The dominant motive of industry, both in nations and in individuals, is self-interest, and its method is war, active or latent. Christ demands that this God of Self-interest shall be dethroned and that the method of war shall be repudiated without compromise, absolutely and finally. If the church is faithful to its Christian mission, the layman will hear in its councils and from its pulpit the demand that the tariff question shall be treated not from the standpoint of what appears to be most advantageous to American interests but what is best for the one family of mankind; that immigration shall be unrestricted, or, if regulated at all, shall be so regulated as to inflict neither slight nor injury upon any group in the one great family of God; that in the treatment of the debts owed this country by other countries, the principle of service, not merely of self-interest shall govern; that our navy and army being instruments for the infliction of injury shall be not reduced, but abolished.

This latter point is vital, for the principle of defending oneself at the expense of others is the negation of the Christian method of life. Military establishments are at best instruments for the infliction of injury upon one group of the family for the apparent good of another group, but there is no place in the Kingdom of God for the use of evil to overcome evil. At the inception of his ministry, Christ refused to accept success, that is, sovereignty over all the kingdoms of the earth, if it was to be gained by evil means. At the end of his life he refused to use his limitless force, his Father's "more than ten legions of angels" to overcome his enemies. He clearly instructed his followers, many of them such as we would deem weak and helpless, to follow his method of overcoming evil by good, at the same time warning them that his method would subject them to persecution and even to martyrdom. Nothing is more clear in his life and teaching than that the endorsement of war for any purpose is a denial of him.

The layman will hear the church demand that the relations between employer and employee shall be free and fraternal, that they shall treat each other as partners, serving together the whole family group. Each partner receives a wage of which he is worthy, and wherever, as in our own country, capitalism is the established order, each partner shares equitably with all other partners the excess of production over wages and salaries, and each partner treats his share of this excess as a steward, on the principle that there is no such thing as private property in the philosophy of Christ, but merely instruments of service.

In a family each member has his or her own specific task—all do not sow or reap, all do not cook, all do not teach. So industry can be considered as a great family, divided for the sake of efficiency into small families, and they in turn into smaller families or companies, each group with its own specific task, this one producing clothes, that meat, and that steel. Is it conceivable that the miseries contingent upon unemployment should be inflicted upon a large section of the first group because of a temporary slackness in the demand for clothing? As soon would one expect a farmer to turn his children out of doors in winter because farm work is then slack.

The layman will hear the church demand unemployment insurance. Or is it conceivable that when sickness over-takes a member of the meat group that his hire should thereupon be withheld from him and his family? Does one so treat one of his own sick children? The layman will hear the church demand adequate sick benefits for each member of each group.

Or can we visualize a group in which the hours and conditions of employment are such as to preclude sufficient time for recreation and worship? Such a picture would be a denial of the supreme value of each of God's children.

BRINGING JESUS' TEACHINGS DOWN TO DATE

The layman will hear the church demand that the police, the court, the prison shall form one redemptive trinity, that none of the three should usurp the prerogative of vengeance, which rests in the Deity alone, and that each should work in cooperation with the others to cure and restore to usefulness. The layman will hear the church protest against capital punishment as being just as clearly a denial of the way of Christ as it was when the "Master stooped down and wrote in the sand."

When the common people hear the church preaching these foundation principles and demanding of itself absolute allegiance to them, they will no longer listen to those who call the church insincere or call her the handmaid of the mighty. Then, as of old, the common people will hear her gladly.

Wartime Church Unity and Its Lessons for Today

By John Ralph Voris

EVER since the signing of the armistice, writers, actors, artists and similar makers and leaders of public sentiment have been lamenting the unwillingness of people to think about war themes. They rightly point out that the result of this mental attitude, in which the men who were in the service seemed not only to share but to lead, has been a failure to capitalize the ideals and to be admonished by the immoralities of the war time. This in many fields is nothing less than a tragedy for measureless values have been dissipated. Of special concern to thoughtful men is the fact that not only people in general but church folk in particular possessed this lethargic attitude toward the deeper religious realities uncovered by the Great War.

However, the recent but growing disposition on the part of the public to be more open-minded toward war-time facts gives one a slight degree of confidence not possible a year ago in suggesting that we turn our thoughts back to one of the most important contributions of the war spirit to religious life, namely, the unity of the church in relation to the work for enlisted men. But this confidence, slight enough at best, is tempered by the memory that the plea for a united church was almost as unpopular during the so-called period of "reconstruction" (God save the mark!) as was any mention of the war itself. The renaissance of denominationalism which came to a climax rather than to an end in the fated Interchurch Movement inhibited enthusiastic interest in ideals of unity, even those that had just been shown by camp experiences to be not theories but practicalities.

The term "church unity" was regarded as a positive menace to the Interchurch, as is indicated by the following incident. Before arranging and offering for publication the notes which form the basis of this paper, they were presented, a year ago, to the publicity department of the Interchurch World Movement with the request that a frank statement be made concerning them. Word came back that the publishing of this message by anyone connected with the movement would be unwise in view especially of the financial campaign being then planned. Like all friends of the larger ideals and hopes of the Interchurch I was unwilling to do or say anything that would in the least handicap the effort toward denominational cooperation, and since it was really of little moment to anyone whether these ideas came to light or not I readily acquiesced.

During the months since the collapse of the plans of the Interchurch there has been an even greater disposition to regard unity as a theme taboo.

But there are two classes of people, at least, who are interested in every demonstration of the principle of church solidarity. There is on the one hand the comparatively small group in every denomination who hopefully have kept a flaming zeal for the cause of ultimate church unity, and have persistently worked through their organizations to this end not only through and since the war but for years before. On the other hand, there is the very much larger number of those who, though they cannot claim to be "church leaders" and, though they are inarticulate, have no interest in continuing outworn church divisions and grieve over every failure of cooperative projects such as the Interchurch. These people—laymen and ministers—an increasing and exceedingly important folk—will gladly face facts that point toward united Christian effort. In one or the other of these groups will be found practically all war workers.

CHURCH SOLIDARITY

All other classes, however, will unite with these in recalling with a feeling of satisfaction the part which the Protestant churches played during the war, and particularly the fact that, in keeping with the spirit of solidarity which characterized our whole nation, these churches found themselves thinking and acting as an organic whole in patriotic and unselfish endeavor. Local churches gave inspiration, leadership, office space and funds for Red Cross, United Warwork, Liberty Loan and endless other campaigns. They released pastors for short and long periods to act as camp workers and chaplains, caring for their broken services as best they could. Local pastors meeting together for war community work felt a new spirit of solidarity. Heretofore they had federated largely to strength their own work. Now they visualized a common cause which made them enter the crusade as one man, while their churches were back of them with never a query as to the advantage to the individual congregation.

Those of us who have been critical of the churches for their seeming indifference toward social problems, involving industrial and international relations, can find few vulnerable spots in their war spirit, which was really social service in a deeply fundamental sense. The American Protestant church had been divided in the Revolutionary war into Tory and Liberal; in the Civil War into North and South. Until the Great Conflict it had never visualized to itself a cause great enough to give the sense and appearance of unity. Something seemed to have lifted the churches out of their ordinary thinking, for the emphasis was not upon their success, or authority, or prestige, or dignity, or size, or budget, or forward program! but simply upon their duty and opportunity. Nor can we recall that any one denomination took advantage of the many openings to capitalize the war in general or the camp work in particular to strengthen itself as a denomination. The corn of wheat was being buried in the ground. The church had lost herself—and had found herself—in a great burst of unselfish patriotism.

UNITED IMPACT OF PROTESTANTISM

All are aware of the truth of these statements as they relate to the community, while those of us who were close to camp work realize that it reached its highest manifestation there. In the camp both at home and abroad a single united impact was made by the Protestant church. Whatever may be said of the work of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. here or overseas one must recognize that the "Y" represented institutionally the Protestant church at work for enlisted men. Working together in the "Y" huts the chaplains, camp pastors, visiting speakers, secretaries, whether selected by the denominations, the Federal Council, the War Time Commission or the Associations, were one force representing one church. And the church was glad of this until the signing of the armistice "when sin broke out" and the era of criticism came.

In our huts we looked amazedly at those pastors from prominent churches streaming into camp, anxious to perform any service, however menial. And the way they did preach when they had the coveted chance. The gospel was very real in those days. Those men in khaki and blue packed in the huts, who listened so intently to the messages from the platform, were possibly going to their deaths. Somehow or other it did not seem fitting or necessary to emphasize the differences between denominations or theologies.

The impression on the enlisted man was of the oneness of the churches. Night after night they came to the huts to hear speakers whom they knew to be Presbyterian or Baptist or Methodist, although sectarian differences were never emphasized. Inevitably the listeners caught the point of view, the vocabulary, the convictions of the speakers. It was an all-round religious education for the enlisted men. It was a vision of the whole gospel, given with singleness of purpose. There has never been anything like it before or since. The men of the service may not say much about this thing. They may scarcely realize it. But we may be sure they will not be wholly satisfied with a constricted gospel again. However, whether they are satisfied or not with a limited gospel, the church owes it to them to give them as broad a vision in peace, with peacetime duties and responsibilities, when they face life as she gave to them during the war when they faced death. And if the church could quickly organize her forces to give this full-orbed gospel amid the rude surroundings of the camp, how much more thoroughly and alluringly could she present it now—if she simply could vividly see the opportunity.

RISING TO OLD IDEALS

The effect upon those visiting ministers who came frequently or for long periods into the camp in bringing them to think in terms of the whole gospel can never be estimated. They felt a sense of oneness with the soldiers, the camp workers and with one another. Although not professionally engaged in work for the men in the camps, yet without compensation for themselves or their churches they came to give the best they had. The war spirit permitted these pastors to be that which their ideals had always demanded. They did not change their ideals; they were simply permitted to rise to them. The inhibiting crust of conventional denominationalism was broken.

The ministers of near-camp cities, meeting frequently to organize their work for the men teeming into town from the camps, spent themselves unreservedly and unselfishly. The enlisted man was invited to share the privileges of many congregations but of one church.

But if the camp spirit gave the consciousness of unity to those serving part time or occasionally, how much further toward that ideal of Jesus expressed in his prayer "that they all may be one" did it lead those of us who gave full energy to the promotion of camp religious work. Chaplains, camp pastors, Y. M. C. A. religious work directors and other pastor-secretaries felt this as keenly as did the laymen. As time went on they freely rejoiced over this development.

Among these Protestant workers this spirit of solidarity was electric. Men of all denominations, of widely differing points of view—conservative and liberal; men accustomed to the individualistic approach to religion, and those willing to hazard their lives on the social message; those who temperamentally were evangelists and those who were religious educators; those stressing the liturgical element and those who had been trained to think liturgy was dry-bones—all pulled together as one team. They met together weekly without dissension. They spent hours considering their common problems without even the discussion of non-essentials. They felt the merging of their souls in prayer and hymn. Most of all they had the companionship of those engaged in a common task so large that they had to unite in order to accomplish its purpose. Sectarianism had been adjourned!

NO DENOMINATIONAL EXCLUSIVENESS

The special denominational representatives, known most frequently as "camp pastors" would come to the camp charged primarily with caring for the men of their own denomination. A day or so for those who were by nature broad of mind, and a week for the most recalcitrant denominationalist, were sufficient to give them the spirit of the camp, and they found themselves the most ardent of all in working for the common good of the men, without thought of denomination. This does not mean that they neglected their duties to the men of their faith, or that they were less loyal to their church, but that they placed first their interest in the work as a whole, and they felt that they were the ambassadors of their respective churches to minister to all the enlisted men.

We thought in terms of unity; we prayed for it; we held conferences concerning it, and established commissions on it. This is something noteworthy. An actual demonstration: nothing on paper; no resolutions; no conventions; no ecclesiastical agreements; no vast expenditures of money to bring it about. But it existed successfully on a nationally wide scale, in a work for several millions of men, in the promotion of the full-orbed program of the Christian church. The soldiers liked it and many praised it openly. More conscious of the development and more articulate in commendation of it were the camp religious workers, particularly the ministers, whatever their denomination or training.

INTERDENOMINATIONAL APPRECIATION

This spirit of unity was brought about in part, at least, through the development of interdenominational appreciation. This does not mean merely tolerance, or breadth of view, though these qualities obtained, but rather the more Christian virtue of understanding the value of what other persons and organizations had to give. There was forced upon all the conviction that the Episcopalian had something to give us that no others to the same degree possessed. So with the Methodist or the Friend. Each denomination had its own contribution to make, and each individual unconsciously gave the strength gained through his denomination. Having visualized there in the camp the distinct contribution of each denomination, we began to realize if in any unit the leadership of any one of the leading evangelical forces was limited or omitted, the religious work there was limping and abnormal.

But not only was there gradually growing an understanding of denominational values, but of temperamental as well. The conservative learned first to moderate his antagonism toward the liberal; then to cooperate with him; then to appreciate his mental attitude and to appropriate what he had to give. The radical learned that nothing is so narrow as illiberal liberalism. It was not that men gave up their convictions in the midst of a dilettante eclecticism. Not at all, for the camp was a place of blazing convictions and not of easy-going tolerance. But here amid an atmosphere which lent itself to mutual understanding men learned to see the point of view of others and to determine their own in that light.

Can this fine spirit of brotherhood be given opportunity to live again as it lived within the camp? It would not mean that the Methodist would applaud and generously acknowledge the work of the Congregationalist, and then go about his way unmoved, but that he will wish to possess all that Congregationalism can give to Methodism—which is a great deal! It means that the Baptist would not merely endure the ritualist, but would ask himself, while maintaining the integrity of his convictions, whether there may not be something that the Episcopalian can give to him which will enrich his religious life—and there is!

CAN THIS SPIRIT LIVE AGAIN

The united impact of the Christian forces in the camps made it possible to present a full-orbed gospel, which after all is the chief function of church unity and the principal raison d'être of the unity movement.

One of the hopeful expressions of this new ideal of spiritual comradeship was the custom in many camps of celebrating the communion in common. It was early in the war game that the first of a series of such observances was held in a large cantonment in the west. There assisted in this service ministers from the Presbyterian, Methodist, United Brethren, Baptist, Episcopalian, Disciples and Congregationalist churches. There in the bare hut those men and the soldiers pledged themselves to their divine leader, conscious of a spiritual unity which was far above the usual expression of interdenominational fellowship.

It was the comradeship of those engaged in a great moral crusade.

And a training conference of religious work directors of all the western camps, after nine days of intensive work of the most gruelling sort, during which there had been builded a full program of the camp work, representative of the whole Protestant church, closed its work with the Lord's supper, administered near midnight. The fifty men privileged to be there will never forget the experience. It seemed as if the physical presence of the Master were there. Those men can never completely "revert to type."

Workers in the overseas areas were conscious to an even greater degree of this sense of Christian brotherhood, regardless of denomination. In fact, while on this side the camp work was a synthesizing of denominational ideals, on the other where death was nearer, and things were simpler, it was a practical elimination of denominational thought. The attainments of the camps here are perhaps more nearly practicable in conditions as they exist today.

TEMPORARY REACTION INEVITABLE

That the center of gravity should move after the war from the single common cause to denominational ideals was natural and perhaps inevitable. There was the reasonable reaction from the extreme unselfishness of war times when churches injured themselves in their eager desire to help the enlisted men. It was necessary to recuperate strength. Moreover, many denominational plans had been held in abeyance during the war and these had to be emphasized or lose their significance to the detriment of good causes. The denominational forward movements were all nobly conceived and efficiently promoted. While some may say that the strength of these projects made the Interchurch success impossible, yet it can just as logically be urged that the forward movements were not strong enough for the Interchurch to succeed. They were caught at a time when they were all fighting for self-existence. They had no energy to spare. Had they been further along their leaders could have afforded to be altruistic and cooperative far beyond the point where their really earnest ideals permitted them to go. But it is not our purpose here to study the philosophy of the rise of the denominational movements, or of the rise and fall of the Interchurch. Our purpose now is simply to call attention to two facts.

The first fact, a tragic one, is this: Many of the church leaders did not see that concerted action was as necessary during the period following the war as it was during the war. Surely at no time during the great conflict was there quite the urgent need for united strategy against sin as there has been during what we first called the period of "reconstruction," which became one of destruction instead. And this is based upon the second fact, namely: The church did not have an adequate program to meet the immediate needs. Neither the denominational movements nor the Interchurch challenged the conscience of the nation with a program for the returning soldier, for international mindedness, or for industrial reconstruction. The denominational and interdenominational projects, great though they undoubtedly were, and based upon the war psychology of promotion, were for a church program as if there had been no war, or as if there were no immediate problems following the war.

The cause of church unity suffered because of the failure to visualize an immediate need great enough to compel concerted action.

Let us frankly mourn over our failure to meet the needs of the day of "reconstruction." Let us face it as social sin, and be humiliated by our failure, a failure far greater than that of the Interchurch, of which the Interchurch collapse was simply a terrible incident. But being humbled, let the church arise, and seek anew her high motives of war times.

A camp worker of wide experience said of the various programs then at their height a year ago these vital words: "If the denominational educational movements or the interdenominational projects do not strive to bring back the high dream of war times, when there was a sense of working unitedly on a common cause, of attacking immediate evils, moral, and social—then may God help us, for we certainly will have slipped backward in spite of our great programs. No matter how many millions of dollars we raise, or how many missionaries we send, or how many colleges we endow, if we shall have lost something of the moral fervor, of the evangelistic passion of a united church working on a common program, we shall have lost to just that extent the spirit of the living Christ."

VERSE

On My Seventieth Birthday

LORD, here am I. My three-score years and ten
All counted to the full; I've fought Thy fight, Crossed Thy dark valleys, scaled Thy rocks' harsh height,
Borne all Thy burdens Thou dost lay on men
With hand unsparing, three-score years and ten.
Before Thee now I make my claim, O Lord.
What shall I pray Thee as a meet reward?

I ask for nothing. Let the balance fall.
All that I am or know or may confess
But swells the weight of mine indebtedness;
Burdens and sorrows stand transfigured all;
Thy hand's rude buffet turns to a caress,
For Love, with all the rest, Thou gav'st me here,
And Love is Heaven's very atmosphere.

DAVID STARR JORDAN.

Prayer

O GOD, in every temple I see people that see Thee, and in every language they praise Thee.
If it be a mosque, men murmur the holy prayer,
and if it be a Christian church they ring
the bell from love to Thee.
Sometimes I frequent the Christian cloister, and sometimes the mosque, but it is
Thou whom I seek from temple to temple.

ABDUL FAZI.

Missionaries

SINGING they go their long adventurous ways;
Far-off alarms ring stirring in their ears;
Splendors that glimmered on the lost frontiers
Shine for the Pilgrims of Earth's kindlier days.
They range a new frontier. The trails they blaze,— Faint trackways in the waste of hates and fears,— Shall lure the feet of unborn pioneers.
No rigors wear them; and no loss dismays.

Lord of all dreamers, who shall see the gleam?
We walk the safer roads with languid feet.
What bright adventure touched the common street
Where Jesus named your name and lived your dream!
Children of Light serve always with high deeds;
Their traffic is in life, and not in creeds.

HELENA GAVIN.

Light

FULL many stars are in the sky,
Yet they are deaf to me;
The one that I must travel by Within myself I see.

It may not prove a steady light,
But 'tis the best I know;
And if it lead me through the night
Or not, I onward go.

And if I find the fabled Morn,
Or sink in utter dark,
I never fail, in paths forlorn,
To listen for the lark.

CHARLES G. BLANDEN.

City Neighbors

I THOUGHT the house across the way
Was empty, but since yesterday
Crepe on the door makes me aware
That someone's living there!

NEW YORK TRIBUNE.

Happiness

THE noblest man's no happier than a hog,
If happiness be reckoned by the bulk.
Indeed, the weight's in favor of the swine.
He boasts by far the better appetite,
Is bigger, fatter, wallows in content.
Not weight, nor quantity, but quality
Gives character to happiness. You must Have soul supremely to enjoy. A pig's
A person: that nice fact has recently
Been demonstrated in a magazine.
At least the writer satisfies himself.
But, person or archangel, even he
Will probably agree that "pigs is pigs,"
And only pigs, in appetite; that squeals
And grunts express the limits of their joy.

Your soul's not made of beef or pork. And stuff
That yields exquisite happiness, be sure,
Is not less subject to exquisite pain;
Your nobleman must buy his pleasures dear.
You'd have yours cheap? Then consort with the hog.
The biggest gets the swill. Just push the others
From the trough, and help yourself! It's lots
Of fun,—if you're a hog. If you're a man
You'll find the soul's sublimest joy is found
In sympathy, in sharing with the rest.

JOSEPH ERNEST MCAFEE.

Prayer

O LIFE that breathest in all sweet things
That bud and bloom upon the earth,
That fillest the sky with songs and wings,
That walkest the world through human birth;

Lead us through these bewildering ways
Of pain and beauty Thou hast trod!
Thou art our creed, our prayer, our praise,
O Christ, Thou human heart of God.

LUCY LARCOM.

Books by

Edward Scribner Ames

Associate Professor of Philosophy in the University of Chicago.

The New Orthodoxy

A popular, constructive interpretation of man's religious life in the light of the learning of scholars and in the presence of a new generation of spiritual heroes.

$1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Psychology of Religious Experience

"Should be read by every thoughtful minister."—The Outlook.

$3.50, plus 15 cents postage.

The Higher Individualism

Sermons delivered at Harvard University.
"Good philosophy and excellent religion."
—The Congregationalist.

$1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn Street,
Chicago, Ill.

English Liberals on "Prussianism" in Ireland

OUR great American democracy desires above all other international relationships to be one of mind with Englishmen. Sir Horace Plunkett, a Protestant, who has done more constructive work for Ireland than any other living man, and one whose sane, balanced and well-informed judgment on the Irish question has more weight with thinking Americans than any other man in Britain, says the verdict of the world overwhelmingly condemns the present regime in Ireland. Upon his return home from America, speaking of American opinion in the matter, he said: "The dominant note in moderate and would-be friendly circles, to which I purposely devoted most of my inquiries, was one of utter bewilderment at the tolerance of the British people for acts perpetrated in their name in Ireland. The whole of this disastrous chapter in the dark history of Anglo-Irish relations has been more closely followed in the United States than in Great Britain." In an open letter to the British people he warns them that there cannot be right mutual understanding between English-speaking peoples "while the scandal of the British government in Ireland remains."

Gilbert Chesterton condemns the present regime in stinging words and in an interview given out in St. Louis the other day said: "It is a tradition in England that foreign affairs must be handled by the aristocracy. The aristocracy has been lamentably diluted by a sprinkling of cads, but still, as a class, it is permitted to dictate the foreign policy. It is unfortunate that Irish matters are considered foreign matters, but they are." That is, the democracy is powerful in internal affairs in Britain but leaves foreign and imperial matters to the aristocracy. In that way England maintains a democratic self-government alongside an aristocratic imperial and colonial government. "I would as soon see babes in perambulators handling the foreign affairs of England," added Mr. Chesterton, "for babes in perambulators are apt to be rather honest and innocent."

America knows no such class strata as that of English aristocracy and she will never sacrifice her essential democracy in any sort of an English understanding that compels her to swallow that aristocracy or its denial of essential democracy in its imperial government. Our Anglo-American alliances and understandings can be sustained only in our common democracy, and the present regime in Ireland is rapidly destroying that dream for all good Americans.

* * *

What English Democrats Think

The Manchester Guardian calls Sir Hamar Greenwood's regime "more Prussian than the Prussians" and says he "clings to the belief that mere murderous blackguardism breaks the spirit of a white people." It speaks of "the chartered crimes of the Black and Tans" and says "contempt for our government's performance in Ireland is visibly lessening from month to month the chance of that substantial solidarity of the English speaking nations which held out, a few years ago, the best hope for our national safety and for the world's peace." It thinks "Sinn Fein, in its political aspect, is largely the fruit of prolonged disappointment, complete mistrust, and the anger produced by inept and wantonly irritating administration."

The Daily News says: "Every day Ireland is being welded more surely and more irresistibly by the premier and his armies into a nation that will not be conquered." The Nation (London) says the government is guided by men who "see Ireland not as a reality but as a nightmare. Never coming into contact with Republicans, they regard them as monsters. They prefer chaos itself to an order not produced by themselves... Dublin Castle will never govern Ireland again, but at least it is going to prevent Irishmen from doing it. Yet it does not even know how to do this. It is to sack a town or fire into an unarmed crowd. It is the logic of a policy of chaos. The government will not give Ireland freedom.

That being so it has no alternative but to give it frightfulness."

General Jan Smuts, the noblest and broadest of democrats, in condemning the present policies adds, "unless the Irish question is settled on the great principles that form the basis of this empire, this empire must cease to exist." This great seer and statesman of the proposed British commonwealth warns that Britain cannot exist in this post-war world of democracy half-democratic and half-aristocratic and that the same policies which Englishmen democratically applied to Englishmen must also be applied to non-English citizens in their world-spanning realm. The Nation agrees with General Smuts, saying: "Our statesmen forget that the Irish question is in a very real sense an English question; that the ruin of liberty in Ireland means the ruin of liberty in England; in the chaos that must ensue the British empire itself may perish." We may crush the Irish, but we cannot do so without lighting fires of hatred in Australia, in America and in the hearts of our army and navy; and without awakening terrible echoes in India." Lord Robert Cecil, of the old conservative House of the Salisbury's, agrees with General Smuts, saying: "Anything which attacks justice, equity, and freedom attacks the basis on which the British empire stood. The supremacy of the law is the guarantee of freedom, and for that all lovers of freedom in our history have fought. Reprisals are the negation of that supremacy."

* * *

The Reaction of Some Conservatives

In a recent address in the house of lords the Archbishop of Canterbury said: "Wrong has turned to right in the minds of many of our officials in Ireland." General Crozier, the military chief of all police forces in Ireland, caught a large group of auxiliary police red-handed in looting and suspended them, ordering court martial for the officers and chief offenders. Dublin Castle immediately restored them to their positions without either a hearing or trial. General Crozier immediately resigned, assigning his reason in the following words: "I consider that theft on the part of policemen in the course of their duties is unpardonable, and I cannot honestly associate myself with a force in which such acts are condoned." The London Times, ever the apostle of conservative English tradition, speaks of the forces in possession

If Not a United Church—What?

By Peter Ainslie

THE first of a series of Handbooks presenting the proposals of a United Christendom. Dr. Ainslie, who has been a pioneer in the cause of unity, has given much thought and labor to attempting a solution of the difficulties which bar the progress of the movement. This volume deals with the necessity, growth and outlook of Christian unity, to which is added a copious appendix. The argument adduced is that if unity be not attained, the church inevitably faces an era of gradually weakening power. Dr. Ainslie writes vigorously, yet without heat or partisanship, and presents a cogent and lucid plea for the cause that must be answered.

Price $1.25 plus 10 cents postage
THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

of Ireland as "an army perilously undisciplined and a police force avowedly beyond control, which have defiled by heinous acts England's reputation." The Daily Mail says "reprisals cannot succeed. They have already brought chaos to Ireland and shame to England."

Lord Parmoor reminds his colleagues that "the essence of representative government is consent, but the only remedy sought to be applied in Ireland is military force. What the English," he says in terms that even a laborite might find strong, "repudiated in time of war on their own behalf, they are now enforcing upon Ireland in what is called a time of peace." "This bill," cried an Ulster conservative in the house of lords when the coercion act was being debated, "will kill England, not Ireland." The Marquis of Aberdeen, former governor general of Ireland, advocates a reversal of the Irish rule and vigorously condemns military reprisals. He says 20,000 private homes have been raided in the past two years, and dates the bitterness of Irish feeling from the appointment of Sir Edward Carson, who had armed Ulster against the Home Rule Act, to a place in the cabinet. Many others frankly state that Sir Frederick Smith and Sir Edward Carson were compounding treason quite as surely as some who were shot for it in Dublin, and that the whole Irish trouble is brought by the determined government of things from a partisan, bitter-ender, Ulsterite viewpoint. Nearly a year ago Sir Stanley Harrington, Commissioner of Education for Ireland, said: "I see disaster ahead if the government does not immediately tear off the mask which Sir Edward Carson has drawn over its eyes." The Earl of Denbigh is convinced that "the policy of reprisals now carried on will never be successful" and says "if allowed to continue more harm will be done to the British empire in its reputation abroad than the average man has any idea of."

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

London, March 8, 1921.

"SHYNESS is never a virtue. At best it is a painful disability, at worst a crime. If you are interested in things of the mind, talk about them if you can get anyone to listen. If you cannot find a sympathetic ear, discuss them like Demosthenes with the waves but do not bottle them up."

These are the counsels of a wise man, Professor Zimmern of Aberystwyth University and they fitly head a column of Table Talk. They were addressed to Welsh students, but there are others who need the same admonition. Good talk is the best of all schools, but good talk is impossible where the talkers are afraid of letting themselves go. And it must be confessed that even among those whose supreme concerns lie in the realm of the spirit, there is too much of the crime of shyness. It has even been suggested by Dr. Clifford that the old fashioned testimony meetings might be revived. "How much we have missed through dropping the meetings for personal witness concerning the power of Jesus Christ in our own experience." There is no doubt that such meetings were often liable to become unreal, or to unloose excessive torrents of emotion or even to give room for cant. But the loss of talk upon the concerns of the kingdom of God is a very grave loss. And it is only necessary for someone to make a beginning to discover how concerned men are about the abiding realities. They will babble on about test matches—a sore subject with us—but in their heart of hearts they are really wondering when the other fellow is going to talk about something that matters.

* * *

Free Church Reply to Lambeth Proposals

The big guns of the free churches are in Manchester this week for the Free Church meetings. Whatever is done of political moment will be cabled before this letter arrives, but it may be assumed that many wise and eloquent speeches will be made. Unhappily, hitherto the striking power of the free church council has not been equal to its speaking power. Its resolutions have not been matched by its achievements. Still at any moment—it may be this week—its platform may become a place of vision for the people, and voices may be heard which will reverberate through this kingdom. On the theme of reunion, much of the task set to the free churches by the Lambeth Conference has been accomplished already by the Federal Council of those churches. A friend, whose judgment I value, has read the reply to Lambeth, prepared but not yet published, and he declares that it is a great document, altogether worthy of the moment and in it there can be discerned, no less than in the Lambeth documents, the evident presence of the divine Spirit.

A London editor said to me last week that in his judgment it was not reunion that mattered so much as the pursuit of reunion. "To travel hopefully is better than to arrive," was his remark. There is truth in this paradox. The churches are busy going into their treasure houses; they are overhauling their armories and perhaps their old clothes; they are compelled to sift and test their traditions and even their prejudices, the most stubborn of all traditions. They may never reach that form of reunion of which they dream, but they will have won something better. It belongs to the character of a life like this that the best remarks are given during the conflict and not at the end. The game itself is always more than the prize. Anyway it is all to the good that churches are facing the demands of the new age upon them and are hearing the call to set their houses in order. The Manchester conference should bring some of the gains which this adventure offers. Those who seek for reunion in the hope of tranquility and cessation from struggles are missing the spirit of the scene altogether. The quest for reunion should be a daring adventure, and whatever reunion is won, it may be assumed that it will bring not inaction nor dull monotony, but a signal for fresh adventures and discoveries which at present it does not enter into the boldest heart to conceive.

* * *

New Wine in New Wineskins

The last has not been heard of a great sermon preached by my friend Rev. C. E. Raven before the Cambridge University. It was a passionate and fearless plea for the church of England to adjust itself to the new renaissance. "New wine must be put into new wineskins." These are some of his pleas. "It is no mere local or temporary crisis through which religion is passing. It is not simply the aftermath of war or the fruits of the labor movement or the result of modernist criticism. We are assisting in the closing stages of a movement of the human spirit, more revolutionary and more universal than any recorded in history, a movement for which the only possible parallel is the renaissance. The new renaissance has given rise to the new reformation. The process is as sure and as inevitable as time itself; we may fear it and we may hate it but we cannot delay or restrain it and if we resist it, we shall be smashed. At present the majority of our officials and the most vocal of our clergy are insisting either that 'there is really no hurry' or that if we must change, let us go back to the past, and not forward into the future. And while they delay, our ruin comes daily nearer."

The revolt of the younger generation is a manifest fact. One can not live for many weeks in a place like Cambridge without realizing that a fresh outpouring of the Spirit has taken place; that at last Christianity has got over the perplexities and adjustments of the past century and that a new and reasonable faith is stirring. But how is it these young men and women are not returning to the church? How is it they do not find their newly discovered and glorious Lord in his church? These are some of the challenges thrown out by Mr. Raven. For the evangelicals he has more hope at the moment than for the Anglo-Catholics. But nowhere does he find that his church is awake to the character of the crisis. With these solemn words the preacher closed his sermon; they will not go unheeded for the speaker is not one of those who fire their shot and then retreat: "It is possible for us also to reform ourselves: God's grace may yet restore to the old wineskins their pliancy and make them fit to contain his new wine. But the season for such a peaceful change is passing fast. Many of us will wait and work and watch in the hope that the change may yet come in time. Only our hope grows fainter. Only there may come a moment—and sometimes it seems at hand—when we can wait no longer, when action at whatever cost will have to be taken, when to be still would be to sin not against man but against God. And if that call comes, that call which no man dare disobey, thousands will rise to answer it."

It is interesting to note that Mr. Raven has undertaken the editorship of The Challenge, a church weekly uncommitted to any party. There will be no lack of life in this paper and if those who really care for a free press are willing to see it through, The Challenge should still do a great work in the days ahead. But over here at least there is much talk about the desirability of a free press and too little disposition to back the free press already in being.

* * *

Strategic Place of Pioneer Missions

Our missionary societies are ending or have ended their financial year. In general it may be said that though they have not reached the high levels of the previous year; they have far exceeded the old levels and though there are deficiencies before many societies, there is no reason for gloom. There has never been a time in which the eyes of statesmen and administrators have turned with more interest and sympathy to the missionaries and their work. Students of history too are beginning to see the critical importance of the work done by the pioneer Protestant missionaries during the nineteenth century. They were, though they were often unaware of it, the prophets of a new conception of empire. They were the pioneers who led the way to the only relation between peoples which offers any hope for the peace of the world. Sometimes the missionary enthusiast may be forgiven when he hears statesmen of today on the race problems, if he exclaims, "I knew that a hundred years ago."

* * *

Non-Conformist in Olney Church

Here is a curious coincidence. On Sunday last, I had occasion to speak for the first time for many years upon John Newton and his Olney group. On Monday morning I received a letter from a friend who told me he is to preach in the Olney church on Good Friday, the first non-conformist to preach in Newton's church where William Cowper worshipped. Newton and his school were very friendly in those days with "dissenters" but apparently not even Mr. Bull, the dissenting friend, within whose spiritual care Newton trusted the poet when he left for London, was permitted to preach in the parish church of Olney. But, once more, we move.

Is there any difference between "normally" and "primarily"? The bishops in the Upper House of Convocation spent a day in discussing the ministry of women in the church. The Bishop of London to allay anxiety proposed to insert in the resolution words which would admit women speakers to occasions "primarily for their own sex." The resolution finally adopted was that "under conditions laid down by the bishop of the diocese, it should be permissible for women duly qualified and approved by him, to speak and pray in consecrated buildings and that such ministrations should be on occasions other than the regular and appointed services of the church and intended normally for congregations of women or of children." But what is the difference? It looks as if "normally" is the more practical word, and may easily become a dead letter. There is no doubt that the claim of women to preach cannot long be denied. The objection to their preaching to mixed assemblies cannot be long maintained, "normally" may prove the last and feeblest of the barriers to be swept away. Wicked cynics ever declare that the only drawback in the charge will be found in the unemployment which it will bring upon many men preachers.

* * *

The readers of The Christian Century will be interested to know that the fine articles by John Drinkwater on Lincoln as a world emancipator are to appear in "Outward Bound," our new monthly magazine dedicated to the nobler internationalism. These articles have appeared in America, but not as yet in this country. They have their burden for this side no less than for America. There is a genuine passion among many in this land for a new world order, and though there are many adversaries, there is, nevertheless, a door opened which no man can shut.

Holy week and Easter are drawing near. It is growing more common every year for churches to render Bach's Passion music, or Stainer's "Crucifixion," and in very many churches courses of Lenten services are given. For many of us, however, the great interpreter of "The Passion" is not the preacher but the musician. Bach's Passion Music, as Dr. Royce pointed out, is a wonderful piece of interpretation. There are some engagements in the year one would drop with a light heart, but not the hearing of the Passion according to St. Matthew in St. Paul's on Tuesday in Holy week. It is a great act of devotion which makes the hearer live over again the story of that night and all that was wrought under the darkened Syrian noon which followed. Strange that the Leipzig Cantor should be our truest guide back to the Man of Sorrows and to the cross and to the lovely morn which should follow the night of weeping!

EDWARD SHILLITO.

Ambassadors of God

By S. PARKES CADMAN

In this book, just from the press, Dr. Cadman, well-known Brooklyn preacher, maintains that the outstanding truths for preachers to proclaim are few, simple and experimental. He bids them find these truths in the Scriptures and shows how their greater peers in the Christian church through all the centuries have taken this Scripture material, and shaped it, each to the needs of his own generation.

Boards $2.50, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
1408 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

CORRESPONDENCE

Dr. Fitch's "Omissions"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The eagerly anticipated article by Dr. Fitch has appeared in your valuable paper. But after reading it and acknowledging its high literary merit and beauty of suggestion, one wonders what was in the mind of the editor when he described the article as "remarkable." It is remarkable, not for what is postulated and definitely stated, but for what is omitted. One quite naturally concludes on having read it that Dr. Fitch thinks that the church does not believe in Jesus, as he interprets such belief. Whereas, the outstanding feature of modern Christianity is that the churches overwhelmingly believe just that—and nothing more. It is this restricted belief that constitutes the present weakness of the church and its ruinous tendency. Take the omissions in the article. There is no mention of sin, except in so far as certain conditions which were in existence in Christ's day, are described as evil. But individual sin—that which to Jesus and his immediate followers constituted the awful barrier between man and God—of this there is no mention in Dr. Fitch's body of belief. Not only is the word itself carefully avoided by him, but the fact of sin—its ubiquitousness, forthright damnableness, its separating effects—this is passed by. Not only is the word "cross" not once mentioned, but all that the cross stood for in the mind of Jesus, of Paul, of John—the reconciliation with God, the forgiveness of sins, redemption from sin—of these things we hear not a word. It is as if man set out to discuss the beauty of the dawn without making mention of the sun. It is as if man attempted to describe conditions of life on this planet and yet ignored the life-giving qualities of the sun. I make mention of sin and the cross as being essential to any reasonable presentation of Christian discipleship, and I protest against being called a reactionary because of this attitude. If Dr. Fitch's system of belief is complete, then evangelical faith is dead and Unitarianism is victorious all along the line.

GEORGE LAUGHTON.

Winnipeg, Canada.

Doesn't Believe in Community Churches

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of March 17 under the caption "Tragedy of Overchurching", my critic missed the point. In my communication, my contention was that the community church does not, will not and can not minister successfully. My point was that the so called community church received a wonderful boost through the Interchurch workers reports. These reports were hurriedly thrown together and therefore are not trustworthy in many cases. As a matter of fact they advocated community churches as the solution of the problems and maintained that the successful church was the church of over a hundred members and that churches under that number ought to combine and constitute community churches. The real truth of the matter is that churches below what they termed the "efficient church" have through the years supplied our ministers and missionaries. The larger churches have been so busy with machinery and making the wheels go round that they have failed to function. If the enthusiastic Interchurch workers had their way our ministerial force instead of increasing would continue to decrease. In my statement, recently published in The Christian Century, I said that there were many unchurched areas but the much heralded community church would not supply the need. Only preachers of conviction can convince, convict and convert others. Should three churches in a given town combine and call a community church preacher, which in nine cases out of ten means one not in harmony with evangelical ideas, how many years would it take that combined church under unconvicted leadership to convert lay members into ministers and missionaries of the cross? I still maintain it's the wrong end at which to begin. Get churches now established to assume the responsibility of filling up the gaps in unevangelized areas. Get them to select and properly equip the most promising of their young people and send them forth to preach the word. These going out with a spirit born of conviction and not by compulsion will give those unevangelized areas what they need regardless of what they want. The writer has read, re-read and studied Interchurch reports and he has come to the conclusion that all that data, hurriedly collected, ought to be "junked" along with the machine that produced it.

Corresponding Secretary

J. FRANK GREEN.

Michigan Christian Missionary Society.

Victims of Ecclesiastical System

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Permit me to express to you my appreciation of the paper you are giving us. I know of no religious journal that so clearly interprets the mind and heart of the age—it is even far in advance of the age. There is a breadth voiced through the columns of The Christian Century that is refreshing to one who has grown weary with worn out traditions and interpretations. I feel that we are all the victims of, not only a vicious, economic, political, and social system, but of a vicious ecclesiastical system as well—a system that involves a narrow and petty competition, and this competition invites unchristian methods which must be hateful to the Father of us all. God speed you in your efforts to liberate us from ecclesiastical and denominational bondage.

A. T. CARR.

Clergy Fares—A Layman's View

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: A bill is now before the Legislature of Nebraska proposing, as I understand it, half-fare permits to ministers (and to charity workers) on the railroads within Nebraska. I observed yesterday in the paper that the committee having it under consideration in one of the houses of the Legislature has recommended the bill for passage. Such half-fare permits have been granted in interstate traffic for some time.

Ministers are entitled to know how the half-fare permit for clergymen appeals to the layman. What I say here I believe to be representative of a large body of lay opinion.

I talked recently at lunch with a passenger representative of one of the railroads, and half-fare permits for preachers came into the discussion. Speaking of interstate permits, the tenor of his talk was as follows:

"You know the boys out on the road, the train crews, despise these permits. They soon learn to spot the preacher who is riding on such a permit, and they find often that he buys a half-fare ticket to the nearest point in another state over the Nebraska line, when he is not intending to go outside Nebraska, in order thereby to get the half-fare rate. This is often done on trips from Lincoln to Omaha. There is one man I have in mind who occasionally goes to Omaha from Lincoln on the last passenger train of the day, a local that goes no farther than Omaha. He gets a half-fare ticket from Lincoln to Council Bluffs, and of necessity must leave the train in Omaha.

"There is another preacher in Lincoln who preaches at X—in Nebraska near the state line. He buys a ticket at the half-fare rate to the first station beyond, and gets off at his preaching point in Nebraska. One trip there was no ticket on the train for X—; and the train ran right through X—to the first point in the adjoining state. It was a mighty mad preacher that got off the train. He did everything that a preacher is supposed to do when mad, except cuss. He said: 'Why didn't you stop at X—?' 'There was no occasion to stop at X—.' 'But you knew I wanted to get off at X—.' 'There wasn't a ticket on the train for X—.'"

Imagine, if you can, such a preacher, trying to put across to those trainmen the gospel of Jesus Christ.

I wonder if the preachers in Nebraska know how the public will regard a half-fare law in their favor. I wonder whether individual preachers know how they will be regarded, by laymen, if they accept a half-fare permit within Nebraska, when legalized by act of the Legislature. It strikes me that the ministry, in order to preserve its self-respect, should be heard right now deploring the passage of the pending law, in order to remove from themselves the suspicion of a desire for its passage.

Since 1907 in this state even the tobacco-spitting, drygoods box-whittling man on the street has been opposed to the railroad pass. Men who have no use for churches have gotten to a plane of ethics in this matter that demands that every man and woman shall pay full fare on the railroads. It appalls me to see the preachers, ministers of high ideals, begin the attack upon the law, and show themselves, if they are backing this proposed measure, to be below the plane of ethics, in this regard, of us plug-uglies of the streets.

Two or three months ago I went to the depot to buy a railroad ticket, and the man just ahead of me was a well-groomed clergyman who purchased a half-fare ticket to some point out of the state. I said to myself as he did it: "Mr. Man, some washwoman with worse than no husband, and with a bunch of half-starved kids, is helping to pay your railroad fare."

Why make the preacher an object of charity? Why does he not stand up and demand a living wage, and get it or quit? There is little use for preachers to preach to us if they cannot command our respect; and I say to you frankly that I do not want any preacher pointing out to me the better life, who is riding around the country, in whole or in part, at the expense of the public. How can he ever acquire a reputation for sincerity when he discusses any problem having to do with the railroads? How can he ever do anything to bridge the gap between the church and organized labor?

The preachers of Nebraska have their choice just now. They can subside into odium with their little old half-fare, if they get it, and lower themselves collectively and individually in the estimation of the public; or they can repudiate the "hand-out" business, and demand a proper wage, and elevate their profession collectively and individually in the estimation of the public.

A few years ago a state official of our church not only rode on an interstate half-fare permit or a pass, but went into the newspapers to justify his practice. Ever since then I have had to listen to the cackling of sinners with whom I associate. Please do not make it more difficult for us who are friendly to the church and friendly to preachers to stand up for them and for the work they are endeavoring to do, by gouging at the vitals of the anti-pass law, for their individual financial betterment.

Make us fellows in the pews pay full fare on our ministers' salaries, so they can pay full fare on the railroads; and thereby no apologies will be due and forthcoming from anybody to anybody.

Lincoln, Neb.

T. F. A. WILLIAMS.

Contributors to This Issue

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, Minister Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City.

JOHN R. VORIS, Secretary Near East Relief; formerly associated with Interchurch World Movement.

HAROLD A. HATCH, New York layman.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Duty of Health*

THERE was a day when the marks of a saint were an emaciated frame, hollow eyes and filth. Simeon Stylites was a sad object from a health point of view. Saints used to scourge their own backs, and becoming constantly thinner, to draw the knotted-rope belt a bit tighter as the weary months went by. The theory, in that day, false as some of our theological notions in this, was that the suppression of the body meant the exaltation of the spirit. In these times of physiological psychology we know that mind is based on body—you are yourself, not part spirit and part body. The theory on which we work, then, is that of a strong mind in a sound body. Moreover, it is a positive duty to keep the body as sound as possible. Broad-minded congregations no longer object to the minister's game of golf. Broad minded ministers promote Boy and Girl Scouts and indoor and outdoor athletics for all. The gymnasium in the church may or may not be advisable, but no one can gainsay the joy of a preacher who faces healthy people rather than lean, crabbed, dyspeptic, flabby "saints," whose whole theological system is perverted and morbid. "Nightmare" religions you might call some of these frightful convictions. (Let us learn here and now that your most cherished conviction may be dead wrong, even if it is your conviction.)

One of the most beautiful metaphors used to describe a sound body and a strong mind is: "Your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit." This figure of speech cannot be taken so literally as to indicate that the Spirit is a kind of independent tenant. Noble spirits love noble dwellings. Notice Washington's home at Mt. Vernon and Jefferson's at Monticello. Gladstone lived in Hawarden Castle, he also lived in an impressive body. Paul may have had weaknesses, but I cannot think of Jesus except as dwelling in a beautiful body. Greek temples combined beauty and strength, so ought our bodies. The Christian's ideal should be an accurate mind in a strong and well-developed body.

Health costs. Not only is denial necessary but positive effort at development as well. Some of us go to gymnasiums three times a week, some of us walk and play games at an effort for the purpose of keeping our bodies fit. It costs effort. Many men guard their diet and force themselves to take ex-

*Lesson for April 10, "Bible Teachings About Health." Scripture, 1 Cor. 6:19, 20; 9:24-27; Gal. 6:7, 8.

The Malden Survey

By Walter S. Athearn

THE Interchurch World Movement gave us some valuable things, and here is one. This survey of a typical urban community, Malden, Mass., with regard to the seventeen church buildings and religious educational plants, is made and compared to the standards on the Interchurch score card. The book is abundantly illustrated with photographs and should be of large value to a community wishing to have a building program that will eventually result in an "adequate number of properly constructed and well located churches."

Price, $2.50 plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

ercises in order to keep in fine condition. Paul "gave his body the black eye"—he says. If the body cries out for whiskey, give it, not whiskey, but a punch in the eye! If the body clamors for indulgence—land a right jab on the jaw! Self-denial is part of the cost of being a Christian. What would we not give to be able to impress this idea upon our young people? But self-expression is as truly a Christian duty. Hugh Black has written upon "Culture and Restraint." To express the best of which you are capable is surely a Christian duty.

A saint? Yes, I saw one this week. He is eighty-two years old, he has gray hair and pink cheeks, he walks erect, he is full of vitality—and he never misses church. He gave $1,000 to charity last week. He is a healthy saint.

JOHN R. EWERS.

BOOKS

THE ADVANCING HOUR. By Norman Hapgood. Mr. Hapgood is an outstanding liberal, always worth reading, particularly now. One may quarrel, to be sure, with his definition of Liberalism. He seems to regard it as a mediatorial school of politics deriving its meaning from the extremes between which it stands. This is inadequate. Liberalism is to be defined not by its specific content, but by the type of thought which it represents. The contempt of radicals which present day liberals have allowed to put them on the defensive, rests on a misapprehension. The liberal is not a middle-of-the-roader, clinging desperately to the "system"; rather he is one who believes in freedom, truth and the open road. He thinks more highly of the equipment of progress than of the goal, which is ever present in the radical's mind. The liberal may accept today radical conclusions, tomorrow conservative; his distinguishing mark is his type of mind—his regard for truth and freedom, his catholic spirit, his intellectual appreciation.

But the merits of Mr. Hapgood's book are much greater than any fault one may find with it. In a masterful way he exposes war propaganda, particularly that directed against Russia. After reciting a story of unspeakable atrocities the truth of which he vouches for, a tale which makes the blood boil against the Bolsheviks, he discloses that it happened not in Russia, but in the United States, and the victims were not bourgeoisie, but Negroes. Harking back to the German invasion of France: "Tell me," I inquired (of a French officer), "is it true that the Germans shot up the hospital on purpose?" "Certainly," he replied, "why not? We had a battery behind it."

In an admirable chapter, "What the Issues Are"—Mr. Hapgood draws a deadly parallel between the speeches in the present congress against the League of Nations and the arguments put forward in 1788 against the adoption of our federal constitution. For example, a Virginian: "What is the situation of Virginia? She is rich with her resources as compared with those of the others. . . . I can see what she gives up, which is immense. The little states gain in proportion as we lose. Every disproportion is against us." Again, in New York: "If we adopt this constitution, it is impossible, absolutely impossible, to know what we give up and what we retain." What a familiar sound has the protest from someone in Georgia who deprecates "the possibility of Congress calling on the militia of Georgia to quell disturbances in New Hampshire!" "The Advancing Hour" is an intellectual and moral tonic. (Boni & Liveright. $2.00.)

RUSSIA IN THE SHADOWS. By H. G. Wells. Mr. Wells here holds that the United States must accept the present regime in Russia and help it to function; the alternative will be letting Russia disintegrate into chaos, which would mean the sure downfall not only of Asia but also of entire Western civilization. (Doran. $1.50).

A HARMONY OF THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS IN GREEK. By Burton and Goodspeed. The purpose of this book is not "harmonization or the discovery from the narratives of a historical order of events, but the exhibit of the facts respecting the parallelism of the Gospels as they stand." (University of Chicago Press. $3).

March 27—May 1—June 5

Three great days and three great events in our calendar.

MARCH 27, EASTER

The day for remembering the widow, the orphan and the aged.

DID YOU TAKE THE OFFERING?

No! It is not too late. Take it. Send it in. The children need it.

MAY 1, HOME MISSIONS

The Department of Home Missions is one of the great Americanizing agencies of America.

It is keeping Church Doors Open by aiding State and Provincial Boards in sustaining 149 preachers.

It is Christianizing the Foreigner by sustaining missions in their midst in three great cities of the country, Cleveland, Chicago and New York.

It is Seeking to Save the Indian by opening a fine educational and evangelistic work among them in the Northwest.

It is Giving the Highlander a Chance through three fine schools for the youth of the mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee.

It is Solving the Race Problem by supporting six schools and a corps of fine preachers among the Negroes.

It is Removing the "Yellow Peril" by Christianizing the Orientals in five cities on the Pacific Coast.

The French of Louisiana are responding wonderfully to a fine mission in their midst.

IT IS THE CHALLENGE
Of Country and Of Christ

Send for a Fine Line of Free Literature and Supplies.

JUNE 5TH

is Children's day for Foreign Missions. The day when children clasp hands around the world.

IT IS NOT TOO SOON

to order supplies. They are the best. They are free. The new exercise by Miss DeMoss,

"CHURCH BELLS AROUND THE WORLD" is one of the finest.

BY THE WAY

United Christian Missionary Society
ANNUITY BONDS ARE POPULAR.

Forty-six have been issued in five months.

They combine all the good qualities of the six old Societies. Safe as a Government bond, more reliable than a will, as productive as the best.

Send all communications and make checks payable to

The United Christian Missionary Society
1501 Locust Street St. Louis, Missouri

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

General Convention of R. E. A.

The general convention of the Religious Education Association was held in Rochester recently. The general theme was "Education for World Fellowship." It was the point of view of most of the speakers that world peace will be accomplished only through an educational process which must begin with the child and continue through college into adult life. Prof. T. G. Soares of the University of Chicago spoke on the subject "Is World Fellowship Practicable?" He laid down the conditions for such fellowship in international fellowship and national humility. In referring to the plan for organizing the world for peace he declared that there could be no world peace which did not include Germany, but on the other hand that Germany could enter into fellowship with other nations only through the pathway of reparation. President McGiffert spoke on "The Church and World Fellowship" and Prof. Edward C. Moore presented the theme "The World Outlook of the Church." A number of these addresses will be published and will help in further clarifying the thinking of the church in a time when there has been but little clear vision.

Criticize Students for Extravagance

The Northwestern Christian Advocate tells the story of a student who recently refused a Cecil Rhodes scholarship because the allowance of $1,500 was not enough to live on. The journal then proceeds to moralize over the present generation of students. "One trait the present-day student has developed is extravagance. He graduates with the simple life fairly eradicated by a score of money-demanding activities that would have made his father stand aghast. The average student of today spends more needlessly than his father's entire yearly outlay at college. Automobiles, taxis, dinners, dances, clothes, athletics, and so forth, pile up the total rapidly. Though colleges are scattered so generously over the country, it is to be doubted if the chances of obtaining an education today are any more pronounced than in the past generation."

Methodist Friction in the Southland

The task of the reunion of Methodism is definitely retarded by the ambitious plans of church promoters who insist upon organizing new congregations in territory already occupied. One of the first accomplishments in the negotiations for unity between the Methodist Episcopal church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was an agreement that "where either church is doing the work expected of Methodists, the other church cannot organize a society or erect a church building until the bishop having jurisdiction in the case has been consulted and his approval obtained." Recently the north church started work in Orlando, Fla. When protest was made by the southern Methodists, Bishop Richardson of the northern body said: "In organizing a society or erecting a church in any place he regarded the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, as he would the Presbyterian church or any other church." By implication he would not regard highly the rights of any of these Christian organizations. The incident may not be important in itself for interest in Orlando, Fla., is not widespread, but unless the northern leaders disavow the utterances of their bishop, the cause of reunion will be definitely retarded. The plan for union favored by the southern Methodists was not accepted by the General Conference of the northern church, and if bad feeling arises over some local occurrence, the law of the tooth and the fang may once more be invoked to settle the issues between the two sister Methodisms. This would be a deplorable end to the negotiations for union which have gone on for years.

Woman Minister Chaplain at Springfield

The first woman minister ever appointed in Illinois as chaplain of the senate is Miss Norma Brown, pastor of the Disciples church at Carlock, Ill. She is a recent graduate of Eureka College and is the daughter of a minister, her father being an Illinois pastor. Her work has been so unique in Carlock that it has been recognized by this appointment. There are several women in the ministry of the Disciples in Illinois who are giving a good account of their stewardship.

Lambeth Proposals Encounter New Difficulty

Rev. R. C. Gillie, president of the Free Church Council of England, was discussing the subject of union recently as it related to the Lambeth proposals. He finds in the Lambeth document no clear word on the matter of intercommunion with American and Scottish Christians in case the proposals are accepted. The close communion practice of the Anglican church is the stumbling block. He says: "If we in England became reunited with the church of England would that mean that we had to cease from offering and enjoying open communion with the Presbyterians of Scotland and our non-Episcopalian fellow Christians in the United States of America and in the dominions? If so, we are placed in a very real dilemma. The Anglican church is concerned, and rightly concerned, that no action on its part should make more difficult a possible reunion with the eastern church. But we are equally concerned lest the present degree of fellowship with some 20,000,000 of fellow communicants should be imperiled. Were we to join in visible union with the five million fellow Christians who are communicants in the church of England, would this mean that our looser but quite actual fellowship with this much larger number of Christ's people would be infringed and brought to an end? Is that the price we are asked to pay? I hope it is not, but if it were, I think we should feel that we were not only disloyal to our past, and to the largeness of life which our Lord has taught us, but we should be disloyal to the sacred cause of unity itself. I doubt whether the mind of the church of England is clear on this point or whether the reality of our difficulty is felt by it."

Methodist Pastors Endorse Steel Report

While the steel report of the Inter-church World Movement is being condemned in some quarters as too radical, three hundred leaders of Methodism in city pulpits assembled at Buffalo recently passed a resolution commending the report to the ministers and laymen of the church. In the resolution they say: "We assert the fundamental right and duty of the Christian church to preach and to teach those ideals of social and industrial justice which will prevent the strife and misunderstandings now so characteristic of human relationships."

Mormon Church Deals With Polygamy

The Mormon church in Utah has recently excommunicated fifty people who have been practicing "interchange of wives." The head and founder of the colony is Moses S. Gudmundson, formerly professor of music at the Brigham Young University. He claimed to have had direct revelation from on high authorizing his views on illicit love. The evil roots of sexual irregularity are still in the Mormon church in spite of the efforts of some very excellent people to bring the church up to twentieth century standards of conduct.

Layman Issues Challenge to Debate

The agitation over the Sunday question which has been nation-wide has given the Seventh-Day Adventists a great opportunity to advertise their doctrines. Recently a carpenter in Indianapolis, C. O. Bolton, printed in the local papers the following challenge: "To whom it may concern: If any one can prove that the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, is the Sabbath, or ever was or ever will be, I will give a year's work for such proof." The method of determining doctrinal issues through public debate was common fifty years ago. It will be interesting to see whether any minister accepts the challenge that has been given by the doughty carpenter.

Asserts That Business Ethics Are Bad

Since Mr. Babson began his preaching, a number of laymen have taken the platform to set forth the truth that business welfare is impossible without an ethical basis. Among these is Mr. Dick Miller, president of the City Trust Company of Indianapolis. In an address recently before the Rotary Club of Wabash, Ind., he said: "The ethics of business is bad. We are getting into sharp practices that are not sound. Big financial institutions are stooping to methods that should be frowned on and that must be discontinued before business can get back to the sound basis of several years ago. Too many of us think the world owes us a living.

Dr. Willett Completes Long Tour for Federal Council

Dr. Willett is just completing a journey of nearly three months in the interest of the Federal Council of Churches and the cooperative movement in general among the churches. He left Chicago soon after the middle of January and went to the Pacific Coast, stopping in Denver and various points in Utah, Idaho and Washington to visit local church federations, and to confer with Christian leaders. He attended the annual meetings of the federations in Seattle, Portland and Sacramento, and was present at important gatherings of those in San Francisco, Fresno, and Los Angeles. He delivered addresses on the subject of closer relations among the churches, in these cities and a number of others, including San Diego and El Paso. Addresses were also made by him in a number of the educational institutions of these various localities. He preached in many churches of the Disciples, as well as in those of other religious bodies. On the way back he conducted a four days lectureship on important problems in the work of the church at Meridian Miss., held under the auspices of the cooperating churches. At present he is delivering the midday Lenten addresses under the direction of the Church Federation of Norfolk, Va. He will return for his usual work at the University of Chicago in the spring quarter.

Church Film Corporation Is Growing

Dr. Paul Smith, president of the International Church Film Corporation, has announced the appointment of Mr. W. E. Wilkerson of Chattanooga, Tenn., the largest distributor of motion picture films of the South, as vice president and general manager of the organization. Mr. Wilkerson is president and managing director of the Signet Film Corporation, a three million dollar concern, the largest below the Mason and Dixon line. He is a member of the Baptist church and well familiar with the evangelical viewpoint in the use of pictures. The International has such a growing demand for pictures that it is not able to keep up, indicating the rapidity with which the churches are adopting the modern device in their educational and recreational work.

Episcopal Church Moves on Question of Women's Ministry

The church of England has been agitated ever since the Lambeth Conference over the question of the ministry of women. The bishops of the province of Canterbury have voted that under conditions laid down by the bishop of the diocese, it should be permissible for women duly qualified and approved by him to speak and pray in consecrated buildings. Such occasions should be other than the appointed seasons of worship in the church and the congregations should be normally made up of women and children. The York convocation passed similar resolutions but did not pass the restriction that the congregations should be made up of women and children. One bishop has threatened to withdraw from the church on account of this action, but the other bishops have refused to be influenced by this threat. The Dean of Worcester is contending that the word church in the New Testament sense never refers to buildings and that the restrictions against women speaking in consecrated buildings while they are allowed to speak in church congresses are illogical and contrary to the teaching of the scriptures. He asserts that it is prejudice rather than principle that is keeping women from speaking in the English pulpits.

Knights of Columbus and Socialism

The Knights of Columbus, a Roman Catholic secret order for men, has been engaged in recent years in counteracting the influence of socialists and radicals in the United States. As the church has its face set against socialism, the Catholic who became a socialist leaves the church and there is a great leakage in this way. The magnitude of the work done may be gathered by the figures from official sources. During the past eight years the lecturers of the Knights of Columbus have spoken to two million people. At the close of each address there has been time for questions after the forum method. It is said that 800,000 persons have asked questions. These have been preserved and tabulated. The lecturers have been from the ranks of working men untainted with any sus-

The Passing of Dr. Gunsaulus

THE death of Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus removes from Chicago its leading minister. In the middle west there has never been pulpit of such versatility, and of such varied interests. His passing has been rightly interpreted by the press of this city as the death of one of the city's foremost citizens. Dr. Gunsaulus was born Jan. 1, 1856, at Chesterville, Ohio. At an early age he was converted at an altar meeting of a Methodist church and for many years he maintained his Christian fellowship in that communion.

The educational preparation of Dr. Gunsaulus was made at Ohio Wesleyan University. Here he laid the foundations of a scholarship which was kept alive to the time of his death. He was well known at the book stores of Chicago as a constant patron of the departments of rare books, and it was his suggestion to name a certain quiet nook in McClurg's store as "Saints and Sinners Corner." It is interesting that in recent years his reading and thinking have been almost exclusively in the field of art. He was an interested member of the board of trustees of the Art Institute.

Dr. Gunsaulus chose the profession of preacher after graduation, and held pastorates in Baltimore and Chicago. Called to a Congregational church, he remained through all the later years of his life a Congregationalist, though his church in the loop was organized as a non-sectarian congregation, going by the name of Central Church. He tried his hand at many callings but it is significant that he never was able to repress his preaching instinct. Since resigning the pulpit of Central Church two years ago he has been engaged practically every Sunday preaching in some vacant pulpit in Chicago or elsewhere. He brought to his pulpit the feeling of the mystic nicely balanced with the sympathies of the social reformer.

Dr. Gunsaulus was also enamoured of the work of teaching. He has taught at Yale, the University of Chicago, Ohio Wesleyan and Miami University of Oxford, O. Through his friendship with the late Philip D. Armour he was enabled to fulfil his dream of founding a great technical school in Chicago, of which he has been president since its founding. His administration has continued to be progressive. As a teacher and educational administrator he would have deserved his place among the city's great men. Dr. Gunsaulus has been known throughout the United States as a lyceum and chautauqua lecturer. Three lectures are particularly known all over the middle west as works of genius. These are "Oliver Cromwell," "George Washington and American Statesmanship," and "Savonarola." As a lecturer he was no mere memory machine, but had the rare gift of extemporizing to fit peculiar situations in which he might find himself. He was the author of several volumes of sermons and a volume of verse. He wrote a biography of William Ewart Gladstone, and produced a life of Christ, under the title, "The Man of Galilee."

In the creation of Central Church of Chicago, Dr. Gunsaulus was a unique figure. Long since the theater church has disappeared from the great cities of America. As originally launched by Prof. David Swing it was an institution of theological protest, and when the churches themselves grew progressive, the theater church lost its raison d'être. Dr. Gunsaulus did not interpret his mission in terms of protest. He had a constructive message, adapted chiefly to the need of the unchurched men of the community, and he preached to one of the greatest congregations in the land.

The funeral of Dr. Gunsaulus was conducted at New England Congregational church. The service was participated in by Dr. Charles W. Gilkey of Hyde Park Baptist church, Dr. Frederick F. Shannon present pastor of Central church, and Dr. Clarence F. Brown of Hinsdale, a brother-in-law of Dr. Gunsaulus. Mr. J. Ogden Armour said of him: "He was one of the ablest, broadest-minded men who ever followed the ministry. He possessed a very attractive and charitable personality, beloved by all with whom he came in contact or whose good fortune it was to be associated with him."

picion of capitalism. They have spoken in behalf of the middle way of industrial peace and cooperation. The result of the eight years' work is a pretty clear understanding of the radical spirit in this country, since in every city the known radicals were invited to the meetings. While the organization has been combatting social radicalism, it has been working at social relief. A half million men have been placed in jobs in the past eight years.

Presidential Church Has Been Chosen

The church the President attends is always the fortunate one in Washington. President Harding in the days when he was senator attended Calvary Baptist church. The President attended this church the first Sunday after his inauguration and it seems likely that this will be the presidential church. Great throngs are now coming to the church, and many are turned away. The church is without a pastor, Rev. Samuel H. Green having recently died. Rev. J. Stanley Durkee, D. D., president of Howard University, has been supplying the pulpit recently.

Scottish Church Union Moves Forward

The present government of Great Britain has promised to introduce in parliament a bill which would further the cause of church unity in Scotland. Both the Established Church and the United Free Church have voted by large majorities in favor of union. The minority that has been unfavorable has insisted that disestablishment should precede reunion. These minorities are often troublesome in the case of church union and it is proposed that in this instance they shall be left altogether without legal footing.

Theological Students Go Out Evangelizing

The students of the Newton Theological Institution are accustomed to go out during the Easter holiday to the churches in teams and conduct evangelistic meetings. Some of the students sing while others do the preaching. The young men receive from the churches their actual expenses. This year ten different teams were formed, four of them going up into Maine.

Denominational Relationships in the Cabinet

The denominational affiliations of the new cabinet are a matter of interest and these are readily secured from "Who's Who." Only one man in the cabinet is without a church home, which is in itself significant. The two larger religious organizations not represented are the Disciples and the Roman Catholics. The following is the statement in detail: "Two members of President Harding's cabinet, Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon and Postmaster General Will H. Hays, are Presbyterians. Henry C. Wallace, secretary of agriculture, is a member of the United Presbyterian church. Secretary of State Charles E. Hughes and Secretary of Labor James J. Davis are Baptists; Secretary of War John W. Weeks, Unitarian; Secretary of the Navy, Edwin Denby, an Episcopalian; Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty a Methodist, and Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover, a Quaker. Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall has no denominational affiliation. President Harding is a Baptist, and Vice President Coolidge is a member of the Congregational church."

Fred Smith Says There Will Be One Church

Fred B. Smith, noted Y. M. C. A. worker, recently spoke on the future of religion before a Lenten meeting in Washington. He said: "Slowly but surely we are tending toward a universal church; a universal religion: I believe the break will come and that the whole human family will find a common way to say a common prayer to one God. I believe that Jesus intended that there should be one common form of worship and ultimately it will be brought about."

Secretary Daniels and Sunday

The keeping of Sunday in the navy was one of the interests last dealt with by Secretary Daniels before he retired from the service. He ordered that no work should be performed on Sunday except work of necessity, and that no vessel should begin a cruise on Sunday except in an emergency. When there was no chaplain on board, he directed that a clergyman from the shore should be secured when possible and divine service held. In issuing his order the secretary recalled the words of President Lincoln in a famous order issued in 1864: "The President, commander in chief of the army and navy, desires and enjoins the orderly observance of the Sabbath by the officers and men in the military and naval service. The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiment of Christian people, and a due regard for the divine will demand that Sunday labor in the army and navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity. The discipline and character of the national forces should not suffer nor the cause they defend be imperiled by the profanation of the day or name of the Most High."

Pennsylvania Churches Fighting Sunday Bill

The Sunday liberals are the people who are introducing the new legislation for the most part, and there is now a bill before the state legislature of Pennsylvania permitting commercialized athletic sports on Sunday when local communities vote for them. Sunday baseball is the interest that seeks the new law. The churches oppose the measure and petitions are being gathered over the state. A few years ago a similar measure was defeated, and it is believed that the present bill will meet with the same fate.

Knights of Columbus Opposed to Anti-Semitism

The anti-Semitic movement in the United States has been smitten hip and thigh, and it is not likely that anyone will be foolish enough to start anything like that soon again. It is gratifying to note that enlightened leaders of the Knights of Columbus order as well as Protestant editors were opposed to dis-

Promotes Anglo-American Friendship

A REMARKABLE service was held on Sunday evening, March 6, in Central Congregational church at Winnipeg, Canada. The Rev. George Laughton took charge of this church on the first Sunday of the present year. It is situated in the heart of the business district. For the past month the evening congregations have numbered over two thousand. At a recent service it was computed by the ushers that there were present over twelve hundred men between the ages of 20 and 35. The pastor, while a Britisher by birth, is an American citizen, and was pastor of the Congregational church at Riverside, Calif., until he assumed charge of Central church. Noting the misunderstanding, fostered by certain sections of the press and by party politicians, of the American spirit and purpose, he conceived the idea of holding a meeting in the interests of Anglo-American friendship. He secured the attendance of the Hon. T. C. Norries, premier of Manitoba, and of Mr. J. I. Brittain, the American consul. The building was crowded to the doors, over twenty-four hundred people being present. Premier Norris urged that nothing should be left undone to silence the harsh and unfair criticism now being heard on both sides of the border. He pleaded that Canada should act as intermediary between the United States and the British empire. Said he: "Situated as this country is; knowing the people to the south as Canadians can and do know them; knowing the people of the motherland even better by far than before the war, the work that Canada can do to bring about peace is even greater and will in time prove to be more effective than the deeds performed by Canadians during the war."

Consul General Brittain brought greetings from the United States. He pleaded that the press should cease its denunciations; should strive to foster a better understanding between the two peoples, and assured Canadians that Americans desired nothing but peace and good will with the people of the British empire.

Rev. George Laughton warned the people of Canada against forming their views of what the United States is thinking and doing from what appears in the yellow press. The men who hold authority of any kind there are striving to secure the spread of order, the march of progress, the reign of righteousness, and the advancement of international peace. Songs of the English-speaking world were sung. The meeting was brought to a close by the singing of "America" and "God Save Our King."

crimination against Jews because of race or religion. A news report tells the following story: "Denouncing an alleged anti-Jewish movement in southern parts of the United States, Supreme Knight James A. Flaherty of the Knights of Columbus announced at his home here tonight that he had called upon 2,200 Knights of Columbus lecturers in the United States and Canada to combat anti-Semitism. 'An attack on one religion or race may easily develop into an attack on any religion or race,' his message to the lecturers read: 'The Knights of Columbus will oppose the anti-Semitic movement because it is un-American. There are undesirables of every race in this country, but that does not justify proscription of any race.'"

Noted Woman Preacher Is Ill

Miss Maude Royden, the noted woman preacher of London, has been ill for several weeks and out of her pulpit. She returned to London from Hinhead recently but is forbidden by her physician to preach or speak for another fortnight. Another woman preacher, Miss Cicely Ellis, has been filling her appointments during her illness.

Christian Daily of Chicago Suspends Publication

The American Daily Standard of Chicago, which issued its first number at Christmas time, has suspended publication. Its editor-in-chief states that the reason for the suspension is the abnormal financial conditions and the lack of support among Christian people. The judgment of astute church leaders about the city supplements this report in many particulars. A Chicago churchman could not substitute the paper for Chicago dailies, since it was written for the middle west and often omitted important city news. The burden of supporting two daily papers was too great. The paper was established without securing the support of any of the great Protestant church leaders and in the personnel of its board it was altogether too closely allied with the Moody Institute group to satisfy some. The positions taken by the paper were largely those of the Moody Institute, the sociological positions being often antiquated as well as the theological. Perhaps another contributing factor to its defeat is the fact that Chicago has an evening daily which is quite as Christian as the American Daily Standard was, though in private hands. This paper makes its own way without asking stock subscriptions of the church people.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS

THE following named books are only slightly shelf-worn, and are here listed at from 25 to 50 per cent below their regular price. Add 6 cents on each book for postage.

At $1.00

The Awakening of Asia. Hyndman.
Christopher. Lodge.
How to Pray. C. L. Slattery.
Day by Day With the Master. Cluett.
The Inner Circle. E. D. Jones.
Historical Documents. Young.
Elements of the Great War. Hilaire Belloc.
Fairhope. Edgar DeWitt Jones.
Reconstructing the Church. Harper.

At 60 Cents

The Evangelistic Note. W. J. Dawson.
The Witness of Jesus. Proctor.
Christ, Lord of Battles. Hausalter.
Man Is a Spirit. Hill.
Onward to Christ. Edwin A. McAlpin.
The Soul of Brotherhood. Egbert.
The Protestant. Burris A. Jenkins.
Letters to a Soldier on Religion. Gardner.

Do not send money, as the books you wish may be sold when your order reaches us, as we have but from one to five copies of each title on our shelves.. Order on a post card what books you desire.

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

Brooklyn
New York RIDGEWOOD CHURCH
OF CHRIST
Forest Ave. & Linden St.
KIRBY PAGE,
W. A. R. McPHERSON.
Pastors.

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

CROUP OR WHOOPIING COUGH

PROMPTLY AND SAFELY RELIEVED BY
ROCHE'S HERBAL EMBROCATION

ALSO IN
BRONCHITIS, LUMBAGO, RHEUMATISM

W. EDWARDS & SON ALL DRUGGISTS OR
LONDON, ENGLAND. E. FOUGERA & CO.
90-92 BEEKMAN ST. N.Y.C.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HYMNAL EVER PRODUCED BY THE AMERICAN CHURCH

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLETT

FOR THE USE OF CHURCHES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS

CONTAINS all the great hymns which have become fixed in the affections of the Church and adds thereto three distinctive features:

Hymns of Christian Unity

Hymns of Social Service

Hymns of the Inner Life

These three features give HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH a modernness of character and a vitality not found in any other book. This hymnal is alive!

It sings the very same gospel that is being preached in modern evangelical pulpits

Great care has been bestowed on the "make-up" of the pages. They are attractive to the eye. The hymns seem almost to sing themselves when the book is open. They are not crowded together on the page. No hymn is smothered in a corner. The notes are larger than are usually employed in hymnals. The words are set in bold and legible type, and all the stanzas are in the staves. Everything has been done to make a perfect hymnal.

Write today for returnable copy and further information.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 SOUTH DEARBORN STREET
CHICAGO

Prayermeeting Establishes High Record

While the prayermeeting has passed out of the life of many churches in America, in others it has become one of the most significant institutions of the congregational life. At Hopkinsville, Ky., the Disciples church has a prayermeeting in which an actual count of those present has been made for three years. In this period the average attendance has been 218. There is a club of men who have devoted themselves to the promotion of the meeting. In the past three years, three hundred members have been added to the congregation and the Sunday evening service brings out an audience that taxes the capacity of the church. Rev. Everett S. Smith is pastor.

Good Friday Tends to Become National Holiday

There is a strong tendency to establish Good Friday as a National holiday. It is already so recognized in the states of Alabama, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Porto Rico. The New York stock market has closed on Good Friday for a number of years. For two years past the churches in Detroit have held solemn services on the afternoon of Good Friday. This year the mayor has issued a proclamation favoring the closing of business houses for two hours. In San Francisco, Seattle, Los Angeles and Denver there were street parades on that day. These parades are arranged by Roman Catholics, but are participated in by many Protestants.

Catholics Criticize Movie Producers

The National Catholic Welfare Council has given attention to the movie situation and has adopted an attitude. They will not oppose Sunday movies but will insist that the movie producers clean up the screen or else the Catholic society will begin advocating a national censorship. It will tolerate no caricature of priests or religious practices, and insists that the ban be placed on all films that set forth white slavery and similar illegal practices. If the producers are in earnest in their recent profession of reform, the Catholic church will take no action, but if they are not, a legislative campaign will be begun.

Any book now in print can be secured through The Christian Century Press. Give publisher if possible.

BOOK OF POINTS AND TESTIMONIES for use of Christians and Workers in all meetings. Answering Objections, Excuses or Doubts. Helps for leading and taking part in Prayer Meetings and in giving personal Testimonies. Better understanding of hard places in Scripture, etc. Full of practical suggestions. Don'ts for Workers when dealing with Inquirers. Cloth 25c; Morocco, 35c; Agents wanted. GEO. W. NOBLE, Monon Building, Chicago, Ill.

The Daily Altar

By Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison

is the most beautiful book of personal devotion and family worship published in many years. Fifty copies in your congregation will create a new spirit in your people.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The Bethany Graded Lessons

126 Texts Covering
17 Years of Study

Send for returnable samples

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By Albert Parker Fitch

"Can the church survive in the changing order?" It is a real question. We have a way of supposing that she cannot perish, but there is no such a thing as permanency of this sort in the social structure.

The question is not only real, it is grave, important. At few other times in man's mental and moral history has he more needed the guiding and steadying leadership of a strong religious organization than now.

Can the church survive in the changing order? Well, the answer will depend upon the extent and character of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reinterpreting historical movements so as to make them unhistorically acceptable; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

Price 80 cents plus 6 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn Street Chicago

BOOKS BY Professor Weigle

Training the Devotional Life

By Prof. Luther Allen Weigle, in collaboration with H. H. Tweedy. Ten brief chapters on how to develop the spirit of worship in children. A model hand-book for superintendent, teacher and parent.

75 cents, plus 10 cents postage.

The Pupil and the Teacher

The matchless value of this standard teacher training textbook is attested by the many editions published; by its adoption in scores of study courses and by its official recognition as a textbook by the International Sunday School Association. A compact masterpiece of scientific methods and practical helpfulness.

$1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

Talks to Sunday School Teachers

In this new book the spirit and thought of Professor Weigle's "Pupil and Teacher" is supplemented and carried on.

$1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

Your Bible Should Be the Best and Most Accurate Version of the Scriptures

The American Standard Bible

Authorized and Edited by
The American Revision Committee

The Same Old Bible

The American Standard is The Same Old Bible that we have always used, but it gives the exact meaning of the inspired writers, in the LANGUAGE OF TODAY instead of in the language used three hundred years ago.

The Authorized Standard Edition

The American Standard is used by all the Colleges, Theological Seminaries and Bible Training Schools in the United States, and has become with them, as with the editors of all Sunday School periodicals, The Authorized Standard Version.

The Bible in the Language of Today

It is used exclusively by the great religious denominations in their Sunday School periodicals, because they realize that it brings a plain reader more closely into contact with the exact thought of the sacred writers than any other version now current in Christendom.

The American Revision Committee devoted thirty years to the work and at the end of that period produced what is now recognized as the best version of the Scriptures ever published in the English language.

READ OUR SPECIAL OFFER

We have arranged with the publishers to supply our readers with their large type Teachers' Bible in the American Standard Version as described below.

Bourgeois Type Teachers' Bible

This Bible contains the complete Old and New Testament, with full references, 25 new and instructive outline maps covering entire Bible, Concise Bible Dictionary and new Combined Concordance or word finder. Also has 12 full page colored maps at end.

This is a sample of the type used

15 And ^athe Philistines had war again with Israel; and David went down, and his servants with him, and fought against the Philistines. And David waxed faint; 16 and Ishbi-benob, who was ^bof the sons of the ^cgiant, the weight of whose spear was three hundred shekels of brass in weight, he being girded

^a Ps. 18. 2-50
^b Ex. 15. 1;
Dt. 31. 30
^c ver. 32, 47;
Dt. 32. 4,
37; 1 S. 2.
2; Ps. 31.
3; 71. 3
^d Ps. 91. 2;
141. 2
^e Gen. 15. 1;
Dt. 22. 26

The binding is genuine leather, with a rich woven grain, overlapping cover, as illustrated; round corners, red under gold edges, and title stamped in pure gold on back.

OUR SPECIAL PRICE, $4.50. (Add 15 cents postage)

Send orders at once, as quantity we can supply is limited.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 SOUTH DEARBORN STREET

CHICAGO, ILL.

Story Sermons and Programs

Story Worship Programs for the Church School, J. S. Stowell. $1.50.

The Use of the Story in Religious Education, Eggleston. $1.50.

The Sunday Story Hour, Cragin. $1.75.

Story Sermons for Children, Chidley. $1.25.

52 Story Talks to Boys and Girls, Chidley. $1.25.

Wandering Stars, Hansen. Ten minute sermons for the Junior Congregation. $1.25.

Tell Me a Hero Story, Stewart. $1.75.

The Shepherd of Us All, Stewart. Stories of Christ retold for children. $1.75.

Tell Me a True Story, Stewart. Tales of Bible heroes for children. $1.75.

Add 10 cents each book for postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Is Business Suffering for Lack of Religion?

Roger W. Babson, the famous statistician, says it is. His new book—

FUNDAMENTALS OF PROSPERITY

Shows the need of religion to big business men as well as of big business men to religion. Many ministers are preaching from this startling book. Business men are giving it away in quantities.

Price of book $1.00 plus 10 cts. postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Books by Joseph Fort Newton

The Religious Basis of a Better World Order

An application of Christian principles to world affairs.

The Sword of the Spirit

City Temple Sermons.

The Eternal Christ

Studies in the life of vision and service.

The Ambassador

City Temple sermons.

Each $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

("The Sword of the Spirit" is $1.50)

Of Dr. Joseph Fort Newton the American Journal of Theology says: "It is a striking fact that from a town of the Central West, whose very name is unknown to England, a preacher should have been called to the City Temple, London, a pulpit made famous by Joseph Parker and Dr. Campbell. Mr. Newton is a mystic, but of a different type. He goes back of the long line of doctrinal and ecclesiastical development to Jesus of the Gospels, to the ideal human life in whom God dwelt and through whom God revealed his redemptive love, the divine Saviour and Master of men. This life of the living Christ, touching every life, the soul of every redemptive movement, actually working in men and with men for the world's salvation. His sermons speak especially to cultivated minds, yet through their simplicity and naturalness and humanness, they make the universal appeal. Here is the real power. They do not speak the language of the church, but the language of humanity. They are real sermons of a warm, spiritual, enthusiastic manhood."

Dr. Newton is one of the favorite contributors to The Christian Century, and his books are particularly popular among our book-loving constituency.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

Is Christianity Practicable?

By WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN
Professor of Systematic Theology
Union Theological Seminary

"In this time of world crisis," says Dr. Brown, in the preface of his book, "when existing customs are everywhere being challenged, it is essential that we raise anew the question as to the nature and grounds of our faith, and that we ask ourselves whether the enterprise in which we are engaged is a practicable one, worthy of the allegiance of sensible men." In the book, Dr. Brown considers his great theme from the following viewpoints: "The World Crisis as Challenge and Opportunity;" "The Christian Interpretation of History;" "The Duty for To-morrow;" "What the Church Can Do."

Price of the book $1.75 plus 12 cents postage

Other books by Dr. Brown:

Modern Theology and the Preaching of the Gospel ($1.75)

The Christian Hope: A Study in the Doctrine of Immortality ($1.75)

Christian Theology in Outline ($3.50)

The Essence of Christianity ($1.75)

(Add 12 cents each for postage)

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it. we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage. (Pocket ed., $1.35 plus 8 cts.

The Shorter New Testament (Kent), $1.00 plus 10 cents postage.

The 20th Century New Testament, $2.00 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, $1.50 plus 8 cents postage).

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

YALE TALKS

BY CHARLES R. BROWN, LL. D.

ALTHOUGH these "Talks" were delivered at Yale, Harvard and other colleges, they afford a wealth of illustrative material for addresses and sermons to young people, especially to young men. Among the themes are "The True Definition of a Man," "Unconscious Influence," "The Lessons of Failure," "The Men Who Make Excuse," "The Wrongs of Wrong-doing," etc.

Price, $1.35 plus 8 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT

Sir. W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL. D.

A Commentary as well as a Greek Text and Translation

Its Purpose

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT was conceived by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL.D., and carried out under his careful editorship. His purpose was to produce a work which should include all that was most reliable and sane in the international exegesis of the New Testament and to present it in the form of a critical edition of the Greek Text. Scholarship which was scattered through several languages and many books, so that it was accessible only to the few, he purposed to bring together into one comprehensive survey which should have the harmony of critical freedom combined with reverence of faith.

Its Plan

The preparation of the critical introduction and notes to each book of the New Testament was allotted to a separate scholar who was an expert in that department of exegesis. The notes, printed below the Greek Text, are historic and critical in nature; they are suggestive of the deeper spiritual meaning of the context and keep definitely in view both the needs of a student seeking religious insight and the requirements of a minister engaged in a pulpit-ministry.

Description of Books

The set consists of five handsome large quarto volumes—beautifully and clearly printed on paper specially prepared for this work. Bound in durable red buckram. The price is $25.00 for the set complete, with an additional charge, if sent by express, of actual cost of transportation. The price of any single volume is $6.00 plus 20 cents postage.

Special Offer to Christian Century Readers: Send $10.00 and the complete set will be sent to you on condition that a second remittance of $10 be mailed to us in 30 days, and the balance ($5.00 plus postage) in 60 days.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Five Indispensable Books

Recommended by the Editor of The Christian Century (Issue of December 23)

The Outline of History

By H. G. WELLS

Here is the history, not of kings and their wars and land-thefts, but of ages and races and nations. It is truly democratic. It is of greater value to the average man than a whole library of bulky histories of individual nations. Buy this book and save money on encyclopedias!

IN EIGHT BOOKS

The first three books, on "The Making of Our World," "The Making of Man," and "The Dawn of History" are veritable gold-mines of science, and the last book, on "The Next Stage in History" will appeal to all prophetic-minded people.

Two Volumes, $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

What and Where is God?

By RICHARD LARUE SWAIN.

Of this book the Editor of The Christian Century says: "I could wish that every perturbed mind might read this book. It would put a new face on nature, on history, on providence, on prayer, on the future life. Aye, and the possession of a deep conviction as to the reality of God would put new radiance upon the face of the reader himself."

Boards, $1.50, plus 14 cents postage.

The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War

By ROBERT E. SPEER, WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN and others.

These great leaders indicate that the way out for the distracted world is not by the League of Nations alone, but also by the way of Christian missions. Any minister who would deprive himself of this most timely and prophetic survey would be courting failure for himself in his chosen work of carrying on the tasks which the Master began.

Price $2.00, plus 14 cents postage.

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By ALBERT PARKER FITCH.

Can the church survive? Dr. Fitch holds that that will depend upon the extent of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

80 cents, plus 6 cents postage.

Wanted—A Congregation

By LLOYD S. DOUGLAS.

Not merely a book of methods of the how to fill the pews sort, but a book filled with inspiration for the troubled preacher, and replete with suggestions for practical promotion of the work of the church. Dr. Douglas is one of the most lucid writers, but he is more: he is a man who has succeeded admirably in conducting the work and worship in his own great church in a spirit of devotion, and also with remarkable popular success.

$1.75, plus 10 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

Wanted—A Congregation!

By LLOYD C. DOUGLAS

is helping to solve the essential problem of the preacher. The reception given the book upon its first appearance indicates that Dr. Douglas has rendered the church public a genuine service in producing this unusual book.

Press Comments on "Wanted—A Congregation"

The Christian Advocate, New York:

"What is the matter with the churches? How shall the preacher get a congregation to hear his message from Sunday to Sunday? Well, here is a preacher 'whose own great church is packed every morning,' who tells his brethren of the pulpit how to do it. The whole is cast into the form of a story, but it may as well be stated that there is not very much romance in this story. 'The Rev. D. Preston Blue,' who is the 'goat' in this case, and to whom 'are assigned many ideas, convictions, plans, and executions thereof,' is a very real person, as many a preacher, as well as a member of an official board, can testify. The preacher who goes through this story will get many valuable pointers on how to do it, as well as many on how not to do it, and it is hoped that there will be, likewise, many official members of the churches who will read the story and be profited thereby, coming away from the reading wiser, even though sadder, men."

The Christian Endeavor World, Boston:

"Preachers especially will enjoy Lloyd C. Douglas's story, 'Wanted—a Congregation.' It is a clever discussion, in story form, of some church problems that puzzle most of us. Why, for instance, are the churches often empty and the theatres full? What can be done to attract people to church services? What, in a word, is the matter with the church? The hero is a minister who goes to a birthday party and meets two old friends and a new one. They tell him some startling things and advance some daring theories, with the result that the minister goes back home and preaches his church full. The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The Continent, Chicago:

"In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church. It is especially to be recommended to pastors who Sunday after Sunday preach to empty pews. The layman with a keen interest in church matters will find the story exceedingly interesting and perhaps as a result of reading it will devise ways in which to aid his minister friends."

Price of the book, $1.75 plus 10 cents postage

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

Is the Christian Church
Christian?

Two Views:

By Charles E. Jefferson
and Vida D. Scudder

With an Editorial on the same theme

Fifteen Cts. a Copy

April 7, 1921

Four Dollars a Year

Many Creeds—One Faith

THE confusion of the present time has for many persons but little of cheer. To them modern life is inspired by a spirit of selfishness and hatred that can lead only to chaos. Deeper-seeing minds can detect beneath this unprecedented confusion the tidal heart-beat of a new democracy whose ruling motive is the spirit of brotherhood.

The prophets and poets have usually looked forward in confident hope of this event. The hymn-writers have almost invariably done so. Even when theologians, with their creeds, have divided humanity into groups, the world's great singers have persistently sounded the unifying note of love and fellowship. There is no feature of the new hymnal—

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLETT

which has stirred so much comment as the spirit of Christian brotherhood which prevails throughout the book. Note the following extract from the preface:

"The editors regard as of greatest significance their discovery through these hymns of a spiritually united Church. Many creeds seem to melt together in the great hymns of Christian experience. A true Christian hymn cannot be sectarian. It belongs to all Christ's disciples. From many sources, far separated ecclesiastically, there comes one voice of common praise and devotion. It is from this perception of a united Church existing underneath the denominational order, a Church united in praise, in aspiration and in experience, and expressing its unity in these glorious hymns, that the title which this book bears was first suggested. Hymns of many creeds are here, interpreting, however, but one faith. It is our hope that wherever these hymns are sung the spirit of unity may be deepened and Christians be drawn more closely together as they draw near to their common Father in united worship."

This great hymnal is preeminently fitted for use in churches where there is an aspiration for real fellowship and cooperation among the followers of the Master

A returnable copy will be mailed you upon request

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn Street

-:-

-:-

Chicago, Illinois

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, APRIL 7, 1921

Number 14

EDITORIAL STAFF: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR; HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR
THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS, JESSIE BROWN POUNDS

*Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879.
Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918.
Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago*

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra.
Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

From the Baptistry to the Spotlight

ON the Sunday after the acquittal of Clara Hamon, charged with the killing of the Oklahoma oil millionaire, the newspapers reported her conversion and admittance into the church of Disciples located in the town where the trial was held. Certainly no one begrudges the boon of another chance for this woman who has been sinned against as well as a victim of her own sin. The church was the right place for her to find refuge from the fierce furnace of passion and shame and guilt in which her past ten years were lived. But the church to which she fled disclosed its spiritual superficiality in making so quick and easy—and so public—a solution of her moral problem. A sound spiritual pedagogy would have guided the young woman into quiet paths of reflection and moral reconstruction in friendly fellowship with Christian minded women and away from the stare and meretricious stimuli of public curiosity. But the day after the acquitted girl's conversion and baptism were announced, it was reported that she was going straightway into the movies. This of course is more than a breach of good taste: it is a disclosure of a moral insensitiveness which her spiritual advisers should have regarded as their special task to correct, and to see that it was corrected before a public welcome into the church was extended. That a woman should go dripping from the baptismal waters to the stage to exploit as her sole histrionic asset the life of shame and passion and moral guilt which she carried on for ten years, is a commentary both on the tolerance of social judgment and the shallowness of churchly ideals. Certain older communions of the Christian church would not have denied Clara Hamon admission, but they would have insisted upon the evident fruits of repentance before she would have been given the status of church membership. The result would have been a convert more thoroughly grounded in the principles of the Christian faith and who would in the long run receive a far greater blessing from the fellowship of the church. Conversion is regarded by some as an emotional experience of a single hour. By others it is regarded as the submission to the formal rite of baptism. But it is a far deeper and delicate experience than either the emotionalists or the legalists would have us believe. The change from old modes of thought, old standards of value and former reactions upon life is not accomplished by some magical act. Involved in the process are adequate acquaintance with the word of God, the steadying influence of Christian friendship and the blessing of the spirit of God in the soul. The church must have an open door for every sinner, but it must make sure of the thoroughness of its soul-saving processes.

Anglo-Saxon Cooperation the Basis of Civilization

THE other day a young man who wears the service star said "I want to fight in one more war. That will be with England." He was repeating as his own wish what he had heard some one else say. Unfortunately there are not a few of his sort going about at this time. For this, there are a number of causes. The old-time Fourth of July patriotism expressed itself in this way. That this sentiment is out of date, some belated minds do not know. There was some friction in the trenches in Europe which turned the minds of some young men from love to hate. That has happened both with the French and the English. The most potent cause of the anti-British sentiment in this country is to be found in the Irish propaganda. The one hope of the mythical "Irish Republic" is to embroil the United States with Great Britain. A small minority of Irish and German people not yet Americanized may indulge this hope, but the vast majority of our population would regard a war with Great Britain as an unthinkable tragedy. Three thousand miles of northern boundary would have to be fortified. The British navy would have a base in the West Indies. Even though we patriotically believe that in the end we could win such a war, why should we wish such a tragedy on the world? The man who suggested a war with Great Britain is a mad man who should be restrained by every right thinking citizen. The ties of America and the British empire are the closest possible. Common language, common laws and common literature bind together the English-speaking people of the whole world. The religion of these peoples is one. Their very habits of thought are alike. We want no more war of any sort, but least of all a fratricidal war that would break down the very structure of civilization itself through the conflict of the world's two leading nations.

Will France Publish Her Latest Secret Treaty?

ANOTHER evidence that France has not emerged from the bitter reactions of war that left her stridently militaristic is found in the refusal so far to publish the text of the new Franco-Belgian treaty. It was claimed by Germany that such a secret treaty existed before the war, and on that excuse she explained to her people her attack on Belgium as a roadway to France. Now the making of such a treaty is acknowledged, but France refuses to keep the League of Nations' covenant providing for the registering of all treaties with the league's secretariat and their open publication. She has sent instead the correspondence covering the negotiations, and claims that is all she is obligated to send. The covenant definitely makes any treaty not registered invalid. The nations have already registered seventy treaties and the good work is proceeding apace. One of the prime virtues of the new understanding among nations lies in the definite abolition of secret treaties with the consequent lessening thereby of the danger of wars growing out of them.

Fillmore Music House Shares With Employees

MR. J. H. FILLMORE, veteran writer and publisher of church and other music in Cincinnati, happily illustrates the modern viewpoint of Christian dealing with his employees. He took steps this year to make them sharers of the house's prosperity in a division of profits. Three years ago, when there was no profit, the Fillmore Music House raised wages anyhow, because the cost of living had gone up and it was felt that bread and butter for the families of the workers must be provided before dividends were declared for the firm. Mr. Fillmore has tithed his income to church and philanthropy for a great many years and in times of increased prosperity has doubled his tithe on the principle that there is no legal limit to generosity but that the tithe is simply a convenient minimum for prosperous men. Many a prosperous churchman has allowed his tithe to ease his conscience both as to generosity and the division of his prosperity with those who helped to make it. Happily we are learning that no prosperity is just that is not shared with all who contribute to it, and that justice to those who labor for us must come before charity or philanthropy can redound to our own good reputation.

What the Movies Do to Children

ALARGE part of the patronage of the moving picture theaters of the country is made up of children. It is well-known that there are children who go every day. The influence of the movies upon these growing children is a matter that has already engaged the serious attention of educators. The physical reaction of an excess in the movie habit is bad. City children have too little physical exercise any way. Time spent in the shows means less helpful, vigorous play. The movie is not to be regarded as true recreation. Recreation means activity and social participation in games. The movie audience only hires some one to amuse, and this is not true recreation. Psychologically childhood should be called upon to make its own pictures of things not yet seen. The sand pile is a creative opportunity for little children. Drawing and dramatics stimulate the creative expression of growing minds. The movies make the mind of a child impotent on the imaginative side. It is one thing for a boy to see in his mind's eye the island of Robinson Crusoe. It is another thing for the movie film to perform this labor for him. The moral influences of the movie have already been considered by the friends of children everywhere. The exaggeration of sex and the perversion of sex ideas is known to be thoroughly harmful. The delineation of crime is also a hurtful moral influence. Of course there is much to be said for the movies on the constructive side. The travel movie helps to broaden one's knowledge of the world. Distant peoples become known in this way. The comics which are not too much of the slap-stick sort help to divert the mind of the child. The romances of childhood have in many instances been reproduced upon the screen. The churches that have installed movies have the same obligation as the commercialized houses to see that the picture business is not overdone in the lives of the children, and that the more glaring evils are corrected.

Japanese Help Feed Starving Chinese

IT is an augury of good when the Japanese lend a generous hand in the feeding of the starving Chinese millions. The school children have sent 100,000 yen while more than a quarter of a million dollars have been raised through general public subscription. The former is quite generous when we remember the average family income of the masses in Japan, but the latter cannot be called so very generous when we think of the great wealth laid up in Japan during the war. Yet Japan is not a Christian country and even such a beginning of generosity is gratifying. The government is sending 500,000 bushels of rice as a token of sympathy and good-will. In this act our own government is outdone for our senate refused to vote money for the relief of the world's starving. It is a rather ignominious thing that the richest, most prosperous nation, and the one that proudly thinks of itself as the most Christian and generous, should be so unable to merge a great human interest into governmental action as to allow millions to suffer while it wrestles with the problems arising out of its plethora of wealth. By dint of great effort sundry millions have been raised in America for the sufferers from the wreck of war and famine, but by a single act of congress a really adequate provision of hundreds of millions could have been made. By governmental act we could contribute billions to fight a war; could we not by a similar act legitimately provide for its human wreckage and woe? Japan's governmental action may have been diplomatic quite as much as philanthropic, but it will feed several million people for a time and the saving of human lives cannot wait upon too microscopic a tithing of the mint and anise of motive.

Humanism in the Religion of Today

THE issue between Martin Luther and Erasmus in the reformation days arose out of the implications of their respective attitudes toward scholarship and intellectual interests. Both men loved learning, and the scholarship of Martin Luther cannot be despised by any man. Erasmus, however, made his scholarship the sole end of life, while Luther recognized that learning was after all for service. For the great reformer, life was more than the cold light or the delight of reason. It included the emotions and passions of great causes. The church of this hour is undergoing a more fundamental change than that which occurred in Martin Luther's day. Four hundred years ago a section of the Christian world repudiated the false authority of the papacy. In this day the authority of creeds, theologies and theories of inspiration is being given over for the surer guidance of the spirit. Four hundred years ago the reformation arose from the schools. The reformation in our day is also a product of the schools. There is the same difference in attitude that was to be found in the church of four centuries ago. The humanist of today values learning for its own sake. He cultivates the sciences and humanities, even such sciences as psychology and sociology, in an abstract and relatively detached fashion. The humanist minister is often liberal enough in his soul. He keeps himself remote from the controversies of the hour and affects a philosophic calm in the presence of the sharp issues that divide men. He even patronizingly scolds those who set forth their views with vigor. This kind of man has as little part in the making of tomorrow as the humanist has ever had. The need of every age is a scholarship which is filled with the passion of human service. It is this scholarship which ever moulds the succeeding age.

The End of Talaat Bey

THE fatal cord of retribution has begun to tighten about the necks of the three Turkish arch conspirators against civilization—Enver Pasha, Djemal Pasha and Talaat Bey. They were the three wild beasts that ruled Turkey, in mutual hatred and suspicion, but with unfailing regard to their own personal advantage, and the despoiling of the helpless subjects of their despotism. In particular against the Armenians their cruel and vindictive attitude was displayed. They followed all the sinister traditions of merciless persecution of these unfortunate people, and appear to have learned from their Teutonic advisers a new lesson in the inhuman treatment of disliked populations—expatriation. Having given up the hope of immediate advantage in Turkish areas, Talaat betook himself to the hospitality and seclusion of Berlin to enjoy the fruits of his plundering policy, and to wait for further opportunities. But the long arm of assassination reached him as the result of a solemn covenant made months ago by Armenian nationalists. He was shot down on the streets of Berlin, the first of the notorious triumvirate to pay the penalty of his crime. One would have preferred that these men should have faced the international court contemplated for the trial of the chief offenders against humanity and decency in the late war. But no retribution that a court—or even an assassin—can inflict is comparable to the slow torture of ceaseless apprehension under which these men have lived of late, and under which the two surviving criminals must remain until the inevitable and unpreventable end shall befall them. To that pursuing fear one only needs to add the execration of all mankind to complete the sombre picture. No matter in what far land the brilliant and dashing Enver and the timorous and calculating Djemal may seek seclusion, the searching eyes and the outstretched hands of an entire race of martyred people are seeking them, and there is no probable escape.

Indigenous Education for the Negro

PRINCIPLE GREGG of Hampton Institute recently defined civilization as consisting in that which would "bring people together in sympathy, mutual courtesy, respect and friendliness," and added, "In community efforts people are discovering how to be Christian neighbors." At the last Tuskegee Conference a resolution was adopted looking to the organization of some sort of a country-life movement among the Negroes to study the whole present prevailing discontent and to seek a remedy that will make farm life "so prosperous, happy and well protected" that the present trend of colored folk to the cities and to the north might be stayed. Education seems to offer the solution and this must begin with the rural Negro school. The director for these schools in Alabama reports that there are 1989 of them in that state alone which are maintained in dilapidated shacks rented for the purpose. The director of the Jeanne's Fund reports 14,740 such schools without teachers in the three states of Alabama, Georgia and Mississippi. The future seems to lie with those practical progressives of both races who believe, with Principal Moton of Tuskegee and with the late Booker T. Washington, that Negro education must first be practical and issue in a race of prosperous, useful citizens. The time is passing for whites to think it of no use or even dangerous to educate the blacks. The very hope of peaceful relations lies in an education that will make for material success, spiritual ideals and a social understanding. The Secretary of the Negro Child Welfare Association pleads that the materials for the education of the Negro child are too largely white in their make up; his text books, pictures, heroes and his books are by and about white people. He pleads for a medium of instruction that will come out of and minister concretely to their own race and thus make for self-respect and uplift in terms of their own life and character. Negro education should cease to be an importation into their life; it should be made indigenous. The most pathetic, as it is also the most perilous, aspect of our conventional treatment of the Negro is our failure to begin with him by accepting him as he is. The natural impulse of imitation will appropriate more than enough of the customs and styles and standards of the superior white race amidst which the Negro lives, without our systematically imposing them upon him in the educational schemes we contrive.

Fiction Finds Again Its Theme in Jesus

THE effort to visualize the environment of Jesus and the apostles has teased the minds of literary men for a generation. The enormously successful "Ben Hur" found the basis of its popularity in this interest. A number of other novels have run into large editions by reason of the popular interest in the Palestine of Jesus' day. The latest offering is "Princess Salome," by Burriss Jenkins, minister of Linwood Boulevard Church of Disciples, Kansas City, and editor of the Kansas City Post. The work of Dr. Jenkins is unique in that it embodies those conceptions of New Testament times which have been built up by modern scholarship. Throughout the book the author maintains a reverent attitude toward Jesus. There is none of the crude over-emphasis upon supernaturalism which has marred many previous works, nor the shocking departures from fact characteristic of "The Brook Kerith" of recent memory. The New Testament characters are introduced in some new and romantic relationships that entice the imagination. The picture of Palestine ripe for revolt and disappointed in a non-military Christ will help many readers to understand the actual back-ground of the work of Jesus. The descriptions of transportation, commerce, industry and recreation all help greatly in giving the picture reality. As a novel the story is far more readable than most of the books which lie in a similar field. There is no tedious introduction at the beginning. The story is off with the first page, and continues in unabated interest to the very close. It avoids skillfully many rocks of controversy. The reader has the surprise of finding many of his old friends of New Testament acquaintance disguised for a time under other names. The dash and imagination of the gifted author is to be found on every page. Whether "Princess Salome" is enduring literature or not it is safe to predict that the story will have a wide vogue. The perennial interest in the theme as well as the freshness and brilliance of the treatment would seem to guarantee that.

An Unescapable Question

THE articles by Dr. Jefferson and Miss Scudder appearing in this issue must not be taken by our readers as in any sense a debate. From a list of several themes submitted to them, both distinguished writers chose to make their contribution to The Christian Century's current discussion under the same title, "Is the Christian Church Christian?" Neither knows what the other has written nor indeed that the other has written at all. Their two articles, however, represent so well two distinct points of view that it has seemed particularly happy to let them appear side by side in the same issue. Some readers will, no doubt, interpret the articles as mutually contradictory. They are sharply dissimilar in mood, in intellectual hospitality, in candor. And without doubt the logic of each article taken by itself leads to far separated goals. Whether, however, the two points of view can be unified in some inclusive conception we will leave to our readers to consider and perhaps to say. Without invidiousness, we are compelled to compare these articles in terms of adequacy, of depth, of pertinency to the concrete situation in which the modern church finds itself. The question we would ask is not, Which author is right and which wrong? but, Which author meets the problem more adequately, explores it reaches more sympathetically, and throws more light into the confusion which besets our Christian steps in this changing era.

Dr. Jefferson resents the asking of such a question as "Is the Christian Church Christian?" He "stamps upon it"; he declares a priori that the church is of course Christian, Christian in spite of its faults, more Christian than it ever was in its history, and calls upon Christian people to ignore such questions as these and continue their work without tarrying for any assumed benefits that may derive from self-criticism. To the amazement of those who know the sincerity of Dr. Jefferson's sympathy with distinctively modern endeavors and ideals, he seems to find in the changed social and intellectual order of our time no hint of justification for questioning the Christian adequacy of the conventional church. He stands inside the church institution seeing, apparently, no farther than its sacred walls, and speaks as one who is impatient at the interference with the church's adjustments which new and clamant moral ideals are causing.

In his heat at stamping on his subject one fears that Dr. Jefferson has made some assertions that will not bear close and exact scrutiny. For example, he declares that this is an old question, that men have always been asking it, that to give it any tolerance at all at this late date is to waste time and to create a false psychology in the church, weakening its morale and its courage. The fact is quite otherwise. Since the primitive days, there has never been a time in the history of the church when the question of its Christian character confronted the mind of the church in the sense that it does today. Individuals there have been who asked it, but with no background of group conviction or social awareness as to its implications. The mind of the present day church has been brought for the first time in Christian history self-consciously under the scrutiny of the mind of its Lord. And the church is confused and embarrassed, knowing not what to do, but unable to escape the haunting sense that through the long ranges of the years it has been neglecting some of the essential business that its Lord left it to do. The uniqueness of this experience is due to the fact that it is only in very modern times that the historical Christ has been rediscovered to the church. It is a commonplace among enlightened Christians nowadays that we have a clearer understanding of the Jesus of Galilee and Jerusalem, than has been possessed by the Christians of any age since the last apostle died.

In the past the great crises upon which the church has come have been decided by appeals to the creeds, to the church authorities, to the Bible, to the mind of St. Paul, but not one has been decided by direct conscious appeal to the mind of Christ. Today it is Christ who stands forth clothed with a realism and a personal authority which has never appeared in him before. The church sees its Lord measuring and examining the foundations and pillars of its ecclesiastical structure and it cannot help wondering what is his judgment upon it all. To be petulant with the question, "Is the Christian church Christian?" is to set oneself against the logical and natural results of Christ's new presence in the eye and heart of his followers. It is to withstand the ethical issue and outcome of the vast enterprise of biblical scholarship which has made the work of the past two generations far more fruitful and significant than all the centuries before. If the work of our scholars is to be justified at all, it can be justified only by a church that ardently, and without fear of the consequences, undertakes the task of re-evaluating itself in terms of the new vision of Christ which its scholars have given it. The question that Miss Scudder candidly undertakes to answer and that Dr. Jefferson refuses even to consider is a new question, never met before, and it will haunt the restless soul of the church until a true answer is found and translated into practice.

But much of Dr. Jefferson's impatience with his question is due to the assumption that it is churchmen alone who raise it. He pictures the church going out as a physician to heal the sick world and all the time casting the spell of its own doubt upon the mind and nerve of its patient. This, however, is not the true picture, for it is the patient himself who is asking as to the credentials of its physician. On all sides of the church in the social order there are arising questionings and challenges of the church as the bearer of the healing medicine of Christ to a world at dis-ease with itself. For Christ has strangely captivated the admiration of mankind where the church has not done so. The results of the rediscovery of the historical Jesus have been put not alone into the lap of the church, but into the lap of an enlightened mankind. And men, disillusioned and discouraged at the failure of the wisdom of this world to set the ideals of brotherhood at work among the nations, are turning to Jesus with wistful and hopeful conviction that he alone has the key of our salvation. But, they insist, the church does not represent him; it is the victim of its ancient traditions, of its irrelevant theology, of its prosperous and respectable institutionalism.

They are not merely asking, but declaring that the church is not Christian. What is the church going to do under such circumstances? Let it stop its talking and go to work, replies Dr. Jefferson. Yes, but it has to find its work by talking, by comparing its thoughts, and by striving to understand better what its Lord's mind is and what is the mind of its accusers and critics as well. And besides, talking is a large part of its work! You cannot suppress its impulse to defend itself against its critics, and to search its own soul to see if its critics may not indeed after all be right.

However, the most searching consideration against the attitude of impatience with which Dr. Jefferson handles his question remains to be indicated. It is not merely that we have a clearer view of the historical Jesus than any generation of Christians before us have enjoyed, but we have actually found Jesus to be a different sort of person than we had conceived him to be, holding a radically different conception of his mission than we had come to imagine, and therefore laying upon his followers a task radically unlike the traditional task to which the church had through the centuries adjusted itself. Dr. Jefferson concedes the fact that Jesus is an ever-increasing and advancing Leader and contends that the church, while it lags and falters, is nevertheless advancing steadily forward as its vision of its Leader grows more clear. If this were a full description of what is happening we, too, might share his impatience with so radical a question as the one we are discussing. But it is not a full description. The truth is that our modern knowledge of Christ is showing us a Christ-figure not merely clearer in its outlines than the traditional figure, but one so different from the old as to be almost another Christ.

We wish to avoid exaggeration here. Yet there is little danger of exaggeration—the fact itself is so profound and awful that the danger is it will be understated rather than overstated. The Christ we are seeing today, the Christ who haunts our hearts and whose presence makes us ask these grave, radical questions is not merely an idol but an ideal. One does not need to take one's idol seriously, but one's ideal must be taken seriously. As Jesus Christ is translating himself out of the terms of ecclesiastical worship into the terms of personal and social behavior great questions arise. Toward Christ as an idol the church has always been Christian enough. Nobody would think of raising our present question while Jesus Christ stood in his glorious position within the blessed trinity. But the moment he comes into our homes and streets, into our factories and courts, into our stores and packing houses, into our legislatures and peace conferences, into our battlefields and our federal penitentiaries, the question is unescapable. Are we really Christians? In the light of what we now see Christ to be, do we still want to be Christians? Can we endure his interference in these temporal, mundane affairs of ours?

Yet this is precisely what our modern knowledge of Christ has disclosed to us—a Christ with an essentially social, human mission of love, goodwill and brotherhood; a Christ bent on saving the world from its lust, its competitive strife, its obsession of acquisitiveness, its false nationalism, its warfare. And, more serious than all, we see the cross of Jesus as the very instrument by which he proposes to accomplish this salvation of the world, and that not by some supernatural efficacy it may be thought to possess on its Godward side, but by its actually being borne on the back of a church willing to go to its Calvary as its Lord went to his. Here is an astounding and radically new vision of what it means to be a Christian church. Well may it pause and ask whether its faith and courage are sufficient for this thing.

As with Simon Peter at Cæsarea Philippi, so the Lord asks the church today if it still believes in him. Simon had been a believer in the messiahship of Jesus from the beginning. But he now sees in his Master a new sort of a Messiah. The crass, materialistic, political conception of his Lord had to be given up, and he begins to see the dim outlines of a cross. Our Lord, agitated with anxiety, asked Simon Peter and the little "church" whether it was still Christian! And Peter's immortal confession was the answer: "I still believe, Thou art the Christ of God!"

In view of its new vision of Christ, of its new vision of its task, is the Christian church still Christian? Is it still willing to wear Christ's name? That is the point and essence of the question which Miss Scudder bravely and with gracious candor and discrimination undertakes to answer. That is the question which the church must answer before it can look the world fairly in the face or look its Lord fairly in the face.

The Fish and the Bait

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE were in a certain city two boys. And they both loved to fish. And there came a day when the Spring was alluring, and they listened unto the Call of the Wild. And they went out of the city, and sat them down by a certain stream. And they essayed to fish.

But one of these boys, before he went, took a Tomato Can and an Hoe, and went into the Back Yard, and dug until he had a Dozen Worms and a Blister. But the other boy liked to fish and did not like to Dig Worms.

And it came to pass at the end of the day, that they returned home both of them. But one of them had a string of fish and a Sunburnt Nose, and the other had only a Sunburnt Nose.

And it came to pass that those two boys grew unto Manhood. And one of them before he began any New Enterprise, went into the Back Yard of the matter, and did a lot of hard digging. And the other just shouldered his pole and went into the affair, and watched his Cork placidly floating upon the Surface of the Stream, and never going under. And the history of one of these men was a Succession of Successes, and the other was a Series of Sheriff's Sales.

And when I considered these matters, I said, Life is a Fish Pond, but it is more than that. It is also a Back Yard out of which Worms are to be dugged with much Arduous Toil; and other things being equal, a man's String of Fish is proportioned unto the Size of his Tin Can of Bait, and the number of blisters in his hands that were made by the Hoe Handle.

For while the Hoe Handle is less pleasant to the hand than the Fishing Pole, it is an Important Element in the successful catching of Fish.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

Violence

THEY have made him the chief arguer of the centuries, who was the meekest and friendliest of men. They have exhausted their intellectual resources in explaining how he was the second member of a metaphysical combination called the Trinity, whereas he spent his quiet days telling the children how he loved them, and making the way of life a little less hard for his friends. They have placed him upon a fiery altar, for the atonement of a revengeful God, who found his highest delight in pointing out to his fellows the beauty of the lilies and the glory of the sunset as revealing a loving Father-Creator.

Like thieves of the night, the theologians have broken into the temple of humanity and stolen away the Gentle Brother of sorrowing souls, the Loving Friend of us all.

To Wordsworth

THE daisies and the dancing daffodils
Were friends of yours. To you all things were fair
In heaven and earth, God's thoughts were everywhere,
And yet your chief delights were woods and hills.
You walked, elate, amid their peaceful shade,
Though war was raging in the land of kings:
Your mind was set on dawns and flowering springs;
On sunny noons, whose light can never fade
For him whose thought is high as are the skies.
How much we need you now, great poet-heart!
You learned to live within, to dwell apart,
Content with stars and morning's glad surprise.
Look now on us, whose frettings never cease,
And point the way to reverence and peace.

When April Comes

WHEN April comes, and on the air
Is wafted forth an incense rare,
Which tells of gardens lately blown,
Of orchard trees with beauty strown,
The pink of apple, peach and pear,—

Then earth becomes a place so fair
That men forget their weight of care;
For who could nurse a heart of stone,
When April comes?

Then happiness is everywhere,
Our very breathing kills despair;
Although we know some glad hopes sown
Shall still be hopes, with summer flown,
Yet smiles and posies shall we wear,
When April comes.

Is the Christian Church Christian?

From One Point of View

By Charles E. Jefferson

THE question is not one of my coining. It is included in the list of subjects which were propounded as suitable for serious discussion, and having been given the privilege of choosing, I selected this one because I hated it more than all the others. I shrink from allowing it to be linked even for an hour with my name. All such subjects are, in my judgment, a species of demon by which the prince of the devils is tormenting our unhappy age. Why should a busy man want to waste his time in discussing such a question? I do not want to discuss it, I want to stamp upon it. I am using it as the topic of this article solely because it gives me the opportunity of saying a few things which have been long in my mind.

One becomes weary of these disparaging and disheartening queries. They are like leeches, they suck the blood. This question is only one of a large family. Like the demon mentioned in the gospels, the name of this demon is legion. For instance: "Can the church survive?" "Has the church failed?" "Why has the church lost its power?" "Do the churches really believe in Jesus?" "What is the matter with the church?" "Is religion dying out?" "Is preaching futile?" "Has the church a message for our times?" "Is the power of the pulpit waning?" "Has the Christian religion failed?" "Does the Christian ministry show signs of breaking down religiously?" "Is Christian theology Christian?" "What will put religion on the map?" "Is the modern church loyal?" These are only a sample of the kind of interrogation which is now plaguing the Christian world. It would be well if the whole herd could be allowed like the Gadarene swine to rush down a steep place and perish in the sea.

INFIDEL QUESTIONS

What can be gained by the raising of such questions? Do they increase the courage of Christian hearts? Do they put into ministers and laymen new vim and vigor? If they are raised by infidels why not let infidels answer them? Unbelievers have always been experts in asking questions, but it is not the business of Christian workers to spend their time in replying to questions which are only cavils. A man who seldom goes to church, and who knows nothing at all about modern preaching, and who has a head so full of his own ideas and schemes that he cannot listen to anybody else, may get the idea that all preaching is vanity, but why should this conclusion give anybody the slightest concern?

What difference does it make to any human being what a man of that type thinks about preaching? The obscure preacher with his little congregation must always seem to be a nonentity to a man who can write books and get his name in the papers. From the beginning the highbrow looked down on the preacher. He did it in the days of the apostles, but it never daunted Paul. Paul brushed him aside as a conceited and insignificant creature, quietly informing him that all his brilliant ideas and glittering programs for world reconstruction, had failed to get humanity out of its misery, and that it had pleased God to save this world through the foolishness of preaching. Any man who thinks that preaching is futile, or that it will ever pass away, shows that he knows little either of God or of man, either of the past or the future, and his opinions on all matters which lie outside of his own narrow field are negligible.

IF NOT NOW IT NEVER CAN BE

When such questions are raised by Christian men we know in most cases their answers in advance. Why propound questions just for the fun of answering them? Life is too short to waste it in mental gymnastics which get us nowhere. Can the church survive? Of course it can. Of course it will. Christ settled that 1900 years ago. The gates of hades shall not prevail against it—why open the question now? What is the matter with the church? The same thing that has been the matter with it for the last 1900 years, and the thing which will continue to be the matter with it for 1900 years to come. What is the use of asking questions which everybody can answer? Is religion dying out? Of course it is not. How could it die out? Man is by nature a religious animal, and there is no more danger of religion dying out than there is of reason dying out, or love dying out. Has Christianity failed? Of course it has not failed except in the sense that Jesus himself has failed. Christ failed. Paul failed. John failed. All the apostles failed. The church in every country and in every century has failed. What of it? Why ask such stupid questions?

Is the Christian church Christian? Of course it is. If it is not Christian, then let us quit talking about it and devote our attention to something else. If after the efforts and sacrifices of sixty generations the church of Christ is not in any true sense Christian, then it is folly to begin at this late day to try to make it Christian. If all the long line of Christian leaders and workers and martyrs have toiled for nearly 2000 years in vain then we are ludicrously bumptious if we imagine we can do better than those who have gone before us. If the church is not Christian now, certainly it never can be Christian.

Not only is nothing gained by the discussion of such questions, but much is lost. Psychologically it is a blunder. We are always in the wrong when we focus our mind upon ourselves, and hold it there. The man who keeps his finger on his pulse and the thermometer under his tongue is a man who is mentally sick. The man who catches up every idle remark of his neighbors concerning his appearance, or his health, repeating their words, meditating on them, suggesting them to others is a man who is acting the fool. The man who goes up and down the street asking, How do I look? How am I getting on? Am I holding my own? Have I really failed? makes himself a laughing stock and a bore. Sensible men do not ask such questions. Mothers do not beg their sons week after week and month after month with: Have you failed? What is the matter with you? Can you survive? Are you losing ground? God would never have entrusted the rearing of children to women had they been such dunces as to stunt and paralyze their children by flooding them with disheartening questions.

APOSTLES DID NOT ASK THESE QUESTIONS

Take all these current queries in which men of a certain type delight today and put them on the lips of Paul, or of Peter, or of John and see how they sound. Imagine Paul in Athens discussing—Can the church survive? or in Ephesus—Is preaching futile? or in Corinth—Is religion dying out? or in Rome—Has the Christian church failed? Paul did not overthrow the Roman Empire by a question. Certainly this everlasting asking of questions which carry in them a subtle attack on the church has no sanction in the greatest of all Christian preachers. Jesus never wasted time in asking questions which did not get the world on. He never asked: Is religion dying out? or Can Christianity conquer? or Can the business world become Christian? or What is the matter with the Jewish church? He knew what the matter was, and he spent all his time in proclaiming truths which would help the church to slough off its defects.

Our age is like all the ages that preceded it in criticising the church. To its critics the church has never been Christian, it has never succeeded, it has always failed, it has always been on its last legs, it has always been tottering toward the grave. The pulpit has always been stupid, always ridiculous, always impotent. Christianity has always been losing its power. Religion has always been dying out. If a man wants to be of service to his generation let him shake off these debilitating questions. If the church is sick then let him deal in great affirmations. A physician does not stand over his patient asking: Can you survive? Is your energy ebbing? That is the way to kill invalids. You lower vitality in a man or an institution when you prick the mind with questions. You can retard the beat of the heart by solemn interrogations. Suppose that in the great war men of reputation had asked questions like these: Is the American army loyal? Are our Generals patriotic? Does the army understand its duty? Do the men know what they are fighting for? Such questions would have stopped enlistment at once. They would have taken the heart out of the men already in the service. The government would not have tolerated such questions for one minute. They would have broken down the morale. One of the best ways of disintegrating morale is to ask questions.

A TWENTY-FIVE YEAR VACATION

Let us take then a vacation for the next twenty-five years from all questions which intimate that fundamental facts are uncertain. Let us throw ourselves back on the great faiths and hopes by which men live. Let us quit beating the air with these hysterical interrogations and fix our eyes on the glowing ideals which bring healing to hearts willing to receive them.

Is the Christian church Christian? What do you mean by church? Do you mean some little moribund congregation round the corner that you happen to know? Does it loom so large in your vision that you have plunged headlong into the slough of despond? There are, no doubt, isolated congregations in which the fire has died out. That need not surprise us. The same phenomenon is described in the last book of the New Testament. Do you mean by church some particular denomination which is handicapped by its bigotry and frenzied by its crazy notions? There are small groups of Christians who have never shaken off ideas and practices which check in them the work of the grace of Christ. But in a world like this such tragedies are inevitable. When you use the word "church" you use a vast word, a word which covers the entire body of Christian believers, the whole company of men and women who have dedicated themselves to God in Christ.

Is this bundle of life Christian? Of course it is. It is Christian in the only way in which such a mass can be Christian at this particular stage of human development. It is partially Christian, the Christian leaven is in the lump, and the leaven is working. The whole lump is not yet subdued, it is progressively Christian. The spirit of Christ is working, it is advancing, but it is not yet completely triumphant. The church is not saved, but it is being saved. Like all organisms it is under the law of development, but it is not yet what it is going to be. But it is Christian, genuinely Christian, undeniably Christian by every standard by which it can be fairly measured. Is a boy of ten manly? If he has been well brought up he is manly up to the possibilities of that age. He is not manly to the degree to which he will be manly at twenty. Nor at twenty will he be so fully manly as he will be at forty. The church is truly Christian today, but not so fully Christian as it will be a hundred years from now. And at the end of the hundred years it will not be so thoroughly Christian as it will be a thousand years from then. From the beginning the church has been Christian, and Christian it will always be, but the Christianization is a progress, and it runs on through the ages.

JESUS' TEST OF THE CHURCH

To find out whether the church is Christian we must use the standard announced by Jesus: "By their fruits you shall know them." There is no other safe test. Measured by its fruit the church in our day is the most Christian church that has ever existed on our planet. No church in any other generation has been equal in any way to the church of our own. As for the apostolic church it was a mean and shabby affair compared with the church of the twentieth century. When has the church been so broad in its mind and so wide in its sympathy and so high in its ideals, and so eager to serve, and so indefatigable in good works as today? Never has the church laid less stress on the ceremonial, and more stress on the ethical than just now. Never has the church since the fourth century cared so little for metaphysical creeds and so much for life consecrated to humanity as today. Never have we had such a vast company going about doing good as in this year of our Lord 1921.

When has the church ever shown in such practical and effective ways its interest in the poor, the captives, the blind and the bruised? When has the church given such incontestable proof that it has taken to heart the teaching of the parable of the sheep and the goats? and that it has adopted as its ideal of conduct the hero in the parable of the Good Samaritan. Both in ideal and in deed, both in thought and in feeling, both at home and abroad, the church has never been so gloriously Christian as it is at the present hour. Never has the pulpit been so truly Christian as today. Compare the sermons of our day with those of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and what a contrast. What an advance the preaching of today marks over the preaching of fifty years ago. Never has the spiritual note been sounded so strong in the pulpit as today. How can a man look out upon the foreign field where multitudes of men and women are working in obscure and difficult places, supported by loyal congregations at home, and ever again ask the insulting question: Is the Christian church Christian? Surely the work of the church which Jesus had in his mind, and for which he died, is being done. Men are bearing witness to him to the uttermost parts of the earth.

AN IMPERFECT CHURCH

Let us be patient. The church is not yet perfect. It has not yet attained. It is pressing on. It has not yet accomplished all it will accomplish. It has not attempted all that it will attempt. Some of its faculties are yet undeveloped, some of its powers are yet dormant, some of its talents are buried, some of its virtues lie latent in its blood. Some of the Christian graces are in bud, they will come to bloom later on. Some things it does bunglingly, some things it does not even attempt, but we must not expect the impossible. It is not our fault that we are in a growing world. It is our Heavenly Father's good pleasure that there should be first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn. We have not arrived at the full corn. We must be content for the present with the blade. It does not yet appear what the church is going to be, but we know that Christ loves it and gives himself for it, and that some day, somehow it will be a glorious church, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing. It is Christian now. It is increasingly Christian. It is a mixture. Good and evil in it are mingled. Everything in this world is mixed. Tares will grow with the wheat. That did not discourage Jesus—why should it dishearten us? The church is growing. It has been growing, and will continue to grow. It would grow faster if we did not waste so much time in asking nagging questions!

Is the Christian Church Christian?

From Another Point of View

By Vida D. Scudder

“OUR chief need in the mission field is not money,” said a missionary bishop lately in a rousing address; “What we need much more is a Christian church at home to point to. But it is much easier to raise money in large sums than to find that church.”

Is the church Christian? The question was asked of a devoted deaconess whose life is spent in its service. “Of course not,” came the answer.

“And what would be the first ‘note’ of a really Christian church?”

She hesitated a moment, her delicate face intent:

“Unpopularity,” she said, with decision. . .

It is an interesting adventure to attempt the defense of the Christian church or of Christianity before groups of social radicals, say in a forum at socialist headquarters. They remain quiet during the address with difficult courtesy; as soon as the discussion opens, comes a torrent of scornful protests. The church as an instrument of repression, as a tool of the powers that be, as a cloak for self-deception; the church affording through her philanthropies a convenient sedative to the conscience of the rich, and an evasion of fundamental righteousness—such an image possesses the minds of the audience and cannot be dislodged. “Religion is the opium of the people.” The inscription sanctioned by Soviet Russia expresses, with rare exceptions, though more generally in Europe than in the United States, the opinion of the working masses.

As Matthew Arnold remarked years ago, “They arrive, these masses;” and for the Christian heart, loyal to the living Christ in his mystical body, the situation is disquieting to the point of anguish. And the worst of its anguish is that the question, “Is the church Christian?” echoes sorrowfully within.

AN ANCIENT QUESTION

It is no mere modern question. If the inquirer looks back down the long perspective of Christian history, he will find no point where he can easily answer “Yes” till he reaches the shores of the Lake of Galilee, or at least the church of catacombs. In the middle ages, the great so-called ages of faith, jeers at the whole paraphernalia of organized religion form a staple of literature, and the indignant denunciations of honest men within the church—men like Grosteste, Adam Marsh, and other noble souls in every country—horrify us by their disclosures. The Reformation was a less effective house-cleaning than is sometimes supposed, and by the eighteenth century the sceptics or “intellectuals” of their day were doing the church a far worse injury than denouncing her. They were patronizing her and adopting her as a bulwark of government and a guardian of morals. Contemplating Christian history one sees how easy it is to write a book like Upton Sinclair's “Profits of Religion” and cannot wonder that in many circles the book is greeted with acclaim.

No one, for instance, can read the authentic annals of that glorious spiritual age, the thirteenth century, without recognizing the large degree of truth in the attacks upon the church. If it is any comfort to us, the official church was far less Christian then than now. At least the scandals were more gross, and much was tolerated which could not exist today in any communion, Catholic or Protestant. The organization was commercialized past belief; the morals of the secular clergy are best undescribed; in the tremendous struggle between the pope and the emperor, there was little to choose between the behavior of the two parties. The official church as a whole seems hopelessly alien to the ideals of Jesus.

But when one talks of the official church, is one really talking of the whole church of Christ? Far from it. The student is always confronted with an amazing contrast in the church "militant here below." On the one hand, religious officialdom—not wholly bad nor wholly good—but rarely rising much above the moral level of the secular world around; on the other hand, spiritual activities ever renewed, ever creative, stirring now here, now there, in sweetest freedom, responsive to the Holy Breath of God. In every age, he hath not left himself without witnesses. This very thirteenth century which sees arrogant prelates fighting unabashed for ignoble ends, swayed like any predatory noble by lust and greed, sees also the pure flame of Christian aspiration and achievement shining with heavenly beauty in the murk, so clear that still today we sun ourselves in its radiance.

SPIRITUAL PASSION

It is the century when the spiritual passion of Francis and his followers renewed the very likeness of the Christ-life till the roads and little towns of Umbria became only less Holy Land than those of Galilee. It is the century when those valiant "dogs of the Lord," the disciples of Dominic, vie with the Franciscans in an intellectual labor which quickens the mind of Christendom. The best in the secular life of the period is evoked by the pure Christian idealism of the Lesser Brothers and their Dominican comrades. The rise of the Free Towns owes much to their untrammelled sympathies. Simon de Montfort in his struggle for liberty in England finds his best friends among them. Art, philosophy, poetry revive under their touch. Stubbornly, silently, the Christian consciousness opposes resistance to the powers of this world. The Lauds of Jacopone da Todi and his school, amazing in their mystical beauty, give a transcript of secret things which are forever real. All over Europe spring into being those marvels of architecture, which, as Mr. Cram allows us once more to believe, express the Christian soul.

Directly or indirectly these good gifts are the result of the intense repudiation by the mendicant orders of those acquisitive instincts on which secular society, then and now, subsists. And around the orders gather those great bodies of Tertiaries, the Brothers and Sisters of Penitence, who were so often disconcerting to the governments of their time. No wonder; for they foreshadow advanced and dangerous tendencies, pacifist, international, communist, if you will. They will bear no arms, these tertiaries, and in vain the municipal governments of petty towns appeal to the papacy to grant them dispensation from this disconcerting habit in times of civil strife. Citizens of the Vera Patria and singularly free from the chains of things, they live far in spirit from the vexed little patriotisms of their day. A ferment of thought concerning the true Christian attitude toward property—often leading to strange vagaries—marks the century, finding its climax in the famous controversy of the next age. Men are languishing in prison, men are dying at the stake because they persist in averring that Christ and the apostles held no private wealth and because they claim in all humility the right to do as he did. Thousands in every land are following joyfully the law of their Master to its ultimate surrenders, and knowing the peace of union with him in his redemptive pain. It is among these, not among the officials that we seek an answer to our question.

TWO SETS OF FORCES

If at any point we consider closely the entire life within the church, we shall find the same strange opposition. On the one hand, the forces of institutional religion—corrupt at their worst, and at their best, occupied only with maintaining an accredited and rather uninspired standard, and by the very fact of their trusteeship pledged in a way to that watchful acquisitiveness and conservatism of temper which Christ abhorred; on the other hand, the forces astir in unofficial Christianity—always adventurous and heroic, athirst for sacrifice to the uttermost, illumined by the glory which shines from the Pierced Hands, joyous, creative, free. Toward these tendencies the attitude of the Church Official is often enough repressive, and naturally, for they are dangerous: they have developed the heretics of history. But however persecuted, however disavowed, they have ever surged up anew from the deep heart of the church eternal, ever seeking with desperate loyalty and unquenchable desire to press near to him who said to his own: "Marvel not if the world hate you; ye know that it hated me before it hated you."

And forever the church is bewildered by her offspring—Franciscans, Wesleyans, Christian Socialists—what you will. She pursues an uncertain policy toward them. Now, when she is wise, she has assimilated them, thereby generally subduing them to convention. Again, she has driven them without the pale, to their loss and her own. An extraordinary drama this; the relations of the governors of the church, Roman hierarchy, presbytery, church federations, to the eager pioneers impelled not to maintain a comfortable ethic but to release a supernatural and revolutionary power. Very unwise they are often, these men so sure that they are fulfilling the expectations of Christ! Exasperating, disturbing peoples; prone to wildest exaggerations and to hysterical blunders. Yet, when the church gets her perspective and looks back, she is rather in the habit of canonizing them.

THE GREAT CHRISTIANS

And there is some humor in the fact that to the general mind they are the church. Savonarola, Francis, Wyclif, Wesley, Newman—all in one way or another at odds with the ecclesiastical machinery of their time—these are the men remembered when the church is mentioned; not a Pope Gregory IX or the excellent bishops of the nineteenth century. These are the great Christians: men who not being disloyal yet labored under the imputation of disloyalty; incalculable persons, impelled by the Breath of the Spirit into strange, untried paths; the dangerous, the distrusted, the rejected. They are the abiding glory of the church of Christ.

Does such glory still shine within her? On the answer to this question will largely depend our judgment of the Christianity of the church.

If we want to answer "yes," we must not look first for outstanding personalities—for heroes, martyrs, prophets. In these days of democratic mediocrity, such are hard to find. We must look first at the plain Christians—and what throngs of them there are! Far from public life, untouched it may be by the larger issues of the day, they draw strength in quietude for the disciplines and tests of daily living, from prayerful union with Eternal Love and from faith in his promises. To masses of people, the church is still the fostering Mother, through whom their faith in God and goodness is derived and no one would dare say that Christianity is dead or dying who is cognizant of its hidden work in purifying and strengthening men. The steady creation of Christian character, unselfish, tender, humble, brave, is the enduring miracle, the triumphant witness that the church is still the church of the living God.

L ECCLESIASTICS AND PIONEERS OF THE SPIRIT L

But still the opposition persists between the admirable persons responsible for the continuance of the ecclesiastical structure, and the free spirits of the pioneers. It is an opposition less crudely obvious than in former days. Religious life, at least in the United States, corresponds to our imperfect democracy and preserves a certain simulacrum of freedom; constraints, not absent, being subtler than of old. Gross abuses are over. Our authorities (with whom the public at large still insists on identifying the church) are no longer immoral or corrupt. They are honorable, they are valuable, they are sometimes holy, these authorities. Yet it would be hard to claim that they satisfy the urgent demand for Christian influence in this wracked and awful world.

And still one recognizes all the varied groups familiar to history. The unchurched public, larger than it used to be, but no less scornful of nominal Christianity. The groups of restless seekers, untouched by formal or accredited religion, swayed by passionate tides now sweeping them toward social radicalism, now toward strange mystic cults. And still within the church are those who feel the sanctity of her tradition and draw their very life from her ideals, but who press toward the counsels of perfection, who realize in distress and pain that obedience to the Carpenter of Nazareth can never be satisfied by the decorous respectabilities of our obvious religion.

And the more ardent spirits aim now at deepening the spiritual life, longing to draw aside the veil so thick in modern times between us and reality; and now, since the world is in revolution, and social problems dominate our thought, they summon the religion of the Christ crucified by the respectabilities of his day to ally itself at last with the cause of the oppressed and in the name of him who said, "Behold I make all things new," to join the forces of labor in the abolition of class and the realization of economic brotherhood among men.

How intensely these forces, radical or mystical or both at once, are stirring in the churches, is evident to anyone sensitive to the vibrations of the religious life, here and abroad. At this point this article ought properly to begin; but it is perforce nearing its end. A few hints in illustration must be allowed us. We may recall the "Partite Popolare" in Italy, a radical movement inspired by Christian ideals within the Catholic church; the Christian International, which has gathered young delegates from many lands, and issued a noble manifesto; the League of Faith and Labor, and the Industrial Christian Fellowship in England. These all have in them the thrill of the new life.

AN EXAMPLE NEAR HOME

Perhaps we may dwell a moment on one example nearer home: the League of Industrial Democracy in the Episcopal church. Here too is a fellowship vibrating with the spirit of the religious pioneers of old. It is a small but valiant organization. Says the preamble:

"We face a world in revolution. Some regret the fact; some thank God for it. Regret and gratitude are in a sense equally irrelevant; the church is called to act, and the contemporary situation furnishes her with a challenge and an opportunity unsurpassed since Pentecost.

The purpose of this organization is to unite, for intercession and labor, those within the Episcopal church who believe that it is an essential part of the church's function to make justice and love the controlling motives in all social change, and who wish, as Christians, to promote all sound movements looking toward the democratization of industry and the socialization of life."

The league affirms its belief that "only that social order can be called Christian which substitutes fraternal cooperation for mastership in industry and life." It does not enter the difficult field of economic or political formulae; it recognizes that "the mere transfer of social control from a self-seeking few to a self-seeking many" would in itself avail nothing for righteousness, and it preaches "the gospel of sacrifice, service and fraternity" as ardently to the working class in their rise toward power as to capitalists and employers. It aims to spread among church people our new social movements as they arise. It stands firmly and with growing power behind all clergy—they are many and increasing—whose positions are endangered by their social radicalism and it summons its members constantly to gain from prayer and sacraments "the strength and wisdom requisite for the surrenders and readjustments of democratic living."

THE BEATITUDE OF THE PERSECUTED

Already this body of faithful Christians enjoys a little the Beatitude of the Persecuted. But its members, including sixteen bishops, and a large number of the younger clergy, feel without terror the new day that dawns for civilization. And the intimate contacts with labor, the rare opportunities for full expression of the Christian vision in unusual quarters which this League and all similar bodies gain, prove afresh the marvelous vitality of the life the church exists to nourish.

Two points in conclusion:

First: There is always much to be said for the attitude of the official church. In these compressed pages, scant justice has been shown it. Every sane Christian must realize that the official organization of the church, even if it tends to formalism, does by and large conserve the tradition within which the progress of humanity can most safely be assured, and channels of communication with the Eternal be kept open. The anxious sense of this high task, rather than more ignoble motives, has dictated distrust of its more fiery children and its frequent policy of suppression. They have their place in the kingdom, the careful protectors of an accredited and accepted morality. Great work is theirs to do, continually, quietly. The children of the Day-to-Be may be called to ignore them and at times to oppose them, for the officials of the church have almost never been willing to follow the faith of which they are the appointed guardians to its ultimate limit, which is a certain hill without the city wall, known as the Place of the Skull. But it is possible to reverence while one opposes, and the noblest souls within the church have ever combined deep loyalty to her sacrament and her organization, with gentle and persistent revolt from all which clogged the full expression of forward looking love.

THE CHANGED SITUATION

Second: The situation is changing before our eyes. Because the ecclesiastical organization has, in the past, opposed progress, is no reason why she should always continue to play this discouraged role. Nations, in time, become democracies. The church in God's own season may cast aside her fears. Already there are gladdening signs on every hand of new vision and new courage. Despite her vast endowment, she is probably less rooted in the temporalities than she was in the middle ages. One hears rumors of pioneer minds in the church of Rome working out a new socialized casuistry concerning Christians and private property. Radical repudiation of an industrial order based on competition and fostering the acquisitive instincts, is latent in the formulae of all social service commissions, is expressed with splendid courage in such documents as the Lambeth Report and the social creed of the churches issued by the Federal Council. The call to sacrifice in the name of the brotherhood sounds clearer and clearer, year by year, from countless pulpits, and the glorious possibility of extending Christian ideals from a code of private virtue to the informing principle of international and industrial life becomes clearer and clearer as the one hope of the world.

"Sirs, what if I turned Christian?" was the query flung by Browning's charming young priest, Capousacchi, to the world prelates of the Renaissance. It is the question the Christian church is putting today, alike to her own authorities and to the world. If she should indeed "turn Christian," what then? The deaconess quoted at the outset may well have said the word of truth: unpopularity will be her portion: the state, the secular world, may look at her askance. But let her remember how dangerous Jesus thought it not to be unpopular. "Woe unto you," he said explicitly, "when all men shall speak well of you." "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake."

Perhaps the Christian church may soon inherit, as a whole, that neglected portion of her noblest sons—and on the day when she enters into that inheritance, and not before, she will win thousands among her critics to her allegiance.

A Modern Religious Outlook

By Richard Roberts

THIS is not a creed. It is an attempt to state simply and succinctly the main elements of one man's religion in this year of grace 1921. It arose out of a recent discussion upon the fundamentals of religion with a group of college graduates.

I

THE BACKGROUND

The first need of our time is a vision of life under some image of a city of God,* a beloved community; a vision of men and women living together, doing great things together—the great things of the spirit.

*The religious quest of ordinary humanity has not been for God but for a city or kingdom of God. Only the mystic has sought a direct vision of God. Jesus did not tell man to seek God; he did not think that God needed seeking; but he did tell men to seek the kingdom of God. The whole outlook of the New Testament is towards a social existence of love and peace and harmony—"the city which hath the foundations," the New Jerusalem. Few books have so moved mankind, from Plato's Republic to Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward, as those which have sought to depict the ideal commonwealth.

This vision will first function as a principle of criticism and valuation, directing itself to life as it is today. It will test all institutions, doctrines, policies, modes of behaviour, by asking concerning them two questions: First, Does this make for the increase of life? Second, Does this make for the unity of life?

The vision will provide an objective, a goal, that will require us to evolve a technique* of life appropriate to its realization.

*By a technique of life is meant any coherent scheme of behavior—public and private, including morals and table-manners, economic processes and political policies. The nature of the technique will be determined by the objective. Nietzsche's doctrine of the Superman requires the technique of individual self-assertion and a social organization of master and slave. The Puritan motive of spiritual survival (in England) and afterward of social survival (in America) created the rigorous and austere Puritan technique. It was economy of life, for the sake of the survival of life.

Two modern nations have consciously and with some consistency pursued an objective. Germany pursued power, and for the purpose evolved a technique of close social regimentation which it called its kultur. America has pursued prosperity and has evolved a technique primarily for wealth production which is identified by some with Americanism.* Great Britain has vacillated between a love of freedom and a passion for empire and has in consequence evolved a muddled self-contradictory technique. Hence her European reputation for hypocrisy. What if the youth of Germany, America and Britain could be mobilized for the realization of a city of God, in the village and the small town, in city, nation and the world!

*If this seems too harsh a judgment, let the following quotation justify it. It is from a letter written by the Vice-President and General Manager of the Employers' Association of Pittsburgh to its members: "Some of the things that the Y. W. C. A. believes in and endorses are as follows: Industrial democracy, collective bargaining, a share in shop-control and management by the workers, labor's desire for an equitable share in the profits and management of industry, protection of workers from enforced employment, a minimum wage, government labor exchanges, experiments in cooperative ownership. The Y. W. C. A. has done and is doing a good work along some lines; and it is greatly to be regretted that they have taken this excursion into a field about which they know practically nothing, and thus lend encouragement to what every man conversant with industrial problems knows to be destructive of the very basis of America's progress and civilization.

II

THE FAITH

Life is a process working out and moving towards its own realization in perfect love*; and this process is the will of God.† Faith is the will to face life on the assumption that God is love and that he is always actively on the side of those whose life, aspiration and effort are in the line of his will.

*We start with the concept of life, because it is the most obvious and immediate fact of experience. Modern evangelical religion fails because of its moralistic background, as though the moral order were the ultimate basis of life. But the moral order is simply the condition under which life will reach its goal. The business of religion is not to inculcate morals but to reveal values; and if it can communicate a principle of valuation, morals will take care of themselves. But it reveals values by revealing a "realm of ends"; and so far as human life is concerned this realm of ends is the universe of love.

†No apology is made for this assumption. Any signs of purpose in life justify the presumption that there is an intelligent will involved in it. But God is taken simply on those terms, taken for granted, as it were; and nothing is predicated about his non-moral attributes—omniscience, omnipotence, omnipresence. For these after all are metaphysical guesses.

The ultimate ground of this faith is the cross of Jesus, which reveals a love of God* that is true to itself through everything, even to the forgiving of impenitent enemies.

*The highwater mark of life is personality; the highwater mark of personality is Jesus; the highwater mark of Jesus is the cross; and the highwater mark of the cross is "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do." That is "love going the limit"; and it shows the way in which life is trying to go, the goal it seeks to reach, and the fundamental nature of the will which is within it. It is to be observed that this remains true whether we conceive of God as uniquely incarnate or fully immanent in Jesus. It disposes of the old controversy about the "diphthong!"

The human endowment of freedom means that God has designed and equipped us to work with him for the triumph of life in perfect love; but it also means that we have no assurance beforehand that life will win out.* The triumph of life is contingent on us. Sin is the refusal to take our place in the struggle, sabotage of the purpose of God by unsocial and antisocial conduct.

*It is surely time we dropped the stupid and enervating superstition of a fated and inevitable progress. If we accept free will, we must accept a doctrine of conditional progress; and one observes that the most thoroughgoing determinists quietly assume the freedom of their own wills while they deny that of the rest of us!

While we have no assurance of the final triumph of life in time, the hope of immortality brings reassurance concerning the destiny of the individual and the promise of redress for the brokenness incidental to the struggle of life in the present world.

III

THE LIFE

The perfect embodiment of the life, the perfect exponent, by word and deed, of its critique and its technique, is Jesus.

The roots of the life are in prayer and in fellowship—*especially in both together.

*By prayer is meant any affirmation of faith, that is, any effort to make contact with the Unseen Source of life. By fellowship is meant any affirmation of love, to make vital contacts with other folk. The church was meant to be the organ of fellowship in prayer. Today it is only a corporation.

The technique of life will be governed by the ideals of freedom and fellowship.*

*Freedom, because original creative faculty is an affair of the individual; fellowship, because personality is social and the individual only finds himself in fellowship. The synthesis of freedom and fellowship is love, as indeed it is also their source. It will be observed that it is implied here that this technique of life will not use or consent to the use of force or coercion except as such use is directed to and is consistent with a redemptive purpose; for love is essentially an energy—and follows a policy—of redemption and social integration.

The personal realisation of life is by way of

1. Creation—the fashioning out of our own substance, in whatever medium, word or deed, color, sound or stone, that which may be a quickening of life in others;
2. Redemption—the exercise of love in overcoming the anarchy of self-love in others;
3. Discovery—the searching out and finding of unknown things that may add to the stature, or the wealth of life.
4. The service of life in any vocation.*

*Creation, including all forms of art; here we have the criterion of art—not art for art's sake, or art for preaching, but art for life's sake. Redemption, especially the endeavor to reclaim the social misfit, the criminal and the derelict, to reconcile enemies—to God and man. Discovery, embracing science, of course. Vocation, observe, not occupation. A man chooses his occupation; but his vocation chooses him. This includes commerce which should be conceived not as a means of private gain but as a holy and constructive social service, requiring no less sacrifice and no less chivalry than we expect, for instance, from a physician. It is one of the most damning criticisms that we pass on commerce that we should say that a physician who cares more for his pay than for his patients "commercialises" his profession.

It is to be observed also that altruism has no place in this scheme. Altruism is a counterfeit of love. For love is also a hunger and is therefore humble. But altruism means condescension, patronage, the implication of superiority. And we are all just poor empty hungry souls who help each other by simply pooling our hunger and seeking together "the manna from heaven."

IV

THE GOAL

The goal is "the good life of personality in the environment of the beloved community."*

*This is quoted from Randolph Bourne, but he evidently got it from Josiah Royce. Observe that there is no longer any distinction of "individual" and "social" ethics. It is superseded by the idea of an "organic" ethics. Personal and social are interdependent. The great soul and the great society will arrive together.

The glory of the beloved community will be the perfection of its fellowship and its art, the riches of its life in love and beauty.*

*"My friend, you and I shall remain strangers unto life and unto one another and each unto himself, until the day when you shall speak and I shall listen deeming your voice my own voice, and when I shall stand before you and think myself standing before a mirror." (A saying of Kahlil Gibran). That is love made perfect. It is self-identification with the other man.

V E R S E

"Sanctuary"

LET us put by some hour of every day
 For holy things—whether it be when dawn
 Peers through the window-pane, or, when the noon
 Flames like a burnished topaz in the vault,
 Or when the thrush pours in the ear of eve
 Its plaintive melody; some little hour
 Wherein to hold rapt converse with the soul
 From sordidness and self a sanctuary,
 Swept by the winnowing of unseen wings,
 And touched by the White Light Ineffable.

CLINTON SCOLLARD.

Arcady

OH! I have sought for Arcady
 In many lands and far;
 And winding trails have beckoned me
 Beyond each high white star.

The happy hours kept pace with me,
 And laughed along the way;
 And star-dust dreams companioned me
 Through every questing day.

Oh! I have hied me home at last—
 No more I seek, forsooth;
 For fleeting years have whisp'ed me
 That Arcady was—Youth.

ANNA K. BENNET.

Life

IF life be short, let's make it
 As lovely as a rose!
 If cares there be to shake it,
 If griefs there be to break it
 With multitude of blows—
 If every joy forsake it
 And only sorrow wake it,
 Let fragrance crown its woes!
 If life be short, let's make it
 As lovely as a rose.

CHARLES G. BLANDEN.

Wealth

IT all belongs to all. Not even food
 Nor lodge nor clothes belong to you of right Inherent, absolute. The only claim
 To even them is won by work, a clean
 Addition to the sum of human weal.
 None may in justice plead exemption save
 The senile, infantile, or imbecile:—
 The loafer thus may classify himself.
 Wealth is the surplusage of labor massed.
 A lavish, reckless, irresponsible

Expenditure on self of common stores
 Is violation of the rights of all.
 A true democracy must find the way
 To claim again in the behalf of all
 What none can show the right to have and hold.
 Does this spell revolution? Aye, naught less!
 The question which alone remains is how.
 The "must" is not a peradventure. Why
 Is altogether clear: abuse of power
 From riches won by seizure is so rank,
 And constant, and inevitable, that
 Evasion of the issue's ludicrous,
 Or wicked, proof of common cowardice.
 This is not "socialism"; it is sense.
 Nor will it wreck society; it will Alone forestall inevitable wreck.

JOSEPH ERNEST MCAFEE.

Youth Passing

MY age comes on me all too soon,
 My twilight crowds upon my noon;
 The dreams my boyhood knew are tossed
 Like straws upon the wind and lost.

I hasten to the darkling wood
 To join the quiet brotherhood,
 And learn if it be false or fair,
 That God is good, as priests declare.

And if the tale is rightly told
 I who before my time grew old
 Shall kneel before the living Truth
 And beg again my vanished Youth!

JAMES WALDO FAWCETT.

Revolution

I THOUGHT the ruin of old schemes,
 The falling down of ancient wrong,
 Would make a theme for singing men,
 The burden of a poet's song!

But oh! so swift and true they struck,
 So keen their blade and great their thrust,
 The strongholds of oppression fell
 In merest silence to the dust!

JAMES WALDO FAWCETT.

Essentials

A LITTLE love, a little trust,
 A soft impulse, a sudden dream—
 And life which was as dry as dust
 Is fresher than a mountain stream.

STOPFORD BROOKE.

The Twelve Hour Day

A CENTURY ago the twelve hour day was common in industry. Today it is common only in India, China and the American steel mills. Before the war Russia still worked the twelve hour day, but during and since the war it has been abolished in practically every European country. It is the last vestige of the rude early stage of machine industry, and when coupled with the seven day week it is little more than barbaric. It is one thing for a farmer to work that number of hours when he works for himself, or for his hired man to do it where the work is varied, the rest periods under the worker's control and the work seasonal with long seasonal lulls; and it is altogether another thing for men to work in mills and factories under a boss, for a company where there is no personal contact and where the work is steady and monotonous.

In 1912 the stockholders' committee of the United States Steel Corporation reported to the company that in their judgment "the twelve hour day of labor, followed continuously by any group of men for any considerable number of years, means decreasing the efficiency and a lessening of the vigor and vitality of such men." They called attention to the fact that it means thirteen hours out of the home and "leaves scant time for self-improvement, for companionship with his family, for recreation and leisure." They recommended therefore that it be abolished. On the seven day week they were even more emphatic, saying: "We are strongly of the opinion that no matter what alleged difficulties in operation may seem to hinder the abandonment of the seven day, they must be met." The seven day week was ordered reduced even before 1912, but both its use and that of the twelve hour day increased instead. Judge Gary says the seven day week "can, must and will be eliminated." The Christian conscience of the nation demands that he add the twelve hour day to that order.

* * *

The Effect of the Twelve Hour Day on Men

The Survey for March 5 is largely devoted to "Three Shifts in Steel." John Fitch tells there the results of his personal investigations into the human side of the twelve hour day. He helped to make the Pittsburg Survey twelve years ago, and in this study he went back and interviewed the same men he had talked with then. Here are some of his findings. When the worker worked twelve hours he used to be so tired "he didn't know what he was doing," but now he gets rested every day. "It isn't right. A man has no pleasure in life at all. I never go out evenings when I am working on the day turn because I don't dare lose any sleep. On night turn I have no evenings, so life is nothing but work and sleep. A man hardly knows his family." "A man can't sleep more than three or four hours in the day time, and he's tired all the time—chronically tired. Money is no recompense for the kind of life we live. I would gladly accept a reduction in wages with an eight hour day." "We can't live when we work twelve hours a day with no day off. What kind of a life is it to live here and see nothing but the mill? A man could live twice as long if he had the eight-hour day."

A man who struck against the twelve hour day and took up contracting said, "What's the big pay of my old job to me? I'm working outdoors here in the sun and I'm well. I feel like a king—every day I feel like a king." A foreigner who got a ten-hour day said he always felt queer under twelve hours but he is rested now and has ambition again. A highly skilled man said: "At the end of eight hours everyone drags along performing as little work as possible." "It is a question of eat, work and sleep"—this is the universal refrain. Another skilled man says "a man works, comes home, eats, goes to bed, gets up, eats and goes to work." Mr. Fitch gives a graphic description of the twelve hour man's household with double meals for the family and the worker with these increased again when there are two workers, one on day and the other on night shifts, and no family meals at all or days with the family.

A small percentage of unmarried, hearty newcomers from alien lands who wish to lay up money quickly and return home or have sweetheart or wife come over, may prefer the long day for the sake of the extra wages, but the mass of the men would gladly split the difference in pay between the twelve and eight hour shifts for the sake of the shorter hours and a chance to live.

* * *

What Britishers Think About It

Mr. Whiting Williams, who as vice-president of the Hydraulic Pressed Steel Company of Cleveland, put on overalls and spent seven months in various steel mills to find out "What's on the Worker's Mind," and who last summer did the same thing by working five months in British mills, tells in the same number of the Survey what he found the British worker thinking about the twelve hour day. "We will be glad to be done with the twelve hour day for good and all. You wouldn't find anybody in the country—employer or employee—who would be willing to go back to it even on a temporary basis." He says the shorter day has not lessened production or the ability to meet American competition and that, cost of living taken into account, "the British worker in steel and iron is probably better paid than the American." He says "it is impossible to overstate the amazement and incredulity—also the profanity—which in all parts of the country greeted the statement that the long turn was still in operation in most of the steel mills in America. "No! Wot? Twelve hours and no time out for breakfast or dinner—in America! And seven days a week! Well, rule Britannia! I supposed we was bloody the lawst! Blime, yer don't sye." Even "operation of the open hearth or smelting furnace," which we are so constantly told must be kept going, "has for years in Britain been suspended from Saturday early afternoon to late Sunday night."

Mr. Williams says the most surprising feature in connection with it is that there is unanimity amongst owners, superintendents and all classes of workers in refusing to think that there are two sides to the question. They agree that it results in less wear and tear, lessens tardiness and absence, drink and the "driving" tactics of the foreman, which usually results in sullenness, indifference and a determination not to do more than necessary to get by. The "sliding scale" results in sharing prosperity, good will between management and workers and increased activity on the part of the workers. The shorter hours lessen dissipation and bring more games and an increasing good use of the leisure time.

* * *

The Dollar and Cents Side of the Issue

Before the last meeting of the Taylor Society in New York, Mr. Horace B. Drury presented the results of a very thorough-going study* of the the three shift system in the steel industry in this country. His findings as a scientific economist agree thoroughly with the findings of the Interchurch Investigating Commission. One million five hundred thousand workers have had their hours reduced to eight in the past few years and the whole trend is toward the eight hour day. However the adoption of the three shift in any continuous industry does not necessarily mean the adoption of the eight hour day; it does mean the abolition of the inhuman twelve hour day. Mr. Drury sums up his findings as follows: "To give all the men now on twelve hour work a 25 per cent increase in wages and cut down their day from twelve to eight hours, would cost the manufacturer of pig iron at most about 21c a ton. Pig iron sells (at the time paper was read) for $40. If all the departments in a steel plant were to be changed from two to three shifts, the increase in total cost for the finished rail, bar or plate could not, on the average, be more than about 3 per cent." This he goes on to say, is too high in actual experience, as a 35 per cent increase in workmen will cover the change from a two to a three shift system, large economies will result in greater attention, alertness and care, and there will usually be an increase in production, amounting in some cases to as much as 20 per cent.

*The Three Shift System in the Steel Industry by Horace B. Drury. The Taylor Society, 29 W. 39th St., N. Y.

In due time, when all adjustments are made and the men are trained to a more alert and better managed system of action, there will be an increase fully equal to the additional wage fund required. Steel has been profitable enough to make it quite possible to pay the twenty odd million it would cost to make the change; if it were not then it is better for the consumer to bear the small extra cost on each ton of steel than to perpetuate a system of work that is so archaic, trouble-making and debilitating to men, their homes and their citizenship, as well as demeaning to our common Americanism. Mr. Drury investigated twenty great companies that have adopted the three shift system and found surprising unanimity, just as Mr. Williams did in Great Britain, among all concerned, that it was no longer a debatable question. The twelve hour day can, must and will be eliminated.

ALVA W. TAYLOR

British Table Talk

The Nonconformist Conscience

London, March, 1921.

DR. CLIFFORD has issued a clarion call to Nonconformists to rouse themselves in protest against reprisals in Ireland. "There is a tendency," he says, "to hesitate in regard to the impeachment of the present government which I for one consider to be altogether unworthy of our principles and traditions. Whatever may happen to the government, it is the duty of free churchmen to protest against a policy which is at once illegal, unjust, ineffective and must be disastrous to Ireland and to this country. If free churchmen fail to protest, they are traitors to their principles and refuse to carry out their obligations." He considers the issue to be vital to our relations with America and to our moral standing in the eyes of other nations. "For my own part, I believe in a policy that attempts to overcome evil with good, rather than a policy that would attempt to overcome evil with evil." Resolutions will be passed at the forthcoming assemblies of the Baptists and the Free Church Council, "but whether they will be strong enough," says Dr. Clifford, "I do not at present know." He considers that a deputation should be sent from the Manchester Assembly of the Free Church Council to the prime minister and the Irish secretary. Principal Selbie of Mansfield, Oxford, writes to the Times: "However great be the provocation, there can be no possible justification for the policy of reprisals as it has been carried out. It is the negation of law and ethically quite indefensible." For the most part official nonconformity has not spoken on this grave matter with the certain and reiterated sound that it should have done. This is partly because nonconformists, like the liberals, are now sharply divided in their political allegiance. The British Weekly, the most influential free church newspaper, is an out-and-out supporter of the prime minister and the coalition. On the other hand, the Christian World, the old-established organ of "political dissent," maintains the Independent Liberal position, and fearlessly criticises and condemns Mr. Lloyd George's inconsistencies, and the government's frequent violations of Liberal principles and nonconformist sentiment. Anglicans and dissenters alike are grateful to the Archbishop of Canterbury for his dignified and forceful protest in the house of Lords. "I say deliberately," affirmed his grace "that if it is by wrongdoing that you produce peace, you have not really won a peace which is worth while. . . Not by calling in the aid of the devil will we cast out devils or banish devilry." A newspaper correspondent, commenting on Mr. Devlin's complaint of the torpor of the nonconformist conscience, caustically remarks: "It is not dead, it has been transferred to the Archbishop of Canterbury."

* * *

The Churches and the Unemployed

With a million unemployed in our midst, the churches are striving both to relieve distress and to search out fundamental causes. After a Saturday afternoon service at St. Paul's, Covent Garden (Canon Adderley's), a procession containing many clergymen marched into Trafalgar Square where a large crowd had assembled. The procession was headed by a plain cross, followed by a banner inscribed "In the Name of Christ we demand Justice for the Unemployed." Then came the banners of trades unions, detachments of unemployed and the Church Socialist League. The speakers included a Romanist, Anglicans, and free churchmen, one of the latter being Dr. Orchard enveloped in a black cloak. The resolution passed declared that the crisis was a sign of the failure of our present social system, and that the remedy could only be found in a fundamental change in our social system. It was also urged that all possible means should be at once taken to provide work for as many unemployed as possible at standard wages, and that the Christian church should raise its united voice with a view to relieve the acute distress. All the speakers advocated some kind of Socialism, and endorsed the principle of state-maintenance of the workless. The next day in the (Wesleyan) Central Hall a thousand people listened to an address by Mr. Robert Young, a Labor M. P., on Christianity and the Unemployed. He insisted that a victorious people cannot consent to return to the economic conditions of the pre-war years, and declared that the vain search for work demoralizes a man physically, breaks him down mentally, and endangers him morally. Thus ministers and laymen are striving to apply Christianity to economic problems and labor conditions, some of them being perplexed as to the best methods to employ and how far as religious teachers they should intervene in industrial affairs. At a meeting held by the League of Faith and Labor preliminary to the Trafalgar Square demonstration, which it helped to organize, a minister while supporting unemployment insurance, urged that the church's immediate duty is to show the underlying purpose of industry, rather than to mark out an economic policy.

* * *

The Church and the Cinema

As a whole, churches and ministers, while realizing the immense possibilities, religious and educational, of moving pictures have been slow to decide what should be the attitude of organized religion to this new and tremendous agency for good or evil. Most religious leaders content themselves with pointing out and condemning the evil elements in the cinemas and calling for their elimination. A few shrewd and enterprising churches and missions have boldly adapted it to religious purposes. The Church Army has for years shown pictures on Sunday evenings. Most of the Methodist Central Missions use the cinema at Saturday concerts and Sunday services. Digbeth Institute, opened by Carrs Lane Church during Dr. Jowett's ministry there, was the first in Birmingham to adopt moving pictures, which are now witnessed every Sunday evening by between 1500 and 1600 people. A company, the Church Pictorial Movement Limited, has been formed on a commercial asis, with a capital of 100,000 pounds for the purpose of giving cinema exhibitions in small towns and villages and thus "to provide amusement and instruction for rural audiences and alleviate the dullness of leisure hours and assist in preventing the depopulation of the countryside." The movement has received arch-episcopal and episcopal blessing, and motor cinemas are now traveling through the country giving in parish halls and schools exhibitions which are much appreciated. A petition to Plymouth Borough Council, signed by 21,000 people, in favor of the opening of cinemas on Sundays, prompted a local minister to propose to the citizens that they should form a People's Council, representative of the churches, the Labor party, the Watch Committee, and other institutions, to survey the needs of the town, and at suitable points arrange

Sunday evening social centers for the people, where they could obtain light refreshments at cost price, hear good music, and enjoy wholesome social fellowship. One difficulty is to obtain good and suitable films for religious purposes. "Earth-bound," the cinematograph's first contribution to the consideration of the problem of life after death, recently shown in London, was an ambitious, well-meaning, but rather crude effort. Better adapted to religious purposes, "Thy Soul Shall Bear Witness," based on a story by Selma Lagerlof and issued by the Swedish Biograph Company is an attempt to preach through the eye a sermon on sin and repentance. "The Beginnings of Christianity," which starts with the creation, and contains about 30,000 feet of matter is about to be produced in London and is exciting anticipation. ALBERT DAWSON.

CORRESPONDENCE

Ministers and Radicalism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: By no means the least interesting part of your paper is the "Correspondence" page. In your issue of March 17 are two notable letters, which seem to me to merit a word of discussion, and as no one else appears to have responded I am taking the liberty of doing so.

In his letter on "Unjust Policies of Labor Unions," Mr. Joseph B. Lyman sounds a word of warning that may be necessary for the churches. The interests of truth and fairness are not any more conserved by blind radicalism, than by narrow conservatism. But I wonder if Mr. Lyman does not charge against the unions, much that is really chargeable against human nature, and that is by no means confined to the unions. While we are not justified in palliating selfishness and injustice because it is on the part of workingmen, are we not apt to demand of the workers a type of morality and idealism that we have been slow to demand from employers and captains of industry, either individually or collectively? We are so ready to assume that the unions ought to consider the interests of the community, while we more or less justify the employers' consideration of things from the standpoint of profits and dividends. I think we would make more progress if we denounced wrong as wrong, and ceased to talk so much of "capitalistic" wrongs, and "unionistic" wrongs.

Two wrongs do not make a right, nor does the history of a wrong constitute its justification. There is no great transformation of grace that turns a worker into an unselfish idealist as soon as he joins a labor union. But I think it is only fair toward the unions to point out that almost every policy that might be regarded as unjust has arisen to meet some corresponding injustice from which the worker has suffered. For instance, Mr. Lyman cites the limitation of a day's bricklaying by the unions. It is not many years since I heard a bricklayer, upon whom I was making a pastoral call, bitterly denouncing the practice of employing unusually strong and skillful workers at higher wages, for the purpose of pace-making and speeding up. He professed his readiness to do a fair day's work, and I believe him to have been an honest and competent worker, but he thought it unfair that men of average strength and ability should be forced to undue exertion in keeping up with a line constantly advanced by the speed-maker. This may explain why, when the unions got the upper hand, they went to the opposite extreme.

During the war, and since, we have heard much about the limitation of output by the workers. I have passed through several acute industrial crises, and long periods of extreme unemployment, in industrial communities. The constant explanation of these conditions was "over-production." I do not discuss this explanation, nor the condition to which it was applied. I merely remark that when the mind of the worker has been filled with this "over-production" bugaboo, by economists and employers, you cannot expect the psychology of the worker to change over-night. I do not offer any defense of "slacking." I am convinced that the world's trouble is not over-production, but under-consumption. But we cannot blame the worker for appropriating ideas widely promulgated, and there can be no question whatever that a great number of workingmen strongly believe that in unduly speeding up production they are helping to produce themselves out of a job.

Without the least reference to Mr. Lyman, I think it may be said that the average minister gets too much of his knowledge and impressions of social and labor matters at second hand. In the cultivation of close acquaintance with employers and workers he can learn much regarding the special problems and difficulties of each, relating his information to the wider range of facts, and to the problem that is larger than the individual case. I think that in such a process of personal inquiry one comes to a deep sympathy with the task of the fair-minded employer, but I think also that an intelligent union-worker is able often to put an entirely different aspect upon some demand, or rule, that to an outsider has seemed unjust. A rule that works a great injustice in the individual case, either toward employer or worker, may be necessary and for the benefit of a large number.

I would deplore, as much as Mr. Lyman, any selling out of the church to unionism, but when one finds unionism making generally for better wages, more reasonable hours and for cleaner and healthier factory environment, one cannot help being impressed. On the other hand, allowing for a few notable exceptions, and for occasional brief periods under unusual conditions, it has been my observation that the employers who are strongly opposed to unionism work their employees longer hours, for lower wages, and under inferior conditions, to those prevailing under unionized plants. An ordinary minister, who is seeking to be fair and impartial, would be much more strongly impressed with the honesty and idealism of an employer's opposition to unionism, and of the plea for liberty, if he found these associated with more progressive action.

I have read with some amazement the letter of Clarence H. Wilson regarding revolutionary agencies employing the institutions of the church for propaganda purposes. I wonder if the theological student and the seminary professor to whom Mr. Wilson refers would accept his version of the private conversations which he reports. I do not question his honesty in the matter, but the conversations are of a nature where misunderstanding is rampant, and where a few words taken out of their relation to a man's whole viewpoint and character may give an erroneous and unfair impression. It seems incredible that many men would enter the ministry with a sinister purpose of preaching socialism. Surely, at best, Mr. Wilson exaggerates the importance of isolated cases. If, as is possible, a man frankly believes that Christianity implies socialism, he ought to have a right to his opinion without being subjected to anything more than just and fair criticism. I think it is hardly meeting propaganda with propaganda, or argument with argument, to suggest that men are ready to prostitute pulpit and seminary chair to the despicable purpose of disseminating ideas which they do not believe to be essentially Christian.

The fact of the matter is that, though Mr. Wilson may live in a liberal and enlightened community, there are many communities where the mildest variance from utter stand-pat-ism in religion and politics is sufficient to bring against the sincere minister of Christ the charge of being "socialist," "bol-shevist," or something equally ridiculous. I have no great complaint to make myself; but I know at the present moment of men of the utmost purity and sincerity of character, and of pronounced Christian faith and vision, who, because of their passion for social redemption, fairly and reasonably manifested, are being subjected to the basest misrepresentation and the pettiest sort of persecution. I regret that a life-long liberal Mr. Wilson, should make the situation of such noble men more difficult, for I frankly believe that the effect of his letter will not be toward the weeding out of some exceptional man who prostitutes the ministerial calling, but to strengthen the hands of those who bring the sort of charges he has implied against men of the utmost worthiness and integrity.

If we liberals would have the sort of liberty we desire, we must defend the rights and liberties of men who are our equals in sincerity, no matter how deeply their opinions may differ from our own. The social implications of Christianity are so much matters of controversy that we ought surely to encourage wide latitude in opinion and expression, and an inquiring, non-dogmatic temper.

W. E. GILROY.

Fond du Lac, Wis.

Insists Community Church Pastors Are Christians!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just read your communication from Rev. J. Frank Green, published in the issue of March 31. Mr. Green says that in nine cases out of ten, pastors who accept community churches are not evangelical. When Mr. Green makes this statement he virtually says that he is acquainted with about ten out of ten community pastors in the country and has found nine of the ten unevangelical. If he does not possess such information, he is guilty of deliberate slander of community pastors. I venture to say that Mr. Green can not give the names of twenty of the more than 500 pastors of community and federated churches in the United States. We have in our office files a long list of such pastors and we know the evangelical pedigrees of a great many of them, and have them recorded. More than 80 per cent of them went to community churches they now serve from an evangelical ministry of successful accomplishment, measured in terms of souls saved. It is true that some pastors of community churches in the east are not evangelical, and for the same reason that many pastors of sectarian churches in the same section of the country are not evangelical. They are infected with the same infection which has stultified the denominational work of New England for years. But this is not chargeable to the community church nor to them in their particular capacity as pastors of community churches.

Mr. Green talks as if all that is necessary to recruit ministers and missionaries is to keep the churches small enough and sectarian enough. He argues that most of our ministers and missionaries come from churches of less than 100 members, and that therefore it is preferable to have these little churches stay little and compete with each other in overchurched communities. We suggest that it might be wise on the basis of this logic to ask all churches of more than two hundred members to divide into small churches. They might produce more preachers. And besides, I should like to have Mr. Green offer some statistics in support of his statement that the competing sectarian churches in small fields and of less than 100 members each do actually furnish us with most of our ministers and missionaries.

Mr. Green says he has read, re-read and studied Interchurch reports, and has come to certain conclusions not complimentary to the veraciousness of the compilers of those reports. What he has not studied is the actual facts at first hand. He has read the reports and compared them with his imagination of what is or what he thinks ought to be so, and has discounted them on that basis. We have in this office data gathered quite independently of Interchurch reports on a multitude of community churches, making individual studies of each church including increase in membership, missionary contributions, and many similar matters. Mr. Green would be very much surprised at these findings, which quite agree with those of the Interchurch. But to present them here would occupy several issues of The Christian Century, and I observe that Mr. Green prefers dealing in preconceptions rather than facts anyway. This is only for that section of your readers who desire humbly to know facts and then base their judgments upon them.

Canton, Mo.

DAVID R. PIPER,
Managing Editor,
The Community Churchman.

No Shortage of Ministers

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: This is the first time that I have written to The Christian Century for publication in the correspondence column, but I hope to see this letter in print. I always read the "Century" from cover to cover the very evening it arrives—I would rather read it than eat. But I want to "call you" for a couple of news items or articles in the last issue concerning the shortage of ministers and lack of recruits and students for the ministry.

I admit that there would seem to be a shortage because of lack of students. I know that our religious papers have been crying the need of more ministers and our state secretaries have been pleading for men. I also observe teams of speakers in some denominations going among the churches trying to recruit young men for the ministry.

In spite of these facts, I would like to challenge any one to

The Worst Boys in Town

By James L. Hill, D. D.

A collection of addresses given on both shores of the United States, up and down the Mississippi, and in every capital in New England. The author gave an address in Montreal which later served as a campaign document in Canada.

Price $2.50, plus 12 cents postage.

* * *

BOOKS TO GIVE TO BOYS.

TOUCHSTONES OF SUCCESS

One hundred and sixty prominent men of today point out for boys some of the paths to genuine success.

Price $1.25, plus 8 cents postage.

FIRST! A TALK WITH BOYS.

By Henry Drummond.

The most inspiring book ever written for Christian youth.

Price 50 cents, plus 5 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

prove that there is such a shortage. If I were rich I would offer a reward for the proof.

I am an ordained minister, a graduate of Hiram College, have been in religious work with the Y. M. C. A. for three years, but would like to find a church again. In answer to my letters to state and city secretaries, they all say that there are no vacancies. Just to satisfy my curiosity, I have investigated several other denominations and have received the same reply.

Furthermore, two of my former college mates have been having the same experience. One of them who was a most successful pastor in this city and who has been with the Y. M. C. A. since returning from over seas has been making every effort to locate a church but without success. Very few of his letters are even answered, but the replies he does get say there are no vacancies. Now, I would like to ask what the trouble is. Frankly, I think there are more preachers than churches. It is certain that there are more preachers than there are churches that will or can pay salary enough for a man to support a wife. Unfortunately, I and some others have obligated ourselves to support such an accessory, and so we are "out of luck."

Why don't we frankly admit the difficulty, instead of crying for more men, and bring some of the churches to self support, provide salaries through the home mission boards, or cause the weak churches to unite with other weak churches nearby?

Pittsburgh, Pa.

HOWARD C. WILSON.

A Growing World

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am glad that I am a subscriber to The Christian Century. I share its impatience with its warlike spirit against that narrow interpretation of Christianity. We are living in a growing world. We have not outgrown the Bible, nor the church, nor the need of salvation, but we have certainly outgrown prejudicial interpretations of these things. We have heard Christians thank God for "the light." I thank God for the light of a liberal, sane, true version of our religion, which gives me a bigger Bible, a bigger church and a bigger Christ. Those who fight for, Number 666, a world growing worse, a Christ to come with flaming sword and all such wresting of the Scriptures—call us vile names, but we know in our hearts we are loyal. "The fight is on" against those who, in the words of much loved Borden Parker Bowne, "set up their prejudicial notions as universal principles and think all the world must obey them."

Methodist Church,
Sandwich, Ill.

J. J. HITCHENS.

If Not a United Church—What?

By Peter Ainslie

THE first of a series of Handbooks presenting the proposals of a United Christendom. Dr. Ainslie, who has been a pioneer in the cause of unity, has given much thought and labor to attempting a solution of the difficulties which bar the progress of the movement. This volume deals with the necessity, growth and outlook of Christian unity, to which is added a copious appendix. The argument adduced is that if unity be not attained, the church inevitably faces an era of gradually weakening power. Dr. Ainslie writes vigorously, yet without heat or partisanship, and presents a cogent and lucid plea for the cause that must be answered.

Price $1.25 plus 10 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

HELP AMERICANIZE AMERICA

The Department of Home Missions is one of the worth-while Americanizing agencies of the country. Give it the right of way in May.

It Presents a Great Record

For 72 years it has been our evangelist to the new and needy places of our country.

It has established 4165 churches, many of our greatest and best.

Its work of evangelism has yielded 465,444 additions; it reported 50,000 last Easter, with a promise of many more this year.

No ministry is richer in returns.

It Helps Weak Churches

In co-operation with the State and Provincial boards it is helping sustain 149 ministers and keeping open the doors of as many churches.

It is Christianizing Foreigners in our midst in three great cities—Cleveland, Chicago and New York. By truly Americanizing the immigrant it is turning a national menace into a national blessing.

It is Seeking Justice for the Indian by establishing a fine educational and evangelistic work among them in the Northwest. Our fathers took their land. We give them Christ.

It is Opening the Doors to the Highlander by maintaining three Christian schools for the youth of the mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee.

It is Solving the Race Problem

by supporting 22 high grade preachers and operating six schools among the Negroes of the South.

It is Solving the Japanese Problem

by meeting and Christianizing the Orientals with a force of 17 workers in five cities on the Pacific Coast.

It is Removing the Mexican Danger with a force of 12 teachers and preachers in Texas among Mexicans living in our midst.

Our French Citizens in Louisiana are responding to a wonderfully fruitful mission in their midst.

This great program is

A CHALLENGE TO OUR LOVE FOR COUNTRY
AND OUR LOVE FOR CHRIST

SEND AT ONCE

For a Great Line of Literature and Supplies.

The United Christian Missionary Society
1501 Locust Street St. Louis, Missouri

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Gospel of Labor*

I AM writing these lessons by a beautiful lake in southern Florida, far from my beloved Pittsburgh. Pittsburgh, the workshop of the world. Pittsburgh, where Vulcan swings his mighty hammer by the roaring furnaces with loud resounding clang. Pittsburgh, where labor is the supreme issue. Pittsburgh, the much-surveyed, the much-advised, the unhappy subject of sociological journalists! For twelve years I have lived there and tonight as the moon shines down through the pines, heavy with moss, and silvers the lake, I am mindful of my adopted city and I am at home with this labor problem.

Labor is now at a place of power. We must wait and see if Labor uses power better than Capital has done. The use of power is the final test of character. How you use physical, mental, social, commercial or any other power you may possess really determines what you are, tyrant or servant. But there is one thing which we must hold in mind in all this business; more money, shorter hours, better houses will never satisfy Labor. Capital has tried all of these. Was Capital satisfied with money? No—look at your profiteers. Was Capital happy in leisure? No—look at your occupants of rich hotels. Was Capital happy with lordly mansions, limousines, yachts, horses, pictures, tapestries, ivories, gewgaws, stuff, Things? No! What a long step forward when we realize that Things will never satisfy poor men or rich men. We want bread, but not bread only. We want houses—no, homes with a spirit in them. We want leisure—to think, to dream, to serve. Money never satisfied anyone—never. Time for idleness never pleased anyone. Write this large, my dear fellow teacher, for this great lesson must be impressed upon all men everywhere.

Why, you can see that in your children. Were they ever satisfied with things? Remember the Christmas presents, candies and tempers!! Your children are happy only when they do something for you or someone else. I never saw two boys happier than when they sold lemonade all one hot day and earned $2.30 for Belgian relief. Also I know some happy Girl Scouts who carried flowers to a hospital and sang carols there in the poor wards. Need I tell you why? It is so simple, we almost miss it. I walked into a Cracker's crude patch yesterday. He was following his mule, planting melons. We chatted awhile. Then he took me to see his one cow and his four pigs and his sixteen rows of tomatoes. He was very poor. Then we looked at the banana-trees and I complimented his turnips. He insisted upon my taking an armful home. We got down on our knees

*Uniform lesson for April 17, "Bible Teachings About Work." Scripture, Mark 6:1-3; John 5:17; 2 Thess. 3:7-13.

Contributors to This Issue

CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, D. D., Minister Broadway Tabernacle, New York City; author "Things Fundamental," "The Building of the Church," etc., etc.

VIDA D. SCUDDER, Professor English Literature, Wellesley College; author "Socialism and Character," "The Life of the Spirit in Modern English Poets," "The Church and the Hour," etc.

RICHARD ROBERTS, Minister Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y.; author "That One Face," etc.

and washed them in the lake. He seemed insulted when I offered him money!

Up under the palm trees I waved him adieu as I climbed into the auto. We exchanged smiles—for we were now good brothers. Did I say he was poor? He had time to be considerate. He had the disposition to share his turnips. I do not know how he feels, but I feel richer for the half-hour in his garden!

JOHN R. EWERS.

BOOKS

GROWTH OF THE SOIL. By Knut Hamsun. Translated by W. W. Worster. This is the work that won for its author the Nobel Prize for Literature for last year. It is an elemental story of life, as elemental as the stories of the Patriarchs of the Old Testament. There is no effort to weave an exciting plot. The book is as everyday-like as the soil itself, the nobility of which it celebrates. Isak and Inger stand out, against the background of the Norwegian fields, as part of the scenery. H. G. Wells calls this "among the very greatest novels I have ever read." (Knopf. Two volumes, $5.00.)

MAIN STREET. By Sinclair Lewis. This book is the most widely read novel in America today, because it is an approximately just critique upon our materialistic small town life, with its paltry ambitions and foolish goings-on. The author has both grace and humor and his story moves rapidly. (Harcourt, Brace. $2.00.)

POOR WHITE. By Sherwood Anderson. Anderson is another American fiction writer who stands for realistic portraying of our American life rather than for the tricks of the trade that have produced many interesting but unreal stories. His work seems almost as elemental, in some parts, as that of Hamsun. His stories move slowly, for he is more interested in the development of his leading characters than in keeping the interest of his readers from flagging. The fact is, he writes as if he were unconscious of having any "readers"—which, by the way, is one mark of a great artist. (Huebsch. $2.00.)

MOON CALF. By Floyd Dell. The third of the outstanding mid-west novels of this season, and significant as a part of the movement toward a true picturing of American life. As a newspaper man of many years' experience, Mr. Dell can write realistically of the career of Felix Fay, who was a newspaper reporter. Mr. Dell is at present associate editor of the Liberator. (Knopf. $2.00.)

EMERSON: HOW TO KNOW HIM. By Samuel McChord Crothers. Mr. Crothers, clergyman, essayist, literary Bostonian, does not think Emerson passe, as some modern critics do. He here brings him down from the transcendental heights to which fate had carried him in the minds of most people, and reveals him as a real human. He holds that his message is one that is eternal, his genius timeless. (Bobbs-Merrill.)

POE: HOW TO KNOW HIM. By C. Alphonso Smith. Professor Smith presents America's greatest imaginative lyricist not as a degenerate artist, but as a man of character and deep affection, and a religious man—not simply an eccentric genius. He considers him as world author, man, critic, poet and writer of stories. (Bobbs-Merrill.)

THE BEST SHORT STORIES OF 1920. Edward J. O'Brien's admirable year book of the American short story, containing twenty stories considered the best, and a list of the stories of merit that have appeared during the year in representative magazines. (Small, Maynard. $2.00.)

NEW BOOKS OF FICTION. Admirers of William J. Locke, the author of "The Beloved Vagabond" and "The Rough Road," will be interested in the new book by that writer, "The Mountebank." (Lane.) Sara Ware Bassett, author of "The Harbor Road," comes out with another Cape Cod story, "Flood Tide." (Little, Brown.) "Spring Shall Plant," just from the publishers (Doran) proves to old readers that the author of "Ships That Pass in the Night" is still writing. Those who like a Jack London touch will find in "The Strength of the Pines," by Edison Marshall (Little, Brown), an abundance of out-of-door adventure. The story of the son of a circuit rider's wife is told by Corra Harris in her new book, "My Son" (Doran).

LYRICS. By Laura Blackburn. Containing the choicest songs of this fine lyricist, who is better known to readers of The Christian Century as Charles G. Blanden. The book is as rich in beautiful images as a June day, and there is a true philosophy of life—or rather of living—throughout the book. (The Book-Fellows, Chicago. $1.25.)

LOVE LYRICS By James Whitcomb Riley. A new edition of his favorite collection of the poems of the most American of all American poets, as Professor Beers, of Yale University, calls Riley. The illustrations are by the poet's favorite illustrator, Will Vawter. (Bobbs-Merrill. $2.00.)

THE ESSENTIALS OF MYSTICISM. By Evelyn Underhill. Containing other essays also on "Mysticism and the Doctrine of Atonement," "The Place of Will, Intellect and Feeling in Prayer," "The Mystic as Creative Artist," and studies of a number of medieval and modern mystics. (Dutton. $3.)

CHURCH FINANCE AND SOCIAL ETHICS. By Bishop F. J. McConnell. A book which looks forward to the time when the church, finally united, will have vast sums of money in its treasury, and considering some perils that will threaten when this possibility becomes fact.

A GUIDE TO BIBLE STUDY. By Harry E. Richards. A systematic course of Bible study from Genesis to Revelation, arranged for adult classes in Sunday school and Association work, as well as for personal study. (Oxford).

LINCOLN AND LIQUOR. By Duncan C. Milner. A book showing that from his youth to the end of his career Lincoln was consistently antagonistic to strong drink. (Neale).

SAINT COLUMBA OF IONA. By Lucy Menzies. (Dutton. $2.50).

PRINCIPLES OF FREEDOM. By Terence McSwiney, late Lord Mayor of Cork. (Dutton).

JARED INGERSOLL. By Lawrence H. Gibson. (Yale. $3.50).

ATHENIAN TRAGEDY. Goodell. (Yale).

THE REAL KEY TO CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Richard L. Swain. (Revell).

"CHARLIE" ALEXANDER. A Study in Personality. By Philip L. Roberts. (Revell).

FIRESIDE STORIES FOR GIRLS IN THEIR TEENS. By Margaret W. Eggleston. (Doran).

YALE TALKS

BY CHARLES R. BROWN, LL. D.

ALTHOUGH these "Talks" were delivered at Yale, Harvard and other colleges, they afford a wealth of illustrative material for addresses and sermons to young people, especially to young men. Among the themes are "The True Definition of a Man," "Unconscious Influence," "The Lessons of Failure," "The Men Who Make Excuse," "The Wrongs of Wrong-doing," etc.

Price, $1.35 plus 8 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The Steel Strike of 1919

The Interchurch World Movement Report.

$2.50 plus 12 cents postage.

The Church and Industrial Reconstruction

The pronouncement of the Committee of the War and the Religious Outlook.

$2.00 plus 12 cents postage.

These two books every alert minister should have. Prof. Alva W. Taylor, of The Christian Century staff, considers them two of the most important volumes that have appeared in many years.

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

The Productive Beliefs

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE chapters of this book constitute the "Cole Lectures for 1919" delivered by this brilliant preacher, and ex-president of Northwestern University. The message of this volume is sorely needed in this time of transition and crisis. There is today a profound desire on the part of multitudes for a satisfying, productive faith. They want this faith stated in a definite and understandable way. This book meets the demand. The reader who delights in keen, meaningful sentences will sit up nights with this volume.

Chicago, Ill.

$1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn Street

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Indianapolis Observes Good Friday

The development of sentiment over the country for the observance of Good Friday in some special way has been a marked feature since the war. Detroit has closed up its business houses for two years on the afternoon of the day, and Indianapolis has been added to the list this year. The mayor in his proclamation said: "The three hours passion that our Lord suffered on Calvary that all men from then until the end of time might find eternal life is the most precious heritage ever left to the human race. Every Christian of all creeds and all denominations joins in reverence and thanksgiving for this supreme event. Let us lay aside the every-day working tools of life during the passion hour when Jesus suffered on the cross." All business was suspended at the city hall during the three hour period.

The Passing of Cardinal Gibbons

Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore is dead. He was in his 87th year. His life has had a wide variety of experiences and he has known personally many Presidents and Popes. At the time of the outbreak of the war he went to Rome to participate in the election of Pope Benedict. Though in favor of world peace, he supported the cause of the allies during the war. He has been a strongly conservative force in the field of social reform, having opposed prohibition vigorously to the last. His opinions in opposition to socialism and to the recall of judicial decisions have been widely known. While his attitude to these questions has been negative, he had enthusiasm for positive measures. He defended the right of workingmen to organize. He was in favor of driving the Turk from Europe. The idea of making a home for the Jews in Palestine was one that pleased him. He was in favor of universal military training. During the unpleasantness with Mexico he did a great deal toward ameliorating the lot of priests and nuns in that unhappy country. He was born of Irish parents in 1834 and soon after his birth his parents went back to Ireland. They later returned to America. He entered on his studies for the priesthood at the age of 21. He studied at St. Charles College in Maryland, in the seminary of St. Suplice and at St. Mary's University at Baltimore. He was ordained a priest at the outbreak of the civil war in the city of Baltimore when he was 27 years of age.

Discuss the National Financial Campaigns

The various national forward movements of the religious denominations of America sent representatives to a meeting in New York on March 19. This meeting considered the question of conserving the lessons learned from the recent financial campaigns. It was hoped by the leaders that the larger giving of the people during the past two years might be made a permanent feature of Protestant Christianity. A committee on findings was appointed to present an analysis of the present situation in the various forward movements as disclosed by the discussions of the day and to consider the whole question of the desirability of future relationships to each other. The committee on findings is to report at another conference to be held sometime within the next few months. The denominations represented at the gathering were: Methodist Episcopal; Methodist Episcopal, South; Congregational; Baptist; Presbyterian in the U. S. A.; Protestant Episcopal; United Presbyterian; Reformed Church in the United States; Reformed Church in America; Friends; United Brethren; and Moravian.

Disciple Secretaries Hold Mid-Year Meeting

The secretaries of the state and general organizations of the Disciples of Christ held a three day session at St. Louis, March 29-31. The program laid out was strenuous, for eight hours of sittings each day was the regular thing. The morning began each day with a Bible study conducted by Rev. George A. Campbell of Union Avenue Church, St. Louis. Twenty minute papers were presented on various topics, and these were reviewed in ten minutes by a chosen reviewer. The discussion which followed was limited to five minute addresses. A number of group meetings were held, among these being State Secretaries, Sunday School Field Workers, City Missionaries, State Secretaries and Field Workers of the Women's Organizations and College Executives. This is the first year that there has been a meeting of the city missionaries. Findings committees were appointed on the following themes: Recruiting for the Ministry, Evangelism, Cooperation in Home Missions, Statistics and the Year-Book, Problems of the Budget and Underwritings.

Lenten Meetings Notably Successful

The Lenten meetings held in First Methodist Church in Chicago under the auspices of the Chicago Church Federation were notably successful this year and on several days of Holy Week there was standing room only. Dr. Frederick F. Shannon of Central Church, successor of Dr. Gunsaulus, was the preacher for the week. His address on "Pilate Before Christ" was much commented upon. He said: "First of all, there is the trial of Pilate's individuality. After entering the praetorium, the Roman asked Jesus if he were the king of the Jews. With tremendous significance Jesus answered, 'Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee concerning me?' Destiny hinges upon the answer we give to this question. The answer is fundamentally personal, the response our own minds and hearts must make. Is ours only a hearsay Christ? Is he just a theological, metaphysical, historic Christ? He may be all these without being the personal, redeeming, companioning Saviour. Do we depend upon what preachers and others say about him? Or have we grown a Christianized individuality, which is the profoundest answer as to who and what Christ is?"

University Announces Commencement Speakers

The University of Alabama has already chosen its commencement speakers. Rev. Wallace Tharp, for many years pastor of the Allegheny Church of Disciples in Pittsburgh, Pa., will deliver the baccalaureate address. The commencement address will be given by Bishop Warren A. Candler, of Emory University, Atlanta, on May 24. It is significant that this state university secures both of its speakers from the ranks of the ministry.

French University Invites American Students

The University of Strasbourg has a theological department where American students will be particularly welcomed. The American students are not at present going to Germany in large numbers, and it is believed that the Protestant faculty at Strasbourg will make a strong bid for American patronage. The degrees of bachelor of theology and doctor of theology are conferred by this university. Dr. Eugene Ehrhardt is dean of the school of theology.

Helps Men Behind the Bars

A layman in Detroit by the name of J. F. Wright has inaugurated a work for prisoners which is unique in character. Formerly a Sunday school teacher, his unusual presentation of the lesson chanced to find its way into the Detroit News. This paper fell into the hands of a prisoner in a penitentiary in Montana. This prisoner wrote and asked to become a member of the class by correspondence. He passed his letters and lessons around among his fellow-prisoners. Since then the work has grown until Mr. Wright has become the inspiration of a large number of men who live within the prison walls of different institutions. Just before Christmas Mr. Wright received a check for a hundred dollars with which he was to send his literature to a large list of names. Mr. Wright makes the following observation with regard to prisoners: "In a survey of one of our prison classes of 400 men we found seventy-five per cent had good home training, eighty per cent had been beyond the fifth grade in school and ninety-nine per cent had received religious training. Yet there was something lacking. They had received no ethical training."

Friendly Act Told All Over the Country

The Federated Press is a new news gathering agency which has been organized because of the alleged unfairness to labor and reform movements of the Associated Press and other news gathering organizations. The Federated Press is very much alert for news indicating the attitude of the churches to the labor movement or to social reform. Recently the Methodist church in Jackson, Mich., protested to the City Commission against cutting the wages of common labor to forty-five cents an hour. The commission accepted the protest "on file," but that was not the end of the incident. The labor papers all over the United States printed the story. The church may depend upon that reactionary positions will be given equally wide announcement. No churches in a corner of the world these days.

Editorial Council of Religious Press Has New Leader

While there is an Associated Press service for the daily papers, and a Federated Press service for the journals which are concerned with social uplift and labor questions, with correspondents in various sections of the world, there is no analogous service for the religious press. The Editorial Council of the Religious Press is a very recent organization which has not yet gotten beyond the stage of asking whether it has any right to live in this world where there are so many organizations. The past year the council was headed up by Rev. Jasper T. Moses, who has now gone to Mexico City to take a position in connection with the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America. For the present, Dr. Howard B. Grose is filling the position of executive secretary. The organization has been helpful in furnishing the religious press with some items of general church news.

Bill to Protect Religious Organizations from Libel

A bill has been introduced into the state legislature of New York making it a prison offense for any one "to print, write, print, carve, hew, mark, stamp or stain anything in derogation of any religious denomination, sect or order, or any race or member thereof, in whole or in part." This bill may sound absurd but it is being introduced in many legislatures over the country, and may be introduced before Congress. It is openly charged that this bill has the support of Roman Catholic leaders. Such newspapers as the Menace have doubtless provoked the legislation. To pass the bill, however, would be to puzzle the press and the platform in a way abhorrent to American ideals. Canon Chase has spoken on the bill before committee and said: "I wish to speak of this bill from the standpoint of a preacher and reformer. I can well understand myself or many preachers of my acquaintance in the course of their work arousing the antagonism of other religious denominations and people of other races. If this bill were law, under such circumstances I would be put to the expense of defending myself, which I could not afford. This bill would stop the mouths of the clergy."

Would Have Pastors Increase Pastoral Work

The leaders of the New Era Movement of the Presbyterian church believe that Presbyterian pastors do not ring enough doorbells in the course of a year. The statistics of losses through members dropped for lack of interest grow worse continually. The number suspended in 1915 was 49,756; for 1916, 55,524; for 1917, 55,809; for 1918, 54,394; for 1919, 69,824; for 1920, 61,649. It is held that the ministers have a growing interest in sermons and pamphlets, but a declining interest in the old-fashioned pastoral methods. It is proposed that conferences should be held over the country which would be schools of instruction in methods of personal work. Is it possible that the new minister does not know how to sit down in a home and talk to people about their religious problems, without going to a school to find out?

Presbyterians Are Promoting Publicity Methods

Herbert H. Smith is the national publicity expert of the Presbyterian church. He is in touch with the various congregations that are using the modern methods. Florence, Wis., is one of the star cases where a small community has found the publicity methods to pay. The church here finds that the publicity money all comes back on the contribution plates, and considerably more. This church has grown from 81 members to 120 in a single year, by the use of newspaper advertising, posters and mail. First Presbyterian Church of Tacoma, Wash., is spending nearly fifty dollars a month on advertising and has been doing so for a number of years. Five years ago the evening attendance was 150. Now it is from 800 to 1,400. The membership has grown from 750 to 1,338.

Movie Manager Comes Out Second Best

The efforts of ministers and clergymen to improve the pictures in the movie theaters of the country has brought them into sharp conflict with the managers in some cases. Rev. Milton A. Baker of Christ Episcopal Church, Raleigh, N. C., has been making a brave fight for the passage of a state censorship bill. In the midst of the contest, a local moving picture man threw slide announcements on the screen that attacked the character of the rector's daughter. Churches and civic organizations replied to the attack, and the movie manager was compelled to run a slide in his theater apologizing for his action. The place has become so unpopular that he now seeks to sell out. The censorship bill passed in the senate by a good majority, but failed of passage

Disciples Congress at Springfield

THE Congress of Disciples, an annual event, was omitted last year on account of the activities of the denomination in the Interchurch World Movement. It will be held this year at Springfield, Ill., in the First Christian Church. The following are the addresses: Address of Welcome, by Rev. W. F. Rothenburger of Springfield; Response, by Rev. George A. Campbell of St. Louis; "The Successes and Failures in Cooperative Movements: What Next?", by Dr. A. E. Cory of New York; "The Successes and Failures in Union Movements: What Next?", by Dr. H. L. Willett of Chicago; "An Interpretation of the Apostolic Church: Its Organization and Its Relationships," by Rev. J. B. Briney of Crestwood, Ky., and Rev. O. F. Jordan of Evanston, Ill.; an address by Dr. Frederick F. Shannon of Chicago; "The Possibilities of the United Christian Missionary Society," by Rev. Frederick W. Burnham of St. Louis; "What Shall the Church Do with Its Colleges," by Dr. H. O. Pritchard of Indianapolis; "Cooperation and Coordination," by Rev. George A. Miller of Washington, D. C., and Rev. M. L. Pontius of Jacksonville, Ill.; address by Dr. Shannon; "The Contribution of the Disciples of Christ to Christianity," by Dr. Frederick D. Kershner of Des Moines, Ia., and Rev. Charles Clayton Morrison of Chicago; "The Church's Responsibility in the Present Industrial Unrest," by Prof. A. W. Taylor of Columbia, Mo.; "The Golden Rule in Industry," by Mr. Arthur Nash of Cincinnati; "Our Ministerial Leakage: Its Causes and Its Remedies," by Dr. I. N. McCash of Enid, Okla., and Rev. Clarence Reidenbach of Indianapolis; address by Dr. Shannon; "The Letter and the Spirit of the Restoration Movement as Revealed in the Writings of the Campbells," by Prof. A. W. Fortune of Lexington, Ky., and Rev. George H. Tonwsend of Angola, Ind.; address by Dr. Shannon.

Each session will close with general discussion from the floor. No resolutions are ever offered at the Congress, as it is not regarded as a legislative body. The registration fee is one dollar for each person attending. Entertainment will be extended on the Harvard plan of room and breakfast in private households.

It seems likely that this session of the Congress will be more largely attended than previous sessions for a variety of reasons. There is more time for deliberation now than at any previous period since the beginning of the war. The program is more truly representative of the various angles of opinion in the denomination, and the speakers are well chosen as representing the wide variety of opinion prevailing. The topics lie less in the field of systematic theology than in previous years. It is being felt more and more that the vital problems of the church are somewhat different today from the problems of a former time. The Illinois Ministerial Institute will not hold any session this year, on account of the presence within the state of the Congress.

Historically the Disciples have loved public discussion. The leaders of the national convention tried for a number of years to bar discussion, and even practical legislation from the floor of the convention, but this was thwarted by the holding of doctrinal congresses under conservative auspices. This year the Congress, the General Convention and a number of state gatherings will provide ample opportunity to air the various types of opinion that prevail in this widely diversified body.

in the house on account of the session coming to a close. It is believed that the censorship bill will be passed unless there is a radical improvement in the pictures during the next two years.

Presbyterian Young People in Many Conferences

The Christian Associations have found the summer assemblies for the young people of very unusual value, and gradually the religious denominations are following the same methods. Thirty conferences will be held this coming summer for the Presbyterian young people. Some very attractive spots have been chosen for these conferences by the side of lakes, or on the banks of rivers, and recreational methods are employed along with the educational and the inspirational. The conferences draw from territory in all parts of the nation. Last year 2,800 young people attended these conferences, and more would have attended if the facilities for entertainment had been greater. These summer conferences have been greatly blessed in the way of aiding in choice of a life work.

New Cardinal Appointed in America

Just previous to the death of Cardinal Gibbons came the announcement of the appointment of Archbishop Dennis Dougherty to the cardinalate. In previous years it has been the policy of the Vatican to appoint only one cardinal in America, but in recent years there have been three. Italy has twenty-two, France seven and Spain six. It is the policy that Italy shall always have a clear majority in the sacred college, and it is this fact which makes the church the Roman Catholic church instead of just the Catholic church. The cardinal continues his duties as archbishop but is always subject to call in case of the death of the pope to go to Rome, and help in the balloting for the new pontifex maximus.

Buddhism Takes Over Christian Methods

"Imitation is the sincerest flattery," says the old proverb, and Christianity offers no better evidence of the effectiveness of its missionary work than in the changes that are going on in other religions. The Buddhists of Japan some time ago took over the methods employed in Sunday schools, and in the Y. M. C. A. The latest borrowing is the method of the vacation Bible schools. The general methods of the Christian schools are copied and the only difference is that the Buddhist ethics is taught in place of the Christian gospel. The Islamic world now has an imitation of the Y. M. C. A. called the World Islamic Young Men's Association.

Teacher Ordained Before Coming to Chicago

President W. E. Garrison of the Claremont Boys' School in California has become dean of the Disciples' Divinity House of the University of Chicago. Although Dr. Garrison has been a preacher of considerable experience, having written his doctor's thesis upon a theological subject, he was never ordained. However, on March 13 he received ordination in the Disciples church of Pomona, Cal. Rev. Geo. W. Buckner delivered the charge, and the candidate's father, Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor emeritus of the Christian Evangelist, offered the prayer. Dr. Garrison will be a guest of honor at a dinner to be given by the Disciples' Club of Chicago.

Edinburgh Pulpit Secures Preacher

One of the most eminent pulpits in Edinburgh, Scotland, is St. George's United Free Church. This pulpit, made famous by the mighty ministry of Dr. Alexander Whyte, was recently vacated by the coming of Dr. John Kelman to New York. Dr. G. H. Morrison of Glasgow was called but declined to leave his loyal congregation in Glasgow. Recently

Rev. James M. Black, a brother of Dr. Hugh Black, was invited to the pulpit and it is reported that he has accepted. A younger brother of these two distinguished preachers was recently installed as pastor of First Congregational Church, Montclair, N. J. Thus the three brothers occupy places of eminence in three great communions in the Christian world.

Protestantism Weak in the Cities

The figures which have been compiled for the various large cities shows that Protestantism is relatively weak there. In New York there is a population (1916 statistics) of 5,469,506, and 2,101,233 are identified with some religious organization, including Roman Catholics, Jews, Orthodox and Protestants. Of these, only 415,429, or 7.55 per cent, are members of

A Typical Letter

The Christian Century Press,
508 S. Dearborn Street,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

You will be glad to know that our church has decided upon HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH (edited by Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett) as the hymnal for our use. We examined four hymnals with great care and discrimination—the best known hymnals published. We finally chose yours. We like the general appearance of the book, binding, paper; your hymnal appears to us more substantial than the others under consideration. Then, in the selection of hymns and tunes, we consider HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH the superior of the other collections. Yours is the only book of the four that has ALL the hymns printed between the staves. This we regard as a great advantage. Enclosed you will find our order.

Very truly,

JOHN C. BLACKMAN.

People's Congregational Church,
Sidney, Mont.

Hundreds of churches of all denominations are finding HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH the ideal hymnal for a true twentieth century church. Why not install it in your church now? Returnable copy will be mailed upon request.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn Street
Chicago

any Protestant church. Those outside all Christian organizations are 3,358,373. The same year the population in Chicago was 2,497,722. The total membership in religious organizations was 1,058,785 and of the total population 11.20 per cent were Protestants. Some religious denominations succeed in cities better than others, among whom may be mentioned Episcopalians, Congregationalists and Presbyterians. The Christian Scientists are almost exclusively a city product.

Minister's Son Will become a Missionary

The idea that ministers' children do not choose religious work is well refuted by the facts. The religious press is just now reporting the fact that Leland Emerson, son of Rev. F. W. Emerson of California, has just taken the pastorate of First Disciples Church of Mexico, Mo. He plans somewhat later to go to the College of Missions in Indianapolis and take a course of study to prepare him to be a missionary in Thibet. The list of ministers' and missionaries' sons in the ministry is a lengthy one, though of course many of the children of the manse choose other occupations.

Law Superseded by the Gospel

In Beaver, Pa., it was very much desired by the church people that some of the local confectionery and drug stores should close on Sunday. Instead of undertaking to pass an ordinance closing up the places, the church people went out to interview the shop keepers. Each man interviewed professed to want to rest one day in seven. Petitions were carried, and the result has been that these places are now all closed by voluntary agreement. Meanwhile the shopkeepers are more friendly to the church than before, which would not have been the case if legal means had been employed to close up their shops.

Reform Leader Impressed by Movie Reform

The protestation of the big movie producers that they were about to reform themselves has been met with cold skepticism by most of the public, but it seems that Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, the veteran reform leader of Washington, has taken them seriously. He has agreed to suspend operations in securing a censorship law pending the efforts of the movie men to turn out better pictures. One of the hazards sensed by the reformers is that when the big producers go out of the business of producing filthy pictures, there will be vile recruits to the business who will give that section of the public which wants filth what it wants. The next effort of the church will be to induce church people to patronize the film companies that show ethical sense in the conduct of their business. Meanwhile the Brooklyn reformers have not abated any of their enthusiasm to fight the big producers. At a great interdenominational mass meeting held in Grace Presbyterian Church March 14, resolutions were passed against suggestive and indecent pictures. The meeting pledged itself to the support of the Lusk-Clayton bill in the legislature, and Dr. Robert Rogers, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, and Dr. Paul E. Edwards, pastor of Janes Methodist Church were appointed a committee to appear at the legislative hearing and argue for the bill.

Modernism Disturbing Scandinavians

Modernism is a world-wide phenomenon disturbing the fellowship of Christians wherever it comes. With the advent of the new science, the unbiased study of history from the ancient manuscripts and monuments, and the literary appreciation of the scriptures, there has come a revolution in the thinking of different people. Norway is particularly troubled these days with the issues of modernism, and it is said that the parties within the state church have wider differences than those which divide the dissenting bodies, the free churches. Last fall there was an ecclesiastical convention in Sweden which considered the articles of the Athanasian creed. It was proposed to discard this creed entirely, and to strike out of the Lutheran confession the words "a lost and condemned creature." Several of the bishops favored the innovations. A settlement was finally made in the usual ecclesiastical manner by compromise.

Day of Drives Not Over

Although the evangelical churches have about decided that they have had all of the financial drives they want for a while, some other communions are taking on the high pressure methods. The Episcopal church has entered upon a drive running through the next three years which is aimed to produce $46,000,000. Meanwhile there is an insistent demand upon the part of many religious leaders for a

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea —1 cupful.....	1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)
Green tea —1 glassful.....	2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)
Coca-Cola —1 drink, 8 fl. oz.....	.61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

financial method which will rest back upon education in the obligations of Christian stewardship, and not upon financial revivalism.

Protestants Slack in Church Attendance

The slothfulness of Protestants in their duties of church attendance is notorious, but the results secured by a census in some communities are surprising even to those who have suspected the facts. A census was made of church attendance in Middletown, Conn., one Sunday recently, and it was shown that in a population of 26,000, 1,000 attended Protestant churches and about 2,000 the Catholic churches. It is easy to guess where the rest were. The Sunday movie, the big Sunday dinner party and the Sunday picnic had claimed them all.

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS

THE following named books are only slightly shelf-worn, and are here listed at from 25 to 50 per cent below their regular price. Add 6 cents on each book for postage.

At $1.00

The Awakening of Asia. Hyndman.
Christopher. Lodge.
How to Pray. C. L. Slattery.
Day by Day With the Master. Cluett.
The Inner Circle. E. D. Jones.
Historical Documents. Young.
Elements of the Great War. Hilaire Belloc.
Fairhope. Edgar DeWitt Jones.
Reconstructing the Church. Harper.

At 60 Cents

The Evangelistic Note. W. J. Dawson.
The Witness of Jesus. Proctor.
Christ, Lord of Battles. Hausalter.
Man Is a Spirit. Hill.
Onward to Christ. Edwin A. McAlpin.
The Soul of Brotherhood. Egbert.
The Protestant. Burris A. Jenkins.
Letters to a Soldier on Religion. Gardner.

Do not send money, as the books you wish may be sold when your order reaches us, as we have but from one to five copies of each title on our shelves.. Order on a post card what books you desire.

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

Disciples Plan Great Convention at Winona

ALREADY scouts from various centers are making arrangements for the local groups which will attend the Disciples General Convention at Winona Lake, Ind., August 28-Sept. 4. Although the surroundings at Winona are rural, the people there are accustomed to great throngs, and claim that they have entertained fifty thousand visitors at one time. The facilities this year will be better than ever, for the new auditorium seating eight thousand people is nearing completion. A number of other smaller auditoriums on the ground provide facilities for smaller meetings, while there is a kind of Greek theater out of doors. The delegates will be housed in the hotels on the grounds and in many cases in the cottages. The owners of the cottages observe an unwritten law that everyone must do his part to make the stranger comfortable. Without doubt many delegates will be housed in Warsaw. The Disciples church in that city, of which Rev. John D. Hull is pastor, has already organized to take care of the thousands who will visit their city. Warsaw is only two miles from the convention auditorium by good street car and automobile service. On account of its restaurant facilities, it will doubtless be attractive to many of the delegates. Winona Lake aspires to be a national center of religious gatherings second to none on the continent. The lake itself is a considerable body of water, with pleasure boats and a little steamer. The hills and woods and natural scenery are very pleasing. The management will undertake to make the various national conventions that come to Winona this year so comfortable that they will want to come back. Not the least of the features of Winona Lake are the splendid highways that lead into it. The lake is located on the Lincoln Highway, and there are good roads in every direction. The religious gatherings that assemble there are in considerable measure transported by automobile. The Disciples convention falls this year at the close of the vacation season and it is believed that family parties will drive into Winona Lake from all sections of the country.

Brooklyn
New York RIDGEWOOD CHURCH
OF CHRIST
Forest Ave. & Linden St.
KIRBY PAGE,
W. A. R. McPHERSON.
Pastors.

HYMNS FOR TODAY

A complete hymnal for both Sunday School and Church. New, beautiful hymns on all the vital subjects that leading religious thinkers are advocating today, with Orders of Services for S. S. departments and church, and Services for Anniversaries.

The use of Hymns for Today will educate both youth and adult in the essentials of the Kingdom of God. Price, $75 per 100. Returnable sample sent. Orchestrated.

FILLMORE MUSIC HOUSE,
516 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

Unusually fine stationery for club, social or professional correspondence at an exceptionally low price. 150 sheets high quality note paper and 100 envelopes printed with your name and address, $1.50. Write for samples.

LEWIS, 25 Hudson Ave., Troy, N. Y.

Beware of Contagious Diseases
THOMAS COMMUNION SERVICE
INDIVIDUAL SAVES 1/4 COST OF OTHER SERVICES
Clean and sanitary. Used by over 40,000 churches. Send for catalog and free trial offer.
Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 495 Lima, O.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK'S POEMS

Latest Collection.

Contains 125 Selections.

Price $1.00 plus 5c postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Any book now in print can be secured through The Christian Century Press. Give publisher if possible.

Quiet Talks About Life After Death

By S. D. GORDON.

A new volume of "Quiet Talks" on a subject of more than usual interest to every one today. S. D. Gordon has something to say, well worth thoughtful consideration. One cannot describe these "quiet talks," they must be read to be thoroughly appreciated.

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

The Daily Altar

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

The most beautiful book of personal devotion and family worship published in many years.

Published in Two Editions:

In full leather, with gilt edges, at $2.50 per copy; five copies for $11.00; eight for $17.00.

In beautiful purple cloth, at $1.50 per copy; five copies for $7.00; eight for $10.00.

This book makes an ideal gift, and its use in a congregation will grow the devotional spirit.

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St.,

-:-

Chicago

The Call of the Christ

By HERBERT L. WILLETT

SELDOM has the challenge of Jesus to the present century been presented so earnestly, so persuasively. As a vital, living, convincing portrayal of Christ, scholarly yet simple, positive but not dogmatic, spiritual but not pietistic, it is a delight and an inspiration. A few of the eighteen chapter titles are:
"The Authority of Christ," "The New Life in Christ," "The Sympathy of Christ," "The Uniqueness of Christ,"
"The Fearlessness of Christ," "The Perennial Christ." "The book," says the Heidelberg Teacher, "is the utterance of a heart that has experienced the might and power of the Christ, and burns with a passion for the needs of the rising generation."

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

OUR NEW QUARTERLY

The "20th Century"

For Adult and Young People's Bible Classes, Home Departments, etc.

No "padding"—It gives just what the average student actually uses.

Concise—and thorough.

Scholarly—and practical.

It is reverent and also has "punch"

Send for Free Sample Copy and Further Information

The Christian Century Press

AN INFORMATIONAL

A HOPEFUL sign of the times is the increased alertness of the religious leaders of the country to present day economic and social conditions and needs. The best sellers with ministers and other religious leaders are books which treat these conditions, and especially those which point the church to its duty with reference to them. But this zeal for information has not gone far enough. Too often, it stops with the leadership. For every awakened minister there are 100 church members who are not sufficiently well informed. There is a real call for an "Informational Awakening."

With this fact in view The Christian Century Press has prepared a list of books which are considered the best adapted for general reading in churches, Sunday school classes, etc., and in church homes. At the same time many titles are given which are of interest primarily to ministers themselves. Many of the books included are intended to inform the minds of readers more accurately on matters of primary interest to church members—books on the Bible, on Christian doctrine, on the devotional life. In other words, an effort has been made to make the list as wide in its scope as the intellectual and spiritual life of the normal Christian should be. Note on the next page some uses to which the list may be put.

100 RELIGIOUS BOOKS

A list prepared and approved by Charles Clayton Morrison, Herbert L. Willett, Joseph Fort Newton, Alva W. Taylor and Thomas Curtis Clark

THE CHURCH AND PREACHING

Psychology and Preaching. C. S. Gardner. $2.50.
The Building of the Church. C. E. Jefferson. $1.50.
Christian Ministry and Social Problems. Bishop Charles D. Williams. $1.25.
Can the Church Survive in the Changing Social Order? Albert Parker Fitch. 80 cts.
A Community Church. H. E. Jackson. $2.00.
Ambassadors of God. S. Parkes Cadman. $3.00.
Modern Theology and the Preaching of the Gospel. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
Wanted: A Congregation. Lloyd C. Douglas. $1.75.
Six Thousand Country Churches. Gill and Pinchot. $2.00.
The Little Town. Paul H. Douglass. $1.75.
The Course of Christian History. W. J. McGlothlin. $2.25.

THE BIBLE AND THE LIFE OF JESUS

Popular Lectures on the Books of the New Testament. A. H. Strong. $1.50.
The Jesus of History. T. R. Glover. $1.25.
The Manhood of the Master. Fosdick. $1.15.
Our Bible. Herbert L. Willett. $1.50.
That One Face. Richard Roberts. $1.25.
Christ in the Poetry of Today. Compiled by Martha F. Crowe. $2.00.
Archæology and the Bible. George A. Barton. $2.50.
Jesus—The Master Teacher. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
Jesus—Our Standard. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
New Testament in Modern Speech. Weymouth. $2.00.
Moffatt's New Testament. $1.50. (Pocket ed., $1.75.)
Jesus in the Experience of Men. T. R. Glover. $1.90.
The Proposal of Jesus. John H. Hutton. $2.00.
Epochs in the Life of Paul. A. T. Robertson. $1.25.
The Life of Paul. B. W. Robinson. $1.50.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

The Experience of God in Modern Life. E. W. Lyman. $1.50.

What and Where Is God? Richard L. Swain. $1.50.
The Holy Spirit in Thought and Experience. T. Rees. $1.25.
The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation. James Denney. $3.00.
The Christian Hope. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
Can We Believe in Immortality? J. H. Snowden. $1.50.
Immortality and the Future. H. R. Mackintosh. $1.50.
The Truth About Christian Science. J. H. Snowden. $2.50.
The Originality of the Christian Message. H. R. Mackintosh. $1.75.
Basic Ideals in Religion. R. W. Micou. $2.50.
What Christianity Means to Me. Lyman Abbott.
Outspoken Essays. Dean W. R. Inge.
Public Opinion and Theology. Bishop Francis J. McConnell. $1.50.
The Meaning of Baptism. Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.35.
Living Again. Charles R. Brown. $1.00.
The New Orthodoxy. Edward Scribner Ames. $1.50.

MISSIONS

The Missionary Outlook in the Life of the War. $2.00.
Christianity the Final Religion. S. M. Zwemer. $1.25.
Modern Religious Movements in India. J. N. Farquhar. $2.75.
The Religions of the World. George A. Barton. $2.00.
Mary Slessor of Calabar. W. P. Livingstone. $2.00.

PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

The Meaning of Prayer. Fosdick. $1.15.
The Meaning of Faith. H. E. Fosdick. $1.35.
The Meaning of Service. H. E. Fosdick. $1.25.
The Religion of a Layman. Charles R. Brown. $1.00.
The Psychology of the Christian Soul. George Steven. $1.50.
The Psychology of Religion. J. H. Snowden. $2.00.
The Religious Consciousness. J. B. Pratt. $2.50.

AL AWAKENING

Finding the Comrade God. Walter Fiske. $1.15.
The Religion of a Mature Mind. George Albert Coe. $1.75.

SOCIAL

The Social Principles of Jesus. Walter Rauschenbusch. $1.15.
The Ethics of Jesus and Social Progress. C. S. Gardner. $1.50.
Christianizing the Social Order. Rauschenbusch. $2.00.
Christianity and the Social Crisis. Rauschenbusch. $2.25.
Democratic Christianity. Bishop Francis J. McConnell. $1.80.
Jesus Christ and the Social Question. Francis G. Peabody. $1.75.
The Psychology of Social Reconstruction. G. T. W. Patrick. $2.00.
The Great Society. Graham Wallas. $2.10.
The Social Problem. Charles A. Ellwood. $1.75.
The Church and Industrial Reconstruction. $2.00.
Labor and the Common Welfare. Samuel Gompers. $3.00.
Poverty, the Challenge of the Church. J. S. Penman. $1.00.
Religion and Business. R. W. Babson. $1.50.
Fundamentals of Prosperity. R. W. Babson. $1.25.
The Sword or the Cross. Kirby Page. $1.20.
The Science of Power. Benjamin Kidd. $1.75.
The Gospel for a Working World. Harry F. Ward.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Training the Devotional Life. L. H. Weigle. 75 cts.
Talks to Sunday School Teachers. L. H. Weigle. $1.50.
Social Principles of Education. G. F. Betts. $1.50.
The School in the Modern Church. H. F. Cope. $1.50.
How to Teach Religion. G. F. Betts. $1.00.

INSPIRATIONAL BOOKS

The Daily Altar. Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.50. (Leather, $2.50.)
The Eternal Christ. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
The Ambassador. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
Things Eternal. John Kelman. $1.75.

THE NEW AGE

A New Mind for the New Age. Henry Churchill King. $1.25.
A Better World. Tyler Dennett. $1.50.
The Christian Faith and the New Day. Cleland B. McAfee. 90 cts.
The Church Facing the Future. William Adams Brown. 80 cts.
The New Horizon in the Church and State. W. H. P. Faunce. 80 cts.
World Facts and America's Responsibility. C. H. Patton. $1.25.
The Gospel and the New World. Robert E. Speer. $2.00.
Some Aspects of International Christianity. John Kelman. $1.00.
The Democratic Movement in Asia. Tyler Dennett. $1.90.
Is Christianity Practicable? William Adams Brown. $1.75.

MISCELLANEOUS

Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature. T. H. Davis. $2.50.
Everybody's World. Sherwood Eddy. $1.90.
The Worst Boys in Town. Hill. $2.50.
First. Henry Drummond. 50 cts.
The Strategy of Life. Arthur Porritt. $1.25.
Life of Theodore Roosevelt. W. R. Thayer. $1.00.

HOW THIS LIST MAY BE USED

1. From the list select a shelf-full of books for your church, your Sunday school, your class. Many ministers have placed a table in the foyer of the church, with a selection of books for the reading of members.
2. Make a selection for your own purchase during this year, a book a week, five a month, or by some other regular plan.
3. Select five or ten or fifteen books to present to your minister. His salary does not allow of large expenditures. A good church in Missouri recently gave its pastor the privilege of purchasing fifty dollars worth of books for his library at the church's expense. That was good business!
4. Call the attention of the heads of your church homes to the list, urging them to invest in some of the books, and advising them as to the best ones for their particular need.

Fifty new books in the hands of your congregation

will add fifty per cent to its power and usefulness

Note: Add 10 cents postage on an order for a single book. When ordering two or more books, add 6 cents for each book.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn St. Chicago, Illinois

The Sword or the Cross

By KIRBY PAGE

THE WORLD TOMORROW says of this new volume: "This book is a valuable contribution to the discussion of the Christian attitude to war, coming as it does from the experience of one who went overseas with a quite different conception. Mr. Page portrays the terrible reality of war, shows how the church now defending war has often taken the wrong side on great moral questions, and makes it clear that Jesus faced a similar situation to that of 1914. In his analysis of Jesus' teachings on the subject the author avoids the doubtful proof-text method and also steers clear of side issues as to possible uses of force, and shows how the whole spirit of that teaching is a repudiation of the way of the sword, and an enthronement of its opposite, the way of the cross. The remaining chapters discuss the practicability of that way of redeeming love and the necessity for Christians to follow Jesus in it."

Other Comments on the Book

Charles E. Jefferson, Pastor Broadway Tabernacle, N. Y.:

I like the style of your presentation, and also the noble Christian spirit that breathes through what you have written. You know that I am not able to go quite so far as you do, but I am always happy to have men who feel as you do express their convictions, for it is possible that you are right, and that the rest of us will have to come up where you are.

Peter Ainslie, Minister Christian Temple, Baltimore:

I have taken the time to go over your manuscript and find it very informing and ringing true. A book so well prepared as yours may not have the deserved circulation, but it is certainly worth putting on the market.

Miss Maude Royden, recently of the City Temple, London:

I have read your manuscript with the deepest interest and with the most complete agreement. I admire especially your insistence on the spirit as distinct from the letter, and your dismissal of the idea of non-resistance. Nearly all criticism of our position is aimed at these two points—which we do not hold!

Price of the book, $1.20 plus 8 cents postage

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

Is Modern Literature
Christless?

By Joseph Fort Newton

Saving the Minister's Soul

By Lloyd C. Douglas

The Call of the Christ

By HERBERT L. WILLETT

SELDOM has the challenge of Jesus to the present century been presented so earnestly, so persuasively. As a vital, living, convincing portrayal of Christ, scholarly yet simple, positive but not dogmatic, spiritual but not pietistic, it is a delight and an inspiration. A few of the eighteen chapter titles are: "The Authority of Christ," "The New Life in Christ," "The Sympathy of Christ," "The Uniqueness of Christ," "The Fearlessness of Christ," "The Perennial Christ." "The book," says the Heidelberg Teacher, "is the utterance of a heart that has experienced the might and power of the Christ, and burns with a passion for the needs of the rising generation."

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Cyclopedia of Twentieth Century Illustrations

By Amos R. Wells

Bishop John H. Vincent says of it:

"A gift of world-wide wisdom embodied in a rich, invaluable Cyclopedia of Twentieth Century Illustrations. It is impossible to state its worth. It is a fruit-and-flower garden and a museum of ancient and modern Aids to all Teachers and Preachers and Parents."

Prof. Cleland B. McAfee says:

"The illustrations ought to teach any man how to look out on the world about him and find material for his speaking. These are days when men ought to find their illumination in present day life rather than in historical conditions."

*Over 900 Usable Illustrations.
Octavo Cloth Binding, $3.00 plus 10 to 20 cents postage.*

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
CHICAGO

GOOD BETTER BEST

Our change in plans for financing our missionary work gives clear indication of our growth in missionary spirit and in the grace of giving.

A Good Plan

For many years our entire program of missionary education and benevolent work depended upon the Special Day Offering. The support of the work was uncertain and spasmodic and the disciple's fellowship with his Lord was incidental and accidental. For those who use this plan do not overlook the first Lord's day in May for Home Missions and June 1 for Children's Day for Foreign Missions.

A Better Plan

Many of our members and churches, longing for a closer, more constant fellowship with Christ in His care for a lost world have adopted the Budget Plan. They have assumed a definite daily share in the work of world redemption.

The Best Plan

Special days are good, budgets are better, but stewardship is the best because it is God's plan. Most encouraging is the interest our churches are taking in Tithing. The Stewardship Committee ordered 50,000 each of four different tracts from Thomas Kane, he paying half the cost. Already the first order is exhausted and an additional order of 25,000 each has been given.

Better Than the Best Plan—Doing

George F. Bradford, Stewardship Secretary of California, spent Sunday, February 20th, at Bakersfield, California, where Earl M. Fife is minister. One thousand people heard his message and 217 signed the Tithing pledge card.

J. W. Yoho, minister at Huntington, West Virginia, reports more than 25% of the membership enrolled as tithers. Eighty-six persons recently signed the Tithing pledge card. A number of others signed up as being willing to give 5% of their income. Mr. Yoho says, "The Stewardship Campaign is the biggest thing the Disciples have undertaken for years."

Remember that you can order two pamphlets free of charge in sufficient quantities to distribute to each family of the church. After these have been distributed they can secure two other pamphlets free. All orders should be sent to

Promo- UNITED CHRISTIAN 1501
tional MISSIONARY SOCIETY Locust St.
Dept. St. Louis

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, APRIL 14, 1921

Number 15

EDITORIAL STAFF: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR; HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR
THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS, JESSIE BROWN POUNDS

*Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879.
Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918.
Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago*

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra.
Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

The Capitalists and the Premillenarians

A NEW courtship is going on these days, and nothing in the spring of the year is so interesting as lovers. It seems to be love at first sight, and is no one sided affair. Juliet is not even abashed at the suddenness with which she acknowledges her infatuation. This spring-time affair has sprung up between Capital and Premillenarianism. One finds in the journals of capital, such as Industry, kindly references to premillenarian conferences in various parts of the country. Other capitalistic journals approve institutions which are under the management of those who are looking into the sky for the near return of our Lord. At the same time the literature of premillenarianism is kindly disposed to certain generous capitalists. In Los Angeles, a big Bible Institute is largely financed by an oil magnate. In Chicago, other sources of great wealth keep the wolf from the door of the institution that has appropriated Mr. Moody's name. The infatuation of the two interests for each other is no illogical thing. Capital has been greatly disturbed this year over a brand of religion which speaks out unpleasantly about the twelve hour day, child labor and the rights of workers to share in industrial control. It has seemed to certain magnates that the churches which "for-sake the preaching of the gospel" for such worldly interests should be starved into submission by a withdrawal of financial support. When the capitalist discovers a brand of religion which has not the slightest interest in "the social gospel," but on the contrary intends to pass up all reforms to the Messiah who will return upon the clouds of the heavens, he has found just the thing he has been looking for. The premillenarian people are never troubled by any doctrine of tainted money. In their gloomy view the world is all awry any way, and inquiry as to the morals of any particular group of supporters is quite by the side. Money will build more Bible Institutes, it will finance a literature of great magnitude in behalf of the Bible institute kind of religion. But it takes more than that to win the nation to this brand of religion. The religion of America will be increasingly loyal to Christ, to his program of service and to his sense of human values.

The Gambler's Infatuation

LAST week the public press reported another suicide in the fashionable set at Monte Carlo. A wealthy English woman, who had lived for some months at one of the most exclusive hotels in the neighboring city of Nice, took her life with a pistol in the famous Salle Schmidt of the gambling casino, at a moment when all the roulette tables were in full activity. It is known that she had been losing heavily in the baccarat rooms at Nice as well as in the Monte Carlo casino. She had appealed to friends several times for funds on the plea of needing enough to return to her home, but each time had added the money thus secured to the gambling losses already incurred. Incidents of this sort are usually kept from the public by the clever devices of the gambling management. There is a sort of unwritten code that people who are contemplating suicide as the result of failure at the tables should have the good taste to accomplish their purposes in private. But occasionally some thoughtless person violates the proprieties by taking his life in public. The Spanish writer, Ibanez, in his latest novel, "The Enemies of Women," a depressing and rather tiresome volume, that at times reaches low levels of morbidity and disgusting realism, has taken as his theme the gambling system at Monte Carlo, and those who wade through the turgid mass are given a fairly competent idea of the terrible lure of the gambling tables, the almost absolute certainty that every player is a loser in the end, that both those who are periodically successful and those who are persistent losers are drawn back to the game by the irresistible fascination of expected winnings, and that the wrecks of fortune, of character and of health that finally leave the fatal neighborhood are a long procession of pitiful and hopeless people who have exhausted every device, even the most sordid, to try their luck again. The thousands of little Monte Carlos that flourish in all our cities where the public authorities connive at vice, have the same sorry story to tell, if the facts were fully disclosed. There is no indulgence more ruinous to character and integrity than gambling, whether in the public gaming rooms, or in the seclusion of select social card parties.

The Birth Moment of Liberty Recalled

IT is always well to give to important anniversaries the attention they merit. No aware student of events wishes to be insensitive to the dates that have made history. On April 18 it will be four hundred years since Martin Luther stood before the Diet of Worms and uttered his dramatic and challenging words, "Here I stand. I cannot do otherwise. God help me. Amen." That incident has well been called the birth moment of civil and religious liberty. No memory of wrongs wrought in the name of the people from whose midst Luther sprung should cloud the world's debt to him or should prevent its due observance of a day as important as that in the life of the Christian faith. Dr. Robert E. Speer, president of the Federal Council, has admirably suggested that Sunday, April 17, be used in some appropriate manner that shall recognize Luther's fearless words before Charles V and his Council, and shall emphasize afresh some of the great truths which burst forth with renewed power in the Reformation—justification by faith; the duty of obedience to Jesus Christ, the sole Lord of the conscience; the freedom and responsibility of the individual soul; the right of every man to access to the Bible in his own tongue, and the obligation of loyalty to the living God, our only King. "We cannot hope," says Dr. Speer, "to fulfil our longing for a new and reconstructed world otherwise than through the truths which the Reformation proclaimed, and which have yet to dominate the life of the world."

The Stupendous Costs of War Preparation

THERE is now building on the skids at the Portsmouth Navy Yard a huge battleship, the leviathan of the United States navy, the new "North Carolina." It has been under construction for the past eleven months, and will require more than as much time to complete it. It will have all the devices of offensive and defensive naval equipment. It would prove a noble flagship for the admiral of any navy. The statement is made by those who are supervising its creation that the cost of the great fighting machine, with the appropriate flotilla that furnishes its adequate accompaniment of attendance and service, will not be less than seventy-five millions of dollars. That would be enough to put a college, a hospital and an orphans' home in every mission station of twenty or more thousand inhabitants throughout the entire non-Christian world. When asked how long this battleship will last as a creditable part of the navy, the answer was, about nine years. But that is a small part of its cost to the world. For its construction compels the building of the same class of fighting ships in all the other navies of the nations that count themselves factors to be reckoned with in international affairs. And meantime the American people will be paying the taxes not only for these huge monsters of the deep, but for those hundreds of useless vessels that are now anchored in the ship graveyards of Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles, San Diego, Norfolk and a half dozen more of our ports, the rotting, unusable products of war's preparations. The heaviest burden on the resources of the nations today, as in the past is war. And still we talk of larger armies and navies!

The Outlook for Christianity in China

ONE thinks of that Jesuit missionary stationed on the island of Macao, looking across at the great country which he might not enter, and crying: "O wall, wall, when wilt thou open?" One remembers Morrison, a little more than a hundred years ago, trying in vain to penetrate China, and at last after a life-long toil, bringing his interpreter to be baptized, but otherwise, all China barred against him. One recalls his heroic courage when he was asked by the captain of the ship, "Do you suppose you can change 300,000,000 of the Chinese?" and he modestly answered, "No; but God can." All these memories come back to mind when one reads the words of Dr. Cheng Ching Yi, a highly cultivated Chinese, who understands the literature and teaching of the west as well as the lore of China, when he said in a recent address:

The whole of Christian propaganda is the greatest adventure in the world. Are you bold enough to face the difficult situation? Under such circumstances are we daring enough to capture the unparalleled opportunity of taking China for Christ? Are we determined to act in accordance with the times, and do our utmost to win China for the Lord? Remember, friends, my heart is burning within me as I speak. The thought of failure on our part to rise to the occasion for forward, immediate, nation-wide spiritual enterprises makes me shudder. Look wherever you like; such a definite step must be taken. Look at the compassionate Lord on high; look at the opposing forces below; look at the need of our fellowmen around us; look at the personal obligation within us: and there seems to be no way out of it. We are in it, all of us, and no backing out is possible. Let us rise up to the call, and in the beauty of the Lord of Hosts attempt the impossible thing—seeing in the near future Christ for China, and China for Christ.

Surely our own best voices are speaking to us with emphasis and appeals, and that too at a time when the western nations seem to be repudiating Christ. Whether Europe will have Christ or not, it is certain that Asia will. In a remarkable conference that was held a few months ago, an account was given of the new spirit moving in Japan, and how Christianity is appealing to the Japanese because "it is full of life." The doctors recommend it to their patients because it is positive where Buddhism is negative, because it frees the believer from fear; and especially because its doctrine of sacrifice appeals to the heroic in the Japanese mind.

The Churches and the Proposed Naval Holiday

SENATOR EDGE has submitted to the Senate a bill looking forward to a naval holiday. The text of the resolution is as follows: "The President is requested and authorized, if not incompatible with the public interest, to invite the governments of Great Britain and Japan to send representatives to a conference which shall be charged with the duty of promptly entering into an understanding or agreement by which the naval building program of each of said governments, to wit, the United States, Great Britain and Japan, shall be substantially reduced annually during the next five years to such an extent and upon such terms as may be agreed upon, which conclusion is to be reported to their respective governments for their approval." At the present moment the attitude of the United States in naval matters is stimulating the other two nations to greater activity. In stimulating Great Britain to build, we only delay the time when she can discharge her debts to the United States. In compelling Japan to build, we by no means guarantee the peace of the Pacific ocean. Nations with big armaments usually feel called upon to justify the expenditure. It is the man with the pistol who is challenged to a duel. The nation that carries a chip upon its shoulder is almost certain to have it knocked off. Nothing is more natural than that the church should assume a large measure of the initiative in the agitation which must precede the passing of Senator Edge's bill. If this bill were mentioned in all the pulpits, if the men's Bible classes and the women's Bible classes all over the country would pass resolutions and write letters to congressmen, the Christian forces might soon make the issue of naval building one of great interest to the entire nation. The church rests under the suspicion of an excess of zeal for war during the recent conflict. This suspicion will take on real point if there is not now a corresponding zeal for peace at a time when agitation in behalf of world peace really counts. The time to prevent the next world war is right now.

"I Was Hungry and Ye Gave Me Meat"

THE answer of the Christian world to the cry of the starving this year is one of the very best tests of our Christianity, indeed the very test which Jesus himself proposed in his parable of the sheep and the goats. The most hopeless task of all seemed to be the famine relief in China. The needy population was so vast, and the distance of transporting supplies so great. The committee reports that four and a half million dollars have been contributed by America to this work, and about the same amount by Great Britain and by the Chinese themselves. The missionaries have promptly administered these funds and by means of them multitudes of lives have been saved. This has been done in spite of many handicaps. There have been other famine funds, some making a more sentimental appeal to us than the Chinese funds. Some erroneous press reports have given the impression that the need was over. The committee calls attention to other difficulties in these words: "There is evidence in many places of a quiet opposition to the sending of funds to China for famine relief. In some cases this opposition takes the form of a statement that China is a rich country, and is amply able to meet the situation herself. In other cases the entirely erroneous statement is being made that it is useless to send funds to China because lack of transportation facilities makes it impossible to get food supplies into the famine area." This is answered by the committee in these words: "Now is the crucial time in this effort to save starving millions. Nearly three months remain before the harvest may be expected, and when this comes, it may not be at all adequate. Within a few hundred miles of the famine area there is food which can be bought. Rail and water transportation are available." The churches and community organizations are urged to continue their efforts until the undertaking is complete.

Feed the Corn to Poland!

THE low price of corn has brought sorrow to the farmers of the middle west. A bumper crop is bringing less money than an average crop did in previous years. The farmers are aware of the foolishness of people starving in one part of the world for lack of the corn while the farmers of America are poor because they have too much corn. The remedy is obvious. The American Farm Bureau Federation has arranged to ship trainloads of corn to Poland and the Near East in connection with the work of Mr. Hoover's commission. The labor unions have agreed to furnish the labor to move the corn free. The railroads will furnish the cars free of cost. The firms that process the corn for human consumption are doing it at below cost. When yellow corn is given, it is exchanged for the white corn, so all the corn donated may be fed to the people of Europe. It seems like a promising plan, and already the car loads of corn are moving. One of the first counties in Illinois to respond was Whiteside county. A car went in on the siding and the farmers hauled in their loads of corn until it was quickly filled. Meanwhile if a good many trainloads were shipped from this country, the price of corn would probably go up. The corn remaining in the farmers' cribs might be worth just as much after the big donation was made as it was before, which is one of the peculiar facts of our commercial practice. In addition to this, millions of people in Europe who have never learned how good the corn foods are will learn to eat corn flakes, hominy, corn bread and corn meal mush. Perhaps a new world market is being opened up to an American product, and the present corn acreage will not need to be reduced to secure a decent price for grain. The farmers' plan originated in a splendid altruistic sentiment. Can it be that a big piece of philanthropy will pioneer the way to the solution of an urgent economic problem? If so, we have a new exemplification of the element of worldly wisdom in the gospel of Christ.

Personality as the Proof of the Life Eternal

THE coming and going of Easter have quickened into life all the sentiments that reach out for assurance of survival beyond this stage of being and have suggested a fresh consideration of the arguments that offer themselves in validation of faith in a future life. None of these are without value. They all aid in the attainment of a firm and unwavering conviction that death does not end all. Yet in the final issue it is the worth of personality that counts for most in the verdict. There are some whom we have known, and who have gone on into the great mystery of the future of whom it is a sheer impossibility to think as no longer surviving. There would be something unthinkable about a world order that ruthlessly permitted such lives to pass into oblivion. When qualities of fine intelligence, unfailing courtesy, dignity and kindness combine in a character that permits of no doubt as to the fundamentals of its convictions and the large principles on which it is built, it is a kind of treason to all the powers of discernment to permit the thought of death to have control. Such qualities are not fashioned by the long artistry of years to be cast out at the end as of negligible worth. Some of those we have known and loved make it impossible for us to doubt the victory of life over death. In the long argument regarding the basic values of things it must be life and love, not death, that will have the last word.

Russia's Orgy of Atheism

NOT since the days of Nero and Diocletian has any branch of the church been called upon to endure so horrible an ordeal as the Russian church has passed through under the communist rule. All church property was confiscated, looted and closed, and the monks were sent into the red army or to hard labor, like convicts. Monasteries were converted into soviet farms, and buildings used as prisons, or else for propaganda by means of lectures, cinemas, plays and the like. Besides the famous "red gospel," full of raving blasphemy, there was a cycle of poems to Christ, so hideous, brutal and vulgar as to defy description. In addition to "posters, leaflets and articles against the religious doping of the people," the bolshevist literature has recently been enriched by a dramatic "masterpiece" in the same line, "Ivan in Paradise," in which Ivan, the bolshevik, goes to heaven where he meets "the respectable Mr. Jehovah, Christ and the archangels" who, listening to his gospel, "repent of their misdeeds, abdicate and give the people a soviet constitution." Such an orgy of vulgarity, to an accompaniment of the most frightful murders, mutilations and nameless outrages, has been the lot of Christian Russia. The night is indeed dark in Russia, but there are signs of hope now that many of the people—except the dregs of society—are beginning to recoil from this gross atheism and grope for the light. A new type of clergy is emerging, and in Petrograd there exists a Divinity Institute where all that remains of the best spiritual teachers of Russia carry on their work, surrounded by keen young students. The intellectuals, the erstwhile free-thinkers and atheists who thought it clever to revile the church, are beginning to return to the lost faith of their childhood—driven by the raw horror of their own logic, and now lay tributes of flowers on their desecrated shrines.

Hatred of the Alien

IN several sections of the national domain there are exhibited in striking form the sentiments of race prejudice against particular groups, especially those furthest removed by color and former location from our American type. There are the Hindus in the far northwest, the Mexicans on the southwest border, the Negroes in many sections of the north, as well as south, the Jews in most of the larger cities, and the Japanese on the western coast, and especially in California. Against all of these racial "intruders," as the man who regards himself a typical American is likely to classify them, there is manifested, in varying degree, an antipathy which needs careful examination, and which, if not corrected, can hardly fail to lead to even more serious consequences than recent years have witnessed.

Of all these groups the Japanese constitute just now the most perplexing and threatening problem. Regarding them public opinion is apathetic or unaware, save as sinister and prejudiced propaganda has attempted to influence the mind of the nation at large to a hostile attitude. But the people of California, and to a certain extent those of the entire Pacific Coast, are deeply interested in the problem, and for personal reasons. The question is constantly debated, What is to be done with the Japanese? And while there is a prevailing opinion, it must be confessed that sentiments vary greatly with locality and bent of mind.

There are those who affirm with emphasis that the Japanese are undesirable people as related to our general populational situation. It is contended that their standard of living and of morals is lower than that of the representative American, that they are incapable of assimilation into our national structure, that they are not so trustworthy as other non-American groups, and that by clan methods and relentless industry they drive out from the most desirable portions of the land those who otherwise would become its possessors, and by shrewd practices they win in the industrial and commercial competition in which they are so quick to engage.

Again there are those who assert that the Japanese are a quiet, thrifty and industrious people, who have made themselves indispensable to the areas of the Pacific coast, and particularly to California, by applying their skill and patience to any regions which otherwise would not have been brought under cultivation. Since only about one quarter of the state is as yet under cultivation, it is contended that there is ample room for many more. While recognizing the impossibility of amalgamation of the two races, those who hold these views insist that the seventy or eighty thousand Japanese numbered among the four millions of California's population do not constitute a menace, but a factor of recognized value.

There are of course other phases of the subject to be taken into account. Japan has come almost within a single generation from a condition of feudal serfdom to one of international importance. By the rapid, probably too rapid, assimilation of western science, she has asserted her power against antagonists like China and Russia. There is the lurking fear in many minds that with her limited area—hardly larger than California in extent—and her rapidly increasing population, she will become soon an irresistible contender for territory, and her ambitions will pass from Formosa, Korea and the Chinese littoral to the Philippines, Hawaii and the Pacific coast.

It must be admitted that the situation of Japan is serious. Her present territory is inadequate to support her population. She has in her island empire almost none of the great assets of national opulence, such as iron and coal. Her chief resources are agriculture, fishing and trade. Her nearest neighbor is China, of whom she professes to think with condescending consideration, but who, in reality, once awakened from the long slumber of indifference and misrule, will give Japan the struggle of her life, a struggle the ultimate issue of which cannot be much in doubt.

For these and many other reasons Japan needs room and she needs friends. It is possible that jingos in America and Japan may stir up causes for war. But if war comes it will not be of Japan's seeking, for with her enormous war debt of the past, a military controversy with any other first rank power is the last of her desires. What she needs is friends and trade, and war is an enemy to both. Yet, of course, the American yellow journals with their blustering talk of Japanese aggressions, are compelling Japan to keep up the desperate effort to maintain her military and naval competence. She must go on building her battleships as long as we and the rest of the world set the pace.

Many plans have been proposed during recent years, for the limitation of Japanese and other Asiatic immigration. Japan has co-operated to an extent in this plan, by the so-called "gentleman's agreement" to stop immigration from across the Pacific. This has been observed to a large extent, but not wholly. Japanese population on the coast has grown by the device of "picture brides," and in other ways. It has been suggested by Dr. Gulick, a wise and discriminating student of the problem, that immigration from all parts of the world be placed on a basis proportioned to the numbers of the respective groups already in the United States, and the national capacity to assimilate more. This is an admirable and dignified plan.

Yet at the present, owing to fear, which amounts to hysteria in some quarters, it may not be unwise to prohibit all immigration of Japanese for a period, say five years, till the subject can be studied free from the agitation of mind that now prevails on the coast. The fact that one-third of the voting public in California registered its dissent from the provisions of the Alien Land Bill recently passed in that state, shows that California is by no means of one mind. And perhaps if the haunting sense of fear were removed by provisions which wise Japanese leaders would recognize as valid, time could be gained for reflection. But it must be remembered that Japan is a proud, high-spirited nation, justly conscious of the place she has won in the regard of the world, and her government has a volatile, sensitive and excitable populace with which to deal.

Any show of undue subservience to American demands would precipitate revolution.

In a situation so delicate as this only the most mature and Christian sentiments should find utterance. It is the gospel at last that must bring the nations to a common understanding. The principles of Jesus as taught by leaders of the churches on both sides of the Pacific, offer the only permanent solution.

Gleanings From a Year Book

THE new Year Book of the Disciples of Christ is just from the press and its summary of conditions makes very interesting reading. The decline in membership which has been noted for three years continues, though it has been somewhat checked. The loss last year in a body of 1,178,079 was 6,986. During the last decade of the nineteenth and the first decade of the twentieth centuries, the Disciples were the most rapidly growing of the Protestant communions. The present check is probably significant of fundamental changes. The loss in the ministry has been 165, while the gain in the number of churches has been 66, further accentuating the fact that the Disciples have scarcely half as many ministers as churches. The unsettled state of the ministry is revealed by the statement that 56 per cent of the churches changed ministers last year. In a few of the smaller states the change was actually 100 per cent. Of the 5,683 ministers, 1,108 are reported as engaging in business part time, and it is indicated that probably a larger number should be so reported. The colleges have reported but forty-nine ministerial graduates for next June, though this is probably not a complete report. In the Sunday school enrolment there has been a gain of 3,842, with a loss of forty-five schools. The Sunday school enrolment of 926,064 is high in relationship to the church membership, and this fact is one which the Disciples are justified in interpreting optimistically. The most encouraging of all the statistics are those which relate to the benevolences of the church. The total income last year was $3,502,258.61. This total is imposing and the missionary zeal of the churches that are missionary at all is still further appreciated when one understands just how the giving is distributed. About three hundred churches give half of all the missionary and benevolent money. Three fourths of the money comes from about eight hundred churches. Large numbers of the churches, if not to be enumerated as anti-missionary, are at least to be called, in the facetious language of the secretaries, "omissionary." The weakness of the Disciples is largely in this inert mass of inactive churches which are provincial in their outlook, conservative in their theology and often non-fraternal in their attitude.

The ministerial problem of the Disciples will never be solved until there is a frank recognition of the revolution that has taken place in higher education. The young people from Disciples homes are predominantly in the state institutions. Yet the recruiting for Christian work has been done almost exclusively in the little denominational colleges. State university students tend to possess a more open mind perhaps, and in the long run are likely to become more competent interpreters of religion. The fiction that they are less religious is passing out of belief where the facts to the contrary are known. The economic support of the ministry will be largely increased when there is a better trained ministry.

The Disciples are now face to face with the necessity of a new technique in recruiting their leadership. That this is recognized at least dimly is shown by the appointment of Rev. Jesse M. Bader as secretary of evangelism. Mr. Bader can render an important service by studying the recruiting methods of successful churches, and reporting these to the less successful churches. It is an impressive fact that the great majority of outstanding successful churches among the Disciples have been for years using an educational evangelism instead of the high pressure mass meetings.

There can be no doubt that Disciple growth has been greatly hindered by internal dissension. The campaign of suspicion and attack in connection with the propagation of a radical conservatism in theology has broken up the mass consciousness in the church. How many educated people have been driven out of the ranks by it can never be known. There are many tokens that this conservative reaction has spent its force. The Disciples have refused year after year to sell their liberties. With a revival of their religious spirit, and a modern statement of their message for the times, they will yet have a large place to play among the religious forces of America.

Jesus and Politics

TIME out of mind we have been told that Jesus had nothing to do with the politics of his day, but devoted himself entirely to a spiritual ministry, and that his preachers, if they are loyal and wise, will follow his example. In proof of this position the words of the Master about rendering unto Cæsar the things that belong to Cæsar have often been quoted, as well as his refusal to arbitrate between two brothers who were in a dispute about an estate. Jesus, it is argued, laid down no program, made no proposals of a definite kind, but dealt only in principles, leaving it to his followers to discover, if possible, how to apply his truth to life and the social order. In short, that Jesus was not a social agitator, but a Redeemer of the soul.

There was, and there is, truth in this position, and it is held by many noble and honorable men to whom Christianity is a system of spiritual psychology, dealing with the delicate and subtle things of the soul—remote fears, lonely sorrows, inner misgivings and aspirations—and only indirectly with the problems of economic debate. Unfortunately, other men take the same position for very different reasons, and often from less ethereal motives; men who think it to their advantage to have religion regarded as merely a private mysticism—some of whom are just now engaged in an effort financially to coerce the Christian Church into an attitude of aloofness to the issues involved in the economic struggle. They are quite willing to support the church so long as it interprets religion as an individual fellowship with God, but they resent the tendency of religious leaders to formulate specific social and economic programs, on the ground that it is mixing religion with politics.

In view of the acuteness of this issue such a book as "The Proposal of Jesus," by Dr. John Hutton, of Glasgow, is not only stimulating, but almost startling. The thesis of the book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. The politicians of his day tried to win him over to their side, and he was put to death, not for his words of poetry and works of mercy—that were unthinkable—but because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs."

Indeed, it is the master glory of Jesus that, alone among the sons of men of whom we have record, he saw a way by which, even though the hour was late, the world of his day might be saved. Especially did he see a way by which his own people might fulfil their mission to humanity. He saw, and after first hinting it, finally proclaimed a definite public policy for the guidance of his age and no less of ours. His policy was rejected by the leaders of his people, not that they did not understand the meaning of it, but because they did understand it. They perceived that it was asking of them what God had asked of them by the mouth of Isaiah and Jonah, a proposal to take one short step indeed, but a step across their own hearts—planting one foot upon a narrow nationalism and a religious exclusiveness and stepping out into what seemed to them a void and empty place—though to Jesus it was a step across the threshold into the kingdom of God in this world. Anyway, the proposal of Jesus was rejected, and the disaster which he foresaw overtook his nation in the year 70, when Jerusalem was sacked and laid waste. It has been rejected again and again, even in our own generation, with like results, and so long as it is despised as visionary and impractical the world will drift from one calamity to another.

What is the proposal of Jesus for the public policy of the world? The author does not know of anything nearer to the whole fact of the matter than to say that our Lord came into this world preaching the unity of mankind in God; and inaugurated that prospect as the very task and business of all who in every age should come to believe in him. He declared that God is the Father of the entire human race, that he has no natural or national favorites, that he has no respect of persons, that God loves the world. The chosen nation exists for the whole world, not the whole world for the chosen nation. God revealed himself to the Jews as he had not revealed himself to any other people—by virtue of their genius for the unseen; but this with the intention not that the Jews should make a secret of his revelation, still less that they should become proud and contemptuous of other peoples, but that they should regard themselves as the trustees and ministers of something sacred and beautiful and necessary, for the behoof of the entire human family.

At first, and before they understood the real drift of his teaching, the religious leaders of his day encouraged the great popularity of Jesus with the people. Later they became suspicious and uneasy, and at last, having decided that his vision would supercede and discredit their own nationalist dreams, they set themselves to destroy him. In other words, the forces which nailed Jesus to the cross are the same forces which are still with us, active and insolent—at once stupid and cunning—and which in our own day crucified humanity on an iron cross. There is a spirit among us, vigilant, alert, aggressive, and wholly hostile to the gospel of Christ. Whether it take the form of mercenary greed, egoistic vanity, narrow nationalism, lust of power, or religious bigotry, it is the same, and it never sleeps. Its wits are quickened by every motive of gain, its resources are as manifold as the ingenuity of evil can devise, and its courage is the boldness of selfishness guided by unremitting guile. He is blind who does not see its influence and array, and how many times the spirit of Christ must suffer seemingly utter defeat before this genius of discord and delusion will be overcome.

Such, in bare outline, is the thesis of Dr. Hutton, but it gives no inkling of the richness of his exposition of it. Master of a vivid style, suggestive even in its discursiveness, he makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous, but awe-inspiring, as his interpretation unfolds. Besides, it is a vision not only persistent but poignantly pertinent; and for one who loves America—remembering how only yesterday our nation rejected a plan looking toward a tentative world unity of effort and aspiration—it becomes almost terrifying. One passage may illustrate what noble chords the writer strikes in the course of his great argument.

"I sometimes think that in a great, wholesale way we are all of us about to make a wonderful discovery. At times it seems to me as though we were on the edge and moment of a world-shaking revolution in thought and mood. For a long time now we have been feeling our way in a vast, unlit corridor, contending with others in the dark, striking out at shapes which seem to be wishing to do us harm, when all the time they, like ourselves, may only have been out upon their business, and, like us, in the dark. I sometimes think that in answer to the cry of our present distress a light is once more about to shine; and by this light we shall see again an open door, and beyond the door the fair earth and sky. I sometimes think we are all of us on the point of making the discovery that our Christianity is true, and that for mankind to oppose it or to neglect it, is for mankind in the long run to rush down a steep place and to perish."

The Roll with a Strange Name

A Parable of Safed the Sage

HERE came unto our home, our Little Grandson. And he besought his Grandmother, even Keturah, that she would give unto him a Roll. And she would have understood him plainly, but he said that he wanted a Pyonder Roll.

Now Keturah can make Pocket-book Rolls, and Parker House Rolls, and Hot Biscuits, and if there be any kind of Rolls that are good, them also can she make. And when she serveth them with Golden Butter and Maple Syrup or Honey or Preserves, then would she cause the mouth of a Graven Image to water. But she did not know about any Pyonder Roll.

And the little lad said, I want the Roll that's called a Pyonder.

Then did a Great White Light begin to dawn upon the mind of Keturah, and she said, Tell me the rest of it, my dear.

And he said:

When the Trumpet of the Lord shall sound and Time shall be no more,

And the Roll is called a Pyonder I'll be there.

And she gave unto him a Roll, and he was there.

Now I bethought myself of the Strange Mental pictures which our Grown-up words bring unto the mind of children. And I considered that our Heavenly Father knoweth that our minds also are but the minds of Little Children, and all our Mental Pictures of Celestial Things are limited, and that much which we learn of Divine Truth is even as the Pyonder Roll.

And I am thankful that we have our Pyonder Rolls, even our Daily Bread, and that the way of essential righteousness is so plain that a little child may learn it. And it is my earnest hope that when the Roll is called Up Yonder, I'll be there.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

To John Burroughs

(In Memory)

WE waste our years with creeds and empty words,
Pretending God will give attention due.

Alas! He does not hear! He turned to you,
Who knew and loved His roses and His birds!

You had no time for proudly pious vows,
So humbled were you by the dawn's surprise.

You searched no book for miracles: your eyes
Found wonders strange among the blossomed boughs.

Bequeath to us your wisdom, prophet sage,
That we at last may learn the way of life,
That we may not be stifled by the strife
Of brutal men, in this inglorious age.

Although your feet now tread eternal ways,
Your spirit still shall light our clouded days.

Aspiration

AS yonder tree, though captive to the sod,
Lifts heavenward its head, so do we unto God
In aspiration fond lift heart and mind,
Captive to earth and circumstance unkind.

Saving the Minister's Soul

By Lloyd C. Douglas

SO steady a character as the Tarsan once candidly admitted that, having preached to others, it was by no means certain he himself might not become a cast-away. These were brave words coming from the self-confessed pioneer of an exalted moral code engaged in its first struggles to gain a following. It would have been easy for Paul to say to his congregation, "I have discovered two forces at work in you—virtue and vice; so inextricably mixed that even when you would do good evil is present!" It was quite another matter when he declared, "I find two laws within me—a law of my mind and a law of my members, and these two laws at war: oh, wretched man that I am!"

The present-day preacher who would thus phrase repentance in the first person singular might give his congregation an uneasy moment for fear he was about to make some startling disclosure of moral turpitude. It is considered much more becoming in him to speak of sinfulness in the third person; or, at most, in the second person. It is assumed that he himself bears a charmed reputation and inviolate character, safe as Cæsar's wife from the ordinary frailties of the race.

HEARING SERMONS

Our profession seems pretty thoroughly committed to the belief that hearing the gospel preached, week after week, is so excellent a safeguard and stimulus to correct living that public morality is greatly influenced by the Christian pulpit. Sometimes the doubt is expressed that people who habitually deny themselves the moral and spiritual uplift from the pulpit may order their lives as becomes good Christian citizens. If this proposition has a leg to stand on, what is to become of us who never have a chance to hear the gospel preached, except as we ourselves interpret it, from one year's end to the next?

It is not the object of this writing to imply that preachers, as a class, are misbehaving themselves; for such is not the case. Although our ministerial ordination guarantees no immunity against the common weaknesses of mankind, the public expects us to exhibit a high-grade morality. That this demand has been met in a manner fairly satisfactory is evident from the respect generally accorded the clergy as leaders in the moral life of their communities. Once in a while, we are rasped to spluttering indignation over the front-page prominence given to the story of a moral lapse committed by some weak brother whose name had never meant anything until it had contrived to associate itself with odium; but, if we only stop to reason, this is a sort of awkward, left-handed compliment to our vocation. It means that ministers habitually carry themselves with such circumspection that a mistake on the part of any one of them, however obscure, deserves to be played up as sensational news. Were such delinquencies frequent, they would not startle the public; neither would they earn wide-spread advertisement.

But it is not the purpose of this paper to discuss the preacher's morals, so much as to inquire somewhat concerning the means at hand for the conservation and development of his spiritual capacities and aspirations. As for the majority of us, we rarely have a chance to hear anything that inspires us to higher thinking or nobler action. Such advices are customarily offered on the first day of the week, at a time when we ourselves are busy with our well-meant, though sometimes ineffective, endeavors to build up a stronger consciousness of human-divine contacts in the souls of our parishioners. We are simply agents and jobbers of spirituality, ourselves menaced with spiritual insolvency, due to lack of inspirational income, plus a steady drain of expense at that point; starved in the very process of retailing to the ultimate consumer the finest provisions we can lay hands upon—sometimes blissfully unconscious of the pernicious anaemia that has sapped our spiritual vigor.

AGENTS OF SPIRITUALITY

Occasionally we attend conferences with our fellow-ministers and selected groups of devout laymen; but there the program consists mostly of the mere buttons-and-pins of church methods, the discussion of administrative problems, and consideration of workaday statistical reports. Not infrequently it turns out that the promised "inspirational address," with which the conference was to reach its ennobling climax, deftly maneuvers its way from the pulpit to the receipt of custom, where it attains to such magnificence of appeal that the baskets are passed again—this time in the interest of some undeniably worthy cause that had come "to the parting of the ways," and was "facing an hour of crisis," and "now throws down an heroic challenge to the sacrificial courage of the red-blooded!" And so forth. Ad lib.

But even this drench of distress on behalf of an excellent movement, involving the re-reconsecration of the preacher's puny purse to the jeopardized philanthropy, does very little to assuage his heart-hunger for spiritual nourishment. To be sure, the traveling secretary of the bankrupt board tells him that the most effective spiritual tonic known to the profession is self-administered by the act of turning one's pockets wrongsideout; but the preacher, however salutary may be the moral results of charity, or sweet the uses of adversity, still longs for some genuine inspiration, just once, that doesn't find its ultimate goal in his jeans.

THE PREACHER'S HEART HUNGER

If this matter has been overstated, the exaggeration may easily be pointed out and denied by fellow-craftsmen who have failed to observe that the end and aim of most of our "inspirational" conference addresses is fiscal rather than cardiac. One must never forget—and one isn't at all likely to be permitted to forget—that it takes money, and lots of it, to operate the kingdom, as modernly constituted; but it also takes something else that money cannot buy. It is of this somewhat tangible, but highly important, "something else" that we need to think seriously, these days.

In the course of his daily activities, the preacher—commonly and erroneously presumed to possess singular opportunities for the culture of his own soul—is almost as beset with secular duties as the busiest man of affairs in his congregation. No cloistral seclusion is permitted him, and it is uncertain he would avail himself of such insular protection, were it offered. The nature of his ministerial labors has altered so completely, within the past two decades, that he is no longer in the mood for that peculiar type of spiritual culture which distinguished our predecessors of a generation past. The modern minister gets little opportunity to develop what our elders used to call “piety,” and so infatuated has he become with the newer features of his business that the very term “piety” is not the most popular word in his working vocabulary. He shies off, uncomfortably, when he meets it, suspecting it of distasteful designs upon the length of his countenance and the manner of his speech or dress.

SLAVE OF CHURCH MACHINERY

Increasingly has he become enslaved to all the church machinery bequeathed to him by energetic predecessors, plus all the modern conveniences which he himself has installed, in the way of organizations, “to assist him in his work.” Sometimes, when he sits down, for a moment, before the grate, to catch his breath, after the exacting labors of the day, and contemplates that he must now hurry to the church, with all speed, to meet the executive committee of the Sunny Sons of Something-or-Other—knowing full well that he must adroitly suggest the business to come before the body, hypnotize some Sunny Son into making a motion, and another into the act of supporting it, and all of them into passing it; and that the outcome of the event will be a smilingly unanimous resolution empowering him to go out, single-handedly, and do whatever it was that he might have done, at one-tenth the time and bother, without supervising these parliamentary calisthenics—he wonders whether he hasn’t fed both hands, up to the very shoulders, into the rapacious maw of his own machine!

But it is quite too late to remedy much of this. He has made his bed, and now he must lie in it. He has surrounded himself with cabinets, bureaus, commissions, principalities and powers—The Tri-Mu Fraternity, The Best-You-Can-Do Club, The Merry Matrons, and The Over-the-Tops—from which he may no more readily disengage himself than a mid-August fly with all six legs knee-deep in stick-emfast.

Thus engaged, week-days, in parish and community duties which leave but little time unmortgaged, the good man is really in as serious need of spiritual rejuvenation, on Sunday, the day of rest, as the most jaded beast of burden who appears before him, at that time, in the sanctuary. But—may he not derive much spiritual uplift from his own sermons?—someone pertinently inquires. Well, let us look into that, for a moment. Sermon manufacture is a business. It is not exactly the same kind of business as selling gingham, shingling a roof, digging a sewer, or excising a tumor; but it is a business, and if the preacher doesn’t make a business of it his days will not be long in the land as a preacher. It is not an unusual experience for a minister to be so aflame with his subject that the research, composition, and delivery of his sermon develop him, spiritually, so that he lives for days in the light and warmth of it. But this is by no means a weekly experience, even with the most ardent, if they themselves are to be believed.

THE HOMILETIC MOOD

If the preacher is alert to the possibilities of his ministry, he is continually in a homiletic mood. Nothing ever passes before his eyes that is not hailed as potential sermon material. This mood is ever with him. It is with him when he reads the Book, in the early morning, presumably for devotional reasons. It is very much on the job as he offers his prayers. And the better preacher he is, the more grave is the menace that his own spiritual life may be starved. He must contrive, somehow, to achieve soul-culture!

Perhaps, if he would make a resolution that one day of the week—Monday, say—he would refrain from assaying books, conversation, and natural phenomena, with a view to their possible sermonic ore, reserving that day for his own private consumption, he might, after awhile, consistently practice this habit. All America is afflicted with a psychosis which might be called “the busy bee.” (Not the bee apis, but the bee bonnet.) Preachers have it about as badly as anybody. Worse than most. The good man is fearful that someone will think him idle, or of leisurely habits. He thinks he must be racing about, with wilted collar, either doing things or going through the motions of doing things, all the day long. When asked if he doesn’t reserve Monday as a rest day, he sighs, and says, “Oh, dear, no! All days are alike to us! I’ve given up trying to save my Monday!” He thinks this is as it should be. This is the gentleman who gets himself all excited telling his people that even practical, godless economics requires of mortals “one day’s rest in seven,” and points to notable cases of nations that broke the rule and went heels-over-head to the bow-wows. Yes; everybody needs a rest-day but himself. Alas, poor man, he is too busy to knock off at all! Piffle! He can, and he must, make some provision for the salvation of his own soul. Let him name one day of the week to be sacred to the cultivation of his spirit.

ACCEPTING THE MINISTRIES OF OTHERS

In every congregation, there are a few elderly folk who are living on the income of spiritual capital amassed in days before we became too busy to take counsel of our hearts. I used to know a little old lady who was blind; that is, her physical organs of sight were not functioning. The eyes of her soul were very keen. I looked forward with keen delight to the next visit in her humble home. She always expressed gratitude that the minister called so frequently and stayed awhile; but I never brought her anything to be compared with the treasures I carried away. Some of these fine old saints are prepared to do great things for us, if we approach them properly. How often we rush in, pat them on the shoulder, tell them what a whale of a sermon we preached last Sunday, wish them well, and run away—tatting up another good deed done to “the sick and imprisoned”—when, by sitting quietly at their feet, and encouraging them to do the talking, we might have come away with a fresh sense of the glory of the human spirit, and the desirableness of a life that is "hid with Christ in God."

If we only stopped long enough to think about it, the bereaved have rich treasures for us of an inspirational character. How little we make use of them, for our own good, in the moments when grief has fairly transfigured their lives! How we do imagine that we must, ourselves, do all the talking, apparently never dreaming that it is our business, at such times, to stand, with bowed head and expectant heart, waiting a message lifted up on the wings of pain.

Every so often, the preacher ought to get away from his church and sit in a pew. He should not content himself with a visit to some church of the same capacity as his own, where he will inevitably take notes and make comparisons. Neither should he go to hear a preacher of the same caliber as himself, in which case he is sure to get little out of the service or the sermon beyond the mechanics of both. He must go, as a worshipper, into a church equipped and manned so excellently that he will forget everything but his own soul, under the inspiration of the hour. His congregation at home should open the way for him to do this, not less than twice a year. They should not expect him to come back and report, either, on what he heard. He should do this for the sake of his own spiritual culture. Incidentally, the restoration of the joy of his own salvation will inevitably affect his preaching.

If there was room for just one more movement—there is not; so let us have no further thought of that!—but if there was room for one more movement, perhaps it would be well to start something calculated to assist the preacher in the highly commendable business of cultivating his own soul. This is a live question! It would be interesting to learn of the various expedients to which busy ministers have resorted in their efforts to achieve spiritual culture. If we fail, at this point, we fail fundamentally. If we never see or hear anything that inspires us, how may we expect to inspire others? If the light that is in us be darkness, how great is that darkness!

Is Modern Literature Christless?

By Joseph Fort Newton

IS modern literature Christless? Much of it is. Most of it, indeed, is written as if Christ had never lived, or having lived his swift and gentle years, had faded into a myth. Naturalism has run riot for twenty years, to go no further back, and we are still smeared with it. An acute critic has said that if it was the task of the last century to put man into nature, it is the task of this century to get him out again. He is still neck deep in it, having followed nature to "the last ditch and ditch water." Yet even before the war there were signs of revolt equally against the utopian naturalism of Wells and the etherealized sensuality of Maeterlinck—in whose perfumed pages the scent and sheen of the flesh were so disguised by a mystical glamor as almost to deceive the very elect.

PORTRAYALS OF CHRIST

What influence the war will finally have upon literature we do not know, nor can we guess. Just now we are too near the shambles, too much in a cloud of rancor and reaction, rightly to interpret that vast tragedy. If humanity were logical, as it is not, it would seem that the fiery horror of the last few years should issue in a literature reflecting the vindicated "law for man," as over against the law of the jungle. Whether it will be so or not is among the things to be awaited. At the moment there is very little sign of it, though, so far, we have only the desolation of the war, not its despair, not its echo in the lonely places of the soul. Perhaps my purpose will best be served by pointing to a very impressive fact just preceding the war which revealed a yearning, a quest, an adventure the more striking when seen in the setting of the paganism of the hour.

I refer to the fact, which is surely arresting in its significance, that not less than forty volumes—plays, novels, and poems—were written in different languages, by artists of a high order, who found their theme in Christ, seeking to portray him as a living Presence among men. Such a widespread interest in Christ among leading authors in various lands, when otherwise confusion reigned in religious faith, was most significant. No such books, so far as I am aware, were written in the last century at all. The simultaneity of these works, as well as their astonishing popularity, are facts not to be forgotten. Whatever may be the meaning of the fact, it is true that the first decade and a half of the new century exhibited a Christward interest and tendency not to be paralleled in our literature. This impression of the personality of Christ upon our age may be another token of what Thomas Goodwin called "an instinct for Christ" in man, which prophesies of One who, though akin to us, towers above us in wisdom, power and mercy. At any rate, God be thanked for any token that our "wise, wearily wise earth" does listen betimes above the hubbub of its noisy activity to the sweetest of all voices.

It is obviously impossible to name, much less to describe and discuss, all these books at the present moment, but some hint of their trend may be given. Take, first, three books in which we are made to feel, poignantly, the need of Christ and the groping of the modern mind in quest of him. They are "Hilligenlei," by Gustave Frenssen, and "Inri," by Peter Rosegger, each a Massiade, albeit, if the former is the abler work, the latter has more warmth and glow of human passion. Anyway, the somber rationalist of the north and the sunny humanitarian of the south of Germany, agree that behind the life of our age there is no faith; that beneath it there is no foundation; that above it there is no "world-feeling, no religion." Together they cry out for a more satisfying and revealing assurance of the spiritual worth and meaning of things, and both find that meaning in Christ. A book of higher art is "The Miracles of the Anti-Christ," by Selma Lagerlof, to understand which one must keep in mind the background of European socialism and its scorn of Christianity. The story bears us along from picture to picture, but its symbolism is transparent, showing the emptiness and ultimate inadequacy of a crass, materialistic socialism, and predicting the final ascendancy of Christ.

REVERENT DRAMAS

Unique in its beauty, appealing in its tenderness, is the shadow-play called "The Saint and the Animals," by Johann Widmann. It is a study of the temptations of Jesus, following closely the narrative of the Gospel of Mark, but with a series of scenes in which our friends, the animals, make plea to Jesus to be their redeemer. The raven, the fox, the hare, the snake, the lion, each asks why, if God is good, there should be such woe, terror, and cruelty in the animal world—why life feeds on life in earth and sea and sky? Not less striking is the drama by Hermann Sudermann woven about the closing days of "John the Baptist," showing how the sun-burned desert prophet, preaching of impending wrath, is softened and won by the strange gospel of love. Thus, while showing us John as the central figure, it is a Christ-drama of amazing power. More beautiful still is "The Samaritan," by Edward Rostand, a play written in jeweled words and with the insight of a master artist. Nor must we forget "Judas," by Andreyev, in which we see Jesus as he is reflected in the cloudy mirror of the mind of the man who betrayed him. All these dramas are noble, reverent and beautiful, and the message of all is the same—that the gospel consists in knowing Jesus and redemption in living with him. All alike show us a person of ineffable winsomeness, who loves men and women, and by the contagion of his love teaches them not only to believe but love the highest and live for it.

There is hardly need to mention "The Servant in the House," by Kennedy, the memory of which is a joy forever. It tears right through all shams, making mock of false religion and of love that bases itself upon any level lower than the highest; it shakes down the towering lie of respectability, while over all is the beautifully sustained suggestion of the presence of Christ—God working with us and in us for our fellow souls. Of like kind was "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," by Jerome, where we saw the Christman, clad in the garb of today, a guest in a dingy boarding house in Bloomsbury Square. Sometimes the Passerby seems to be Christ; then again we somehow feel that he is the angel of our better nature. Perhaps the meaning of the play is that he is both—that within us akin to the divine; that seed which sleepeth until we water the ground on which it lies; that voice of God we will one day no longer deny. Akin to these dramas is "The Re-appearing," a story which fell like a bomb on the gay streets of Paris four years before the war. Its author, Charles Morice, had been known as an esthetic, an authority upon Verlaine and Rodin, and his book was a change of heart as great as that of Huysman's, some years before. Of a sudden he turned against his former gods and gospels and became a lover of Christ, in whose light he saw the awful gap which yawns between the life of today and the life of Jesus.

CAN CHRIST BE FOLLOWED

While these plays and stories bring near the Christ of long ago and fill us with a wistful longing to be like him, they do not tell us, save indirectly, how to follow him in the strange world in which we live. Is the attempt to live the Christ-life in our age a failure and a foolishness? Gerhart Hauptmann seems to say so in his remarkable novel, "The Fool in Christ," the very title of which suggests the folly and futility of it. Emanuel Quint, the hero—if hero he may be called—lives the Christ-life, albeit on a lower plane, and is taken for a madman. Assuredly it is folly to follow Christ, if by that is meant that we should repeat the form of his life. The letter killeth; it is the spirit that giveth life. A life lived in the spirit of Jesus is shown us in "The Saint," by Fogazzaro, a story in which we see the whole of modern Italy spread out before us in a many-colored picture, and a lovely figure living the Christ life as Francis lived it in Assisi long ago. But more convincing, to me at least, are those books and plays which show us not a figure reminiscent of the Christ of Judea in manner and garb, but one like ourselves—indeed, one of ourselves—mediating the spirit and mercy of the living Christ to men in their sin, and to women in their sorrow.

For example. One night in Chicago I saw "Salvation Nell," a play written by Edward Sheldon and acted by Minnie Fiske—a play to shake the heart and still it. There passed from the City of Destruction to the City of God a being in whom there was much innate goodness, as there is in every soul however far fallen, but for whose feet the way was very hard. The drama was instinct with spirituality. Its veracity of atmosphere was only equaled by its tenderness, its hopefulness. While it showed the horror of the city slum, it did not exploit the besotted for the sake of peopling the stage with strange, grim figures. Rather, it told their story with austere realism, but with a great awe for their condition. With true insight it evoked the light from drab shadows, and held it clear and high for the guidance of feet that falter. It was told simply, vividly, with true touch, by a man who had put his ear so close to the hearts of them that dwell in the abyss that he heard a song—the song of those who aspire, who come by devious ways to the light, and who by the help of Jesus make resolution to live. For Nell Saunders it was a literal wrenching away from evil and a frantic clinging to Christ that saved her slipping feet, and, saved herself, she becomes a savior, and the play ends in a note of rapture. My feeling as the curtain fell was that here was the living, eternal Christ at work—seeking the far-wandering, as of old—and that whether it was Nell Saunders in the gutter half a block from hell, or myself, it is the same Christ who loves and heals and saves.

THE NEARER CHRIST

But enough. Surely it cannot be said that the literature of our age in Christless, so long as it shows us not only his figure, in many lights and shadows, but also his truth and his spirit at work among us and within us, using the hearts of men, if they be broken that he may enter in, and their hands if they be love-anointed, to carry forward the things which he "began both to do and teach" in days of old. For us in this ambiguous time, no less than for "Marius the Epicurean" in an earlier age, Jesus is a living protest and perpetual witness against all the naturalisms in which we may wallow, the cynicisms to which we may be tempted, and the skepticisms which beset and becloud us. Nay, more; in the promptings of a finer social conscience, in the aspiration for a more delicate justice among men, in the dream of a world ruled by the force of law, rather than the law of force, one sees now a Figure, now a Face, like unto the Son of Man.

English Liberals on the Irish Debacle

A FEW days ago there was held in London a great meeting of thousands of women of liberal affiliations to protest against the present Tory conduct of affairs in Ireland. It was a meeting of English women demanding that the government adopt for the Emerald Isle a policy "based not upon force but upon peace and good will." Viscountess Bryce, wife of the great ambassador, presided and among other speakers was the Marchioness of Aberdeen, whose husband was once lord lieutenant of Ireland. The marchioness denounced the treatment of Irish prisoners and said: "The women of Ireland are back of their men. They will support their boys to the death." Viscountess Bryce said that "reprisals occur because vengeance is taken out on the innocent when government agents are unable to find the guilty." Lady Bonham Carter summed up the sentiment of these women thus: "In Ireland we are betraying every principle for which England fought. We are enthroning there the monsters of brute force and militarism which the youth of the world died to overthrow. We are watching a nation torn by a conflict between crime and crime. The Irish issue is the test of the value of our citizenship. In the name of the innocent victims of this tragedy of force we are asking a united protest. We are losing the soul of England in this struggle. We women, at least, repudiate with horror the things being done in Ireland."

A few days ago the Congregationalist Union of Great Britain passed a ringing resolution of condemnation for the government's policy in Ireland and Lloyd-George, himself an apostle of non-conformity, is about forsaken by its leaders; or rather he has forsaken them for his new political allies, the Tory aristocrats, and of a parliament which is characterized by an Englishman as a "body of hard-faced men who made money out of the war, and who, having power, mean to keep it." Principal W. B. Selbie, president of the National Free Church Council, says: "However great the provocation there can be no possible justification for the policy of reprisals as it has recently been carried out. It is the negation of law and ethically quite indefensible. On the moral issues thus raised the Christian church should speak with no uncertain voice and should be ready to withhold all support from the government which countenances, if it did not originate, the method of reprisals."

* * *

Viscount James Bryce and Lord Gladstone

Americans respect no English voice more than that of the great ambassador who wrote "The American Commonwealth" and whose unaffected democracy has not suffered by his being made a viscount. His words indicate a poised mind and are backed by a lifetime of historical study. He says: "The Irish feeling of distrust is being renewed and intensified by the conduct of the 'irregulars.' The policy of the government is turning into rebels those who have been well affected or neutral. Ireland is being treated as an enemy country whose population is presumed to be hostile. We hear daily of cases in which persons are shot at random, or persons, not caught red-handed and against whom no evidence is produced, have been shot without trial. . . . The government are making the position of the peaceable neutral an impossible one. . . . We cannot contemplate holding Ireland down forever by force and terror, but the policy now being pursued makes it every day more difficult to hold it down by any other means."

Let us recall that it was Lord Bryce's report on German atrocities that convinced the world.

The name of Gladstone is one all Americans revere. The Grand Old Man went down in defeat on the home rule issue. Had he won there would have been peace instead of civil war in Ireland today. The present Lord Gladstone joins other outstanding Liberals with the following words: "The long story of evictions, starvation, and bad government in Ireland through generations has had its bloody accompaniment of crime. We hoped that this book was closed. It was not to be. The home rule act of 1914 passed through parliament and received the king's signature. After the war it was arbitrarily and finally shelved. Was ever such an action perpetrated by a great constitutional country? So we have the old recrudescence of the old state of things. Ireland is not, and never has been, criminal at heart. The violent coerce the peaceful into silence, and all are held by the government responsible for the actions of the few. No course can be more fatal. You can by sheer force put down murder and disorder, but you will never crush aspirations in themselves worthy and noble."

* * *

Lord Grey
and Others

Lord Grey is conservative in regard to English foreign matters. Therefore his words have the greater poignancy when he says: "There is already talk of possible future wars, and of all things in the world there is talk of possible war between this country and the United States. I am one of those who think there would be little pleasure or interest in living on in this world if there were war between the United States and this country. I believe cordial relations and cooperation between these two countries will do more than anything else to benefit the whole world, but I also believe that this question should

Contributors to This Issue

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, and LLOYD C. DOUGLAS, both frequent contributors to The Christian Century.

BOOKS

Any book in print may be secured from The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago. Give name of publisher, if possible.

be handled not as one of sentiment but with regard to certain plain facts. One plain fact is this: There will be no real cordiality between this country and the United States as long as the Irish question remains where it is."

There are the words of a great Belfast ship builder, the Hon. Alexander M. Carlisle, of the Harland, Wolfe Co. We are led to believe all Ulster Ireland about Belfast was of one mind and that mind infallibly right because Protestant. I could fill the page with such words as these, spoken by Mr. Carlisle: "The issue now raised transcends the question of Irish peace. The question for the British public to decide is whether the old traditions of honesty in public life are to be maintained or discarded. It is not merely that the government have made mistakes—gross, unpardonable mistakes, of which they were fully warned—it is that they have endeavored to hide those mistakes by shameless duplicity and infamous dishonesty."

Here are the words of another M. P. whose name has a significantly Scotch Presbyterian sound, the Hon. J. A. Murray McDonald: "When, on October 20 last, the subject of Irish reprisals was for the first time discussed in the house of commons, I voted with the government. Last night I voted against them. . . . In the debate of October 20, Mr. Bonar Law, speaking for the government, told us that they condemned reprisals. . . . But the promise has not been carried out. The condemnation remains a dead letter. The reprisals continue: and, from all the evidence that comes to us, they continue in an aggravated form."

The present regime in Ireland can no longer camouflage its wickedness under religious prejudice nor post-war nationalism of the narrower variety. We make the words of Lord Grey our own, namely, "There will be no real cordiality between this country and the United States so long as the Irish question remains where it is." In a later article we will discuss Sir Horace Plunkett's viewpoint and remedy for the whole sorry matter.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

A COMMUNICATION

The Y. M. C. A. and Industry

THERE is a tradition in the Association movement that it will follow the lead of the churches. With this in mind we must ask, What is the Association's attitude toward the problems of industry? Is the Association to blink these problems? Is it to hide behind the skirts of the Y. W. C. A.? More property and more persons are directly concerned in industry than in any other phase of American life but one. Are we to be silent, and afraid? Can we not serve both employer and employee where they have great need?

Those who read the letter of L. Wilbur Messer, general secretary of the Chicago Y. M. C. A., in The Christian Century for February 24, gather the impression that the Association is afraid. But let us examine the facts.

The last action of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States is recorded in the report of the fortieth convention which was held in Detroit in November, 1919. The official report shows that the Association movement has sympathetic opinions in regard to industry and has laid down a platform. In the course of action the convention said:

"In view of the fact that so many Christian communions have recently made clear their policies with reference to social reconstruction: and in view of the fact that the Federal Council of the Churches and the Interchurch World Movement have made public pronouncements regarding their principles and program of action for the churches in the present social unrest, it is our belief that the Association movement, which is an arm of the church, should reaffirm the action of the church by expressing its belief in these social implications of the gospel," etc.

The convention then proceeded to "endorse the social creed of the churches as adopted by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America."

This "creed" is divided into sixteen numbered paragraphs. There are four corollaries to the last one. Through an inadvertence Mr. Cherrington of Denver, who proposed that the Detroit convention adopt the Federal Council's platform, did not submit the four corollary paragraphs to the sixteenth resolution. The convention followed Mr. Cherrington and voted down Mr. Messer, who was leading the stand-pat forces. Mr. Mott, the general secretary of the international committee, Mr. Stone, the leading secretary of the Pacific coast, and others were conspicuous in voting for the resolution.

In correspondence in The Christian Century and in statements in conferences, it is now claimed that by the unconscious omission of the subsidiary clauses to article sixteen, the Young Men's Christian Associations are not on record conclusively. But is this not a petty legal contention? If you omit a corollary from a proposition it does not invalidate the proposition.

These resolutions state positively that the Young Men's Christian Associations of America should stand "for equal rights and justice for all men and in all stations of life." This has large implications, but it is not all. We are authorized to work for the "abolition of child labor," which all Christians, employers or employes, certainly stand for. We are expected to help in the "abridgment and prevention of poverty," which is part and parcel with the industrial question. The great right of all men to work, for opportunity of self-maintenance, and for safeguarding this right against encroachments of an unfair kind, is now a part of our platform and is there a Christian man, no matter what his business or profession, who does not believe in it?

It is held by Mr. Messer that the Association movement should have no opinion which falls into the zone of disagreement in industry, but the convention disagreed with him by adopting the eleventh clause of the resolution which puts the Association, along with the churches of America, squarely behind both labor and capital in the right to organize; namely, "the right of employers and employes alike to organize and for adequate means of conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes." The Association does not act as a union organizer, nor is it to act as an organizer for capital, but it is definitely committed to a recognition of the right of both classes to organize.

What is most needed in the industrial realm is a new state of mind by both parties to controversy. The question should not be, "What can we force through?" but "What is right?" and the Association is so to help "in the line of conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes." Although the Association is for young men, it is no longer unmindful of the aged workers, for our platform states that "suitable provision for the old age of the worker and for those incapacitated by injury should be made."

There is prospect that seven days' work in seven will soon be a thing of the past, because the Christian conscience knows it is wrong. The Association conscience has arisen to the occasion, somewhat late it must be acknowledged, and asks for the "release from employment one day in seven."

Another of the contested points in industry is the hours of labor. As the Association is composed of all types of men it certainly has an opportunity to minister in the right adjustment of the hours of labor, and the fourteenth clause of the resolution urges the "gradual and reasonable reduction of labor to the lowest practical point and for that degree of leisure for all which is a condition of the highest human life." This is not a "radical" deliverance. In it the Association simply comes abreast of Christian practice. It has not led the way, but it shows that it is not willing to follow silent in the rear.

In the zone of disagreement lies the question of wages, and in regard to that the Association, like the Federal Council of Churches, does not propose to take the matter out of the hands of the responsible parties, but it has a conscience and it stands for "a living wage as the minimum in every industry and for the highest wage that each industry can afford." The Christian wishes to view the whole question of property and of the "equitable division of the products of industry" in a constructive way, and so did the Detroit convention in language which is not cryptic. The Association convention at best is not so advanced as the Congregational churches of San Francisco Bay, nor does it go as far as the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church, who have called upon all laymen and ministers "to give most earnest heed to the application of Christian principles to social reconstruction."

The resolutions of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, adopted on June 12, 1919, go farther and are more definite in some particulars than the resolutions of the Federal Council.

The Baptist church has put itself on record in regard to the Christian spirit in industry by public declaration, and any one who studies its "Social Issues" will realize that the Y. M. C. A. has yet far to go in outlining a platform as efficiently as have the Baptists, but it is undeniable that the Association wishes to keep in this good company.

The National Catholic War Council, over the signatures of Bishops Muldoon, Schrembs, Hayes and Russell, is not afraid to call for legislation to mitigate wrongs and to lay down a platform. The Catholics are very explicit.

The Central Conference of American Rabbis is not afraid. Their "Social Justice Program" issued in 1920, states that the question of industrial peace and progress "overshadows all other domestic problems."

The Conference of the Quakers, which met in Philadelphia in 1920, went much farther than the Federal Council. It declared, for example, for "the limitation of the return upon capital." The Friends are not willing to issue a platform merely but believe that they should try to get the platform carried out, and to this end they say: "Let us work for changes in their effect revolutionary, but achieved by consent and without violence; let us apply our principles earnestly and fearlessly to the daily problems of life, individual and national, as they emerge."

The Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian church realizes that in its own work in America it must face the problem of the church in industry and so in May, 1920, this body issued its report as instructed by the General Assembly at St. Louis in May, 1919. The recommendations in this report encourage the churches to "mediation in industrial disputes" and to avail themselves of the opportunity to perform the Christian ministry of reconciliation.

It may be conceded that the so-called industrial department of the Y will not enter the new and difficult field which the churches, the Women's Christian Association and the Men's in their own way and with their own declaration of purpose are entering. That form of industrial work is "geared up" to serve meals, purvey beds, provide helpful recreation, meetings and creature comforts at the joint expense of the company benefited and the employees who pay the fees.

But the essence of the Detroit resolution which may be expressed in the language of the Massachusetts Federation of Churches, that "industry is to be thought of primarily as a service to society, and secondly, for a means of personal and corporate gain," will take hold of others in the Association movement. There are enough Christian laymen in the churches and on the boards of the Christian Associations, there are able executives, here and there, prophets and teachers, who are not content to follow the lead of the reactionaries because they know that where there is no vision the people perish.

The Association is not to be a partisan; is not to advocate en bloc whatever labor may demand, nor is it to be a partner of capital. It can never countenance force by either party as a means of settling industrial disputes. Its mission is to help secure justice and lay a foundation for religion. Manifestly the Federal Council's sixteen points fall within the zone of disagreement at times, between this group of employers and that group of laborers, but it is not to be abandoned for that reason; that is exactly why the sixteen points are necessary and challenging.

The seriousness of this discussion lies in the fact that it is not academic but practical. The conservatives in the Association movement are at this moment busily insisting that if we apply Christ's teaching it will "cause trouble." They are saturating conferences like that held in St. Louis in November last, and publications like the "Association Forum" with the idea that the Detroit platform on the one hand is of little significance, and on the other hand that it should be ignored because it has dangerous implications. And, furthermore, like inquisitors behind closed doors they are now attempting to coerce the progressive men in our brotherhood to "keep still" or to "get out."

The Federal Council's program has no anti-capitalistic plank, no nationalization of public services such as long since have prevailed in France and other conservative lands, no public ownership of utilities, no expropriation, no nationalization of natural resources, no single tax theories, no non-partisan league, no Plumb plan, no socialism, no taint of communism—all the realm of the radicals is taboo to the Federal Council.

The Council's sixteen points are the consensus of demand by religious leaders for elemental justice, shared in by all forward-looking Christians of all groups. How account therefore for the fear of the Y conservatives?

The answer is found in the one word "contributions." If they steer by a positive program, no matter how simple and fundamental, they fear on the one hand that they will run into the "scylla" of bad business, now and then, and will lose their "contributions"; or on the other hand that they will run into the "charybdis" of bad unionism here and there, and will lose other "contributions." So as to offend neither party, it may be asked, would Christ keep still and content himself only by washing dishes with Martha in the kitchen of the world's need? Has the Y something to do in addition to the thrifty management of its institutional operations?

If I read aright the mind of the times, literally tens of thousands of business men and workers of every description are saying to us:

"We are with you body and spirit if you are to mean anything to our industrial civilization, but if you are neither hot nor cold we will spue you out of our mouth."

Cleveland, O.

ROBERT E. LEWIS.

General Secretary Y. M. C. A.

If Not a United Church—What?

By Peter Ainslie

THE first of a series of Handbooks presenting the proposals of a United Christendom. Dr. Ainslie, who has been a pioneer in the cause of unity, has given much thought and labor to attempting a solution of the difficulties which bar the progress of the movement. This volume deals with the necessity, growth and outlook of Christian unity, to which is added a copious appendix. The argument adduced is that if unity be not attained, the church inevitably faces an era of gradually weakening power. Dr. Ainslie writes vigorously, yet without heat or partisanship, and presents a cogent and lucid plea for the cause that must be answered.

Price $1.25 plus 10 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

British Table Talk

The Quiet Scholar and the Popular Leader

London, March 22, 1921.

IN all forecasts of life and thought within the church it is important to remember the scholar. He is often hidden from the public eye; he is little known on platforms, but while ecclesiastical leaders are defending their traditions, slowly but irresistibly scholarship is providing fresh data which must be accepted soon or later by all of them. It is of little use to commandeer the scholar in the interests of a party. He will be like Balaam. In the long result he must speak with the calm voice of science unmoved by the thought of what may follow and caring only for truth. In this country today there must be many who know little of such men as Dr. R. H. Charles, or Dr. Kennett, or Dr. Bartlett, yet these men have been at work upon the story of the beginnings of the church and they and others like them are providing material which cannot be neglected. They are sappers and miners, busy out of sight beneath the forts of folly.

The more popular voices, for example, are busy discussing the ministry and orders of the church. Claims are made for this or that practice that it is apostolic. There is between the defenders of the various schools perpetual clash, and it looks as though there were no possibility of agreement. But the scholars working upon their common material are nearing some conclusions. They are preparing at least for that common history without which there is never likely to be a reunited church. It has been claimed that we shall never reach a true international life till all nations read the same history. Nor can we reach unity in the church till we read the early history of the church, and interpret the New Testament according to the same broad, general principles. That time is not yet come, but it is nearer than "when we first believed."

The discussions upon the Christian doctrine of marriage and its relation to divorce are proceeding with much warmth. Into that debate enter Dr. Charles! He speaks with immense knowledge upon the precise meaning in their historical setting of our Lord's teaching upon this matter. His book can be neglected by the controversialists but only for a time. So into every controversy the scholar enters. If it is the discussion of the holy communion, Dr. Kennett provides an analysis of the narrative in which the institution is recorded and such a scholar must be heard. Much in certain theories of the church rests upon the authority of the pastoral epistles; but if at any moment the scholars were able to show that in the main these represent, not the life in the Pauline churches, but in a later period, that too would be a piece of evidence not to be disregarded. We talk much of our preachers; their fame is in all the churches and they have a noble part in the kingdom of God. We listen to our statesmen. But we often forget the student with whom, on many a controversy, the last word will rest.

* * *

The Passing of Lady Somerset

Nearly thirty years ago in Manchester, I, a little more than a schoolboy, heard two women speakers who seemed then and seem still to touch the heights of eloquent speech, Mrs. Besant and Lady Henry Somerset. Both had been drawn into public life by their private sorrows. They went very different ways—Mrs. Besant to India, Lady Somerset to a more definite high churchmanship. But if I wish for a memory which will give a symbol of noble orators, I think of Mrs. Besant in the Secularist Hall pleading for theosophy, or Lady Somerset speaking on her great passion, the cause of temperance, and closing her address with the promise to the true disciple of Christ that death would be "the lifting of a latch and a step out into the open air." She has now stepped out herself, rich in the love of her friends.

This life was one of the many which recall to us how much the two nations on either side of the Atlantic may help one another. It was Miss Willard whose friendship brought into Lady Somerset's life the conviction that the temperance cause should take into it all that affects the welfare of women and children. The friendship of these two advocates was strong and beautiful and stood the strain of many differences. Lady Somerset has told us of her own religious rebirth. One day, brooding in a garden like St. Augustine, like him she heard a voice: "Act as if I were; and thou shalt know that I am." That proved the clue that she needed. It led her into the strong Anglo-Catholic church. Nor was she the only instance of a union between Catholic principles and temperance advocacy. Cardinal Manning, as we have been reminded lately by his new biographer, was a passionate pleader for the same cause.

* * *

Literary Lights and Teetotalism

It pleases a certain group of Catholic literary men to link together the Faith and Beer, but they are not the only voices to speak for the Catholic church in this matter. They are, however, very gifted poets and they honestly believe that the "big black teetotaler" is the enemy of the faith. I refer to such men as Mr. Belloc and Mr. Theodore Maynard, and, though not in Rome, Mr. G. K. Chesterton. They are fine singers with a rollicking humor and a defiant creed. Here, for example, is a piece from Mr. Belloc:

"Then thank the Lord for the temporal sword
And for howling heretics too;
And for all the good things that Christendom brings
But especially barley-brew."

It is a curious alliance which, however, must not be overlooked. Happily in some ways Mr. Belloc's love of the temporal sword acts as a deterrent to certain waverers who feel the attractions of the Roman church as a school for saints. They love much in Rome, but they cannot stand the temporal sword.

* * *

Unconventional Parsons

There are a number of unconventional parsons abroad in our land, but we could do with more. The new Bishop of St. Alban's causes ripples of resentment among proper people, but the common folk are glad to hear a bishop who is not afraid to use colloquialisms and to give himself away. He has been attacking a practice which no one defends in theory, but no one seems able to abolish—the practice of selling "livings" in the church. "As things are now," he says, "the spiritual care of the souls of men, women and children can be put up for auction and knocked down to the highest bidder." The bishop promises to fight this evil and he will. Within the church and without there will be many who will wish him well. Among the other unconventional preachers with a wide audience stands Mr. Studdert-Kennedy, "Woodbine Willie," whose rhymes and books are eagerly read. And mention should be made of Canon Adderley and the Rev. "Dick" Sheppard of St. Martin's. The canon and he are neighbors, and in a friendly way they had a debate recently upon the methods of St. Martin's. It covered much ground and was not only illuminating but entertaining. Among other charges Mr. Sheppard answered one to the effect that his church was opened all night and was in fact a "doss house." If Turkish baths were open all night why should anyone object to the house of God being open? "You can't have battlefields without a few casualties," he said. "What if the cross or candlesticks should be stolen? We would still go on. No one has any right to speak of a 'doss house.' No person is allowed to sleep there a second night. I thank God poor folk do come in and get the impression that though the clergy are asleep the church still welcomes them. I could give instance after instance of men and women who have literally been saved in this way."

* * *

Dr. Griffith-Jones On Faith

The meetings of the Free Church Council at Manchester are said to have been of living interest. In the discussion of reunion there was no disposition to shirk the great problems raised afresh in recent days by the Lambeth Conference. The task of setting forth the Free Church position was committed to speakers who represented various shades of Free Church opinions on the matter. Dr. Griffith-Jones defended the position that there are two elements in faith, the static and the dynamic, and of these the Free Churches stood for the dynamic. The two, he claimed, were not so much opposed as complementary to each other. The one safeguards the continuity of religion from age to age, and tends towards the conservation of its permanent elements and ever-enriching experience; the other demands freedom for that impulsive, experimental element which wells up periodically from the depths of spirituality in every healthy community, which forms the starting-point of nearly every revival of faith, nearly every reformation in morals. Ideally, it is good to have these two types of religion in every nation: and if religion indeed is to flourish, they must be allowed complete liberty to exist side by side, neither interfering with the complete freedom of the other.

* * *

Revival of Broad Churchmanship

Canon Deane has been pleading for a revival of "broad churchmanship" in its earlier and nobler sense. In the present hour he claims that the churchmen who are called "broad" are really only one more sect, as narrow as others, and often as intolerant. What is needed is not a new party but a new spirit of religious tolerance. It is the destruction of party spirit that is needed. The parties would not be ended, but each would have a new positive value and each would allow for the others. This broad churchmanship which Canon Deane invites must be set forth in every church which follows the Master who set forward as supreme the law of love, and though he speaks first of all of his own church, yet it remains no less true of others, that they need broad churchmen who will be willing to allow others to be narrow and to learn from this very narrowness.

* * *

Disfranchising the King

An amusing corollary of the Enabling Act which was recently passed into law, has been noted. It established councils for the established church with a large measure of self-government; the qualification for voters was considered long and carefully. In the end, among other conditions it was made clear that voters must not be in communion with other churches. Therefore it follows that the King of England is disfranchised, seeing that when he is in Scotland he habitually communicates in the established church of Scotland, which is a Presbyterian church. In this he follows the precedent of the late king, his father, and of Queen Victoria, so it comes to pass that the formal head of the church in England is not entitled to vote in its councils, and therefore, if he attends a council in Sandingham, his own parish, would he be entitled to vote?

* * *

The Education of Adults

Some day we shall hear more of the World Association for Adult Education of which Mr. Albert Mansbridge is chairman. It is one more of the international links of which we cannot have too many. Its council includes an Australian bishop, a French doctor of philosophy, a Chinese worker, a Serbian "don," and men and women from Canada, the United States, Queensland, New Zealand and Britain, and it is under the presidency of Dr. Masaryk, President of the Czecho-Slovak Republic. Its purpose could not be better expressed than in the words of Dr. Zimmern, professor of international policies in Aberystwyth.

"The purpose of the World Association for Adult Education is to dispel the melancholy belief that grown men and women have nothing left to learn, and to diffuse throughout all countries, and in every section of society, the sense of wonder and curiosity, and the gift of mutual sympathy and companionship which add so much to the meaning of life.

"It pursues this purpose of seeking to establish contact between all those, whoever and wherever they be, who hold fast to the belief that the true purpose of education, for young and old, is the understanding and enjoyment of life, and that the uneducated man is not he who cannot read or write or count or spell, but he who walks unseeing and unhappy, unaccompanied and unhappy, through the busy streets and glorious open spaces of life's infinite pilgrimage."

* * *

Statesmen and the Moral Note

Let me give a quotation from Mr. Sheppard whom I have mentioned above: "Why is it that our statesmen at this critical time refuse to sound any sort of spiritual note? It is amazing that no one in high office, with the exception, perhaps, of Lord Robert Cecil, dares to summon us to live more nobly, that our country may be saved from ruin. Is it that the lives of our statesmen are so difficult that they are afraid of being called hypocrites? Or is it that they cannot read the signs of the times? Or are they moral cowards?"

* * *

The World Needs the Easter Hope

The sun of Easter never rose upon a world which needed more its comfort and hope than the world needs it today. The time has fully come; mankind has known the desolation of winter, it is hungry for the spring. It has been in the grip of death; and it waits the signal of resurrection. In the ceaseless struggle between life and death the nations have watched the encroachments of death; it has been theirs to know the power and fear of death, and to hear its "far-ruined wings beat on the lonely night." Now they are eager for a sign that life is mightier than death. Spring is that everlasting sign; spring is the most ancient sacrament of life; and it is spring with its human appeal that lives on, captured and translated and glorified by the hope of Easter. The voice of the spring that has proclaimed in the human heart from its earliest days the victory of life, is become the voice of faith and of love sounding from some near but hidden world of light.

EDWARD SHILLITO.

YALE TALKS

BY CHARLES R. BROWN, LL. D.

ALTHOUGH these "Talks" were delivered at Yale, Harvard and other colleges, they afford a wealth of illustrative material for addresses and sermons to young people, especially to young men. Among the themes are "The True Definition of a Man," "Unconscious Influence," "The Lessons of Failure," "The Men Who Make Excuse," "The Wrongs of Wrong-doing," etc.

Price, $1.35 plus 8 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

CORRESPONDENCE

Regrets Slump in Unity

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As a former chaplain of the A. E. F. in France, I desire to endorse the article by Mr. Voris on "War Time Church Unity and Its Lessons for Today." I often look back to army religious work with regret that the church cannot come up to the spirit of fellowship and real fraternity that was there practiced. And I would venture to go beyond the spirit or rather the letter of the article and, if it would not shock too much the spirit of the standpatter in denominationalism, to say, that the spirit of fraternity went beyond Protestantism to all men of good will.

To illustrate. In my old regiment, the 318th Field Artillery, I had key men, in every unit of the regiment, who would work with me for the general religious life. These were Protestants, Catholics, Jews, and others. No open label but men with character and a cooperative spirit.

By invitation of the village priest, I held a Christmas service in his church at Pothieres Sur Seine. The last service I held in the Y. M. C. A. hut here, I had charge of the service, a Jewish rabbi preached the sermon, the pianist was a non-commissioned officer who was a staunch Roman Catholic, and the soloist and leader of the music was a Christian Scientist. Just why we four men, representing four sides of reality, cannot meet as naturally and as happily as we did in France, is a problem too deep for me—except that the churches are far sighted, and that death decreed by the Creator is a benefit to humanity. The generations come and go, but man goes on, and gains a little. But God is in a hurry and so are we.

Conneaut, Ohio.

CARLYLE SUMMERBELL.

Clergy Fares—A Minister's Opinion of "A Layman's View"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: If Mr. T. F. A. Williams, whose communication you publish in your issue of March 31 is as friendly to the churches and as keen for a square deal as he takes credit to himself for being he will be glad to know that there is another side to the question of half fares for clergymen. The picture he draws of well groomed ministers getting concessions from railroads that have to be supported by full price tickets paid for by washer women with families of half starved kids makes the ministers look more than enough like scabs to be sure. If that were a fair setting of the whole argument ministers ought to repudiate and oppose such bills as the one before the legislature of Nebraska. But I would like Mr. Williams to exercise his wisdom on such a phase of the matter as I have now to decide.

I have just been asked to visit Nebraska to preach at the funeral of a soldier killed in France. I shall ask for this service only my expenses. The amount will be about twenty-five dollars. The family of the deceased can afford this. They could not afford to pay twice that. Is it not reasonable to infer from the fact that the request has been made that I should grant it if I can do so on practicable terms? Is it fair to make out that I am a dead beat for using a half fare in this case? Next week I shall have to attend the district meeting of my denomination. This meeting is necessary to the transaction of the business of the church none of which is done for any man's personal profit or pleasure. The expenses of the delegates are therefore supposed to be borne by the churches represented. The men who give to churches are already disproportionately burdened for the support of religious and charitable enterprises from which others receive the principal benefits. Wherein lies the iniquity of a law that will lighten their burden by halving the expenses of such delegates?

I conclude from the fact that ministers can seldom afford to travel for pleasure and have little occasion to do so for profit that nearly all their use of the half fare is for public services similar to these trips I shall soon make. If Mr. Williams should happen to see me use my clergy fare and put me down as beneath his contempt I shall ascribe that result to his own folly. As a minister I shall care for laymen's opinions only in proportion to the sense and justice they seem to me to embody. If, as he says, he "does not want any preacher who rides around the country" as I shall, "pointing out the better life" to him, so be it.

H. B. ALLEN.

Marengo, Ia.

Several Things—All Good

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: At the meeting of the Federated Church Council in Boston a large number of men of many denominations spoke to me about The Christian Century and always in terms of superlative commendation. I am surprised and delighted to find how many of my fellow ministers in this city and elsewhere take, and what is more, read this paper. As a rule the religious papers are about the dullest and most inane things that cumber the earth! But The Christian Century has broken through and is in vital touch with an actual world. To read the "Century" is a mental stimulus. Moreover it is the handsomest thing printed!

Easter in Pittsburgh was glorious. The day was perfect and all churches were crowded. Holy Week was widely observed. In the East End twenty churches of various denominations held union noon-day and evening services which were largely attended, while on Good Friday, seven of us from seven different denominations took the words of the cross in the three hour service in the leading Episcopalian church. The church was filled all the time. Into our own church we received a large company, making more than one thousand new members welcomed into our fellowship during the present pastorate. All the ministers tell me of growing interest in church affairs and of the incoming tide of spiritual things.

I was deeply interested in a suggestion in your last issue regarding "personal work." The Christian Century could do nothing better than to seek to promote this quiet type of winning people to Christ and the church. The modern minister is sorely tempted to use up his time in committee work, luncheons, campaigns, parish promotion enterprises and technical reading to the exclusion of the actual pastoral work. Even more ministers fail to maintain any sort of "personal work groups" who will make these calls for him. We have three such groups, one consisting of twenty-one deaconesses, another consisting of several men who represent the board and the men's classes, and still another composed of young people.

These three groups reach out and touch many lives. No minister can do all the work that ought to be done but by means of these workers scores can be touched. Strangers at the services, new comers into the community, unattached church members, friends of the congregation and Sunday school scholars are thus kept in contact with the church. Nothing takes the place of the personal appeal. Letters, parish papers, and cards have value but only the sympathetic, tactful approach of some trained and inspired individual can bring results. Pastoral work must not be despised and pastoral helpers must be secured in ever increasing numbers.

JOHN R. EWERS.

East End Church of Disciples, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Survey Reports

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I note in your issue of March 31, Mr. Green's answer to my letter in regard to the Interchurch World Movement rural surveys. I hope, sir, that you will permit me the luxury of observing to you that if Mr. Green has "read and re-read and studied" the Interchurch survey reports he has had a remarkable opportunity that many have craved, inasmuch as no actual survey reports have been published by the Interchurch except the Malden Survey and one rural county survey which was printed at the request and largely at the expense of the local people. Mr. Green is too honorable a gentleman to class as survey reports the preliminary editions of the survey summaries which were frankly labeled preliminary and which simply illustrated methods and gave only such facts as were culled from existing data.

EDMUND DE S. BRUNNER.

Mountain Lake, N. J.

Comments on Dr. Fitch's Article

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: There are three points in regard to which I think Dr. Albert Parker Fitch does not heartily believe in Jesus no matter what the churches believe. These form the prelude to his thesis, first, a setting aside of the "metaphysical Christ"; second, a slur upon "the miraculous Christ," and third, a ban upon the "divine man" or the "sentimental Christ."

These views of Jesus having been relegated to the realm of the unimportant, Dr. Fitch concentrates on the "teachings of Jesus." How do we know anything about the teachings of Jesus? In one way only—from the four gospels. These were written by men who believed thoroughly in the truth of what they wrote; Luke calls them "eye-witnesses" and claims "accurately to write" that we "might know of a certainty."

Now these gospel writers tell most emphatically of a miraculous birth and a no less miraculous resurrection, a series of miraculous healings, three cases of raising the dead, clear claims by Jesus himself to miraculous power and divine sonship, clear faith of the disciples—even Thomas with his "My Lord and my God"—and all inextricably blended with the so-called teachings, which Dr. Fitch proposes to cull out from the gospels as all that is in any way worth while.

This dismembering of the gospel story is most destructive and unjustifiable, for who are we to pick and choose among recorded events which we think are good enough to build a modern church upon? If the disciples with the best of intentions lied about the miracles, about the resurrection, about the claims of the messiahship, why take their word for the teachings? Strange that they should have recorded them correctly and falsified all the rest.

After all the talk about the teachings it was the personality of Jesus, and the absolute confidence of the disciples in his divine mission which set Christianity upon its feet. That personality is still the dynamic force of the church if we will let it be.

How his disciples, all his followers, men and women, yes, and children, loved him! Hear Thomas again, "Let us go also that we may die with him."

Were they willing to die for his sermon on the mount? No, for him! "If I be lifted up," he said, "I will draw all men unto me." Not an abstract ethical teaching—but the power of the cross on the hearts of men. The soul of Christianity is prostrate in adoration of the divine son of God, and although we may and must differ as to the interpretation of difficult passages in his teachings we can all continue loyal to that personality which held the early church true to the death.

The martyrs did not brave the lions because Jesus taught brotherly love and a revolt against ceremonialism, but because they loved him as the only begotten Son of the Father. If we were more devoted ourselves we might be better able to face the lions in the amphitheater of today.

Colorado Springs, Colo.

FONETTA FLANSBURG.

Page's "The Sword or the Cross"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have gone through Kirby Page's book, "The Sword or The Cross," very carefully. It presents two strong challenges: (1) to our own personal faith, and (2) to our confidence in the final outcome of Christ's truth—both are tremendous. His spirit is truly Christian and I have a growing conviction that his message is also.

W. S. LOCKHART.

Youngstown, O.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

"And Was Buried"*

THAT was what happened to him—he was buried. A mule died here last week—"and was buried." The rich man died "and was buried." They planted him in the earth and forgot him while the heirs fought over the estate and only an angel from heaven could stand a chance of reforming the lawless brothers.

A very good way of estimating the value of an action is to study the probable result. It would be great to dive off into that deep blue water—but how would I come to land? It would be grand to eat that mince pie—but how about 2 a. m.? It would be wonderful to speed my car sixty miles an hour—but how about the hospital? It would be delightful to lie in bed until noon, but how about my job? And so it would be great to be rich—but how many rich people have you known who have kept their heads and their hearts? Precious few. Some day we preachers will quit sidestepping the plain teachings of the New Testament and we will tell men to their faces that a camel can go through a needle's eye easier than a rich man can go to heaven.

"How shocking"—some timid brother will say—"Do you really dare to think that?" Well, there it is in black and white—make the most of it. If that is not enough to hold you, read the story of the "Rich Fool," spoken by a philosopher named Jesus and see how far you can sidestep on that and not lose your mental balance. It's fairly plain to the ordinary citizen. And after you have played fast and loose with these texts read our golden text today and see what you can make of that by your clever perversions—"Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." If a rich man's treasure is in his church, then his heart will be safe. If a wealthy woman's money is in charities, then her heart will be alright. But the trouble is that both treasure and heart, both time and talent, both day and night, both intellect and love are absorbed in the making of more money and the care of it. The two outstanding sins of today are greed and self-indulgence.

There is only one way to tell whether your rich man is safe and Christian or not—bring him up on the stand and say, "Kindly tell us your investments." If he says, "Missions, benevolences, colleges, Sunday schools, churches, the care of the poor and afflicted," then you may answer, "Your treasure and your heart are safe and Christian." But if he answers, "Stocks, bonds, lands, buildings, oil-wells, lumber tracts, mills, speculations, mortgages—not as means to a noble end, but as ends in themselves," then you can tell him that the camel's chances are ten to one better than his. And note this, you plebeian with the satisfied smirk on your hypocritical face—note this—this same spirit is just as damnable in the middle-class shopkeeper, wage-earner, farmer, salaried class, as in the rich. You simply have to face these facts—where is your treasure? What are the objectives of your love? The story of your little life is written there. God help us all!

JOHN R. EWERS.

*Lesson for April 24, "Poverty and Wealth." Scripture, Isa. 5:8-10; Amos 8:4-7; Luke 16:19-25.

Red-Blooded

That describes our publication prepared for adult and young people's classes studying the international uniform lessons—

The 20th Century Quarterly

This Quarterly is undenominational. John R. Ewers' talk on the lesson (see adjoining column) is a big feature of the Quarterly.

Send for free sample copy

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St.

Chicago

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Senator Finds Bible Good Reading

Former Senator Beveridge of Indiana speaking on Y. M. C. A. platforms in different parts of the country on "The Bible as Good Reading." He tells a personal experience that never fails to interest his audience. "When a boy of fourteen I went 'logging,' There was literally nothing to read, except a Bible which I found in my packet. This did not attract me; rather it repelled me. We did what was at that time called 'Bible readings' in our house, and these readings were done with such solemnity, such meticulous severity, and there was about those exercises such an atmosphere of gloom that I could not imagine anything more depressing than to read what I had so often heard under such uninspiring circumstances. However, it was either the Bible or nothing; so finally one night I opened the book and began to read. I was astounded; for here was no dullness, no preachments, no scourging, no rod of punishment. Instead, here were the most entrancing and thoroughly human pages that I ever had read. American history had been my chief delight up to that time—the real history of our country, and not the denatured, colorless and misleading stuff that is now passed up to us. But I found the Bible history stories more captivating even than the absorbing narrative of the heroic deeds of the men who founded our republic."

Presbytery Favors Federation

There is a federation movement in Ohio at a very advanced state of development. The secular papers reported recently that the presbytery of St. Clairsville had planned some new mission points at which there would be fresh overlapping of territory. The presbytery disclaims any such intention. Within the borders of the presbytery are six points where church combinations have been formed with the approval of the presbytery.

Largest Book Sale in History

Aside from the Bible, no religious book has ever sold so widely as has Charles M. Sheldon's "In His Steps." Up to the present time twenty-two million copies have been disposed of. The simple idea of trying to do as Jesus would do has entered deeply into the life of the modern world. It is now twenty-five years since the book was first published. With new problems confronting the world, Dr. Sheldon is announcing a new book called "In His Steps Today."

Dr. Meyer Will Revisit America

Dr. F. B. Meyer will visit America again this summer. He has not been here since before the war. He will speak two Sundays in Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York. He is also booked for a series of addresses at Ocean Grove, N. J., and at Grove City, Pa. Dr. Meyer sounds the mystical note in his preaching and his visits to America have always been the occasion of wide interest.

Preachers at the University of Chicago

The first university preacher for the spring quarter at the University of Chicago was Dean William Wallace Fenn, of the Harvard Divinity School, who spoke on April 3 and 10. April 17 will be Settlement Sunday, when Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, of Detroit, Michigan, will give the address. Dr. Hough will also preach on April 24. Professor Harry Emerson Fosdick, of Union Theological Seminary, New York, will be the first preacher in May, and will be followed in the same month by Dean Charles R. Brown, of the Yale School of Religion; Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin, of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York; and Rev. Frederick W. Perkins, of the First Church, Lynn, Massachusetts. Dr. John Kelman, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City, will be the first preacher in June, and June 12 will be Convocation Sunday.

Church of Generous Spirit Succeeds

A widespread impression among church people is that the successes in local church administration go to the man of narrow spirit. There are indeed congregations which in spite of narrowness of outlook have gone forward by high pressure methods. Many of these have also come to a speedy decline. East End Christian Church of Pittsburgh, where Rev. John Ray Ewers is pastor, is one that has been interested in every forward step. Social justice, Christian Union, and modern biblical teaching have all been favored. Already a thousand new members have been received during the pastorate of Mr. Ewers. On Easter Sunday many people were turned away after every available corner in the church was utilized.

Abraham Lincoln Center Becomes Busy

Under recent management the Abraham Lincoln Center of Chicago, which through the years has been more or less identified in public thought with the Unitarian denomination, has been opened up to all the churches of the neighborhood. Nearby churches use the gymnasium for their classes, and in this way the churches have not had to provide separate equipment for each denomination.

City Temple Loses Valuable Worker

Mr. Albert Dawson, one of the British correspondents of The Christian Century, recently resigned the honorary secretaryship of the City Temple, London. His resignation revived many memories of service in the past. A reception was given him at the City Temple, and his coworkers presented him a check with which to purchase something as a memento of the occasion. In the course of the evening Mr. Dawson's service as editor of the Christian Commonwealth was commemorated.

It was largely through his efforts that the sermons of Dr. R. J. Campbell were given to the Christian world. He shared in the credit of bringing Dr. Joseph Fort Newton from Cedar Rapids, Ia., to the City Temple, and with Dr. Newton deserves honor for discovering Miss Maude Royden, now the most noted woman preacher of Great Britain.

Sanitarium for the Tubercular

Since it is now well known that most cases of tuberculosis are curable, many organizations are building sanitariums for the scientific treatment of the disease. The fraternal orders have led the way, the Modern Woodmen having a great institution near Colorado Springs. The Baptists are now projecting a million dollar institution which will be located near El Paso, Tex. It is said that seven mountain ranges will be visible from the proposed site. The nationally organized funds of the denomination are making some big advance steps possible.

One Muskrat per Member the Slogan

In different parts of the world Christian people use various kinds of currency with which to pay their church dues. In Africa brass rods are used. The most unique currency is that used in Alaska. The natives in Stephen's Village gave this past year one muskrat per member for the support of the mission. At the prevailing price of fur this was generous giving. They also gave one fish per member to help the missionary on his journey. The fish were donated as dog food.

Adventists Lose Their Strongest Evangelist

The Advent Christian church believes in the near return of our Lord, but is not committed to the observance of Saturday as a holy day. One of their strongest evangelists has been Rev. George W. Sederquist, who was an evangelist and a gospel song writer. He has traveled from coast to coast during his life time. He held pastorates at Lynn, Mass., and also at Boston, Salem, Springfield and Haverhill. He liked best, however, the speaking in the great summer assemblies of his denomination. Mr. Sederquist died recently at the advanced age of eighty-two.

Work of Eddy in Egypt

The work of Sherwood Eddy among the students of the world is one of the interesting phenomena of the times. He has been able to meet students anywhere and hold their attention. His recent ministry in Egypt was particularly blessed. From Cairo the evangelist went to Tanta, perhaps the most fanatical Moslem city in Egypt. The local committee scarcely knew what to expect; but there was an orderly gathering of more than 1,300 men and women for three nights in the Municipal theater, and the gospel was preached with plainness and power, and heard attentively. At Assiut the largest meetings and in some ways most important were held, with six to seven thousand people out four nights in succession to hear Mr. Eddy. After one of the general meetings an opportunity was given for Moslems to remain and discuss some of the burning questions that come forward when the gospel is preached to them, and over 200 remained. This was little less than marvelous to those who know missions to Mohammedans. Dr. Phillips makes it clear that throughout the meetings Mr. Eddy was at his best, and exerted a profound influence that will be of large blessing to all the missionary interests.

Dr. John R. Mott Will Not Retire

Persistent rumors have been going about to the effect that Dr. John R. Mott would retire from the leadership of the International Y. M. C. A. These reports are now being declared erroneous. Dr. Mott is much stronger in health and it is thought that he will return in a few weeks much improved after a protracted vacation. During the war and during the days of the Interchurch World Movement he carried very heavy burdens.

Imitation "Y" in India Fails

The work of the Y. M. C. A. is hard to duplicate without the Christian motive power which keeps it going. In India non-Christian organizations trying to work along the lines of the Association have been tried and have failed. The student work of the Association is unique in the world. A prominent Mohammedan of Calcutta has recently besought the Y. M. C. A. to open a hostel for students in that city. Through the student work the skepticism of youth is tempered with faith and the immoral tendencies that develop in the unnatural atmosphere of the schools are restrained by the teaching of the ethics of Jesus Christ.

Dr. Sheldon on a Preaching Mission

Since the announcement that Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, editor-in-chief of the Christian Herald, would devote much of his time the coming year to preaching missions, many communities have sought his aid. He was in Marietta, O., recently. He spoke on Sunday evening to the combined congregations of the city. Monday morning he conducted a conference of church workers and ministers. He held a healing mission in the afternoon, distinctly affirming the value of material remedies, but also asserting the place of prayer and communion in the healing of the body. At the healing mission a great many people were present, mostly the chronic invalids of the city. He also addressed the college students of the city on "The Meaning of an Education."

W. C. T. U. and Blue Law Hoax

The "Blue Law" hoax is still being kept alive by newspapers that were among the wettest of the wet in the old days of beer and pretzels. The Chicago Tribune has been printing from week to week new allegations against the national organization of the W. C. T. U., with headquarters at Evanston. Although it costs only ten cents to telephone from the Tribune headquarters to the officers of the white ribbon women, the newspaper has continued to print stories that are persistently denied by the women. The W. C. T. U. is being falsely represented as wishing to introduce legislation curbing the adult use of tobacco and of bringing in the mythical thing called "the Blue Sunday." So far the protests of the women have produced no change in the editorial offices of the Tribune. The Chicago Post, an evening paper, with a Christian editor, says: "There is a great deal of nonsense being talked about 'blue law' drives, and most of it comes from persons

Evanston Plan Runs Into Snags

THE socalled "Evanston Plan" of religious education as worked out in Evanston, Ill., has run into a lot of snags. The Board of Religious Education a year and a half ago rented the school buildings for the mornings at a nominal rental. Paid teachers were provided to give a half hour of religious instruction. Dr. Frank McKibben was brought on from Boston to be the director of the plan. The churches have experimented for two years, and are now seriously considering a complete change in the plan.

In the first place the secular board of education has persistently refused to allow any time for religious education during the school hours. They have sometimes taken the position that this was illegal, though legal opinions have been obtained to the contrary. Perhaps sectarian influence was at work in the development of their attitude, or the fear of doing something unusual. The parents of the children disliked lengthening out the day for the school child, and particularly disliked getting a child ready for school at eight o'clock in the morning. During the past term only 615 children took the work in a city of 45,000. A new term is just beginning with 800.

Great difficulties have been encountered also in the financing. At first it was proposed that the enterprise should be financed quite independently of the church by a call to the citizens. The Board of Religious Education was drawn from the different churches but did not represent them officially. Religious education was to be a community enterprise rather than a church enterprise. It was not a great while until a considerable deficit was accumulated. Then the pastors were asked for aid in liquidating this deficit. They in turn demanded a voice in making the budget that they were expected to raise. At the present time the finances for the movement are being raised by the churches, but the complete reorganization of the Board of Religious Education to make it a completely representative body has never been fully accomplished. Money has been raised in much larger sums this year, but there is still grave difficulty in providing enough for the overhead costs which are much more than the cost of the teaching.

The Monday night school in the high school building has been conducted for two years and it also has had a declining attendance. Organized for the purpose of training teachers for the local Sunday schools it was quite popular the first year, but less so this year. Here also the financial ghost has walked. Some instructors are drawing fifteen dollars an evening for their lectures. The salaries of the staff of instructors run therefore into a considerable sum.

The "Evanston Plan" was imported into Evanston by a group of brilliant teachers who came to Northwestern University from Boston in connection with the Centenary Fund of the Methodist church. Among these were Dr. Betts, Dr. Richardson and Dr. Stout. Their ideas in the field of religious education have been admittedly revolutionary, and experimental in character. They have pioneered the way with some new methods, and have thus contributed to the solution of a most difficult problem. It seems likely, however, that before the "Evanston Plan" can become permanently successful, it will have to operate on a more modest budget, and submit to a democratic control on the part of the churches. The churches are not any more likely to commit their children to a "community organization" for their religious education than they are to permit the public school itself to do the teaching.

Meanwhile in every city of the nation the results of divorcing religion and education are becoming increasingly apparent. Any educational program which ignores the ethical and religious foundations in the life process is certain to lead the young astray. Whether it is the "Gary Plan" or the "Evanston Plan" or some other plan yet unborn, there is a profound conviction in the church that the task of building up a Christian character will require much more than a half hour a week, and that it must command a much more significant financial support than the pennies of the children.

Mid-Summer Conference for Ministers

Union Theological Seminary
New York City
July 18-29 Inclusive

Professors W. A. Brown, Coffin, Fleming, Lyman of Union, also Professor Bacon of Yale, and others will take part.

For further information address
Dr. Charles R. Gillett, Registrar,
Broadway and 120th St.

who, either as dispensers or consumers, have suffered loss of profit or indulgence because of the eighteenth amendment. It is part of an effort to provoke a reaction against prohibition. The effort will fail. The American people are not as silly as these bogey-makers think them."

Big Peace Meeting Will Be Held in Chicago

The World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches will hold the annual session in Chicago May 17-19, this year, and the Chicago Church Federation will be host to the meeting. Dr. Henry A. Atkinson is the secretary of the organization. The following men of national reputation will be among the speakers at the afternoon and evening sessions: Hon. Wm. Jennings Bryan, Mr. Edward A. Filene, Mr. John Spargo, Dr. Charles Aked, Dr. Arthur J. Brown, Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, and Bishop McConnell.

Roman Catholic Demands Better Pictures

The traditional line of demarkation between Catholics and Protestants was wiped out recently in a big meeting at the Massachusetts state house. Religious people of various communions were petitioning for a regulation of moving picture houses. A priest in making the address said: "Every great art and invention is begotten for a worthy purpose, but sooner or later certain perverted men, who prefer what is profitable to what is proper, debase the art or invention and prey upon the weakness of human nature to its undoing. Then arises the need for the restraining power of the state. The need of such restraint is an acknowledgment of human weakness, but the time has come when we must invoke the power of the state to save our youth."

Disciples of Illinois Out After Two Million

The centennial of the planting of the first Disciples church in Illinois is to be celebrated by the raising of a fund of two million dollars. This enterprise is headed up by Rev. Harry H. Peters, who some years ago saved Eureka College from bankruptcy by his vigorous methods in the securing of funds. The two million dollars will be divided between three interests. Forty per cent will go to Eureka College, forty per cent to the Illinois Disciples Foundation for the carrying on of religious work at the state university, and the remaining twenty per cent will go to the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, the society of which Mr. Peters is secretary. The two million dollars will be raised by individual gifts entirely. Two field workers are busy now and others will be enlisted. In connection with the movement is an effort to found the Knox P. Taylor Bible Chair at Eureka in honor of a popular teacher of the Bible who once exercised a great ministry among the Illinois churches. It is said that Eureka College is in immediate need of funds to meet a rapidly increasing deficit.

Inman on Mexico and Latin America

DR. SAMUEL G. INMAN, secretary of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, on the eve of his departure for a visit to Latin American countries, spoke recently in the Broadway Tabernacle Forum of New York on the relation of the United States with the Latin nations to the south. Mr. Inman said: "For the last several years the United States has had a force of 1500 marines in Haiti, a like number in Santo Domingo and 100 in Nicaragua. In Santo Domingo we took over the government completely four years ago, and since then the marines have been the only government. Whether or not the seizing of that government was justified, the American people will not be content permanently to hold another nation's sovereignty and permanently to rule that country by martial law. The relations with these small Caribbean countries that have been cursed with revolutions for 100 years form a serious problem. But it is a problem not for some minor official at Washington to solve, but rather one for the American people to study and about which to reach just and wise conclusions."

Referring to Colombia, Dr. Inman said: "We can never stand right in the eyes of Colombia and the rest of Latin America until we have done all that we can do to compensate Colombia for the loss of Panama." Then, turning to the subject of Mexico, he continued:

"The one thing that would wipe out all the advantages of the present wonderful opportunity for inter-American friendship is the very thing that started all of Latin America's suspicion of us in the first place—war with Mexico.

"We ought clearly to recognize that Mexico is a part of that great Latin family and her sisters have a deep sympathy for her. They do not hold any false ideas as to her perfection or fail to recognize the justice of the claims of the United States for just treatment of her citizens and her interests. Their impartial work in the A. B. C. mediation between Mexico and the United States in 1913 proves that. But they do believe that the greatest nation in the world, the nation that holds two-thirds of the wealth of the world and that claims to have gone further than any other nation in the development of democracy and to have fought a war for the weak peoples of the world, ought to be able to find some other way of getting along with its next-door neighbor, poor little weak, revolution-tossed, exhausted, starving Mexico, than by shooting it into submission to our imperial will. And rightly or wrongly no pious phrasing of our benevolent purposes and our interest in Mexico's welfare by our national congress as we send our armies to Mexico would ever convince Latin America that armed intervention was not for the purpose of making more sure our economic exploitation of that unhappy land.

"Intervention is a short sighted commercial policy and it is necessary for the best elements in the country eternally to stand against it."

When You Go To the National Capital

You are invited to attend the

Vermont Avenue Christian Church

Earle Wilfley, Pastor; Earl Taggart, Assistant

A young woman leaving Washington wrote:

"The beautiful, spiritual and inspirational services of the Sunday hours of worship in the Vermont Avenue Christian Church will always remain to me among the most precious memories of my eighteen months of service in Washington. I feel that many young people are returning to their distant homes with grateful hearts for the kindly, Christian spirit of welcome and fellowship we received in your church during the time we were trying to do our 'bit' for our country."

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

Brooklyn RIDGEWOOD CHURCH
OF CHRIST
Forest Ave. & Linden St.
KIRBY PAGE,
W. A. R. McPHERSON,
Pastors.

Fruit Trees, Grapes, Roses
Everything for Farm and Garden Delivered. Reduced Prices.
3 Best Gladiolas 25 Cents
Dozen 75 Cents Hundred $4.00
Named varieties, all colors. Full directions for planting. Bloom in doors or out doors, fragrant and beautiful.
Novelty Floral Co. Newburgh, N. Y.

Bible Readers and Christian Workers Self-Help Hand Book

Short and plain articles by nearly 100 experienced Christian writers. Just the Help over hard places you have been looking for. How to lead, teach, testify, pray and grow. Young Christians' helper, experienced workers' guide. Pkt. size, 128 pgs., Red Cloth, 25c, Mor. 35c, postpd. Agts. w'd. GEO. V. NOBLE, Monon Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Unusually fine stationery for club, social or professional correspondence at an exceptionally low price. 150 sheets high quality note paper and 100 envelopes printed with your name and address, $1.50. Write for samples.
LEWIS, 25 Hudson Ave., Troy, N. Y.

CROUP OR WHOOPIING COUGH

PROMPTLY AND SAFELY RELIEVED BY
ROCHE'S HERBAL EMBROCATION
ALSO IN
BRONCHITIS, LUMBAGO, RHEUMATISM

W. EDWARDS & SON ALL DRUGGISTS OR
LONDON, ENGLAND. E. FOUGERA & CO.
90-92 BEEKMAN ST. N.Y.C.

Prof. HARRY F. WARD asks:

What is to be the Christian teaching concerning war? Is it going to declare judgment on the basis of the principles set forth in the gospels or will it be only the expedient servant of nationalism and continue to exhort its followers to internecine slaughter?

Is the American pulpit going to continue denouncing war in general and supporting wars in particular?

Kirby Page, in his new book,

THE SWORD OR THE CROSS

endeavors to meet these questions frankly and fairly. From his extended experience as an associate of Mr. Sherwood Eddy in his religious campaigns in Europe and around the world, Mr. Page is led to believe that the present attitude of so-called religious nations is driving the world on to certain war. But he still has hope that the church will awake in time to save the world from a repetition of the great debacle of 1914.

OPINIONS OF THE BOOK:

Harry Emerson Fosdick, Union Theological Seminary:

Let me congratulate you upon a very sincere and impressive piece of work. As you know, I do not completely agree with all your conclusions but your presentation of your point of view seems to me the best statement which I have yet read of it. Even though my method of attack on war may not be identical with yours, I am so sure that the presence of war is the greatest standing challenge to Christianity, that I sincerely trust that your book may have a wide circulation and an earnest reading.

The Presbyterian Advance, Nashville:

In six clear, strong, concise chapters the author presents a terrible condemnation of war and a strong argument for its complete abandonment by those who would act fully in accordance with the mind and spirit of Jesus. In fact, we are dared to act upon the very obvious teachings of the Master and to risk all in the determination to be true idealists, as he was. With the war spirit still upon us and our familiarity with the excuses which are given for war, the author will be deemed a most pronounced pacifist, and so he is, because he understands that nothing less is demanded of the follower of Christ. Even many who are fully satisfied that war is sometimes justifiable would do well to read this straightforward little book and get the other point of view, for it reveals a kind of heroism in the pacifist which is sometimes mistaken for cowardice.

Price of the book, $1.20 plus 8 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

Reginald J. Campbell

By Joseph Fort Newton

Is Tithing Christian?

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

Japan's Place in the World

By George Gleason

Four Great Books for Thinking People

Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City, on being asked what are the outstanding books of the day for alert churchmen and churchwomen, submits four titles. He considers these essential books:

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1860. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 So. Dearborn St., Chicago

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, APRIL 21, 1921

Number 16

EDITORIAL STAFF: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR; HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR
THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS, JESSIE BROWN POUNDS

*Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879.
Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918.
Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago*

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra.
Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

A Death-blow to Sacerdotalism

ALL of the negotiations on Christian unity get back in the end to a definition of the church and a theory about its faith, its ordinances and its ministry. The pope showed intellectual acumen when he said that he would be generous in all else if the Christian world would unite on a correct view of the government of the church—which in his view was a recognition of the papacy. The high-church Episcopalian asserts continually, "Where the bishop is, there is the church." He is met by the free churchman's dictum, "Where Christ is, there is the church." Dr. Headlam of England has done the Christian world a great service in presenting his epoch-making lectures in book form under the title, "The Doctrine of the Church and Christian Union." He makes short shrift of the idea of a papacy finding its origin with Peter, showing how often Peter was made subordinate to others in his church relationships. Short shrift is given to the theory that bishops have anything that can properly be called apostolic succession. He says they were originally presbyters and pastors, having none of the modern episcopal functions. His reason for being an Episcopalian is quite other than those that have usually been advanced. The Episcopal order has in his judgment worked. By the pragmatic test he comes to appreciate and approve a government in the church which has had wide prevalence throughout all the centuries except the first. His spirit in dealing with the problem of the church is well expressed in this paragraph. "We want no antiquarianism. We do not want to transport into the twentieth century the form of the first. We want to learn its principles, and be inspired by its spirit. We want to be able to transform our inherited organization to meet the needs of the day, as it created new forms, and we want to exhibit the same boldness and statesmanship in the face of the problems of a divided Christianity which the church of the apostles displayed on the great question of the place and the duties of Gentiles. We want life and courage."

The Sin of Having Dirty Churches

THE survey of church and religious conditions in Malden, Mass., carried out under the direction of Professor Athearn, is a most valuable contribution. Millions of dollars have recently been raised for new church buildings and it is important that this money should be wisely spent. In the survey of the Malden churches, both the strong and weak points of the various buildings are impartially noted. One of the most shocking facts discovered is the state of filth and disorder into which some church buildings had fallen. There were basements that were fire traps, and store rooms that were in utter disorder. Anyone acquainted with church buildings over the United States knows that they are seldom as neat as people's homes. It takes money and work to keep them that way, and only the occasional congregation has interest enough to do it. A dirty church building tells the same kind of story that a dirty house tells. Those who live in it do not care enough for what it represents to be sensitive to maintain the decencies. The grounds outside the church are often in a state of disorder. When everybody in town mows his lawn except the church janitor, it is evident that the church property will tell an unfavorable story to every passer-by. How many churches have plants and shrubbery on the grounds? They are even more appreciated on the church grounds than they are on private property. Yet it is hardly one church in a hundred that makes the church lawn as beautiful as the prevailing standard for the community. It may seem to some that the dirt in the choir loft bears no relation to piety, and that the weeds on the church lawn have no relation to the indifference of the community, but this is to miss the fact that life has its roots in the physical. It is true for the church as for the home that "cleanliness is next to godliness."

Two Types of the Community Church

CONSTANT witness is borne to the many forms which the community church plan is taking in different parts of the country. Many of the critics of such organizations appear to labor under the impression that the only method of procedure is that adopted in a particular locality, in which they have found something to criticise. A wider survey of facts might afford a corrective of such unfriendly impressions. For example, two widely separate forms of community church have come under observation within the week. One was in a city of commanding size and vigorous commercial life. A church belonging to one of the evangelical denominations, and still bearing its former distinctive name, has become to all intents a community church. It has waived all but its most fundamental requirements for church membership, has widened its sympathies and thereby its fellowship, and is ministering to the entire city. At a church gathering of a social character a thousand people were seated at dinner, all but a handful of whom were members of the church. Its roll includes accessions from practically all of the denominations, without doctrinal discrimination. For four years it has been deprived of a church home and compelled to worship in a theatre, yet no element of its church life has suffered, and it is an aggressive force for righteousness in the city. The other instance is that of a suburban church, in a little community of a few hundred people. The church building is small and exquisite in form and feeling. The service is rich, and the entire community finds itself happy in its church home. In both these instances the wider ministries of missions and other benevolences are performed through denominational channels. But the churches are providing the communities with just the sort of free and yet urgent Christian ministry that the times increasingly demand.

Wells is Read by Churchmen

IN spite of its price, Wells' "Outline of History" is one of the big sellers this year in religious circles. His book is bought by his critics quite as eagerly as by his friends, for all realize that here is a work which cannot be laughed out of court. Though every expert praises Wells as an authority in some other field than his own, yet all realize that here is one of the most ambitious literary enterprises of the age. If Wells has not succeeded in working out a philosophy of universal history, he has at least set the world thinking about the problem. Without doubt others may essay the same task, but with a different point of view. The Unitarian reviewers are delighted, because they find the view of a purely human Jesus set forth by Wells. This is sufficient to blind them in large measure to other defects. Catholic reviewers are of course harsh in their treatment of the ambitious journalist, the Catholic World asserting that Wells has never known the meaning of the great Christian truths. In between these two extremes are those of more discriminating judgment who are quite aware of the technical defects of the work, and also of some of its deeper fallacies, but who also know the merits of seeing human life in this big perspective. Wells undertakes to simplify the religion of all people to a few fundamentals. It is this desire to force simplification upon the facts which has brought him to grief. It is only by the sorry process of putting the various religions on the Procrustean bed that they can be made to look so much alike. Not all religions have had a god. Not all religions have even been significant builders of social spirit. The diverse needs of human life, and the varied conditions of society have brought into existence so many systems called religion that this word now seems to be incapable of definition.

Are the Churches Cold?

THE most frequently expressed conviction about the churches is that they are cold. Every now and then some enterprising reporter goes about to test the degree of this frigidity. Since the story sells better which agrees with popular prejudice, he usually finds evidence of coldness in the churches and makes these the substance of the report. The thing a man looks for he usually finds. Unfortunately there are cold churches. Some of these have deliberately built up this atmosphere as being conducive to spirituality. To speak to one's neighbor before the front steps are reached would be a violation of the proprieties. The opposite kind of church is noisy and garrulous after the service. This kind of church is not necessarily friendly. It may have hostile cliques within it. Often groups of old friends neglect the stranger. The real test of the friendliness of a church is what it will do for anyone who needs help. The church that will feed the hungry, find employment for the idle and aid the sick is a church that possesses the friendly spirit. Some churches know how to organize this friendliness so that it misses no opportunity. Other churches do not have any regular way by which the people in need find a friend. Very often people wish to find in the church no particular form of relief, but just friends. Young people are lonesome in the city wilderness of folks. They are grateful to go where they will be met with a smile and a cheery word. The church that can develop this sense of camaraderie and good will has one of the secrets of success. Christ called his disciples friends. The good old word has every day new depths of meaning. When the people seek for the friendly church they are just looking for the church with the Christ-like spirit.

Ministerial Jocularities

TRADITION has it that ministers are long-faced and very serious. Those who know ministers well realize that in their effort to escape this reputation they have in many cases gone to an opposite extreme. Probably no proprofession in the world can tell the humorous story better than the ministry. Hunting parties and tourist groups gladly include a man of the cloth for his contribution of good cheer to the party. Banquets and dinner occasions are usually adorned by the wit of the minister. This cultivated gift of humor often becomes a peril. Many an installation service has been quite spoiled by attempts at facetiousness which prevented anyone saying the serious word that ought to be spoken on such an occasion. The popular evangelists are good examples of the danger that inheres in a reputation for humor. They have a way of mixing the humorous and the sacred in a single discourse until they quite break down the thing most fundamental to religion, reverence. Perhaps there is a place in the pulpit for humor. One finds humor in the Bible at times, if one is in the mood to discern it. The story of Jonah and the gourd which sheltered his head seems to lie in this field. Humor as a weapon against sin is one of the most powerful of weapons. When Spain began laughing at chivalry it was dead. Cervantes slew it with "Don Quixote." In the same manner when laughter is enlisted against the foibles and irrelevancies of religious people it is a sign that such things are soon to be given up. But when one hears ministers on state occasions making unseemly jokes about the ordinances and the sacred things of the churches, one feels that here humor has become harmful. Ministers with happy hearts who can adorn our festive occasions will ever be popular. But the minister who is on every occasion a joke-smith will not be sought out by those who carry the heavy burdens, and who are seeking spiritual counsel.

The Y. M. C. A. at the Pacific Cross Roads

THE work of the Y. M. C. A. in Hawaii is largely in the hands of young men from the University of Missouri and the Disciples Bible College in affiliation with the university. Mr. Paul Super went from that educational center several years ago to lay a Y foundation in Honolulu, and there have followed him for places on his staff a group of as fine Christian men as any church school could boast of educating for service. Mr. Lloyd Killam has perhaps made the most striking contribution to this work by leading in the erection and management of a Y at the cross roads of the races. Many Y leaders thought it impracticable to try to unite the various Oriental races in one organization, but Mr. Killam lived by faith and at last won support for his experiment. Nuuanu Y. M. C. A. in Honolulu is the result. There travelers see Koreans, Japanese and Chinese mixing freely at play and study, in sociability and friendly discussion, notwithstanding the strife between their compatriots elsewhere. The assumption underlying the work is that individuals can be friends over and above all racial, national or class differences, and that in friendship and toleration will be found the solution of even the most difficult problems. Hawaiians, Filipinos and Americans also gather here. Each group in its own clubs and all together are taught to be good Americans. Premier Hara of Japan pleads for an effort to reach a spiritual understanding between east and west so that we may mend the breaches of war and build a new world in amity and peace. The Y. M. C. A. is doing much to help in this by bringing together as friends the young men who will have so much to do with the future policies of the various oriental lands. What they are doing in Honolulu they are also doing in many oriental ports and capitals. The Nuuanu Y perhaps has the most distinguished roster of speakers of any association in the world, for the eminent men of all nations who pass this cross station of the Pacific come to see their work and gladly address their cosmopolitan membership.

A Church Building That is an Inspiration

ONE of the arguments of the promoters of the Disciples Congress which will be held in Springfield, Ill., the second week in May is unique. It is pointed out that hundreds of Disciples ministers are about to undertake church building enterprises. They need a model in church architecture, and First Christian Church in Springfield is it. There is much truth in the contention. The building is pure Gothic, but unlike so many Gothic structures, it has been made exceedingly practical for present-day church needs. The congregation holds to the free church ideals of religion, but there is something very like the Episcopal altar with the communion table at the center and the pulpit on one side. Back of the communion table is the baptismal font. In the basement below the chief structure are a gymnasium and entertainment auditorium. The parish house is to the rear with its equipment for religious education. The pastor has an up-to-date office with all of the aids of the modern executive. He also has a study where he may retire at times from the importunities of a public that leaves the popular preacher little enough opportunity for his own culture. It is probably correct to say that any Disciples minister will be repaid for his trip to Springfield, if he gets no more from the Congress than a fair example of how the ancient and the modern may blend into an ideal house of worship which preaches every day from its classic walls and tower the gospel of God. It is by examination and criticism of existing buildings, rather than by the slavish following of drawings and blue prints from the hands of an architect that the churches are to be led into right ideals of architecture. The sanctuary that looks like a fire station must make way for a true house of God. Protestant barrenness has at last become a standard of ugliness, and an ugly thing is always at a disadvantage when it comes to praising God. The swing of the pendulum is due. The people who pay for the church buildings of the next decade will demand that beauty and utility be made harmonious.

The Philippine Commission

LAST week there departed from the United States a little group of men whose leader is Gen. Leonard Wood, to make a careful study of the situation in the Philippine Islands, and report to the government on the question of their independence. From the day of their entrance into the protecting care of the United States from the control of Spain there has been the tacit assumption that as soon as they were ready for self-government they should be permitted to make the experiment. Many of their people are of the opinion that such a time has come. There is of course a body of sentiment in the United States, chiefly commercial, that the islands should remain under permanent supervision of this government. But the twenty millions of dollars we originally paid for them, and the other millions we have poured into their improvement, to say nothing of the teachers and other helpers we have sent them, have had the implication of ultimate independence. It is now ours to determine whether they have reached the state of education and self-control essential to democracy. There could be no better commissioner than General Wood. We may expect a painstaking and discriminating report. Then if the verdict is favorable, we should be prepared to assist the Philippines to erect the sort of government that will best meet the needs of their varied races and communities. That is consistent with the spirit of America, and with our professions of friendship for all our neighbors.

The Ripening of Faith

LIFE tries faith, tests it, and discovers what is real, workable, and dependable. Perhaps, in our emphasis upon faith as a guide to life, we have not enough considered life as a purifier of faith, and how an accepted faith may be modified by the wisdom which comes with the years. There is a faith of expectancy, and there is a faith of experience. As we make our way through the years, only those truths which stand the practical, ethical test of experience are of value. Age does have its understanding; it begins to know what things are trustworthy, and what things are sure to disappoint. Life simplifies faith, leaving things inconsequential behind. Toward the end a man ought to believe more than ever before, not more things, but a few extremely simple and profound things more deeply, more hopefully. Youth is for faith, age for trust.

Such reflections are suggested by a notable book by Dr. Lyman Abbott, entitled "What Christianity Means To Me," begun on his eighty-fifth birthday, and happily brought to a triumphant conclusion. It is a gracious, wise and noble book, in all ways characteristic of a teacher whose influence has been due equally to clarity of insight and lucidity of style. It is a spiritual autobiography, a kind of last will and testament of faith, as confirmed and unfolded by a long and fruitful Christian experience; and as such it deserves an unusual attention. What men learn by living, what the years have taught as it reveals itself in the interpretative meditations of age, must command both our pondering and our gratitude. Truth is always precious, but never more lovely than when it has upon it the gentle light of the on-coming evening and the star-crowned night.

In telling how the book came to be written, Dr. Abbott recalls the New England home in which he was brought up, and the New England theology taught in those days. With slight differences of setting and statement the picture, in all its essentials, is familiar to many who are much younger than the venerable author. When the boy began to be troubled by questionings and misgivings, he could get no answers except the arid and rigid dogmas of the day. He asked for bread, and he received a stone. That is, until as a young man he came under the spell of the golden voice and glowing personality of the pastor of Plymouth Church, whose insight was a revelation and whose eloquence was like an orchestra. Even now, as he attempts to describe the result, one realizes once more what a great thing it is to have an authentic teacher of spiritual truth in the plastic, formative years of youth. Beecher made the young man glad about God, and once a man has settled the first truth, and the last, the way thereafter, if sometimes cloudy, can never be a dim battle in a doubtful land. What this meant is told, in part, as follows:

Suppose that all your life you had dreaded an awful God, or in fear submitted to a fateful God, or hesitated between defying and cringing before a hated God, or vainly sought to understand a hidden God, and suddenly the curtain were rent aside and you saw the luminous figure of the living Christ, and over his head were written the words, "This is thy God, O man!" Something like this was the experience of this youth growing into manhood. He had thought of God as infinite power. Here is God revealed to him by the endearing manifestation of an unparalleled love. He begins to believe that Jesus is not an ambassador from God to man, not an intermediary between God and man, but God entering into human life that he may enable men to understand him . . . God is no longer to him a great unknown. . . This faith means much. It lightens burdens, strengthens purpose, inspires with courage, solves perplexities, simplifies life, and he longs to give to others the gift which has been given to him. To that purpose he has now for sixty years given himself in various forms of activity, but with unvarying purpose.

And now, having passed four score years, Dr. Abbott quietly sets down how this vision of God required readjustments of thought in respect to the details of doctrine, and how, through all the years, the vision grew and unfolded, lighting up life by a sunrise. The story of his changing thought, made necessary by his growing vision of God in Christ—his rediscovery of the Bible, his restatement of theology, and what are the social implications of such a faith—is more fascinating than any romance. More and more he came to think of religion in terms of life and growth, and of Jesus as the giver of life. He learned that the teaching of Jesus was not metaphysical, but vital, and that his gospel is a kind of spiritual biology. It has grown increasingly clear to Dr. Abbott, with the passing years, that the most radical difference between the teaching of Jesus and that of the churches is this: Jesus taught men how to live, and the churches have taught men what to think; Jesus tested men by their lives, while the churches have tested them by their beliefs. Though, if one may venture to say so, it is not theology, but bad theology, that causes the trouble, and the churches need to learn anew of Jesus what to think as well as how to live.

Anyone who knows the writings of Dr. Abbott will follow with joy his exposition of the gospel of Christ in the mellow light of his sunset years. For him the love of God, revealed in Christ, is the master light of the gospel, and his interpretation of it is radiant in its beauty and rich in its insight. God is something more than Ruler and Maker of humanity; he is our Father, Companion, and Friend. Re-igion, as he reads its meaning in the face of Jesus, is "the life of God in the soul of man"—life free, abundant, overflowing—and because it is life it takes myriad forms of duty and of love. With the hand of a master—which has lost none of its cunning—he traces the fruits of the spirit in character, in conduct, in art, architecture, music, and the growth of a beloved community. Religion is no more confined within the church and its rites than spring is fenced within a garden. All through these pages one feels the joy of a noble emancipated soul for whom Jesus has shaken the poison out of all the wild flowers, and unveiled the meaning of life as love, service, and comradeship. Theology has been reconstructed accordingly:

Salvation no longer means for me deliverance from hell and admission into heaven; it means deliverance from sin. Exemption from penalty without deliverance from sin would not be salvation. If a good man were to go to hell and retain his goodness he would be saved. If a bad man were to go to heaven and retain his evil he would be lost. Heaven must be in us. Salvation is character.

Justification by faith no longer means to me that Christ has suffered the penalties of my sins and therefore if I accept his sacrifice God will treat me as though I were innocent although I am guilty; it means that Jesus offers himself to me as my divine companion and if I accept his companionship I can be made virtuous although I have been guilty.

Attachment no longer means to me that Christ has made reparation to God for the wrong I have done and therefore God is reconciled to me. It means that Christ has by his life and teaching interpreted God to me and by his personal presence inspires in me the will to do my Father's will, and so has reconciled me to God.

Incarnation means to me more than the spirit of God dwelt unrecognized by the world centuries ago for a few years in Jesus of Nazareth; it also means that the same spirit still dwells in the world, carrying on now with the followers of Jesus the work of serving and saving men which the same spirit carried on with Jesus then. Incarnation is not merely an historical episode; it is an eternal fact.

If I were to paint the shadow of the cross, I would not paint it as the shadow of a yawning boy cast on the wall betokening his weariness of the task which he has been set to perform. Have you not seen the mother with arms outstretched and the little child by this silent invitation of her welcoming love, run quickly to her bosom? I would paint the shadow of that mother's love on the wall; for God's love reaches out to lay hold upon the weakest, poorest, most sinful of his children, and the cross of Christ is the shadow thrown upon the earth of the Father's inviting and welcoming love.

There are those to whom it will be rather startling to hear Dr. Abbott say that the idea that Jesus organized a church, in the sense in which we use the word, has little or nothing to support it. The institutions of Christianity, however useful and important, were not framed by Jesus, but were developed by his followers after his death. Such a position, if accepted, obliterates at once the old debates of ecclesiastics about rites and ordinances and leaves the disciples of Jesus free to accept and use those ceremonies and forms of organization most useful and eloquent for the service of the life of the spirit. From what bewildering and tedious controversies, in which every kind of prejudice and pretense is mixed up, such an insight sets us free!

Jesus gave his disciples no creed; but inspires them with an ambition to study the invisible world to which they belong, and of which they are a part, and their beliefs respecting this world they have expressed in their creeds. He prescribed for them no ritual; but he inspires in them experiences of penitence, reverence, gratitude and consecration, and these experiences they have expressed in rituals. He organized no church; but he gave them work to do which they could only do by united effort, and the organizations which they have created for that purpose are the church. Are we then to consider the church as a human or a divine institution? I reply, divine in its mission, divine in the spirit of the life with which its Master endows it; but human in its forms of belief, of worship, and of organization.

And this is what Christianity means to one who has devoted a long life to its study and practice and service. How different, how much deeper, simpler, and sweeter is the truth as it is in Jesus than the dark and terrifying dogmas taught in other days. And yet there are those who think that religion is declining! It is really just now being discovered; and if this is to be the gospel of the church of the future, it must win by its very loveliness. Towards this great and simple Christianity Dr. Abbott believes we are moving, larger in its realization of God and in its practice of brotherhood, and toward that end he has helped us by his life, his thought, his character, and his calm, clear, luminous insight.

The Denominational Convocations

BEGINNING with the middle of May the annual gatherings of many of the religious bodies of the United States are scheduled to take place, at many points east and west, at intervals reaching into September. A list of fifteen or more of these meetings is now available, and cannot fail to provoke interest on the part of any one who scans it. It includes the national judicatories of the more important denominations, and several of the smaller ones. In about equal proportions the assemblies are held in the east, the central states and the west. The one furthest east is to be held in New Jersey, and the westernmost in California. As compared with the locations of church conventions ten years ago they show a decided drift toward the west.

The first impression made by these announcements, and the programs which accompany them, is that of the strength of the church, of which all these evangelical, Protestant groups are constituent elements. It must also be remembered that these gatherings represent but a small portion of the total strength of Protestantism in America. There are many denominations which meet at other seasons of the year, or at less frequent intervals. One has to give careful consideration to the total list of such bodies to comprehend the meaning of this great aggregate of Christian activity and relationship. There is something very impressive about such a variety of confessions of the faith, all composed of devoted and loyal adherents. From one point of view it is much more impressive than the mere statistics of the millions who make up the sum of evangelical Christians in the land.

There is also the realization of the silent but potent body of consecrated Christian people included in these communions. The strength of the church lies not so much in the visible aspects of its life, in the movements of thought or the showy activities that attract public interest as in the steady and largely unrecorded movement of Christian life within its membership. It has been this element through all the centuries that has supplied the real strength of the church. Not in the architecture of religion, even in the glorious cathedral days; not in the stately ceremonials of holy orders; nor in the wealth lavished upon ecclesiastical establishments did the true strength of the church lie. Rather was it found in the quiet, simple faith, the unhurried progress toward nobler standards of living, exhibited by multitudes whose names never adorned the pages of religious chronicles, but were none the less registered in the Book of Life. It is not otherwise today. Far down beneath the play of wave crests of controversy, movements and tendencies, there are the unsounded depths of Christian faith and conduct which constitute the real asset of the church of God throughout all the world.

From many points of view the church assemblies are the least significant and the most depressing expressions of the Christian society. In them the official mind is most in evidence, and the mechanics of administrative activity is exhibited in whatever forms of crudeness or polish it has been able to acquire. There is great difference among the various religious bodies as to the degree in which officialism has passed over into real leadership, and has become humble and inspiring. Age and experience are required in a communion to ripen the sense of administrative oversight into vision and power. Where this maturity and ripeness of character have not been attained there is sure to remain something of the rawness, the bustle and the noise of a mere political convention. From such a gathering the more sensitive and wistful souls in a denomination, those who listen for the voice of the Spirit, and are not allured by bodies, shapes and appearances, are increasingly moved to absent themselves.

In such meetings, moreover, the denominational consciousness is acute and vivid. Denominational history, achievements, watchwords and ambitions are stressed, until gradually there takes form the conviction that about all that is being done anywhere to advance the kingdom of God is taking place under the direction of that particular body. When that becomes the obsession of a church in the community, or of a denomination in the wider spaces of the nation, the doom of wilful and self-induced delusion is already at hand. To anyone who happens into such gatherings from the outer circle of Christian fellowship such pretensions sound naive and ludicrous. The success of each of the churches is too much the result of the devotion and zeal of all for any one of them to take too seriously its own apostolicity, orthodoxy or finality.

In the present unhappy and divided state of the church, these denominational assemblies are, perhaps, a necessity, and not with certain values if rightly estimated and directed. But at best they are, separately, but small fragments of the total Christian group, and need to keep this fact in the front of consciousness, with all its humbling significance. It is too late in the centuries for any of the communions to proceed to its tasks unconscious or contemptuous of the rest. Only by careful contemplation of the entire field of church responsibility, and earnest effort to share with all who have obtained like precious faith the sacrifice and achievement of possession, can any division of the body of Christ justify itself in these days of widening vision and enhanced opportunity.

Indeed it is this sensitiveness of the leaderlike men in many of the churches to this common need and responsibility that is widening the roadway of Christian service, and making more evident the approach of all communions of the church to each other and their common goal.

Where America Lags

AMERICA is slow in matters of social progress in industrial fields. We are still the most individualistic of peoples. Perhaps it is because we have had room for everyone to take his chance with undeveloped nature. The young man could go west or launch some venture of his own. In England and Germany and other older lands such individual margins of opportunity do not exist and men must find their places in the big machine of industrial organization.

Our country was thirty-six years behind Germany and twenty years behind England in its first adoption of compulsory industrial insurance. A recent investigation found that the families of men killed in the Carnegie mills received from nothing up to only $2,000, only two of the families getting so much as $2,000. In Erie County, Pa., out of 211 killed on duty 97 of the families received no compensation and the others got only from $500 to $1,500 each. Texas courts have recently sustained a verdict of $40,000 for the family of a railroad locomotive fireman and one of $22,500 for a brakeman. This was considered the earning value of these men to their families and the cost of their "breakage" was assessed up to the business instead of to their dependants.

We are thirty-one years behind Germany and twelve years behind Great Britain in our first adoption of an old age pension. Old age is one of the primary causes of pauperism. The Surrogate Courts of New York found that out of every 100 men dying 83 leave no estate at all, and 15 leave only from $2,000 up to $10,000. An insurance journal says that at the age of forty-five not less than 60 per cent of America's men have to work for a living because they have nothing laid up. At fifty-five years of age not less than 46 per cent are dependent, while at sixty-five more than 54 per cent are dependent, and at seventy-five full 95 per cent must be provided for.

We were thirty-seven years behind Germany and eight years behind England in adopting a compulsory one day's rest in seven. The Interchurch commission to investigate the steel strike found some 40,000 men still working the seven day week in that industry alone, many of them on the twelve hour day besides. These older lands adopted minimum wage laws some years ago. We have recently seen a few states adopt them for women. The wage adjustments are made by commissions which have usually put them on the basis of enough for a living from day to day, that is, a minimum of existence on some basis of decency. It is only human that every industry should be made profitable enough to pay a living wage and that every profitable industry should be compelled to do so.

The old countries have machinery to assist the unemployed. We had a beginning in the post offices as centers of information about men and jobs, but for some mysterious reason it has been abandoned. In England, today, with a smaller body of unemployed than we have, unemployment insurance is being added to the established program. In normal times we have a daily unemployed force of nearly a million men. This is made inevitable by the seasonal type of certain industries and by those fluctuations of trade which bring temporary shut-downs. Without this margin of casual workers these seasonal trades could not get hands in their seasons. But there is always some type of job somewhere if only adequate means were employed to get the idle man to the open job. Labor takes the main loss of seasonal unemployment and trade fluctuations. Capital may lose interest in the latter but labor loses bread and butter, and there are 7,000,000 persons out of work at some time during the normal year, one-half of them for from one to three months and one-third of them for from four to six months.

The great gains in workingman's compensation laws which charge the breakage of men up to the cost of operation, just as the breakage of machinery has always been charged, will no doubt be followed by other type of social insurance. It is only just and right that industry should bear the cost of lives, limbs and the wear and tear of its workers as well as its machinery.

The Garden

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I SPAKE unto Keturah, saying, I will make a Garden. And Keturah said, So thou hast said, and so hast thou done, each Spring since ever I knew thee. Thou wilt make a Garden in the Spring; but who will hoe it in Summer?

And I heeded her not, but went to work. And after a time she came unto me and helped me.

And I sang unto her a song, saying:

I want to be a gardener and with the gardeners stand,
An horny-handed son of toil with an haystack in mine hand:
Beneath the tall tomato-tree I'll swing the glittering hoe,
And slay the wild potato-bug that skippeth o'er the snow.

And she inquired, saying, Didst thou make up that nonsense, or may there have been before thee another man who did it?

And I said, The song that I have sung unto thee is a free translation from the Sanskrit or some other Ancient Language which was spoken in the Garden of Eden. Thus doth mankind sing in every Spring.

And she said, Thy first father who sang that song was not a brilliant success as a Gardener.

And I said, Woman, be thou silent, and remember, My first father, even Adam, was singing that song to the tune, "I want to be an Angel," and doing very well until thy first mother came along and put him off the key.

I'll buy myself a Durham ram and a gray alpaca cow,
And a lock-stick Osage-orange hedge and a patent-leather plow.

And she made no comment, for from the days of Adam there hath been one unanswerable argument which a man might use in time of need.

And I said, O Keturah, well do I know that I am a bum gardener; and that by midsummer there will be more weeds than garden-truck of my planting. Yet can I not deny myself the annual luxury of getting my own fingers into the soil, and beholding that wondrous miracle of God whereby the earth doth renew life.

And Keturah said, My lord, I know it; and I blame thee not. As a gardener thou art little improvement upon Adam, thine ancestor, and he lost his job; but I am very glad to have thee get back to nature, and to go back with thee. Yea, and so long as we do this, I think we can never wholly grow old.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

The Egotist

HE discovers that there is no God in the universe, only a tendency. He proves that the world was not created, but that, by a "fortuitous concourse of atoms," it happened. He explains that man's feeling for a Father-Heart is only a futile wish, not an instinct, and that his craving for immortality is but the desire of the moth for the star. He declares that there is no such thing as a goal "toward which the whole creation moves." He denies that "through the ages one increasing purpose runs." Life is simply ebb and flow, chance and circumstance, the cry of human mouths doomed to be forever stopped by dust.

Having banished God from the universe, he exalts himself as successor on the throne.

Meanwhile, God the Father-Heart takes pity on his poor, lean soul, and gives him food to eat and water to drink, fresh air to live in, and sunshine and flowers to delight his heart!

In Blossom-time

IN blossom-time, could any say
That life is desolate and gray?

When cherry boughs are drifted snow,
When spring-time couriers, singing, go
Through orchard lanes, which for a day
Are very heaven, who could lay
Upon the gods of far-away

One word of blame for fret or woe—
In blossom-time?

What man could hate or envy know
When apple-blossoms burst and blow?
When, free at last, the kindly May Endeavors Winter's debts to pay—
In blossom-time?

Reginald J. Campbell

Second Article In Series on "Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

NO two men were ever more unlike in physical aspect, intellectual quality and spiritual appeal, than the first two ministers of the City Temple. The first was a sturdy, stockily built giant, the second slight, frail, almost ethereal; one the son of a stone-mason, the other a child of the manse; an old man with a black mane followed by a young man with a white mane. If one had a rugged, massive, dynamic intellect, the other had a mystical mind of iridescent brilliance. One personality was pervasive, opulent, diffusive, the other magnetic, absorbent, winsome. The eloquence of the older man had always a suggestion of the stage, not that it was insincere, but because the dramatic instinct was ineradicable; the oratory of the younger man was unaffected in its simplicity, with no effort after effect, and no flowers of rhetoric. The contrast might go on indefinitely, they were so utterly different; yet each in his own distinction and power was a man of mark, and each had a word of God for his age.

THE "LITTLE GRAY ANGEL"

Mark Rutherford thought that George MacDonald was the most fascinating preacher that ever entered a pulpit; but if he had seen the young man who came up from Brighton, at the dying wish of Joseph Parker, to the City Temple in 1902, he might have altered his verdict. With a head grey in youth, eyes eloquent with a nameless hunger, and a face thin and pallid as that of some ascetic of the desert, his advent in the pulpit was an event—one had almost said, an apparition. Seldom, if ever, has there been a figure more arresting, a presence more captivating, or an appeal more winning than R. J. Campbell made in those early days of his incandescence. Preaching, said Dr. Parker, will endure as long as the race, but it must be preaching; and the "Sermons Addressed to Individuals" were preaching of the most real kind, at once searching and revealing. The vestry of the City Temple is a confessional, as I well know, and each of the sermons dealt with some personal problem confided to the preacher, uniting a clairvoyant insight with a sympathy almost substitutionary. Direct, concrete, lambent, they were unique in their evocation of the religious atmosphere, and in that naturalization of the Unseen which it is the glory of the pulpit to achieve. If in their printed form the sermons lost something, it was because no art could detain the incommunicable grace of a personality as challenging as it was charming. From a letter dated 1904, written by a friend long vanished, I take these words giving an impression of the "Little Grey Angel," as the preacher was described:

"A more beautiful countenance than his I have never beheld among living men. There are pictures of the saints that possess the same haunting and ethereal loveliness. It is a beauty that affects some men as being almost uncanny; the features are so delicate that they would be effeminate save for the glowing, searching eyes and the firm, long lines of the chin. The hair is prematurely grey, but luxuriant. Garbed in his long black cassock, the preacher looked like a Dante that had known no sorrow. Asceticism was there, but no hardness; spirituality without aloofness. As he stood in silence when he rose to preach, searching out the people with his eyes, he looked like a friendly angel. His delivery was not good, being muffled and feeble, sometimes dropping almost to a murmur. He seemed to use manuscript, but I got the impression that only notes and headings were written down. Frequently he made use of devotional poetry, summing up an argument or a plea with a stanza. He spoke intimately to the people and never waxed either oratorical or spectacular. The most extreme gesture that he made was a long, upward and outward movement of the arm, as though he intended to drop a thought among the rear pews. It was a curious and, as you may observe, not an easy gesture to describe, but it had a striking effect and brought the beholder up with a start. My impression all through was of a profound but quietly expressed solicitude that man should not only be happier for being good, but be better for being happier. The secret of his power is elusive. The explanation for such a lack of explanation would naturally be—magnetism or genius. The magnetism, certainly, is undeniable. As to the latter, it is doubtful whether his warmest friends would claim for him the title of genius. Ability, grace, charm, skill—yes; but genius—no."

THE CITY TEMPLE ATMOSPHERE

Unfortunately, it was never my joy to hear Campbell in the City Temple in those days, and one had to see and hear him in that setting in order to know him at his best. Outside the Temple he seemed bereft of half his power, which explains the disappointment of those who heard him elsewhere, and especially in America. Knowing something of the amazing audience which assembles in the City Temple—amazing alike in its composition and in its spiritual contrasts—I know how it tugs at the heart of the preacher. The curious tourists who "do" the Temple count for as little as the jaded sermon-tasters seeking a new thrill. The standing congregation is a mixed multitude in itself, too bewilderingly varied to be described, with which is joined a crowd of lonely, baffled folk, drawn or driven by an inappeasable need of the soul, and no preacher can ever forget their eager, expectant, storm-vexed faces. Men fighting for faith, men who have lost the fight, spiritual derelicts tossed between cynicism and despair—wearied, unexcited, tormented—defeated men whose past is ever before them, and women to whom hell is the only reality—these sit side by side at every service. The appeal to the penetrative and compassionate understanding of the preacher is like "deep calling unto deep," and if he has the shepherd soul it is irresistible. To such an audience—its mind a chaos of unrelated ideas, its soul dumb with a wordless yearning, terrible in the loneliness of a great city—Campbell came like an old mystic who had wandered out of the Middle Ages. Without being esthetically fine or intellectually satisfying, his presence was electrifying, his personality haunting, his utterance thrilling—

Clothed about with flame and with tears, and singing
Songs that break the heart of the earth with pity.

Such was the minister of the City Temple when the New Theology sensation began: a matter with which I have not to do, except to say that, since it was neither new nor a theology, it did not enlist my interest. Indeed, we in America were amazed at the furor it made, finding in it little, if anything, that had not long been familiar to us either in the old liberalism or the new orthodoxy; nothing, that is, unless it was a misplaced emphasis or a sense of proportion all awry. It seemed to us only another proof of the saying of Disraeli that the English are the most enthusiastic and least excitable people on earth, and that the two inspirations of their enthusiasm are politics and religion. Nor did we on this side realize that the movement had been taken up by the Northcliffe papers, especially by the Daily Mail, which exploited an ethereal personality in a manner unprecedented—taking bits of his sermons out of their context and flashing them in large type, much to the regret of the preacher and his friends. The book entitled "The New Theology," and described in its preface as "a concise statement of the outlines of the teaching given from the City Temple pulpit," while containing many vagrant insights of rare beauty, was so ill-considered and hastily written as almost to justify the cartoon in "Punch," showing the author pacing up and down his study, dictating a new theology in an evening.

THE NEW THEOLOGY

There is no wish on my part to belittle the author of "The New Theology"; far from it. He was a preacher of rare and exquisite art, commanding many resources, and there was always a suggestion of a supernatural background to his ministry. His knowledge of the human heart—especially in its bafflements, its struggle with temptation, its pain at the hardness of life, its wistful loneliness—was almost uncanny; and his divination of what people were thinking and feeling, or their inarticulate yearnings, made him an answer of the unasked questions of many minds. His preaching during the New Theology days was in many ways extraordinary, albeit marred at times by an aggressive self-consciousness. Often a sermon began with a too elaborate, if not labored, exegesis of the text in the light of the higher criticism—"I believed the Germans too readily," he afterwards said—but it nearly always found focus in a glow-point of real insight. His prayers, too, were singularly searching, healing, exalting. Indeed, many were drawn to him, not because he had invented a new theology, but because, with real insight and at the psychological moment, he uttered truths deeply felt, or dimly seen, in the terms of his time, and related Christianity to everyday life and the issues of his age. His spiritual fervor, his moral earnestness, his passion for social justice found response in many who knew little, and cared less, for any kind of theology, new or old.

Nor do I mean to imply that the New Theology movement, at one time so much discussed, did no good except to make a stir in the dry leaves. It did good both directly and indirectly. It awakened interest in religion; it emphasized the social meaning of Christianity; it enabled many ministers to speak their minds more freely and frankly; and a freer, fresher air was felt to be blowing through all the churches. Though the movement itself has had its day and ceased to be, thousands of people were made aware of a new sense of reality and a new impulse to service. The leader of the New Theology reached the zenith of his influence and power in 1909, and the following year was smitten with a serious illness which seemed to affect not only his body but his whole personality. Three sermons a week, besides innumerable outside demands, had overtaxed his strength. The minister of the City Temple, as I learned to my sorrow, is regarded as public property in London, and it is a wonder to me that so frail a man as Campbell stood the strain as long as he did. A second visit to America in 1911 did not improve his health, but it marked the turning point of his career. A subtle change crept into his pulpit utterances, and the congregations at the City Temple, while still relatively large, began to decline. At the Thursday noon service the attendance became smaller than it has been for thirty years. Another illness in July, 1914, left the preacher unspeakably frail, and in the autumn he resigned and entered the church of England.

A HOLE IN THE GROUND

Dr. Parker had left a large and influential following at the City Temple, but the attrition of years, the changes in London, and, more than all, the agitations of the succeeding ministry, scattered it. Not a few left when the New Theology discussion began, and many more when the minister adventured into socialism. Others took their places, to be sure, including a multitude of young people who filled the Temple with ardor and enthusiasm. But when their leader recanted his teaching they, in turn, were first dazed, and then disillusioned, like sheep led into a wilderness and deserted by the shepherd—surely not the least part of the tragedy of a notable career. As a result little was left at the City Temple: as one of its officers said to me when I arrived: "It is not only flat, it is a hole in the ground." When I took up my labors at the Temple my predecessor was a priest of St. Philip's Cathedral, in Birmingham, and had just published his apologia, entitled "A Spiritual Pilgrimage." It was more than an apology; it was a recantation. Perhaps an Intellectual Pilgrimage had been a better title, but the tone of the book was irenic, with very few barbed sentences, yet one felt all through a deep undercurrent of disappointment. He spoke rather sadly of "my lost latitudinarian days," meaning his great days at the City Temple, over which he wished to "draw a veil." Indeed, he was not aware of owing anything in his religious life to nonconformist influences; what he had received from that source was rather "a truer view of history and of the sterner realities of modern life."

He was explicit in his remarks about his "re-ordination," a word not chosen at haphazard, when he said that he believed himself to be "no more, and no less, truly a minister of Jesus Christ after I had been ordained in the church of England than I was before"; and he regarded that act as no judgment upon his ministry one way or the other. "The fact is that distinctive nonconformist—or shall I say evangelical?—theology failed me," he said. Apparently the

New Theology had failed him, too. He felt, as he frankly admitted, that "in the corporate unity of the catholic church and in that alone was full satisfaction to be found for my religious need." Yet he makes the curious remark that had his health stood the strain, he did not see how he could legitimately, "in all reason and conscience," have left the City Temple. Indeed, he more than once said to me that if he could have had an assistant, as I had, at the City Temple, he would not have left. It was all very strange, and the apologia did not explain it.

Nor is it my business to inquire into it further. Later when Mr. Campbell came to London as vicar of Christ Church, Westminster, I found him the same lovable and brotherly man whom I had met and heard in America, albeit somewhat pensive and aloof—as one who had journeyed a long way and passed many graves along the road. I attended his induction as vicar, and I shall never forget my feelings when I saw him stand at the altar and accept the Thirty-nine Articles—remembering what he had more than once said of the intellect capable of such a feat. In all this he was utterly sincere, but I wondered what had happened in his heart and how such a thing could be. Temperament, no doubt, explains much. The very qualities which made him so stimulating a preacher unfitted him as a guide for theological wayfarers, the more so when, unfixed from his orbit, he became a wandering star. Such a mind has no place in English nonconformity, in which there is so much that is not only definite, but hard, unyielding, and ungracious. By temperament, not less than by training, Reginald J. Campbell belongs in the church of England, where, I devoutly pray, whether as vicar of Christ Church or as canon of Westminster Abbey, he may have many years of noble and fruitful ministry.

Japan's Place in the World

By George Gleason

THE lying newspaper headlines in recent articles on Japan are unconsciously serving the cause of peace. They are making the issues clear. Their plain unreliability is giving the reading public the opportunity to decide whether international relations are to be settled by misrepresentation or honesty; by ignorance or knowledge; by enmity or friendship.

True to the type a prominent Philadelphia paper published a few days ago with striking headlines a report that Japan's war office is keeping the aeroplane factories of France and England working overtime. The writer asserted that hundreds of planes have already been shipped and then adds: "Nearly every French airman—every army ace—has been indirectly approached with a tentative invitation to come to Japan." The implication is that scores, if not hundreds, of aviators are sailing to the far east to teach Japan to handle a peerless aerial fleet. Then the writer gives himself away by adding: "In no case have I been able to pin down an invitation that has been straight out and out."

One who reads this story carefully thus finds that the headlines give an entirely erroneous impression; that beyond the fact that Japan has purchased some aeroplanes in Europe and that many months ago a few French aviators did sail to help the Japanese in their conquest of the air there is nothing of news value.

UNSUBSTANTIATED HEADLINES

A few days later the same newspaper in reporting Japan's plans for naval increase wrote as a headline: "Japan's navy plans will make her almost equal to the United States." But down in the body of the article the same writer adds: "The completion of this program will still leave Japan far behind the United States even if the latter only carries out the 1916 program." These and other incidents which might be multiplied indicate that we are on the verge of another series of unauthentic war scare stories.

We are reminded of the imaginings which were going the rounds five and ten years ago. In 1911 the Hearst papers startled the country with the news that 60,000 Japanese had landed at Magdalena Bay in Lower California, ready to strike at our west coast. Dr. David Starr Jordan investigated the rumor and was able to locate six Japanese workmen peacefully laboring in a Mexican canning factory. In 1916 the Boston Sunday Globe and The Forum both gave credence to a story that there were between thirty thousand and a quarter of a million trained Japanese army men in Mexico "ready to fight at a moment's notice." An investigation revealed the fact that there were in all Mexico at that time 2,737 hard-working Japanese men and women of whom less than 200 had received military training.

History repeats itself, but the American people may now be on their guard against this criminal newspaper effort to stir up antagonism between nations.

BACKGROUND IN FAR EAST

What is behind these periodic outbreaks of anti-Japanese nervousness? What is back of the intermittent agitation in California? It is hard to believe that the presence of only 80,000 Japanese in that great state, which has a population of over 3,000,000 people, and a territory 10,000 square miles larger than all Japan, is really the cause of that nervous irritability which prompted the stringent land laws of last November. Is not the California question a symptom of a world disease? It is like a red spot on a man's face, of small importance in itself, but significant of the dread fever which is about to break out.

What are conditions in the far east which make the background for these frequent American agitations? First of all is the fact of that huge aggregation of human beings in the Orient: the 330,000,000 of India, the 400,000,000 of China and the 77,000,000 of the Japanese empire. Here in these three nations bordering on the western shore of the Pacific ocean is gathered more than half of humanity. The standard of living of the mass of these people is incomparably below that of Americans. Their customs are so different that without a long period of intercourse real social fellowship is all but impossible. They are, however, so near our west coast that without some barrier the greedy steamship companies could land a horde of cheap laborers which would swarm over the American continent in a way that would jeopardize our whole civilization. This is the California terror.

The second fact which stands out in the background of American nervousness is the vastness of the undeveloped natural resources of eastern Asia. Along the Amur line of the trans-Siberian, by the main line of the Chinese Eastern Railway and from the 500 miles of railroad in Manchuria one can look over broad, black plains where a farmer could start from the rails and plow into the setting sun. Back from the main highways are similar broad prairies untouched by the hand of man. The richness of this land, to those of us brought up in rocky New England, is simply fabulous. I recall a little stream near Harbin which had cut a fresh cross section through the soil. There I saw five, six and even seven feet of rich black loam pregnant with agricultural wealth. If any one fears with Malchus that population is already pressing on the land he should make a visit to this undeveloped region of northern Asia. Mongolia also remains to be opened. Visitors estimate that beef for all Europe could be raised in the valleys of this one Chinese province, which our geographies used to call a desert.

CHINA'S COAL RESOURCES

Geologists always wax eloquent over China's coal. In some parts one can look from his railroad car and see a mine on every farm. The whole world could be coaled for 1,500 years from this almost untouched mineral wealth. Near the coal are mountains of iron ore. When the virile labor of China is scientifically harnessed to these natural resources the possible industrial development of the 400,000,000 of Chinese is beyond the imagination. The problems growing out of the international race for these products of native and human labor and the possible flood over the western world of these hordes of humanity are real. They must be squarely faced.

Above and overshadowing these two oriental facts is still another which today constitutes the greatest question facing humanity. This is the race problem. In "The Rising Tide of Color" Lothrop Stoddard reports that the yellow races of eastern Asia, the brown races of southern and western Asia, the blacks of Africa and America and the reds of North and South America total 1,150,000,000 human beings. The whites number 550,000,000. We are outnumbered two to one. By about 1900 Stoddard sees the white races at their zenith of world power. Excepting China, Japan and the little country of Liberia in Africa, white nations have conquered and are ruling the world. Then he pictures Japan's victory over Russia as the first instance in history of a colored race conquering a white. From Manchuria a thrill went over the whole colored world. Since 1905 there has been a rising tide developing from these more than a billion human beings which he says is the great question of the day. His solution for the problem of the coming conflict between whites and colored is that the white races should unite, build up great navies and armies and be ready to hold the colored races in subjection. One leaves this book with pessimism in his heart.

IS THERE A WAY OUT?

The question before thoughtful people is: What is the way out of these overwhelming human problems? Can we further find in their solution Japan's place in the world? Those who see red picture Japan slowly absorbing eastern Asia, training and equipping the pliable orientals and decades hence marching over the planet at the head of a conquering host. My observations lead to a different conclusion.

After living twenty years in the far east, after having been through the Russo-Japanese war with the Japanese soldiers and spending a year and a half with them on the plains of Manchuria, after eight months with the Allies in Siberia and a fresh study of North China and Korea, I believe that Japan's place in the solution of the problems of the orient and the larger race problem is clear. A few days ago when taking up a morning paper in Minneapolis I found a headline which read: "JAPAN READY TO FOLLOW SUIT." These five words give us the key. That Japan will follow Anglo-Saxon leadership, an experience in Russia bears witness. In the fall of 1918 there seemed clear evidences to many Americans who were in Siberia that the leaders in the Japanese government had a large ambition to put across some economic deal which would establish Japan's priority throughout Siberia. In response to America's invitation to send seven or eight thousand soldiers Japan had sent ten times as many as was expected. The attitudes of the army officers gave ground for belief that Japan intended to be the superior among the Allies in eastern Russia. When, however, the armistice was signed in Europe, when Mr. Wilson's ringing addresses on the new era in international relations were published, the attitude of the Japanese authorities distinctly changed. More than half of their soldiers were withdrawn from Siberia, a special commission was sent from Tokyo to urge the Japanese army men to show greater courtesy to their foreign allies, and their army was reorganized in order to make better cooperation with America and England possible.

Finally in January, 1919, the Japanese agreed to cooperate with the other seven nations represented in Siberia in the international operation of the trans-Siberian railroad. After some months there was a very evident intention on the part of Japan to join heartily in the League of Nations and in the establishment of a new international relationship. Then followed that awful year and a half of American history where in international matters our government was in a state bordering on anarchy. The policies in Asia which were so clear during the zenith of Mr. Wilson's power were thrown aside and the Japanese leaders concluded that Mr. Wilson's high ideals were mere oratory and not backed by the American people. Thus on account of indecision at Washington and consequent confusion in Tokyo the Japanese seem to have gone back to their policy of intrenching themselves on the mainland.

WILL FOLLOW AMERICA AND ENGLAND

The place of Japan in the world was similarly described by a wise British newspaper correspondent in Peking when he said, "Japan will follow the lead of America and England. When these two countries unite in a clear policy of unselfish international dealing Japan will join in." In colloquial American Japan consciously or unconsciously "has passed the buck."

There is, however, another point which must always be in the background of American estimates of Japan. The Island Empire has no large natural resources; the country is not able to feed itself; and minerals, excepting coal, are found in only meagre quantities. The thoughtful statesmen of Japan know that only as she has access to the metals, markets and fields of eastern Asia has the country any future. Therefore, Japan has developed what is sometimes called the Monroe Doctrine for Asia. It has been characterized as a policy of excluding Europe from northeastern Asia and intrenching Japan over the whole area, much as she has obtained her foothold in Korea. From my observation of the Japanese, however, I do not believe this to be the fundamental policy. Japan is in Korea today because she has known ever since the second century that any other country which holds Korea "points a dagger at Japan's throat." Japan in 1894-95 fought to keep China out of Korea. Ten years later she fought with Russia to keep Russia out of Korea. Had there been at that time a League of Nations which would have assured the independence of Korea, Japan would certainly not have annexed that country in 1910. She did it at that time because the Koreans had applied to The Hague tribunal and Japan feared lest some other country might get control in that badly ruled old empire. Her so-called aggressiveness on the mainland is part of the same policy. When Japan is assured that Germany, England and Russia will not seek to hold any part of China, when the 340,000 square miles owned by France in the south are given back to Siam and China, and when the League of Nations will give assurance of an open access to the raw products and the growing demands of the areas of eastern Asia, the clear Monroe Doctrine of Asia will emerge. Until that time, however, as long as Japan suspects the danger of any other countries securing a strangling hold or even a further sphere of influence on any part of the western shores of the Pacific she will increase her army and navy and do everything possible to hold for herself an open approach and keep others out. In other words, "Japan is ready to follow suit." The solution of Japan's place in the world is up to us. Japan will lead in the east as England and America lead in the west.

Is Tithing Christian?

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

EVEN to raise this question will seem a sort of lese majestie to many good people. Is not tithing a divine ordinance? Did not Jesus say in reference to it: "This ought ye to have done and not to have left the other undone?" Is the principle not justified by the fruits, both material and spiritual? And what more can you have than divine authority plus the "pragmatic sanction" of results?

But to some equally good people doubts occur. The matter is not so simple. To put sufficient money into the coffers of the church is undoubtedly a good thing, provided there is no ethical loss involved in the process. To obey a divine behest is imperative, if it be indeed a divine behest. To be a "steward of the grace of God" in temporal as well as spiritual things, is axiomatic in Christianity; but that tithing, as ordinarily interpreted, makes for true stewardship is not so clear. These doubters are sincere Christians. It is their very sincerity that makes them hesitate. They want to do their full duty. But what is their duty? What is the Christian thing to do? Will the ultimate interests of the kingdom of God be advanced by tithing; or is it, perhaps, only another of those ethical short-cuts which prove, in the end, the longest way about?

The justification of these misgivings is the way in which the case for tithing is frequently presented. The cause suffers from the indiscretion of its advocates. Arguments are used in its favor that represent a pre-Christian stage of ethical development. Divine authority is alleged for it of a kind that does not exist. Results are attributed to it that would be magical rather than moral. Motives are encouraged that are pagan in their implications. To re-study the whole question, therefore, from the viewpoint of Christian principle, is a duty which the conscience of the church owes to itself.

VEILED LEGALISM

In the first place, all disclaimers notwithstanding, nine-tenths of the current tithing propaganda is thinly veiled legalism. This is no indiscriminate, stock objection. The heart of the matter lies here. "Tithing"* is historically a survival of "the law," and is fraught with all the weakness and dangers of a statutory religion. Religiously, there is no more subtle temptation than to substitute the outward, formal and fixed observance for the inner, spiritual and spontaneous life. The phariseism which so roused the scorn of Jesus was just that substitution erected in a creed.

*Where the quotation marks are used the word will stand for the current theory.

In this connection, since the appeal is made to Jewish practice, the history of the tithe is instructive. Originally it had nothing to do with temple worship, but was a contribution in kind for the benefit of the Levites and other landless neighbors; but when later it hardened into a specifically ecclesiastical levy, it, along with other ritual and ceremonial observances, was gradually substituted for the very justice and generosity it was originally designed to foster and express: "Ye tithe mint, anise and cummin, but have neglected the weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy and truth." In other words, as the ceremonial importance of the tithe increased, the spirituality of the people declined. It is generally agreed that the Deuteronomic code is the legislative fruit of the greatest spiritual revival in Jewish history; but in that code the tithe is little more than a device to regularize, in the form of a temple-meal, the more ancient and irregular home feasts at which the worshipper and the invited guests acknowledged Jehovah as the source of all their prosperity. The charity, though now "organized," is charity still. After the return from Babylon, however, as the prophetic revival spent itself and religion became increasingly official and ceremonial, the tithe came to assume a quite new importance as a ritual observance, its ethical significance being more and more obscured until Jesus must single out as the very type of unspiritual religion and anti-social conduct a man who "gave tithes of all he possessed."

It is avowedly this final phase of the tithe that we are asked to restore. The appeal is to the priestly rather than the prophetic practice of the Old Testament. Nor is it mere imitation of the Judaic system that is proposed. The "law of the tithe," we are told, is of permanent obligation. It is of no moment that Paul says: "Ye are not under law, but under grace":—as to this law, there is an exception. Indeed, it is not a "law" but a "principle" of equal rigor with the ten commandments! Can we doubt the consequences? There is a moral gravitation in all legalism. Whatever tends, even remotely, to shift the emphasis from character to ritual, from inspiration to rules, from liberty to mechanism, from love to law, is, however good its motive, ethically dangerous. "If righteousness come by the law, then Christ has died in vain."

A PRIESTLY APPEAL

Again: "tithing" tends to perpetuate the unreal distinction between secular and sacred. Here we are met with a storm of protest. "Just the opposite," we are told; "the tithe is the first-fruits that sanctifies the whole increase." The sincerity of the disclaimer is unquestioned; but the facts are against it. The inner logic of the situation is ethical dualism. When the tithe is thought of as "God's part," the unavoidable inference is that the remainder is, in some sense, not so exclusively his. Not everyone, of course, is as crude as the revivalist who, according to a press interviewer, made two piles of the evening's offering and, placing his hand on the smaller, said: "This is God's; and"—shifting his hand to the larger—"this is mine." But it is in that general direction that "tithing" drifts. If the tithe is, indeed, "God's share or portion"; if it is like "rent or interest," "a fixed rate" which you "pay," not "give"; if it is "the part you set aside for religious uses"—the suggestion (I use the word in its full psychological sense) which even well-intentioned people will not be able wholly to resist, is that God and self represent in some sense rival interests, between which adjustment has to be made. Religion thus tends to be thought of as segregation rather than consecration. God is "cornered" in the life. The tithe, along with other "religious" observances, becomes more or less a substitute for the right social relationships which are the true "first-fruits." Scrupulosity in "tithing" slips into something very like unscrupulousness in other things. On no other ground can we account for the number of well-meaning people who are meticulous tithers, but whose characters are unsacrificial, their business methods questionable, their relationships to their fellowman not those of strict justice. These people are not insincere. They are victims of the proxy-religion of "separated portions." For the most part, they honestly believe themselves to be religious, just as the super-tithers of Amos' and Jesus' time did; but their religion is a thing of the sanctuary, not of the street. John Ruskin has defined their case: "We have a nominal and pretended religion to which we give one-tenth of our money and one-seventh of our time, and we have a practical and real religion to which we give nine-tenths of our money and six-sevenths of our time." Why not?—if the tenth and seventh are "rent or interest" paid to God. "Shall I not take mine ease in mine own inn?"

PAGANISTIC TITHING

That this is not hyper-criticism is evidenced by one argument that occurs over and over again in the "tithing" literature. "Tithing pays." It is laid down as a law of the spiritual universe, that he who honors God with the tenth will be prospered as to the other nine-tenths. I have space only for a single, but typical, specimen:

A German Lutheran father and a Roman Catholic mother left their boy uninstructed in religious matters. He became a lumberman and found a Bible in his cabin, which he read through twice. What it said about tithing and the Father's care impressed him deeply, so he joined church and began to tithe, paying $40 immediately out of his accumulated savings. He got a distinct blessing. Later, he went into business, did not tithe till the end of that year, and lost all he had through a fire. Starting again, he tithed faithfully, has been prospered, and is looking for places to put money for God.

It is hard to be patient with teaching of this sort. It is pure paganism, without its excuse. A millennium or two ago, Jacob did it even better than we. True to type he held back his tithes till after the prosperity; we, in this more adventurous and speculative age, are to pay our tithes in expectation of the prosperity. It is true that Jacob got rich: but how? By lying and cheating. Was God a partner in the Laban "deal?" We have known of large fortunes made by tithers, but—"Behold the hire of the laborers . . . which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth out; and the cries of those that have reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth." I have also known of tithers who have been anything but prosperous. But, of course, such commonplace things as facts never inconvenience a theological theory.

Is there, then, no place in Christianity for the system of the tithe (here we drop the quotation marks)? We think there is. Note that we say "system" not "law" or "principle." Tithing is a means to an end—the sanctification of our money. Tithing should bear the same relation to our life as money-earners that stated times and places of worship bear to our total life-activities. It may be made a sacrament. That all life should be prayerful, is no argument against the closet-prayer. That all our time should be spent religiously, is no reason why we should not "keep the Sabbath." That "every common bush is aflame with God," is the best reason why I should go to church. The stated time, place and attitude create a mood of worship which subconsciously will tend to abide with me always and everywhere—sanctifying all of life. So the stated gift need not be a ritual gift; it may and ought to be the occasion for orienting our whole life religiously, the emotional basis for the habit of sacrificial living.

SYSTEMATIC GIVING

In the second place, tithing is systematic giving. "Let everything be done decently and in order." System is not all of right living, but it is a large part of it. There is a business side both to individual character and church-life. If we are God's stewards, he expects us to administer his estate at least as carefully and intelligently as we administer our business. Imagine a business without some system of budgeting and accounting! Yet there are those who think the greatest business on earth can be run at haphazard. Of course, tithing here need not mean strictly a tenth. It may be less or more; but at least it is a fixed amount set aside "as God hath prospered us" for the extension of his kingdom on earth. Unsystematic giving is careless giving and nine times out of ten the careless giver is the little giver. It would astonish some of us to know just how little we do give to others in comparison with ourselves. Tithing forces us to face the facts and see ourselves as the church treasurer—and God—sees us.

Tithing, too, is proportionate giving. Where all is God's we cannot "keep accounts with him," but we can and ought to keep accounts with ourselves and our neighbors. All I possess must be spent religiously, i. e., for higher spiritual ends; but I must use my "sanctified common-sense" in its distribution between the various causes that appeal to my Christian sympathy. Our first obligations are, of course, the social ones of family support and economic justice. We must pay our debts first. Jesus was explicit here, both in the Corban passage and the Sermon on the Mount: "If therefore, thou art offering thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way, first be reconciled to thy brother and then come and offer thy gift." After that, how shall I divide my surplus? All "causes" are not of the same relative importance. God expects me to discriminate. There is a relative urgency of the "causes" expressible in fractional shares of the available gift-fund. But there is one institution that stands out as of unique significance for the spiritual life of the world, namely, the church. None other is comparable. The church is with us always, while the Near East Relief or the China Famine

Fund are merely occasional, and, in any case, are included in the church's mission. The church supplies the motive and urge without which there would be no question of Christian giving at all. It is the fountain head of all sympathy. It keeps the spirit of love alive in the world. Above all, it is the divinely appointed means of redemption, and, however imperfectly, is about the business of bringing the whole world to the feet of Jesus Christ. Other causes may be good, but this is best of all. Others are appealing, this is imperative. Others are matters of individual preference, this allows no latitude to the Christian man.

There is no question here of division between "God and me." All belongs to God; but since his church is the well-spring of all other philanthropy, he expects us to support it first, and lest in the multiplicity of good causes this cause should suffer, it is the part of reason and of privilege to set aside a definite proportion of our income at the beginning of each year for this purpose exclusively. Then we can say, not "This is God's and this my own"; but "This belongs to the church, this to the Y. M. C. A., Salvation Army, Red Cross, etc.; AND ALL BELONGS TO GOD."

VERSE

April

APRIL'S come to town,
Looking debonair,
Clad in emerald gown,
Buds within her hair;
Love's the only crown
Beauty needs to wear.
Hail her, maidens, duly;
Come is she but newly
From her happy Thule,
Bringing all that's fair.

April's at the door,
Violets to show.
Greet her, maids, before,
Vision-like, she go;
Bid your hearts no more
Harvest weeds of woe.
March with all his bluster
Had no power to muster
Half the joy and luster
Days of April know.

CHARLES G. BLANDEN.

Prayer

WHITE CAPTAIN of my soul, lead on;
I follow thee, come dark or dawn.
Only vouchsafe three things I crave:
Where terror stalks, help me be brave!
Where righteous ones can scarce endure
The siren call, help me be pure!
Where vows grow dim, and men dare do
What once they scorned, help me be true!

ROBERT FREEMAN.

Springfield—A Walled Town

By Vachel Lindsay

[This article by Springfield's distinguished poet is partly prompted by Mr. Lindsay's desire to add his invitation to Disciples ministers and laymen to attend the Disciples Congress which is to be held in First Christian Church, Springfield, May 4-6. It is the latest utterance of this "preacher" of the Gospel of Beauty for villages and community neighborhoods, which gospel was the foundation of this poet's fame.—THE EDITOR.]

RALPH ADAMS CRAM has issued a book which I wish every civic patriot would read: "Walled Towns." The price is $1.25, and it is published by Marshall Jones Company, 212 Summer Street, Boston, Massachusetts. There is much in this book with which I disagree, but its fundamental idea I accept. He advocates the return in all things to "the unit of the human scale." The "free city" and the "walled town" make up the solution of many of our difficulties, and only through such an institution can successfully be accomplished the destruction of imperialism, materialism, and the quantitative standard which Dr. Cram declares are the three errors of modernism.

In what respect is Springfield, Illinois, already a walled town? First through the Lincoln tradition. This was Abraham Lincoln's only home after he started out in the law, till he left for Washington. His residence here is a place of pilgrimage for thousands yearly, as is his tomb at Oak Ridge Cemetery. There are fourteen places that have been or are to be marked as significant sites in the town's history in connection with Lincoln—his old law offices, etc. Just a little to the northwest is Salem, where Lincoln spent his earlier manhood. The grave of Anne Rutledge, near Petersburg, was marked lately by Henry B. Rankin, an old Springfield resident and distinguished Lincoln biographer. The inscription is by Edgar Lee Masters, and is the most famous inscription in The Spoon River Anthology.

"Out of me, unworthy, and unknown,
The vibrations of deathless music:—
'With malice toward none,
With charity for all.'
Out of me the forgiveness of millions toward millions,
And the beneficent face of a nation
Shining with justice and truth.
I am Anne Rutledge, who sleep beneath these weeds,
Beloved in life of Abraham Lincoln.
Wedded to him, not through union,
But through separation.
Bloom forever, O Republic,
From the dust of my bosom."

SPOON RIVER TRADITION

Another reason why Springfield, Illinois, is a walled town is that it is definitely in the Spoon River region, and full of a similar tradition from the stories of Old Aunt Hannah Armstrong to Fiddler Jones. The actual Spoon River country is just a little northwest of the Lincoln country. Edgar Lee Masters' brother, father, and mother, live in Springfield, and the poet is a frequent visitor of the town and region. The Spoon River Anthology is fundamentally down-state Illinois in mood, and the difference between Indiana and Illinois is the difference between Riley and Masters.

But speaking more specifically from the standpoint of Ralph Adams Cram, Springfield is also a walled town because of her special local pride in her present graces. There are an extraordinary number of old trees and young trees, and a system of parks. These always stir the pride of the local citizen. The passion for bird-boxes is growing, and Governor Small has filled the yard of the executive mansion with them. And to harp on another thing, we have here two very old and established newspapers, the morning Journal and the evening Register. And my definition of the town is the whole region, as far as those newspapers are the dominant papers, that is, throughout central Illinois. Springfield is also a walled town from the standpoint of the imagination of everyday in that she has her own municipal flag, to wave in the face of all enemies, a flag more used and with more copies on actual display than the municipal flag of Chicago. The iridescent shining red star in the silken center is the symbol of Springfield proper, and shines out in the blue field of the flag with great power. Just behind it is the larger white star that symbolizes Illinois, and around that star are twenty smaller ones to indicate the twenty states first admitted to the union. Visitors to Springfield can scarcely be said to have reached the city till they have noted and understood our handsome and shining municipal flags, which wave from our city hall battlements and the like as bravely as Ralph Adams Cram pictures the municipal flags of medieval towns. The city has the hope of a growing flag ritual, and this flag, evolved by the Springfield Art Club, is one of the spiritual splendors of the place. In the sentiment that hangs round it is the beginning of all our future development. Springfield sees itself as a separate nation, as compared to other cities, a nation, yet an integral part of the empire, the non-imperial empire of the United States.

CITY PATRIOTISM

I have lately distributed ten copies of Ralph Adams Cram's book to ten representative people of the city, in the greatest confidence that its fundamental argument will meet their approval. We are thinking on such things constantly in Springfield. We see our future as an intensive growth. I was recently talking with a leading Springfield politician who agreed with me that the only way to re-establish the old states rights idea to its due strength in the federal system is by the building up of such city patriotism as we have here, and the definition of a free Illinois must be henceforth a stubborn union of free and unhampered cities. Illinois patriotism is a vague abstraction, since practically every railroad and telegraph wire crosses the borders and goes across the whole country. But in our intimate village all the people see each other once a day or once a week or once a year. We are actually a unit, moving together on all grand occasions. On Armistice Day the entire city was on the street to the last well baby and the last tottering old man. The city then proved itself a unit indeed. By nine o'clock in the morning the mobs that had marched the streets since four, became an orderly parade, as clean-cut as the world ever saw, with every band playing. The city is a walled town, a unit, and moves as one man if it moves at all. Every man spoke to every other, face to face, on Armistice Day.

The definition of your city is:—"those you are apt to meet often, face to face." We know it here. We have built a wall of fancy around our neighborhood. We are assuming that it takes one hundred years to make a town, and this town will be made by us, and the children, and grandchildren and great-grandchildren of the very people who are walking the streets here today. This sense of continuity is now in our blood. People who move away, make excuses, and return again, or send back to our papers their adventures, and the story of their triumphs. It is definitely a part of the policy of the newspapers to trace every citizen across the world and record his doings. Whatever any Springfieldian does anywhere in the world is our affair, and they cannot escape it, and do not desire to do so. They are still inside our wall.

HIGH SCHOOL

An excellent example of the cumulative force of our hope in Springfield is the history of our High School. When I graduated from the Springfield High School in 1897 it was a silly little building on top of a cinder pile, right next to the railroad, and trains going by every fifteen minutes and engine smoke coming in through the windows.

The only redeeming features were inside the building—the good teachers and the jolly fellow students. The year after I graduated an enormous new building was put up in a secluded grove in the west part of town, and it seemed we had High School enough for all time. The building looked like a veritable battleship beside a raft compared with the old one, and the grove was and is a lovely thing. But that building soon filled up, and several years ago still another High School structure was erected, in an even more charming grove, a little further to the west, and the old building was relegated to ward-school uses, or Junior High uses. Now this third building, meant to last for years, has pupils sticking out of the windows and doors, and there is talk of an East Side High School. With a city not growing very much, High School attendance has increased since my boyhood from around five hundred to around two thousand. As soon as that East Side High School is built, I know it will fill up in a day. This High School progress indicates an idealism that grows faster than the proverbial American "prosperity." This indicates a walled town. This indicates a town where good citizenship and hope for the future are stronger than the "materialism," "imperialism," and the quantitative theory of life which Ralph Adams Cram has so justly declared are the three great errors of "modernism." Our hope may be said to be all in the future, but that future is indeed real. One final necessity in a great walled town, upon which Cram insists again and again, perhaps too mediævally, is a set of splendid and significant shrines of the patron saint. We have many shrines of Lincoln, and pilgrims year after year. We are beginning to be a walled town and a "free city."

British Table Talk

Anglican and Free Church Reunion Negotiations Reach an Impasse

THE outstanding event of the annual assembly of the National Free Church Council at Manchester in March was the presentation to it by the Archbishop of York of the proposals for reunion made by the 260 bishops who met at Lambeth last summer. This was the first appearance of an archbishop on the platform of the "nonconformist parliament." Received with the utmost cordiality, Dr. Cosmo Gordon Lang was listened to with the closest attention and the profoundest respect. No advocate of any cause could have been more conciliatory and persuasive. Free churchmen, to use his own phrase, heard "a new tone in the Anglican voice." In his anxiety to win over his hearers, his grace almost strained the limits of his brief from Lambeth. The "Christian World" says he was "much more plausible than convincing in the painful effort to minimize the effect of reordination." It fell to Principal Griffith-Jones to respond to the episcopal overture, and in trenchant phrase he voiced the feeling of practically the whole assembly. He regretted that Lambeth had adopted the ceremonial instead of the spiritual test of fellowship, thus excluding Quakers and the Salvation Army. Free churchmen, he said, could not consent to any form of reunion which involved the principle of uniformity; which necessitated reordination, and which aimed at the inclusion of Rome—so long as she remained what she is. Remarking that "the hopes raised by the Lambeth appeal have been sadly dissipated," the "Church Times" takes the view that "every fundamental was challenged by those who spoke after" the archbishop at Manchester, and makes the ominous comment that "to claim membership of the catholic church for religious bodies that reject baptism, or substitute the waving of a flag for the sacrament ordained by our Lord, is to make a demand which is tantamount to shutting the door upon all hope of Christian reunion." The "Guardian" recognizes that a scheme of reunion that excluded Friends and Salvationists would be imperfect, and regrets that the Manchester discussions "brought us no nearer to the desired haven."

* * *

The Free Church Position

The discussion at Manchester served the useful purpose of clearing the air on the eve of the publication of what is virtually, if not in form, the authoritative response of the Free churches to the Lambeth appeal. Drawn up by a joint committee (Principal Selbie, chairman, and Prof. P. Carnegie Simpson, convener of the Federal and National Free Church Councils, the report speaks for seven denominations—Baptist, Congregational, Wesleyan Methodist, Presbyterian, Primitive Methodist, United Methodist, and Moravian—but disclaims official authority, leaving each to make its own reply. While not lacking the fraternal spirit and earnest desire for reunion that dominate the Lambeth appeal, the statement is a masterly presentation of the Free church case. "Church people," says the "Guardian," "will have nothing but gratitude for the spirit and language of the report," which the "Church Family Newspaper" calls "a straightforward and courageous document." After premising that "the essentials of the church are in the gospel, not in organization," the report considers three main matters. (1) "Without the cordial and practical recognition of one another's church standing, proposals for union cannot be carried out and indeed can hardly with propriety be suggested"; yet, as "it is hardly to be supposed that all or the greater part of nonepiscopal Christendom—in, e. g., Scotland or America—will enter at once within the Lambeth scheme of episcopacy," is Anglicanism "prepared to recognize non-episcopal communions (or any of them) as corporate parts of the church of Christ and their ministries as ministries of Christ's word and sacrament? . . . We must not be asked to take any step which would prevent or hamper our continued recognition of sister churches with which we are at present in sacramental fellowship." (2) "We have an open mind towards episcopal order as towards any other," but "we cannot be expected to consider any form of polity which claims to be an exclusive channel of grace." It is recalled that the Mansfield conference of 1920, consisting of Anglicans and Free churchmen, definitely put aside the suggestion of episcopal ordination and substituted the declaration that any mutual authorization was to be "not reordination." "When it is proposed that episcopal clergy should be authorized to officiate in Free churches 'through a form of commission or recognition' which would 'commend' their ministers to those congregations, and that Free church ministers should be authorized to officiate in Anglican congregations by 'a commission through episcopal ordination,' what is meant by this last crucial phrase?" (3) The Lambeth scheme suggests questions which concern spiritual freedom in the relation of the church to (1) the creeds and (2) the state. "Free churchmen generally would be able to give as 'whole hearted' an acceptance to the Christian faith underlying these creeds as do their Anglican brethren," but they "cannot be asked to consent that the civil power . . . has any authority over the spiritual affairs of the church; or, further, to accept any position which would involve injustice, or violate the rights of conscience." Also liberty in regard to forms of baptism cannot be given up.

* * *

The Crux of the Question

From the foregoing it will be seen that efforts on lines so far followed to achieve reunion have reached an impasse. The Archbishop of York (as stated in my March correspondence) foreshadowed this when addressing the Life and Liberty meeting. It has long been evident that the crux of the matter is the question of reordination—though this is not the only problem demanding solution. In their eagerness to win over nonconformists, the bishops at Lambeth indulged in ambiguity. The use of the phrase "a commission through episcopal ordination" in such a way as to imply that it balanced "a form of commission or recognition" (from Free churchmen to Anglicans) was unfortunate. Dean Inge has pointed out in the New York "Churchman," that if Free church ministers submitted to be ordained, "they would not be accepting ordination in the sense intended by the bishops who would confer it," and as Dr. Ramsay says, "there would be a radical insincerity in the heart of it." "To begin to build a union in the church of Christ on a conscious ambiguity," the Free church report gravely points out, with a suggestion of rebuke, "is not to build in God's name and in God's way." Dr. Frederic Burgess, one of the four American bishops who did not sign the Lambeth resolutions on Unity, told a New York audience in February that "everyone knew that the conference, as a conference, believed in ordination as conferring grace, but it is plain that it was not thought diplomatic or statesmanlike to incorporate into the appeal any such reference." If the "Church Times" is correct in saying that "the bishops went to the utmost limit of concession," reunion is impossible. But, as the Archbishop of York said in February, if all roads so far have been cul desacs, as wise men we must try to find a new road. And he indicated one to the Free Church Council—

"not union realized through uniformity, but unity realized through diversity"—a golden sentence. He suggested that the various societies of Christians might keep their own special character, discipline, and government, and yet be no longer separated but in full and true communion with one another. The church of England might if it so desired retain what is meant by establishment, and the Free churches still reject it without breach of communion with one another." Again, "Episcopacy might be adapted in different ways according to the special traditions of different societies." Unfortunately Dr. Lang had not time for "detailed illustration" of how this ideal might be realized, but the Free church report mentions certain stepping stones—e. g., interchange of pulpits, intercommunion, unity of service. The "Guardian" well says "the chief need of the situation is patience and a sympathetic attempt to understand and appreciate the difficulties of each side." Large numbers of people share the view of our great daily newspaper, "The Times," that the bishops would best serve the church of Christ by waiving the question of episcopal ordination. It concludes a fine spirited editorial with the words: "The ordinary layman cannot understand these points of difference. What he desires is peace and union. We believe that union is possible, and that by coordinating all the different churches on the principle of federation the formation of one great Christian body, neither Episcopalian nor Presbyterian, but both, is a matter of practical politics. But it can only be brought about by putting the Founder of the catholic church first and the church or the churches second. Episcopal ordination is a question neither of faith nor of salvation. Clearly it should not be allowed to stand as a stumbling block and a rock of offence in the way of reunion." The next word lies with the bishops!

* * *

The Disestablishment Issue

A formidable stumbling block to reunion is the state establishment of one branch of the church of Christ. Curiously enough, this important issue has been only incidentally or indirectly mentioned on either side; but sooner or later it will have to be squarely faced. A resolution calling for disestablishment has always been part of the official program of the National Free Church Council, but this year it was omitted, in view of the reunion negotiations. A member of the council's executive, Rev. Silas K. Hocking, in an outspoken protest in the "Christian World" declares that "nonconformity has grown strangely weak kneed in these later days," and asserts that "the sturdy nonconformists of an earlier time would have said that the first essential of union was disestablishment and that there could be no possible union without it. He rejects the idea of a "coalition church," contending that "a state-bound church and a free church cannot run in double harness." In somewhat similar vein Dr. Clifford wrote to the Liberation Society's conference, held in the same city while the Free Church Council was in session: "I appreciate the new spirit which has at last taken possession of the episcopate. It is a recognition of solid and undeniable facts due a century or more ago. Still, better late than never. But it does not carry us far. It leaves us face to face with the vicious principle of a state establishment of a Christian society; and that we are compelled to resist as being unjust in itself and productive of manifold injustices to the people of the state, and as contrary to the spirit and genius of the religion of Jesus. We can never ally ourselves with that." Within the church of England itself there is a movement towards disestablishment—to which, according to the "Church Times," many of her loyal children have turned favorably "as a way of escape from present troubles and humiliations," adding, "Certainly we ourselves have no word to say in defense of the present relation of church and state." These remarks were evoked by the inauguration by "the Federation of Catholic Laity" of a disestablishment campaign. Of course, disestablishment cannot be considered apart from disendowment—and that question raises large issues and divers feelings. ALBERT DAWSON.

CORRESPONDENCE

Some Bona Fide Community Churches

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The denominational community church, as distinguished from the federal church (which geographically and economically may be a community church) is, in my judgment, superior to the old-fashioned "union" church, and to the more modern "federated church," in that, while both seek to give a community program, the former keeps the vision of the wider world service for which the denominational world-wide benevolences and educational and other programs stand, a great deal better than can a union or federated church.

As Prof. A. W. Anthony, late chairman of the commission of state and local federations, of the Federal Council of Churches of America, says: "The denominational church is the best type of community church, because it preserves as no other can all the inheritances of the past, and is allied as no new organization can be with all the agencies for the varied and far-reaching ministrations of the church in this and other lands." There are other grounds of superiority, such as greater tenacity of life, larger sense of responsibility, etc., but I would like to give some actual results of denominational community church work, as revealed by answers to correspondence with more than fifty such churches in existence.

The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, under its Department of Country Life and Churches, has twenty-seven "demonstration churches" of this type. The Methodist Episcopal Church has a number, under a similar department. The Methodist Protestants, the Congregationalists, and other bodies have such churches.

The community church at Irasburg, Vt., is an example of saving money and serving the community better. The salary of the Methodist church including house rent, was $800; that of the Congregational the same. Now one minister serves both at $1,200 and house. He is better off, and the community has $400 for the Lord's use. It is now a M. E. Community church, under the Vermont agreement of what is known as "reciprocal exchange."

By this mode of cooperation, sixty churches in the state have been reduced to thirty-seven, freeing twenty-one ministers for other work, at a time when ministers are at a premium, and saving $2,900 home missionary money that was formerly spent in bolstering up the denominational weakling churches that have been merged.

Skamowaka, Wash., is another Methodist community church which was paying a minister $800, but since it began to work along the line of community interests, is able to pay $1,000. Where there were three ministers, one now does the work. He considers every man, woman and child in the community as belonging to his parish, and ministers to all indiscriminately. Favorable sentiment towards the church as an institution has increased 100 per cent.

Weaverville, N. C., is a Presbyterian community church. It includes Baptists, Methodists and others; has increased 100 per cent in membership. The name "Presbyterian" is almost forgotten.

The Independence Community Church, Batesville, Mass., has succeeded in consolidating four small district schools and getting a $4,000 high school bond issue voted. It is building a $5,000 manse. For ten years, the minister writes, "I filled 'appointments' until I was tired of it, and resolved to develop one community." He is now planning for a community nurse, motion pictures, and the organization "of everything and everybody that can contribute to community uplift." This is a Presbyterian church.

The Union Evangelical Church, of Heath, Mass., functions its benevolences through the Congregational boards. It includes Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists. "This is my seventh year here," writes the minister, "and there has been perfect harmony and brotherly love all the way along." It is the only Protestant church in the little town of Heath.

Eighteen to twenty-five miles from a railroad, the White Rock, N. C., Presbyterian Community Church finds the movies a means of social and educational uplift. No one else does anything for the entertainment of the community. The church is also working on a rural credit and a community fair. Medical work, and a new hospital are features of community helpfulness. Religious workers of all denominations cooperate splendidly.

A storm at Pleasant Plain, O., was the agent for hastening community church work, by destroying two church houses. There was a talk of rebuilding, but finally the two unhoused denominations asked the Presbyterian church to mother them all. After three years' trial the success of the merger is more than assured.

The Methodist Protestant church at Kasbeer, Ill., has solved the problem of community cooperation by holding a spring institute for farmers, by turning a room in the manse into a reading room and club for boys, with whom the pastor camps, swims, plays. The church also gave a three days' Chautauqua free to all. Pig, poultry and garden clubs are fostered among the boys and girls. The minister says: "All these needed activities would amount to nothing, if we lost sight of the spiritual. Last Easter nine splendid young men dedicated themselves at the altar." This helps to answer a question that many would like to ask of community churches: "Do they hold up the spiritual work?"

Another Methodist Protestant community church is that of Harmony Grove, Mo. It has recently established a high school, much needed and wanting just the initiative and leadership which the church has given. The "Home Coming Days" are attended by thousands. Automobiles crowd the grounds. The church has a hand in quickening and supporting every community interest, yet is the scene of evangelistic refreshings, when the spirit is poured out as in the day of Pentecost.

Walker's parish, Albermarle County, Va., is trying an interesting experiment in community church life. At Stony Point an Episcopal church was formed of forty-two communicants, and an associate membership of more than that. The associate members are scattered members of other churches, who, without changing their relationship thereto, become affiliated with the community congregation. The Episcopal rector is pastor.

In the Brownsville Methodist Protestant Community Church, Ohio, three small denominational organizations did the bigger, better, wiser thing—they laid down their denominationalism for the advancement of the kingdom. Out of three small Sunday schools one large community school has been made, the primary department alone is as large as any of the old schools. There is a weekly prayer meeting of from forty to fifty, a choir of thirty, a children's choir, larger financial offerings and a general uplift of spirit and purpose.

At Niles, Mich., the Methodist, United Brethren and Disciples churches have united and invited Rev. Harold Holt, of the Trinity Episcopal Church, to give his Sunday evenings and two days a week to ministering to them. Mr. Holt is also acting as truant officer for Niles, and organizing the Boy Scouts. Church attendance has increased 40 per cent.

Rev. R. E. Brooks, of the Methodist Protestant church, has dedicated his life to the country community church work. He has taken several years of special training, including a course in agriculture. At the recent Rally Day of the Shiloh Community Church, Ohio, to which he has been called, a school centralization project was one of the subjects of discussion, by school superintendents and principals. The new building, replacing one burned, will be especially adapted for community work.

The dying Methodist Episcopal church at Rockford, Ill., has now become the Winnebago Street Community Church in a field of 6,000 people, only one-third of whom are American born. There are Italians, Lithuanians, Poles, Negroes, Germans, Irish and French. This is the only white, English speaking church in South Rockford. It will have, by means of aid from the Centenary Fund, an assistant to the pastor, a deaconess, a physical director, and other part time helpers. The new community program is broad and sympathetic. Many a church similarly situated must either die or change to a community ministration.

The Ridgefield, Wash., Presbyterian church, has added the name "Community Church," with a board of trustees formed; a Baptist chairman, an Episcopalian, a Methodist, a Baptist and a Presbyterian. The pastor is a Congregationalist. There are two denominations still outside—the Nazarenes and Adventists. The town has approximately 900; two churches would be ample to accommodate all the people.

I note in conclusion that in Billings, Mont., and Winfred, S. D., there are Congregational community churches, both of which are very active, judging from their programs. The former is so efficient that it has been offered a new free site for a church by a sugar company, and the latter has plans for a $14,000 brick building, towards which ten men subscribed $500 each.

These are but a few of the facts concerning the hundred or more denominational community churches in the United States. They will, perhaps, encourage others needing cooperation to make their work successful, to remove the stigma of a losing sectarian fight in a community, and get together and go on to victory. There will be obstacles to overcome, problems to work out; but doubtless all these will be mastered by a sincere determination to quit wasting the resources of the Master and make every dollar and every man count to the utmost in bringing in his kingdom.

The writer believes that thousands of feeble rural and village churches that will be lost without this spirit, may be yet saved by the use of common sense and brotherliness.

San Diego, Calif.

JOHN F. COWAN.

Puts Clergy Fares up to Laity

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As a new subscriber I have been astonished at the ability shown and the inspiration conveyed in your columns. If you keep up this pace I suppose I will have to be a life-long subscriber. I had thought to hold my peace. But the letter of Mr. T. W. A. Williams on "Clergy Fares" in the issue of March 31 makes it a little difficult to do so. A few statements he makes should not pass unchallenged.

1. "I say to you frankly that I do not want any preacher pointing out to me the better life who is riding around the country, in whole or in part, at the expense of the public." Is not this a clearly implied challenge of dishonesty and moral unfitness? If the pastor of Mr. Williams honestly looked at this matter in a different way, would he have to conform to the ideas of his parishioner in order to get along at all? Some of us think our own freedom of action is the corner-stone of our public work. In over a quarter of a century of ministry I have had only one parishioner who objected to a clerical permit, and he is still my firm friend. He was not violent in his objection.

2. The "sinners with whom" he "associates" agree with him in this matter. Are they always infallible in their moral judgments? There is reason at times to think otherwise.

3. The railroads recognize the value of the services of ministers and churches in making character in the people with whom they have to deal. In offering a reduction of fare to ministers they are partially paying the obligation to the institutions of religion which they and all other forms of wealth really owe. What is wrong about accepting it when they so offer? If the acceptance of this contribution is wrong, then it is equally wrong for any church or philanthropic agency to accept a cent from any corporation or firm as such unless the full consent of the least and last stockholder has been obtained. Not only do thousands of such firms and corporations make such contributions without such secured consent, but such are uniformly received so far as I know. The war-work agencies recently received many such heavy contributions. If the principle to which Mr. Williams adheres is correct, all who received such should have the same odium heaped upon them that he seems to think the ministers accepting reduced fares deserve.

But as a matter of fact, if the writer represents the typical layman's view in the matter, the laymen of the country can remedy this matter over night. Let the laymen of each church call their pastor to meet with them; ask him how much necessary traveling he does on the railroads in a year; tell him they want his permit for fuel and that in addition to his salary they will pay him the amount which the necessary travel would cost him above the reduced fare. Then the clergy permit is eliminated and by the only people who ought to eliminate it—the people of the church. It is easy for the writer to say to the preachers "Make us fellows in the pews pay full fare on our ministers' salaries, so they can pay full fare on the railroads." But when a minister begins to work to the advantage of his own pocket-book his usefulness at any place is ended. This is purely the layman's business. And the minister gets tired of being the "goat" for every idea, wise or otherwise, that is advanced.

After finding so many things in the article from which to dissent, it is a pleasure to say that I heartily agree with what Mr. Williams has to say about any lobbying or asking even that the law be changed so as to compel the granting of these permits. Such a thing is utterly repulsive. I do not want reduced fares wrung from unwilling corporations or contributions gotten from people who are unwilling to give them to the work of the church. I would rather, following the example of the great apostle, work with my hands in addition to the work of the ministry; or, if that should be impossible, quit it altogether. I believe the ministry generally wants to do the fair thing in all these business matters. But under present conditions, many of us see no sin in accepting reduced fares when they are freely offered, or accepting from The Christian Century a reduced subscription rate. When convinced otherwise, it will be by the reasons presented and not by insinuations of moral obliquity gratuitously offered.

Pastor Presbyterian Church,
Laurel, Nebraska.

W. O. HARPER.

Contributors to This Issue

GEORGE GLEASON, for twenty years a Y. M. C. A. representative in Japan; attached to Japanese troops in Siberia during recent war; intimately acquainted with Japan's political leadership. A book by Mr. Gleason—"What Shall I Think of Japan?"—is expected from the Macmillan press before the close of this month and Dr. Gulick prophesies that it will command instant and widespread attention.

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, who succeeded R. J. Campbell in the pulpit of City Temple, London; now minister Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City.

VACHEL LINDSAY, one of the outstanding figures in modern poetry. Mr. Lindsay is fresh from a visit to England, where he lectured and read his verses at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

H. D. C. MACLACHLAN, minister Seventh Street Church of Disciples, Richmond, Va.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

"Loving God With the Mind"*

BISHOP McCONNELL, known as the brainiest Methodist Bishop, is now resident in Pittsburgh. We are proud of him, we also love him. In his opening address before the Union Ministerial Meeting, with about 500 preachers present, he spoke on this challenging and highly potential theme, "Loving God with the Mind." Mind you, we must not lose sight of the loving. In our love of God we will cultivate and consecrate our minds. I took no notes and in this essay I shall not embarrass the good Bishop by implying that he is the author of any of my ideas; I only know that I left the meeting with the profound impression that I would be honoring God if I made the most of my brains.

This brings up the whole matter of education, which simply means the development into fullest capacities of all your powers. Here is a stream of water; intelligence harnesses it and causes it to turn a mill-wheel to grind wheat for bread. Here is a section of land; intelligence brings down the waters from the hills, and the ash-heap becomes a garden. Every child is a bundle of possibilities. To help him discover and develop his powers is the noble function of the true teacher. What is finer than the gradual development of a personality! But to die with all the music in you—what is sadder!

An orange grove—with spraying and fertilization—produces bountifully. Can one be content without doing these things? The automobile with a clean and adjusted engine does twice the work. Can you permit the carbon and the knocks? A man is only half a man who is not educated. But education does not mean four years of football and cigars! A college has certain disciplines: mathematics, to develop accurate reasoning, to adjust the cogs of your brain so that $2 \times 2 = 4$ and not 3 or 5 or 27; science, to teach mastery over nature so that all the forces shall become your slaves, bound and guided; literature, to introduce you to the good, beautiful and true in other minds; art, to open your eyes to form, color and symmetry; language, to train memory and to give sympathy with other civilizations; history, to reveal the glories and mistakes of other ages. Disciplines—by these our minds are exercised and strengthened to meet and grapple with the ceaseless procession of problems.

It is tragic to make a succession of wrong decisions and yet that is what the uneducated person is always doing; the half developed mind being incapable of accurate reactions.

Therefore every parent's primary concern is with health and education. Our public school system has serious faults—wooden processes and wooden teachers. Our colleges need fresh inspirations; too many false notions prevail. Education should develop a clean, reliable, accurate, radiant personality—a healthy body and a keen mind.

But without soul the whole long process is empty and idle. And nothing can put soul into a man but religion, and no religion can put soul worth while into a man but that kind of a religion which Jesus teaches. O Teacher—let us sit at thy feet.

JOHN R. EWERS.

BOOKS

THE VOICE OF THE NEGRO. By Robert T. Kerlin. There are a few, very few, radical Negro publications. On the other hand there are three or four hundred Negro newspapers and magazines, secular and religious, which go their steady way daily, weekly, monthly to the Negro leaders of the land. A good number are poor in workmanship, technique and appearance. Many are of real journalistic excellence. On the whole the Negro press is conservative albeit it speaks more plainly than formerly of injustice done to and indignities heaped upon members of the race. Robert

T. Kerlin, Professor of English in the Virginia Military Institute, a Southern white man, has rendered a conspicuous service in his interpretation of the thinking of the Negro to the white people of the country. Words of Negroes speak for themselves.

Professor Kerlin has made selections from all shades of opinion reflected in eighty Negro publications sent out from centers ranging from Massachusetts to Georgia. Some are radical. Most are conservative. The author himself states in his preface his own aim: "The following work is a compilation from the colored press of America for the four months immediately succeeding the Washington riot. It is designed to show the Negro's reaction to that and like events following, and to the World War and the discussion of the Treaty. It may, in the editor's estimation, be regarded as a primary document in promoting a knowledge of the Negro, his point of view, his way of thinking upon race relations, his grievances, his aspirations, his demands." Professor Kerlin arranges his excerpts—for that is the method of the book and not interpretation—under the following heads: The Colored Press, The New Era, The Negro's Reactions to the World War, The Negro's Grievances and Demands, Riots, Lynchings, The South and the Negro, The Negro and Labor Unionism and Bolshevism, Negro Progress, The Lyric Cry.

If the members of the white race would know of what the Negro is thinking they must go to the Negro newspapers and magazines. It is in them the Negro speaks out with freedom, with justice to himself, for there he speaks as a Negro to Negroes, and he is aware that the white people do not so much as know of the existence of his papers. (Dutton $2.50.)

EVERYDAY AMERICANS. By Henry Seidel Canby. In his racy style the talented literary editor of the New York Evening Post has here ventured an analysis of American life on its psychological side. He finds in America a typical way of thinking, an American mind, which, in spite of our heterogeneous population is distinctive in character. He calls this type conservative-liberal: "the man who was born a liberal in a liberal country and intends to remain as he was born." In other words, America is the land of people who are supremely bent upon conserving a tradition of what was once liberalism. And American education, which has consisted largely in the transmission of a sacrosanct liberal tradition, has in the very process "petrified American liberalism." Hence the contrast between the quick and altogether efficient response of Americans, young and old, to the war emergency, and the meagre functioning in ordinary life for which our education succeeds in preparing our youth.

Mr. Canby finds a true radicalism in America, and by this he means, not the parlor variety—or the soap-box variety—of social theorizing, but the radicalism of physical and moral achievement. And yet this radicalism of achievement has not yet connected with our idealism which, while it pervades our literature, appears in life only sporadically in time of crisis. The idealistic zeal for democracy which the war evoked presently "collapsed like the second day of 'clean-up' week." America, characterized as it is by indifferentism, is approaching a crisis on which hangs all that is of worth in her tradition. In the author's mind all depends upon the "bourgeois" American, who is no longer middle class, but dominant; upon the vitality of his ideals and his religion. The author suggests that the key to this future is to be found in the younger labor leaders and the college undergraduates. Mr. Canby's analysis is shrewd, stimulating, challenging. The book is especially valuable to educators, preachers and social workers. (Century Co. $1.75.)

BOOKS

Any book in print may be secured from The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago. Give name of publisher, if possible.

*Lesson for May 1, "Bible Teachings About Education." Scripture, Deut. 6:4-9; Prov. 3:13-18; Luke 2:52.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

A Campaign of Community Evangelism

An example of the results that may be reached by a group of churches working together in the community spirit is afforded by a recent experience of the eight cooperating congregations of Boise, Idaho. The ministers and officers of these churches planned a united campaign of evangelism. They organized effectively with chairmen of the different departments of the enterprise. There was carefully prepared publicity, in which the local press performed admirably its part. The preaching was done in rotation by the eight ministers. They were given full liberty of theme and treatment. Yet the impression made was that of a unified program, and a definite, coherent evangelical message. The audiences grew from the first, and far more than filled the buildings that were available for the service. The city was of one mind and voice in its approval of the plan. The most convincing feature was the unity of the effort, which could not fail to impress the entire community. In the progress of the meetings more than four hundred persons united with the various churches, and the results in the way of numbers have been continuous since. It was felt by all concerned to be a most worthwhile adventure in Christian cooperation. It is highly probable that many communities would welcome just such united efforts by the local leaders in the churches. It is a prophecy of a coming and successful form of evangelistic effort.

Bishop Proposes Plan of Union with Methodists

The Bishop of London addressed a group of Wesleyans recently—Wesleyans are English Methodists who have no bishops—and suggested that henceforth at every Wesleyan ordination a bishop of the Established church be present to assist. After a generation had passed, there would be no minister in the denomination who did not have the apostolic tradition in his ministry. The bishop assured the Methodists that there would be no interference with the work of the denomination, but it would go on as usual. There are many Wesleyans who regard this proposal with favor. They are not averse to the idea of a bishop provided it does not involve any dogma or any suggestion that the orders in the Wesleyan church have not been valid previously.

Catholics Complain About Publicity

Probably none of the churches feel that they receive fair treatment at the hands of the secular press, for religious news is usually treated inadequately. There has long been the feeling on the part of the Protestants that the Catholics had the inside track with the newspapers. The various Catholic journals have been making comparisons recently, and have come to the conclusion that the Protestants have far and away the most publicity. This opinion is backed up with facts and figures. The Catholic journals find no ground for optimism, but assert that the man who wants Catholic news should subscribe for a Catholic newspaper. The newspapers have great difficulty in getting religious news. A few have hired religious editors and have developed religious departments which are creditable, but that is expensive. The churches will only secure their proper amount of publicity in the newspapers when they build up national publicity organizations. The newspapers must have some authoritative source to which they may turn for the timely information which can properly go into a paper.

Sunday School Bus Is Here to Stay

It is either the Sunday school bus or little struggling churches out in the outskirts of every city. Few children will walk more than a mile to Sunday school and in the sparsely settled sections of a city that would mean feeble churches. In many sections of the country the Sunday school bus has been chosen as the proper alternative. Euclid Avenue Presbyterian Church, of Los Angeles, has a Sunday school bus which has been in operation for six months. At least a hundred new members have been brought into the Sunday school. The bus has cost the school $15.50 per week. As soon as the school is able to finance another bus, it will be put into operation to serve another section of the city. Both grown-ups and children are carried. Mothers who would not trust the little children on the streets alone readily trust them to the Sunday school bus.

Chicago Presbyterians Secure Summer Camp

The Chicago Presbytery has come into possession of a 143 acre summer camp in Michigan called Camp Gray. During this coming summer five thousand dollars will be spent on charitable fresh air outings at this camp. Later it is the plan to develop a summer conference. This plan has already been proven successful by the work of Moody Church, of Chicago, at Cedar Lake, Ind. They have large grounds at a place where only the ungodly were accustomed to resort in days gone by, and hundreds of people assemble through the summer to hear a program of addresses, and to rest in the country. Individual churches also have summer camps. Fourth Presbyterian Church of Chicago has a camp on Lake Geneva which is accessible to the summer conferences. The Winnetka Community church has a summer camp in Michigan. The dining room is a wooden structure in which are stored the camp equipment used for the various Sunday school classes which have outings in the course of the summer.

Great Ingathering at Easter

The church statisticians are greatly interested in the reports that continue to come in with regard to the Easter season this year. From all sections of the country are reports of record audiences and large classes of converts. The Protestant churches have been at a standstill in recent years in the matter of growth, but it is felt that there is to be a big step forward this year. The method of pastoral classes at Easter is evidently superseding the old mass evangelism. The evangelists object that the Easter classes make conversions a matter of seasonal interest in the church. The reply to this is that the church with an annual revival also made recruiting a seasonal interest.

Speer Defends the Missionaries of China

Recently Dr. W. H. Griffith-Thomas delivered some addresses before the Bible Conference in Chicago in the course of which he brought charges of heresy against most of the missionaries of China. He found them afflicted with the disease of modernism. Dr. Robert E. Speer spoke recently before the Presbyterian Social Union of Philadelphia. He referred to the charges made by Dr. Griffith-Thomas and declared that the latter was "mistaken in his facts, guilty of misrepresentation and uncharitable in his judgment of his brethren."

Clergy of Pennsylvania Agitate for Rates

There are a number of states in the union where clergy rates are now prohibited by state law or by the ruling of the service commission. This is true in Nebraska, Missouri and Pennsylvania. Bishop Neely recently spoke before the ministerial union of Philadelphia on the subject, and urged that action be taken by the ministers to secure the rates once more. Members of the union were urged to write to their legislators asking for the needed legislation to compel the service commission to allow the rates.

St. Louis Federation Reaches Men in Shops

The Church Federation of St. Louis has this past year been engaged in an effort to carry the gospel to the men in the shops. It is said that 92,000 people have attended the meetings that have been held. These meetings have been held in twenty shops four days each week. The secretary of the federation estimates that four fifths of the attendance was made up of men while the remainder was women. Eighty different ministers have spoken at the shop meetings. The result of these efforts is to convince the public and the workingmen of the sincerity of the efforts of the ministers to relate the wage workers to the church, and win them to the Christian faith.

Mundelein May Be Made Cardinal

It is stated by those in position to know that the Vatican may appoint Archbishop Mundelein of Chicago as cardinal to succeed to the place of Cardinal Gibbons. The selection will be made from six American prelates. Cardinal Gibbons had another preference as to his successor, but the well known ability of Archbishop Mundelein as a church administrator has been taken into account. Among the names unofficially mentioned for the office in addition to that of the Chicago prelate, are Archbishops Hanna of San Francisco, Glennon of St. Louis, Moeller of Cincinnati, Messmer of Milwaukee, Shaw of New Orleans and Dowling of St. Paul.

Irish Catholics Agitate for Irish Independence

The Roman Catholics of this country of Irish extraction are carrying on a vigorous campaign in behalf of Irish independence. In Chicago the Catholic churches have raised a hundred thousand dollars for relief in Ireland. Concerning this relief grave questions have been raised by the British officers in Ireland, although the fund is called nonpolitical and nonreligious. The first national convention of the American Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic will hold a parade in Chicago on April 17. The convention will attempt to arrive at a practical program which will lead the American government to a policy of intervention.

Conservative Bible Conference and Progressive Ideas

Following the Congress held in St. Louis last autumn, the conservatives among the Disciples of Christ planned a series of state congresses of a similar sort. In Indiana it was hardly possible to hold a state meeting of ministers without inviting a number of the men of progressive spirit. The recent Congress at Columbus was addressed by Rev. Clarence Reidenbach, pastor of Downey Avenue church of Indianapolis. Mr. Reidenbach put his finger on what he asserted was the weak spot of the conservative position. "The critic has been misunderstood sometimes to be an egotistic man who sets himself up to know more than Jesus and the apostles. That might be the case if Jesus and the apostles are correctly reported. But that is just the point. The proponent of the conservative attitude assumes that the so-called critic builds on uncertainties while he himself builds on certainties. But what right has he to be certain? Who told him the Bible is an infallible authority? Did he hear it from Jesus or the apostles?"

Pictures Are Bad in Manila

The menace of the corrupt movie has reached the Philippines according to the report of Rev. E. K. Higdon, Disciples missionary in Manila. He recently made a tour of the city inspecting the movies. With the exception of two or three places, they were mostly of the sort that would be branded objectionable or positively bad. Mr. Higdon is using pictures in his church in Manila. The Y. M. C. A. will be advised by a committee of missionaries to put on free movies in various parts of the city. It is also suggested that an official censorship be set up in Manila. Mr. Higdon has succeeded in organizing some large Bible classes in Manila for the students of the city. These classes have been opposed by the Catholic hierarchy of the city, but the student mind tends to be independent the world over and many students enrolled for the courses. This year a total of 1,500 have enrolled which is a considerable percentage of the twelve thousand students to be found in the city. The Protestant work in the Philippines grows in importance continually, and through the missionaries important educational enterprises are being carried on.

Presbyterian Board Wants Doctor for the Insane

The foreign missionary is a highly specialized individual these days. Sometimes he is an agricultural expert, or he may be a teacher of philosophy. Just now the Presbyterians are looking for a physician who is expert in psychiatry. The large number of insane in China leave few institutions in which they may be treated. The Presbyterian institution already has one hundred inmates, but the physician in charge has been compelled to resign because of advanced years. Dr. John G. Kerr who has been doing this work is now seventy-three years old. His successor must be under thirty-five years of age, but need not be a Presbyterian. In the length and breadth of the land the board has not been able to find a man who would go for this difficult service.

Disciples' Underwritings Campaign Under Way

The Disciples failed last December to raise their underwritings in connection with the Interchurch World Movement. In response to an appeal that went out through the mail, only about one-tenth of the amount was secured. A new campaign is now under way running through April and May. Pastors in each state will visit the smaller churches, and it is hoped to secure all the pledges needed in the two months. The pledges will be paid half on June 30 and half on September 30. The campaign is being speeded up by the suggestion of the New York bankers that suit will be entered if provision is not made for the indebtedness. The leaders say this money-campaign is different from any previous one in its spirit. There is no enthusiasm in it, but in every large center where meetings have been held there has been a recognition of the importance of clearing the cloud from the financial credit of the Disciples societies. Large churches are taking significant portions of the amount. Union Avenue church in St. Louis has subscribed $5,000; Independence Boulevard Church of Kansas City assumes $4,000; Linwood Boulevard Church of Kansas City signs for $4,000; in other cities amounts proportionally liberal have been subscribed. The Disciples of Chicago have a committee with Rev. O. F. Jordan as chairman which has apportioned the Chicago obligation. Already Evanston and Austin churches have reported their apportionments raised. The secretaries insist that the $600,000 will be raised. The pledges are taken on the basis that the whole amount must be provided, or the pledges are not binding.

Church Union in South India

The Congregationalists and Presbyterians of South India have already formed a union, and recently this union group met with Episcopalian leaders to discuss a wider union. As in all discussions of union with the Episcopalians the question of orders is to the fore. Some resolutions were adopted looking toward union and laying down some principles. When the niceties of language are stripped away, the agreement is fundamentally that any minister must have received a commission from the bishop before he can serve churches which in the past have been known as Episcopal churches.

Successful Church in New York

THERE are many churches these days which are not succeeding. The story of the church which is regarded as a success by its community is always interesting. Successes in metropolitan territory are few and far between. Hence the story of a great church in New York is always of peculiar significance. West End Presbyterian Church of that city has a large territory several square miles in extent. It is performing the functions of a church and in addition, those of a Y. M. C. A. and a Y. W. C. A. The principle of group organization is one of the strong features of the work. Many small groups such as boy scout troops, girls' societies and mothers' guilds meet in the building from time to time. There is something going on every day from ten o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock at night. Luncheon is served to nearby school children at the nominal charge of ten cents. These children are very apt to join the Sunday school and to become interested in the various features of the church activity. The moving picture machine was installed some time ago and has proven a popular feature. The shows for the children are given without any charge, but the shows for adults are supported by loose collections. Naturally a great city brings to the door of the church a great many seeking relief. These cases are given careful consideration and all worthy persons are given a place to sleep, food, a job, or else are inducted into a home for the aged or invalids. The best work which is done for these indigent is that which restores them to financial independence, and which makes them once more producing units. The women of the church have plenty to do. Their activity is largely in the way of producing garments for the poor. Last year over a thousand garments were turned out. The church is not unmindful of the needs of the world field. Four missionaries are maintained, a man and wife in Nanking, China, and a home missionary and wife in Arizona. Dr. Albert Edwin Keigwin is the pastor of this interesting organization.

It is possible, however, for ministers to continue their work as in the past without any commission, provided they restrict their ministry to the churches which have been accustomed to receive a ministry that was not in the apostolic succession. Of course all new ministers are ordained by the bishop. The plan is more generous than that which is offered by the Lambeth Conference. It says nothing of re-ordination, and does not compel reordination in order to secure fellowship with the Episcopal churches. Just what attitude will be taken by British Episcopalians toward this new plan is not at present clear.

Dr. Shannon Will Address Disciples Congress

Dr. Frederick Shannon, pastor of Central church, Chicago, will be a guest of honor at the Disciples Congress held at Springfield, Ill., on May 10-13. His topics for special addresses will be "The Blooming Thorn," "The Sacrament of Suffering," "The Power of Christian Faith," and "The New Human." The topics on the Congress program this year belong not only in the field of theology, but are partially related to the practical interests and partially to the deepening of the spiritual life of the group. It is to serve the latter interest that Dr. Shannon was invited.

Ministers Who Go to Europe

The minister who goes to Europe this summer will have a chance to preach. The Federal Council of Churches is particularly eager to secure the names of those going so that their presence in Great Britain and other countries may be the occasion of pulpit interchanges. It is believed that international goodwill will be stimulated by an exchange of pulpit messages, and for this reason church leaders both in Great Britain and America are alert to the opportunities that arise in connection with tourist travel.

Significant Work for Unfortunate Women

The Women's Church Federation Protectorate of Chicago is an agency in behalf of unfortunate women and girls, particularly those who are strangers in the city. The organization has an indirect connection with the Chicago Church Federation. The annual report of the organization shows that employment was secured last year for 141; 73 were placed in institutions; 46 runaway girls were returned home; 23 maternity cases were aided. About half of the people aided claimed residence elsewhere than in Chicago. Mrs. Minnie M. Chapman is superintendent of the organization.

American Waldensian Aid Society

The Waldensians are held to be the oldest of the existing Protestant denominations, indeed they antedate Protestantism. For centuries before the time of Luther they maintained their attitude of independence of Rome. It is said that they have endured thirty persecutions during their history in which large numbers of their members were killed. Many Protestants in America believe that it would be better to strengthen the native Waldensian movement in Italy than to import American denominations into the Italian situation. The American Waldensian Aid Society will hold its first meeting in Washington the first week in May. Some of the most eminent Protestant churchmen will be present and participate in the discussions. The speakers will include: Bishop McDowell, of Washington, of the Methodist Episcopal church; Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin, D.D., of Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York City; Dr. Bruno Roselli, of Florence, Italy, first Italian exchange professor to the United States, now teaching at Vassar College; Rev. Vincent Ravi-Booth, a Waldensian, but an American citizen, minister of First Congregational Church, Old Bennington, Vt.; Rev. Henry C. Satorio, a Waldensian but also an American citizen and curate of Christ Church, Boston; and Rev. V. Alberto Costabel, a Waldensian of Milan, Italy, the Waldensian delegate to the United States and Canada for the present year.

Down-Town Church Succeeds

THE idea that a down town church must inevitably fail has been gloriously disproved in Kansas City in recent years. First Christian Church is now surrounded by business houses. Long since its historic constituency has moved out into the beautiful residential suburbs. It is left with business houses and boarding houses. Under the leadership of Dr. Arthur Braden, a great growth has come in the membership. In the past fifteen months 515 people have been added, 355 of these uniting on profession of faith.

The statistics show that the church has a larger evening than morning service, which is also a kind of curiosity among city churches. This growth in membership, and some kindly aid from adjacent Disciples churches has enabled the congregation to practically free its $250,000 property from debt. The growth of the church rests back solidly on an educational program. There is a large Sunday school, with many young people in the classes and from this school the converts are harvested at almost every service, after they have been well instructed in Christian fundamentals. First church never closes its building. Seven days in the week it continues its helpful ministry to the community. The training of Sunday school teachers for the whole city and for all denominations is carried on in this building. The gymnasium provides physical education, and much wholesome recreation. The employment bureau is an agency for relating the numerous unemployed with positions where they may be useful.

The congregation dines together once a week before the mid-week prayer meeting, and out of this family meeting arises good fellowship and esprit de corps for the work. Sometimes three or four meetings are going on in the building at the same time. The membership of the church is now well up to the two thousand mark, and in this membership are some of the good business men in the city who believe that religion should not retreat from the centers of the community life.

JOWN DEWEY

says of

MAN'S SUPREME INHERITANCE

By F. Matthias Alexander

"The discussions of Mr. Alexander breathe reverence for this wonderful instrument of our life, life mental and moral as well as that life which somewhat meaninglessly we call bodily. When such a religious attitude toward the body becomes more general, we shall have an atmosphere favorable to securing the conscious control which is urged."

The single chapter on "Race Culture and the Training of Children" is well worth the price of the book.

$2.00 plus 12 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St. Chicago

Mid-Summer Conference for Ministers

Union Theological Seminary
New York City
July 18-29 Inclusive

Professors W. A. Brown, Coffin, Fleming, Lyman of Union, also Professor Bacon of Yale, and others will take part.

For further information address Dr. Charles R. Gillett, Registrar, Broadway and 120th St.

Beware of Contagious Diseases

THOMAS COMMUNION SERVICE

INDIVIDUAL

SAVES 1/4 COST OF OTHER SERVICES

Clean and sanitary. Used by over 40,000 churches. Send for catalog and free trial offer. Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 495 Lima, O.

BOOK OF POINTS

AND TESTIMONIES for use of Christians and Workers in all meetings. Answering Objections, Excuses or Doubts. Helps for leading and taking part in Prayer Meetings and in giving personal Testimonies. Better understanding of hard places in Scripture, etc. Full of practical suggestions. Don'ts for Workers when dealing with Inquirers. Cloth 25c; Morocco, 35c; Agents wanted. GEO. W. NOBLE, Menon Building, Chicago, Ill.

Every Church Member Will Help Sell Building Pledges

The automobile people have helped the church people with some new financial methods. This year a popular make of automobile is being sold with a guarantee of seventy dollars back next August provided fifty thousand cars are sold in six months. Rev. Harry H. Peters, state secretary of the Illinois Disciples, sold a church debt in the same way over at Moline recently. An Educational Annex had been built to the church at a cost of nineteen thousand dollars, and seven thousand dollars was owing. The members pledged a definite amount each year until the debt was paid. That made every pledger a salesman for the fund, for the more pledges, the shorter the period in which the pledges would be collected. The church raised a total of $3,200 per year for this special purpose.

Sunday School Sends Rice to Armenia

The city of Houston, Texas, is sending a cargo of rice to Armenia to help the starving people. While funds were being collected for this purpose the Disciples Sunday school connected with South End Church raised the largest amount of any organization in the city. Rev. Wm. Dunn Ryan has recently gone to this congregation from Youngstown, O., as the pastor.

Want Remains of Missionary Leader at Bethany

Rev. W. R. Warren in a recent communication to the Disciple press advocates the removal of the remains of the late Rev. A. McLean, missionary leader

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

Wanted: A congregation devoted to the spiritual life and to the Christ-spirit in daily living. Address, "Minister," this office.

HYMNS FOR TODAY

A complete hymnal for both Sunday School and Church. New, beautiful hymns on all the vital subjects that leading religious thinkers are advocating today, with Orders of Services for S. S. departments and church, and Services for Anniversaries.

The use of Hymns for Today will educate both youth and adult in the essentials of the Kingdom of God. Price, $75 per 100. Returnable sample sent. Orchestrated.

FILLMORE MUSIC HOUSE,
516 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

Fruit Trees, Grapes, Roses

Everything for Farm and Garden Delivered. Reduced Prices.

3 Best Gladiolas 25 Cents

Dozen 75 Cents Hundred $4.00

Named varieties, all colors. Full directions for planting. Bloom in doors or out doors, fragrant and beautiful.

Novelty Floral Co. Newburgh, N. Y.

of the Disciples, from the city cemetery in Cincinnati to the Campbell burying ground in Bethany. This cemetery is now owned by Bethany College, and will be given perpetual care. Some of the greatest Disciples are buried there. This burying ground is often visited by tourists, whereas a city grave is lost amid the thousands, and is never secure against change some time in the future.

When Lodge Men Go to Church

The lodge man is not always a church member. The man without a church is usually a member of some fraternal order. Some of these unchurched men of the orders do not go to church very much oftener than "David Harum" did. This well known fiction character declared that he went to church every Thanksgiving and he had missed only three out of the last four years. The lodges have definite times, however, when they try to rally their members to a religious service in the church. The Knights Templar have definitely Christian elements in their ritual, and they observe some days of the Christian year, particularly Easter. On this day they usually attend church in uniform. The Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias and many other orders observe the first or second Sunday in June as "Memorial Sunday." On that day they attend divine worship, and later decorate the graves of their deceased brothers. On the recent Easter Sunday the number of Knights Templar in church was said to be unusually large.

Unusually fine stationery for club, social or professional correspondence at an exceptionally low price. 150 sheets high quality note paper and 100 envelopes printed with your name and address, $1.50. Write for samples.

LEWIS, 25 Hudson Ave., Troy, N. Y.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful.....1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)

Green tea—1 glassful.....2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz......61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

Hear the Joy Bells Ringing

THE CHURCH BELLS

and the mighty chorus of
HAPPY CHILDREN

In the Bible Schools of Christian America singing glad tidings to all the world on

CHILDREN'S DAY

They are singing of light and life though the gospel of Christ to the children who sit in darkness.

THE BELLS OF HEAVEN

Ringling for joy over the glad news of thousands of CHILDREN SAVED

from sin, sorrow and suffering in Heathen lands through the gifts of gratitude of the Children of our Christian Land.

CHURCH BELLS AROUND THE WORLD

Thousands of Bible Schools have already ordered this SUPERB EXERCISE and are preparing for a great Festival of Joy on June 5th.

1. It is different.
2. It has something for every grade.
3. The music is of high grade and easy.
4. Its teaching is of the best.

NOTE

Order Today.
Prepare Tomorrow.

Supplies consist of

1. Church Bells Around the World.
2. Teacher's Leaflet.
3. Coin Envelopes.

State average attendance.

Promo- UNITED CHRISTIAN 1501
tional MISSIONARY SOCIETY Locust St.
Dept. St. Louis

The Outline of History

A Plain History of Life
and Mankind

By H. G. WELLS

Written with the advice and editorial help of Ernest Baker, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir E. Ray Lankester and Prof. Gilbert Murray. Illustrated by J. F. Horrabin.

HERE is history from the beginning of life on our earth so far as we can trace it by paleolithic records, through the civilizing and decivilizing ages down to yesterday. And much of it is history from the standpoint of common sense. We would hold this view even after you pointed out that Mr. Wells does irreparable damage to many an ancient convention and orthodox tradition. He trains his guns fearlessly on superstition, on corrupting tradition, on historical malpractice.

The author's conclusions stimulate thought. He is an optimist. He sees a new sanity emerging from the hatreds of the war. He looks for a revision of ideas and institutions and the development of a citizenship of the world, with the breakdown of nationalism. Religion to his mind has been obscured by creeds—"the old political and social assumptions, the old religious formulas have lost their conviction." But he expects the future to bring a brotherhood of men rather than of nations, wider education and a religion apart from forms and creeds. Man is to become happier and more contented on earth. He does not seem to fear that, judging by the rate we are going, the old ball may become cold before we achieve that ideal.

This is the big book of the season. Every thinking citizen of these pregnant times should have it.

In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.
Special terms: $5.00 down, balance 30 days.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

AN INFORMATI

A HOPEFUL sign of the times is the increased alertness of the religious leaders of the country to present day economic and social conditions and needs. The best sellers with ministers and other religious leaders are books which treat these conditions, and especially those which point the church to its duty with reference to them. But this zeal for information has not gone far enough. Too often, it stops with the leadership. For every awakened minister there are 100 church members who are not sufficiently well informed. There is a real call for an "Informational Awakening."

With this fact in view The Christian Century Press has prepared a list of books which are considered the best adapted for general reading in churches, Sunday school classes, etc., and in church homes. At the same time many titles are given which are of interest primarily to ministers themselves. Many of the books included are intended to inform the minds of readers more accurately on matters of primary interest to church members—books on the Bible, on Christian doctrine, on the devotional life. In other words, an effort has been made to make the list as wide in its scope as the intellectual and spiritual life of the normal Christian should be. Note on the next page some uses to which the list may be put.

100 RELIGIOUS BOOKS

A list prepared and approved by Charles Clayton Morrison, Herbert L. Willett, Joseph Fort Newton, Alva W. Taylor and Thomas Curtis Clark

THE CHURCH AND PREACHING

Psychology and Preaching. C. S. Gardner. $2.50.
The Building of the Church. C. E. Jefferson. $1.50.
Christian Ministry and Social Problems. Bishop Charles D. Williams. $1.25.
Can the Church Survive in the Changing Social Order? Albert Parker Fitch. 80 cts.
A Community Church. H. E. Jackson. $2.00.
Ambassadors of God. S. Parkes Cadman. $2.50.
Modern Theology and the Preaching of the Gospel. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
Wanted: A Congregation. Lloyd C. Douglas. $1.75.
Six Thousand Country Churches. Gill and Pinchot. $2.00.
The Little Town. Paul H. Douglass. $2.25.
The Course of Christian History. W. J. McGlothlin. $2.25.

THE BIBLE AND THE LIFE OF JESUS

Popular Lectures on the Books of the New Testament. A. H. Strong. $1.50.
The Jesus of History. T. R. Glover. $1.25.
The Manhood of the Master. Fosdick. $1.15.
Our Bible. Herbert L. Willett. $1.50.
That One Face. Richard Roberts. $1.25.
Christ in the Poetry of Today. Compiled by Martha F. Crowe. $2.00.
Archæology and the Bible. George A. Barton. $2.50.
Jesus—The Master Teacher. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
Jesus—Our Standard. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
New Testament in Modern Speech. Weymouth. $2.00.
Moffatt's New Testament. $1.50. (Pocket ed., $1.75.)
Jesus in the Experience of Men. T. R. Glover. $1.90.
The Proposal of Jesus. John H. Hutton. $2.00.
Epochs in the Life of Paul. A. T. Robertson. $1.50.
The Life of Paul. B. W. Robinson. $1.50.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

The Experience of God in Modern Life. E. W. Lyman. $1.50.

What and Where Is God? Richard L. Swain. $1.50.
The Holy Spirit in Thought and Experience. T. Rees. $2.00.
The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation. James Denney. $3.00.
The Christian Hope. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
Can We Believe in Immortality? J. H. Snowden. $1.50.
Immortality and the Future. H. R. Mackintosh. $1.50.
The Truth About Christian Science. J. H. Snowden. $2.50.
The Originality of the Christian Message. H. R. Mackintosh. $1.75.
Basic Ideals in Religion. R. W. Micou. $2.50.
What Christianity Means to Me. Lyman Abbott. $1.75.
Outspoken Essays. Dean W. R. Inge. $2.25.
Public Opinion and Theology. Bishop Francis J. McConnell. $1.50.
The Meaning of Baptism. Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.35.
Living Again. Charles R. Brown. $1.00.
The New Orthodoxy. Edward Scribner Ames. $1.50.

MISSIONS

The Missionary Outlook in the Life of the War. $2.00.
Christianity the Final Religion. S. M. Zwemer. $1.25.
Modern Religious Movements in India. J. N. Farquhar. $2.75.
The Religions of the World. George A. Barton. $2.00.
Mary Slessor of Calabar. W. P. Livingstone. $2.00.

PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

The Meaning of Prayer. Fosdick. $1.15.
The Meaning of Faith. H. E. Fosdick. $1.35.
The Meaning of Service. H. E. Fosdick. $1.25.
The Religion of a Layman. Charles R. Brown. $1.25.
The Psychology of the Christian Soul. George Steven. $1.50.
The Psychology of Religion. J. H. Snowden. $2.00.
The Religious Consciousness. J. B. Pratt. $2.50.

NAL AWAKENING

Finding the Comrade God. Walter Fiske. $1.15.
The Religion of a Mature Mind. George Albert Coe. $1.75.

SOCIAL

The Social Principles of Jesus. Walter Rauschenbusch. $1.15.
The Ethics of Jesus and Social Progress. C. S. Gardner $1.50.
Christianizing the Social Order. Rauschenbusch. $2.00.
Christianity and the Social Crisis. Rauschenbusch. $2.25.
Democratic Christianity. Bishop Francis J. McConnell. $1.80.
Jesus Christ and the Social Question. Francis G. Peabody. $1.75.
The Psychology of Social Reconstruction. G. T. W. Patrick. $2.00.
The Great Society. Graham Wallas. $2.25.
The Social Problem. Charles A. Ellwood. $2.25.
The Church and Industrial Reconstruction. $2.00.
Labor and the Common Welfare. Samuel Gompers. $3.00.
Poverty, the Challenge of the Church. J. S. Penman. $1.00.
Religion and Business. R. W. Babson. $1.50.
Fundamentals of Prosperity. R. W. Babson. $1.25.
The Sword or the Cross. Kirby Page. $1.20.
The Science of Power. Benjamin Kidd. $1.75.
The Gospel for a Working World. Harry F. Ward.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Training the Devotional Life. L. H. Weigle. 75 cts.
Talks to Sunday School Teachers. L. H. Weigle. $1.50.
Social Principles of Education. G. F. Betts. $1.50.
The School in the Modern Church. H. F. Cope. $1.50.
How to Teach Religion. G. F. Betts. $1.00.

INSPIRATIONAL BOOKS

The Daily Altar. Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.50. (Leather, $2.50.)
The Eternal Christ. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
The Ambassador. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
Things Eternal. John Kelman. $1.75.

THE NEW AGE

A New Mind for the New Age. Henry Churchill King. $1.75.
A Better World. Tyler Dennett. $1.50.
The Christian Faith and the New Day. Cleland B. McAfee. 90 cts.
The Church Facing the Future. William Adams Brown. 80 cts.
The New Horizon in the Church and State. W. H. P. Faunce. 80 cts.
World Facts and America's Responsibility. C. H. Patton. $1.25
The Gospel and the New World. Robert E. Speer. $2.00.
Some Aspects of International Christianity. John Kelman. $1.00.
The Democratic Movement in Asia. Tyler Dennett. $1.90.
Is Christianity Practicable? William Adams Brown. $1.75.

MISCELLANEOUS

Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature. T. H. Davis. $2.50.
Everybody's World. Sherwood Eddy. $1.90.
The Worst Boys in Town. Hill. $2.50.
First. Henry Drummond. 50 cts.
The Strategy of Life. Arthur Porritt. $1.25.
Life of Theodore Roosevelt. W. R. Thayer. $1.00.

HOW THIS LIST MAY BE USED

1. From the list select a shelf-full of books for your church, your Sunday school, your class. Many ministers have placed a table in the foyer of the church, with a selection of books for the reading of members.
2. Make a selection for your own purchase during this year, a book a week, five a month, or by some other regular plan.
3. Select five or ten or fifteen books to present to your minister. His salary does not allow of large expenditures. A good church in Missouri recently gave its pastor the privilege of purchasing fifty dollars worth of books for his library at the church's expense. That was good business!
4. Call the attention of the heads of your church homes to the list, urging them to invest in some of the books, and advising them as to the best ones for their particular need.

Fifty new books in the hands of your congregation
will add fifty per cent to its power and usefulness

Note: Add 10 cents postage on an order for a single book. When ordering two or more books, add 6 cents for each book.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn St. Chicago, Illinois

FAITH-BUILDING BOOKS

Belief and Life

By Principal W. R. Selbie

Price $1.25

Modern Belief in Immortality

By Newman Smyth

Price 75 Cents

Through Science to Faith

By Newman Smyth

Price $1.75

Belief in God

By Jacob Gould Schurman

Price $1.50

The Christian Hope

By William Adams Brown

Price $1.75

The Religion of a Layman

By Charles R. Brown

Price $1.25

Add 10 cents per book for postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The Bethany Graded Lessons

Prepared by the best talent obtainable in the Christian world, the work for each department produced by an expert in that department. Beautifully printed, with illustrations worthy of this most authoritative system of graded study.

126 Texts, Covering 17 Years of Study

SEND FOR RETURNABLE SAMPLES

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Things Eternal

By JOHN KELMAN, D. D.,

*Pastor of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church,
New York.*

Thousands of persons who cannot hope to hear this brilliantly spiritual preacher will welcome this volume of his sermons. Some of the subjects discussed are:

Christ's Lessons in Prayer.

Loyalty to Vision.

Leadership. False and True.

Concerning Gifts.

The Rising of Christ.

A Song of the Morning.

Strength and Joy.

The Unknown Christ.

Opinion and Knowledge.

Three Views of Man's Destiny.

Trust in the Character of Christ.

The Religion of Humanity.

Price $1.75 plus 7 to 12 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

"Our Bible"

By Herbert L. Willett

Dr. Willett, of the University of Chicago, and for a score of years the most popular lecturer on the Bible on the American platform, has put into this, his latest book, the scholarly fruitage of a life-time of study, and he has put it into a form that is both useful and attractive.

Some Chapter Titles:

Religion and Its Holy Books.

How Books of Religion Took Form.

The Makers of the Bible.

Growth of the New Testament.

The Higher Criticism.

The Bible and the Monuments.

The Inspiration of the Bible.

The Authority of the Bible.

The Beauty of the Bible.

The Influence of the Bible.

The Misuses of the Bible.

Our Faith in the Bible.

Price of the book $1.50, plus 10 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

The book which furnishes Inspiration, Interpretation and an Apologetic for the Progressive movement among Baptists and Disciples.

The Meaning of Baptism

By Charles Clayton Morrison
Editor of The Christian Century.

THIS is the book which has done more than any other single factor to melt away the dogmatism of Baptists and Disciples on the subject of Christian baptism and to prepare the ground for reconciliation between two great sections of Christendom.

Estimates of the Book:

The Congregationalist: "A daring and splendidly Christian piece of work."

The Presbyterian Advance: "The editor of this paper welcomes this volume, for it enables him for the first time in his life to answer the question often put to him by correspondents, 'What is the best book on baptism?'"

The Churchman: "An interesting summary of the topic, especially as it is related to the history of modern sectarianism."

The Homiletic Review: "The spirit of this book is delightful and raises new hopes where none had seemed possible."

The Baptist Standard: "This is a very interesting work, as much so as any volume of fiction we have read this year!"

The Christian Endeavor World: "A thorough treatise from the immersion point of view, but building a bridge toward the affusionist view."

The Continent: "The author is strongly against the rebaptism of Christian believers who apply to Baptist or Disciple churches for membership, having been accepted in other churches by any mode of baptism whatever. At the root of the argument lies a sound desire for Christian unity."

Price of the book, $1.35, plus 10 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

THE EXPOSITOR'S Dictionary of Texts

Outlines, Expositions and Illustrations of Every Major Text and Dominant Passage of the Bible

Editors: Sir W. R. Nicoll, Lane T. Stoddart
James Moffatt, D.D.

Its Methods

Each exposition is a sermon compact and complete in itself. Each text suggests a theme by which it is headed; for instance, the exposition on "Like as a father pitieth his children," is entitled "THE GOD OF THE FRAIL"; to the exposition eight minds contribute.

Plan and Purpose

The Editors' purpose in planning THE EXPOSITORS DICTIONARY OF TEXTS was to compile a compendium of Scriptural insight and comment. They did so by glean- ing from the master theologians and preach- ers of the past half century the best exposi- tion on every major text and dominant pas- sage of the Bible.

Great Sermon Makers Approve It

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical useful- ness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard- worked pastor will find much gold here for his mint- ing days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The ministry of souls is never out of sight. A more quickening and useful companion to the preacher of the Word does not exist."—REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

In Two Great Quarto Volumes, $15.00

SPECIAL TO CHRISTIAN CENTURY READERS:
Send $5.00 and the books will be shipped at once, on condition that another remittance of $5.00 be made in 30 days, and the final installment (including carriage) in 60 days.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Singing the Social Gospel

AN OUTSTANDING characteristic of the new hymnal, HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is its modernness. This has been widely commented upon by the hundreds of church leaders who have adopted the book for their congregations. As an illustration of this quality of modernness we would call attention to the unique section on "The Kingdom of God," with sub-sections entitled "Social Aspiration and Progress," "Loyalty and Courage," "Human Service and Brotherhood," "The Nation," "Peace Among the Nations," etc. In this section are 101 great hymns which sing the evangelical social gospel which the modern pulpit preaches. Many of these have never before been used in a Church hymnal. Here are some of the authors' names:

Emily Green Balch
Nolan R. Best
John Hay
Felix Adler
Charles Mackay
John G. Whittier
Ebenezer Elliott
W. Russell Bowie
Charles Kingsley
Rudyard Kipling
Frank Mason North

John Addington Symonds
William DeWitt Hyde
Richard Watson Gilder
Algernon S. Swinburne
Gilbert K. Chesterton
Washington Gladden
William Pierson Merrill
Katherine Lee Bates
Frederick L. Hosmer
John Haynes Holmes
T. Wentworth Higginson

Think of being able to sing the social gospel as well as to preach it! The social gospel will never seem to be a truly religious gospel until the Church learns to sing it. HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is the only Church hymnal in which the social note of today's evangelical preaching finds adequate expression. The use of this hymnal will thrill and inspire your congregation with a new vision and purpose.

A returnable copy of the Hymnal will be mailed you upon request

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn Street

Chicago, Illinois

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

The Threat of Millennialism

The Country Church

The Community Church

Fifteen Cts. a Copy

April 28, 1921

Four Dollars a Year

THE EXPOSITOR'S Dictionary of Texts

Outlines, Expositions and Illustrations of Every Major Text and Dominant Passage of the Bible

Editors: Sir W. R. Nicoll, Lane T. Stoddart
James Moffatt, D.D.

Its Methods

Each exposition is a sermon compact and complete in itself. Each text suggests a theme by which it is headed; for instance, the exposition on "Like as a father pitieth his children," is entitled "THE GOD OF THE FRAIL"; to the exposition eight minds contribute.

Plan and Purpose

The Editors' purpose in planning THE EXPOSITORS DICTIONARY OF TEXTS was to compile a compendium of Scriptural insight and comment. They did so by glean- ing from the master theologians and preach- ers of the past half century the best exposi- tion on every major text and dominant pas- sage of the Bible.

Great Sermon Makers Approve It

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical useful- ness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard- worked pastor will find much gold here for his mint- ing days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The ministry of souls is never out of sight. A more quickening and useful companion to the preacher of the Word does not exist."—REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

In Two Great Quarto Volumes, $15.00

SPECIAL TO CHRISTIAN CENTURY READERS:
Send $5.00 and the books will be shipped at once, on condition that another remittance of $5.00 be made in 30 days, and the final installment (including carriage) in 60 days.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Religion and Business

By Roger W. Babson

MR. BABSON is known as President of the Babson Statistical Organization, and as an expert in the science of business. But he is also a sturdy believer in the possibilities of the church. Here is the closing paragraph of his book:

"It is not the purpose of this book to suggest details of a plan for redeeming the world, but rather to emphasize the fact that the world can be redeemed socially, industrially only through religion. Governments may succeed in protecting men in freedom of effort and rights of ownership; but only religion can energize men unto a maximum of useful service and make them content with a simple material reward."

Some Chapter Titles

Business Men and the Church.
Rich Men's and Poor Men's Churches.
Religion and the Wage Worker.
Natural Law Underlies Jesus' Teachings.
Training Our Children in Religion.
The Greatest of Undeveloped Resources—Faith.
Religion and Personal Efficiency.
The Religion Which Will Survive.
The Interchurch Movement.
The Great Opportunity for the Church in Industry.
Can Religion Be Subsidized?
Immediate Problems Facing the Church.

* * *

*New edition in boards, $1.50
12 cents postage*

* * *

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, APRIL 28, 1921

Number 17

EDITORIAL STAFF: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR; HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR
THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS, JESSIE BROWN POUNDS

*Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879.
Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918.
Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago*

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra.
Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

Mr. Bryan's Sunday School Class

WHILE we are taking notice of large Sunday schools and of classes running up to the thousand mark, it is worth while to note that during the winter months Mr. William Jennings Bryan has been addressing regularly on Sunday mornings at his winter home in Miami, Florida, a class of five thousand persons in the open park. They enjoy the measured cadences of Mr. Bryan's mellifluous voice as he expounds to them that which he values above all else in the world—the Christian religion. Mr. Bryan may not expound evolution with full comprehension of its meaning, and he may mix Darwin up with Nietzsche, but we recall that the great Gladstone failed utterly also to keep up with science and learning in his treatment of the sacred scriptures. Neither Bryan nor Gladstone is to be judged by the negative, or even by the intellectual aspects of their religious apostolates but by the fact that they put Christian ethics at the heart of their political ideas. Bryan once said there was just one problem in statecraft and that was to find which way God was going and to go that way. Recently he has challenged his party to a recouping of its fortunes on a basis of being worthy the franchises of the people by putting forth a platform built, not upon political expedience but upon righteousness. He declares that it "must build upon a belief in God—in his justice and in his love," and "on faith in the wisdom, the justice and the strength of popular government." Mr. Bryan is now sixty-one years old. He is no doubt done running for President. In a quarter of a century, without public office, he has held the continuous personal attention of more human beings than any other man in the history of mankind. Even when the newspapers boycotted him, after his resignation from the cabinet, tens of thousands went to hear him lecture. He today draws the greatest throngs when he speaks, and he grows in the confidence and affection of the American people more because of his uncompromising conscience and his lofty Christian idealism than because of even his eloquence. It is better to be righteous than to be President.

The Lutherans and the Federal Council

AFTER sending a special committee to a meeting of the Federal Council in Boston, the United Lutheran church has voted not to become a part of this federation of Protestants. This attitude of aloofness is explained by the report rendered by the special committee. When the verbiage is reduced to simple terms, it seems that the Lutherans object to the lack of doctrinal formulation which characterizes the Federal Council. They see in this lack the beginning of a latitudinarianism which will eventually betray the evangelical faith. The very feature of the council which has been so gratifying to most of the other organizations uniting with the council becomes the occasion of stumbling to the Lutherans. They also insist that the council shall take on none of the functions of the church, and none of the functions of the state. It is hard to see how the first of these requirements could be met by making a doctrinal formulation. The second evidently refers to the social service activities of the Federal Council which have caused some restlessness in other communions besides the Lutherans. It is an unhappy fact that there are thousands, perhaps millions, of evangelical Christians in America who do not really accept the relatively conservative social positions of the Federal Council. This is due to the lack of pedagogical machinery for making the people understand these positions. The Lutherans declare that they will maintain "a separate identity as a witness to the truth which they know" at least until such time as God opens the way to "a real organic union." The changes suggested by the Lutherans in the Federal Council are: First, "a definite declaration of principles" in place of the preamble and the objects; second, a dispensing with much of the machinery of its organization, so that it may "function simply as a council or conference seeking to render service to the churches"; third, "a clear and definite statement, setting forth specifically the things in which the churches may cooperate in the general interest, so limiting itself as not to encroach upon the sphere of operations which belongs distinctively to the church, nor upon that of the state"; and, fourth, "that it beware of visionary and faraway enterprises and encourage diligent application to things that are practicable, and to problems that are near at hand."

Final Meeting of the Interchurch Committee

TO the General Committee of the Interchurch World Movement, together with the special Committee of Fifteen, to which had been entrusted the closing activities in connection with the enterprise, fell the responsibility last week of definitely finishing the work left on hand. This consisted of the disposal of material yet remaining from the varied activities of the movement, and the closing of such accounts as still required adjustment. The underwriting campaigns have practically closed, and it is believed that within a very brief time the last of the underwriting notes will be paid. The Disciples have made heroic efforts to meet the amount of their pledge, and the latest reports are encouraging regarding the results. Nearly all the other religious bodies made good their underwritings some time ago. Thus a great enterprise has passed into history. It is not to be regarded as a failure in any damaging sense. Great mistakes were made in its projection and its promotion. It attempted too many features and it miscalculated the time required for so huge a task. But it set high standards of cooperative work, and in spite of all reaction, the churches will never go back to some phases of sectarianism which were in vogue before it took form. As time passes the irritations caused by its failure to reach some of its objectives will disappear, and it will be seen in retrospect as a very noble adventure of faith, whose final effect on the American Church cannot fail to be of value.

Growing Tension Between Christian Ideals and Business Practices

WILLIAM E. SWEET, a Congregational layman of Denver, has given up business. In some advertisements in the public press he explains why he has taken this action. Business interests seem determined to make it hard for Christian workers who espouse the cause of social reform and modern standards in industry. The business man who does not travel with this reactionary wave is just as unpopular in his business circles as the "scab" is among labor union men. Mr. Sweet believes that the ministers of the country should be reinforced in their appeal for better social conditions. So far it has often seemed that the pew received but coldly the sermons that were directed to the task of social reform. Meanwhile there is a merry fight going on at Pittsburgh. The Episcopal clergy are telling some of the employers just where they stand. The Churchman in interpreting this situation says editorially: "Mr. Long threatens to withdraw support from the churches. Suppose the churches should 'right about' and excommunicate Mr. Long and the Pittsburgh employers, refuse to marry them, bury them or baptize them? That would be about as sensible a thing as Mr. Long proposes. . . . From Lambeth through a score of great church organizations, the interpreters of the Christian religion have endorsed a social creed. That social creed infringes upon the Pittsburgh 'zone of agreement' at certain points. The church will not permit the Pittsburgh employers, or any other employers, to define the province of Christianity in industry." The church desires to add nothing to the present unrest in the industrial world. Its work is constructive and not radical. But no constructive action is possible so long as any organized group of employers take the position of medieval barons. It is only in the democratic processes of conference and conciliation that we may place our industrial operations upon a basis that is at once ethical and efficient.

The Effect of the Crime Wave

THERE are probably no more infractions of law at the present time than is usual. But there has been an unusual number of bold and outstanding crimes which furnish the newspaper headlines. These are being committed by comparatively young men, between sixteen and twenty-five for the most part. The immediate effect of the exploitation of these crimes on the front page of the newspaper has been a revival of reactionism with regard to the treatment of crime. The parole laws are being vigorously attacked. Bills are appearing in the legislature which would lengthen the sentence for various crimes. The attitude of the public is at this moment instinctive and emotional rather than rational. The need of the hour is a more general understanding of the whole subject of crime. The long history of the way society has treated the criminal is illuminating. With a vivid grasp of that history it should be quite unnecessary to repeat the errors of the past. The public should be made to recognize that every war is followed by a crime wave. The worst orgy of lawlessness this country ever had was that which followed the revolutionary war. Training in the art of killing does not help in building up a sense of the sanctity of human life, and the enforced idleness of thousands of returned soldiers who have for years held all things in common does not increase the respect for property rights. The break-down of some of the remedial agencies which have been built up at much difficulty needs explanation. There is a lack of investigators to look into the parole cases, and a lack of probation officers. This has led to the abuse of the parole in many states. It does not necessarily follow that the parole plan is itself a failure. There is a widespread revival of belief in the efficacy of capital punishment. This reaction again is instinctive rather than rational. A comparison of the records of the states that have no capital punishment with the records of the states that do, will show at once the fallacy of the notion that capital punishment is a better preventive of crime than those means which do not involve on society's part an absolute confession of its failure to save its own members.

Dr. Gulick's Immigration Plan Before Congress

ONLY the veto of President Wilson prevented the nation from securing during the last session of congress the enactment of a law for the scientific regulation of immigration. This plan was for long associated with the name of Dr. Sydney L. Gulick, the well-known missionary to Japan. It was favored by Dr. Gulick as a means of preventing any large immigration of orientals into this country while at the same time "saving the face" of those nations. This is only one argument for the bill, however. It would enable an immigration board to regulate immigration scientifically according to the industrial demands of the country. In times of industrial depression, few new workers would be admitted. In times of great prosperity when industry called for additional help, more would be brought in. When the bill is introduced again it will provide for an immigration board with the power of admitting people from any country up to ten per cent of the number from that country already in America. The census statistics would thus be a basis for figuring the amount of new immigration that would be admitted from any nation of the world, or from any ethnic group. The National Committee for Constructive Immigration Legislation has prepared literature on the subject of the Sterling bill which may be secured from the office at 105 East 22nd street, New York. The interest of the church in this bill is many fold. It seems like a peaceable settlement of a problem which ever threatens to embroil us with other nations, particularly with the orient. It safeguards the interests of the immigrants by refusing them admission at such times as they would undergo grave hardships in getting a foothold in this country. It will also prevent the depression of the American standard of living unduly. The plan is brand new and has the value of being a carefully conceived effort to meet one of our most important national problems.

Funeral Services at Potsdam

VERY sad and somber are the events which are transpiring in connection with the burial of the ex-empress of Germany. In all the aspects of her life she was worthy of the place which fortune brought to her. In personal character she adorned the positions of wife and mother. She was worthy of the place which fortune brought to her. Her influence upon the court circle and upon her husband was wholesome. Hers were the homely virtues that Germany once set forth as the crown and glory of womanhood. The tragedy of her life was brought about by that overweening ambition of the military class, of which the ex-kaiser was the leader, which plunged the nation into a self-annihilating war. That war swept away a dozen thrones, and ushered as many sovereigns into oblivion. There must have been very bitter thoughts in the mind of William as he stood beside the body of his dead wife, who had shared his glory, and had fallen with him to the nadir of humiliation. Every effort was made, naturally, to invest the funeral with the pomp and circumstance of the old monarchy. The democratic courtesies toward the old regime were stretched to the utmost tension to permit the revival for the moment of the imperial traditions. But it was only for the moment. In such a time one thinks of Mr. Morton's poem, "The Kings are Passing Deathward," of which the closing lines are these:

"They walk in awful splendor, regal yet,
Wearing their crimes like rich and kingly capes.
Curse them or taunt, they will not hear or see;
The Kings are passing deathward: let them be."

"Beer For Medicine" Threatens Medical Profession's Prestige

DR. HARVEY W. WILEY, the famous food chemist, thrusts his stiletto into Attorney General Palmer's "beer for medicine" ruling in this manner: "Already application has been made to start breweries for the making of medicinal beer. If the ruling of the attorney general is carried into effect the profits of beer making in this country will arise to heights never before known. The vitality and morbidity statistics will be swelled by such a new multitude of sick and convalescent as to try the capacity of the printing presses of the census bureau. Those who have the welfare of the medical and pharmaceutical professions at heart and who want to see the honest and efficient execution of the prohibition act will unite as one man in an effort to obtain a recall of this order by the present attorney general of the United States. Rated on the scale of usage, beer has not now, and never has had any standing as a recognized remedial agent." The new attorney general is slow to act. Perhaps he finds the Palmer ruling true to the letter of the law. If so the way is open for an appeal to congress to remedy the defect. New York has passed a drastic enforcement act. If the wettest of all wet states will do that, certainly the great dry majorities in the nation will see that congress makes the law itself bone dry. Attorney General Palmer's ruling was not justified. It is a clear violation of the spirit and intent of the law, even if it can be justified by its letter. After waiting for more than a year without action he should have allowed the incoming attorney general to make the ruling.

How Ireland Has Suffered

THE American Committee for Relief in Ireland has just published the report of a survey of the situation there made by The Friends' relief unit. They say that the damages "inflicted by the British forces within the past twelve months amount to approximately $20,000,000." This estimate does not take into account the damage done in Dublin and is $8,000,000 under the estimate made by a British official. The committee believes itself to be quite conservative in its assessment. It finds also that "25,000 families in Ireland, numbering approximately 100,000 men, women and children are in pitiful need of instant help from the American people." These people, says the committee, are made up "entirely of men and women who have quietly gone about their peaceful pursuits all their lives and who have steadfastly refrained from taking part in armed activities." The committee found that 600 buildings had been destroyed or materially injured, some 2,000 establishments involved. They point out that wages are always pitifully low in Ireland, so low that Americans wonder how people live. Unskilled labor today is drawing an average wage of only from nine to fourteen dollars per week, and even skilled trades like motormen and conductors get only an average of about twelve dollars. These 25,000 families do not have even this small stipend. The cooperative creameries which Sir Horace Plunkett and his advisors had so arduously and skillfully built up have suffered a loss of a half million dollars at the hands of British soldiers, and 15,000 farmers who lived partially by supplying them with milk face not only loss but severe distress. "Your delegation," said the report, "viewed this damage personally and personally collected on the spot evidence as to the value of the property destroyed. In addition, written statements from reliable sources were supplied to your delegation regarding material damage in the small number of afflicted communities which they were unable to visit."

Depriving Childhood of Uplifting Worship

A GITATION is a good thing once in awhile. Only thus can we become properly conscious of some of our problems. Professor H. Augustine Smith is a well-known song leader of Boston and an enthusiastic worker in religious education. He believes that music must play its part in the religious education of the child. The secular newspapers are just now exploiting what seem to them radical utterances by Professor Smith. He has declared that we are accustomed to sing dance music in the Sunday school with sentimental words that mean nothing in the education of the child. The feet of the children under the pews keep time to the two-step music, while their minds wander away from the pious words. It is no wonder that the dance hall will soon be more attractive to these children than the church service. There are still Sunday schools in which men's classes sing "Beulah Land." Mr. Smith is hard on such men. He says: "I question whether they are men, or just unsexed, bloodless anaemic things who ought to be in a sanatorium or out on the golf links." While in many religious denominations there is now an official hymn-book which is used in the church services containing the great hymns of the past and some of the good hymns of modern composition, the children still sing out of the old-time mushy song-books, on the theory that the children want this kind of music, or that they do not like better hymns. The Sunday school does not fit them to become worshippers in the church, and the result is that but few children go to church. It is sometimes stated that the children are absent from the church because they do not understand the sermons. May it not be that they do not enjoy the church service because all of the music is strange to them, for the reason that the Sunday school has never prepared them for worship in the church? The mushy Sunday school book has large numbers of hymns like "There is a land that is fairer than day." Yet the children are the least interested in the future life of anybody in the whole community. Just now they are most concerned to get the most out of life here and now. Why should not Sunday School music be true to this fundamental pedagogical fact?

Criticism From Both Sides

T HE church gets its criticism coming and going. When the churches were quiet, parochial institutions, with their stress laid chiefly upon personal and family religion, the dominant note of popular criticism was that they were "other-worldly," and not vitally related to the great problems and evils of this world. A favorite point of attack was with regard to the saloon. How often were we told that "the churches could put the saloons out of business if they would," and the failure of the churches in this regard was cited as a symptom of weakness and general ineffectiveness. How often, also, was the church challenged in the matter of social vice. What was it going to do about its own members who owned and rented known dens of iniquity? Was religion only a private matter? Was it concerned only with the souls of men, caring nothing for their bodies, for the conditions under which they worked, the wages they received, the homes in which they lived, and the environment in which they had to rear their families?

Now that the churches have awakened and launched out into activities and programs designed to make religion more effective as a social force, popular criticism, which seems able only to see one aspect at a time, veers about, and finds fault with them for endeavoring to do the very things that they were found fault with for not doing. But was it not ever so? Jesus found his own age to be much the same in character. "We have piped unto you and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you and ye have not wept."

If the churches in awakening to the social aspects of religion, and to the social needs of the world, have gotten out on the wrong side of the bed, or have gone about the day's work in the wrong way, let the mistakes be emphasized in the strongest manner. But to deny the awakening, and above all to charge, as many do, that because the churches are deeply concerned about a multitude of matters, municipal and national, social and industrial, there must therefore be a lessening of personal and family religion, and a weakening of personal piety and the "homely virtues," is surely wide of the mark. There is very little evidence that religion means less in the personal lives of the people as a whole than it ever meant; and there is a great deal of evidence that the socialization of religion has intensified and clarified its individual content. Much of the conventional, orthodox, self-centered sort of religious individualism, that used to be criticized for its lack of practicality and red-bloodedness, has run out in the present generation. But many of the children of the saints are as saintly as their forbears, though the forms and expressions of saintliness may have changed. Also, one of the most hopeful things about the churches today is the recruiting of new blood, the winning of men, whom dead orthodoxies and futile pharisaisms left cold, but who are prepared to support a church morally and socially awakened.

Some years ago a minister induced a "labor leader" to go with him to a conference composed chiefly of ministers. This man had been estranged from the church. For twelve years he had never been inside a church door. The minister wanted to discover his reaction to a somewhat typical ministerial gathering. He was so deeply impressed with the sincerity of the men, with their evident earnestness in seeking to know the truth, and to do their whole duty, and with their freedom from the conventionality and bigotry that he had associated with the church, that he came back, united definitely with his companion's congregation and has continued a faithful and active member ever since. This incident is typical of many that tell of the new appeal and power of the churches in a time when so many are deploring their retrogression. In spite of many deficiencies and shortcomings, in spite of rather dangerous adventures in untried paths, some of which will prove disillusioning, the churches have made real progress in vision, program and attitude.

Almost solidly the churches have made their convictions and leadership apparent with regard to great social and industrial issues. One may not approve of every detail of their pronouncements, but the essence and substance of what they have declared constitute the fundamental principles which lie at the very basis of Christianity and are inherent in a Christianized social order. The churches have strengthened the hands of all who work for a better world. It is a profound gain that their voice of authority has been turned from doubtful matters of theology to speak as the very oracles of God regarding the matters which most deeply concern the spiritual and material welfare of the people.

What are some of these things that the churches have settled? They have settled the fact that religion is social in its nature; that piety cannot be divorced from politics, commerce, industry, or any department of life. The old type of individualism in religion is a thing of the past. The churches have settled the fact that the material welfare of the people has an organic relation to their spiritual natures and needs; that it is out of harmony with sound ideals, social, political, or religious, for the reward of labor to be inadequate to the proper maintenance of good homes; and they have come clearly to recognize that the world is religiously out of joint while some possess more than is good for them and others have less than they need. It has been settled to the satisfaction of the church's conscience that there are certain human rights which men are justified in claiming, and that democracy, if it is a good thing politically, is an equally good thing socially and industrially. The churches, it may be said, have settled certain principles with regard to the status of women and children. They are solidly against child labor, and if they are not agreed as to the specific sphere and privileges of women, they are solidly against every social or economic force that makes for her degradation.

With regard to these and other social ideals the churches are not adopting merely formal, superficial and temporary measures and programs. They are stating deep convictions. The mind of the church today is defining itself on all the problems of life in the belief that they are ultimately spiritual problems. And while the churches are emphasizing the duties of Christians as citizens, they are by no means minimizing the need that citizens must be Christians. Operating more largely in the realm of law and social reconstruction, they have not forgotten that they are the ministers of grace. The churches cannot be criticized fairly from the standpoint of one idea; they are open to vast improvement, but their development and activities were never broader, more inclusive, and more comprehensive than today. By no means let us stop the criticism the churches are receiving. Sound criticism is the gateway to improvement. But let us get away from the one-sided sort of criticism that assumes too readily that particular forms of development must be mutually exclusive. If the churches are becoming stronger and better organized, and are cooperating in mass movement and in social action, that is no evidence that personal religion, or regard for the worth of the individual, is waning; and above all the fact that the churches are more concerned about a better world in time is no evidence of a weakened consciousness of the eternal. The churches are just as sure as ever that Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and tomorrow; what is happening is that they are visioning him more clearly as Master and Leader for today.

The Community Church and the Wider Church

NO phase of present-day Christianity is more significant than the growth of the community church. In all parts of the nation such organizations are taking form. Sometimes they are federated groups combined out of two or more churches that have discovered that they can work more effectively together than alone. Sometimes they are initiated by the interested people of a locality without previous association. And in some instances they come into being through the emancipation of a local congregation from all denominational relationship, and its desire to serve the community in the broadest and most unsectarian manner.

There is no standard to which the community churches must conform. Like local congregations in the beginnings of Christian history, they are the result of the common spirit of worship and service in the people of a defined area, and they take the form which experience and good will suggest. They are, and by right of events ought to be, autonomous. The problems they face are mostly local, and in a measure unique. They will be glad to learn from the experience of other similar groups, but within wide diameters their plans must be self-evolved. And the number and success of these independent organizations is the best proof of their timeliness and efficiency.

There is one problem, however, which confronts every community or independent church, on which as yet there is no definitive word of counsel. That is the question as to the best means of establishing those contacts with the broader missionary, educational and philanthropic causes in which every sensitive community wishes to be interested. It is claimed by some that this cannot be done. As is well known this is the stock argument of denominationalists against the community church. It is but a poor argument, but it is pressed for all and more than it is worth by those who wish to discredit the new movement for community initiative. It is claimed that a church must be in vital contact with some denomination in order to possess those channels of wider relationship without which it becomes merely parochial and sterile.

What are the methods by which this connection with nationwide and worldwide Christianity may be enjoyed? Of course the one most obvious, and most strongly insisted upon by those denominational leaders who face with some anxiety the rapid growth of the community church movement, and wish to control and limit it as far as possible, is that of direct denominational connection. It is affirmed with emphasis, in season and out of season, that the only thing which can save such an independent church from failure is relationship with some communion, to which it shall report, and through which it may dispense its offerings for the wider causes. This is of course a fallacy. It is a fallacy suggested and fostered by the denominational spirit that dislikes to see the diminution of church statistics and contributions. It is this argument which is the weakest feature of the otherwise remarkable volume on Christian unity recently issued under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches. The disadvantage of this method of connection is that it preserves unimpaired the consciousness of denominational relationship and regularity, which is at best a temporary and passing phase of the church's life. One of the great advantages of the community church movement is that it fixes attention upon a different and far more important objective than the denomination—the community in which and for which one lives.

A second method that has been suggested is the combination of the various independent and community churches in an organization which may offer suggestions for their guidance, and may serve as a channel for united effort. This would be one degree worse than the denominational connection. It would have all its disadvantages, and furthermore it would add a new denomination to the present divided groups within the church. It will be natural for representatives of the community churches to gather for conference over common problems. But an organization such as would even hint at a new denomination is to be avoided. Therefore there ought not to be formed any agency for connection between such churches and the fields of missionary and educational effort. Some other plan must be found.

Some of the churches are adopting the method of dividing their contributions between two or more denominational agencies. This has the advantage of wider fellowship than one board would offer, and it prevents the alignment of the church with any one denomination. This is a distinct advantage to the cooperative movement, and provides a broader horizon of Christian activity. Still another plan followed by some of the community churches is the rotation of offerings among the missionary and philanthropic agencies of the various denominations with which they have had relations. This also has its advantages.

But it must be urged that none of these methods is ideal. The basic convictions of those who enlist in the work of the community churches are averse to the entire denominational program. It is at best a clumsy and wasteful system. It is destined to give place to one of greater coherence and efficiency. In the meantime the men and women who have found relief from it in the community churches are little minded to support the older system in any but the most necessary ways.

The agency for which hundreds of such churches are looking anxiously is something like the so-called Philadelphia plan for the United Churches of Christ. This plan provides that the missionary enterprises of the denominations shall be unified in a single organization whose function shall absorb the functions of the denominational missionary societies and boards. The consummation of this great vision would bring indescribable inspiration to the missionary cause from every point of view. But no element in the church would hail it with more ardor than the increasing group of community churches throughout the land. It would at once recreate for such churches the sense of identity with the whole body of Christ. They now stand in an anomalous position. If there seems to the unsympathetic onlooker to be a lack of missionary spirit in these churches, as compared to the conventional denominational church, the explanation is simply that there is no channel or medium through which they can function in their larger connections without either seeming to aid and abet, or running the risk of aiding and abetting, the denominational system against which their existence is a living protest.

Pending the acceptance by the denominations of some such unifying principle as the Philadelphia plan embodies, if two or more of the great missionary boards were to combine in such a manner as to assure the churches that cooperation and efficiency were to succeed the overlapping and sectarianism which are the scandal of the present denominational plan, scores of community and independent churches would hail it as a sign of progress toward the great objective of harmony and efficiency, and would hasten to utilize the instrument so provided. Such a merger of agencies ought to be possible at no distant day.

At present there is no ideal plan. The community churches must make their choice among unsatisfactory expedients until a better order is evolved. Toward that better order the most serious thought of the church of Christ is now being directed. Those who perceive the inefficiency and shame of denominationalism are a great body. Yet contacts are necessary. Until a plan of unity is evolved, some one of the devices here suggested will need to be followed. But a coherent and efficient order of church life is now in process of development, and its disclosure will be hailed with comfort by all those who labor in cooperative ways.

Like Introducing an Old Friend

[It is now several months since our readers first saw the name of Edward Shillito attached to a fortnightly communication of British Table Talk. At first only a name, this name has now come to stand for one of the most attractive and competent minds whose interpretations of religious events goes into the making of The Christian Century. Alternating with Mr. Albert Dawson, long-time editor of The Christian Commonwealth, whose correspondence has been familiar on this side of the sea for many years, Mr. Shillito has been steadily creating for himself a warm and expectant confidence in the minds of all our readers. This he has been doing with no word of editorial introduction or sponsorship. On his own side of the water he needs no introduction, being a preacher and Christian counsellor of wide acquaintance and authority. We have asked Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, of Detroit, to speak a word interpreting Mr. Shillito's personal history and spiritual quality, which he has gladly done and which we desire to be taken as the voice of The Christian Century itself.—The Editor.]

REV. EDWARD SHILLITO, M. A.

IT was in the alluring library of my friend, Mr. Harry Keep of Birmingham, that I first came to have a definite idea of the activities of Rev. Edward Shillito, M. A. We had been speaking of forward looking men whose voices were carrying weight, and Mr. Keep began telling me of the work of this vital and keen-minded Free Churchman whose writings are welcomed by The London Times, The Westminster Gazette, and many other journals, secular and religious. He spoke of the charm and grace and spiritual insight of Mr. Shillito's poetry and of the wisdom and expressiveness of his prose writing. I had already read that significant little volume, "The Hope and the Mission of the Free Churches," which reveals the deeply spiritual quality of Mr. Shillito's mind, and the sureness of his insight when he is dealing with matters of moral and spiritual history. Later I got into his sermons and found a delicacy and beauty of phrase combined with a swift movement to the heart of the spiritual realities which carried the conviction of authentic and noble prophecy. Mr. Shillito is the son of a minister. He is a graduate of Victoria, and is also a graduate of Mansfield College, Oxford, where he felt the influence of that great thinker and teacher, Dr. Fairbairn. He was for a period associated with Dr. Horton, with whose rich and ample spiritual aims he deeply sympathizes. He is minister of the Buckhurst Hill Congregational Church, in a London suburb, and the Literary Superintendent of the London Missionary Society.

He is first and most of all a preacher and he carries the preacher's mind and the preacher's conscience and the preacher's passion into all his varied literary and journalistic work. Mr. Shillito is keenly aware as to all the contemporary moral and intellectual and religious movements, and from his watchtower looked upon them with singularly sympathetic and understanding eyes, with all the alertness of his mind and the sense of intellectual discipline which his writings convey perhaps their most characteristic quality is a certain authentic note of spiritual insight. He uses words as friends whom he dearly loves, and he writes as one who has seen the invisible. He is a keen and eager modern man who has made his own journey to the burning bush.

LYNN HAROLD HOUGH.

Jesus of the Scars

"He showed them His hands and His side."—John xx. 20.

IF we never sought, we seek Thee now;
Thine eyes burn through the dark, our only stars;
We must have sight of thorn-pricks on Thy brow,
We must have Thee, O Jesus of the Scars.

The heavens frighten us; they are too calm;
In all the universe we have no place.
Our wounds are hurting us; where is the balm?
Lord, Jesus, by Thy Scars, we claim Thy grace.

If when the doors are shut, Thou drawest near,
Only reveal those hands, that side of Thine;
We know to-day what wounds are, have no fear,
Show us Thy Scars, we know the countersign.

The other gods were strong; but Thou wast weak;
They rode, but Thou didst stumble to a throne;
But to our wounds God's wounds alone can speak,
And not a god has wounds, but Thou alone.

EDWARD SHILLITO.

Announcement

DR. JOSEPH FORT NEWTON has so woven his messages and spirit into the fabric of The Christian Century by his contributions over a period of nearly ten years, that the acceptance by him of any more formal relationship will hardly seem to our readers to make any material change in the aspect of the paper. Nevertheless, we take particular satisfaction in announcing at this time that Dr. Newton has consented to take a place on the editorial staff. He will continue to write under his own name as he may desire, and in addition will share constructively both as writer and counsellor in the editorial policies of the paper. Dr. Newton is making for himself and his message a great place in the hearts of churchmen on both sides of the sea. The Christian Century remembers with pride its pioneer part a decade ago in "discovering" this brilliant and gracious spiritual interpreter to the larger public. It recognizes gratefully his generous help through the years and finds appreciable increase of joy in presenting him to its readers in an editorial role.

THE PUBLISHERS.

The Threat of Millennialism

By Obadiah Holmes

HERESY HUNTING has been revived. A world wide movement beginning in America and spreading through Great Britain and the foreign mission fields, under the name of "Fundamentals of the Faith," proposes to drive "new theologians, evolutionists, modernists and higher critics" from churches, high schools, normal schools, colleges, universities and theological seminaries. An index expurgatorius is published in Yonkers, Minneapolis and Philadelphia.

This cult does not desire heresy trials, for this means open discussion. It proposes, however, to use political methods in selecting delegates to official bodies of all denominations in the United States. The heresy hunting program says: "The National Conventions (Disciples, Congregational, Baptist, etc.), or Presbyteries or Assemblies (all Presbyterian bodies, etc.), or Governing Bodies (Episcopal, etc.) could be controlled by directing the appointment of delegates from the local churches or from other bodies." All denominational colleges (Yale, Princeton, Brown, Vassar, Chicago, Boston, etc.) and all state colleges (Michigan, California, etc.) "shall be compelled to give a full account of their work and teaching to some strong representative orthodox board outside of their own boards and trustees."*

A SERIOUS MENACE

This is not a huge joke but a serious menace as many modern clergymen and professors know through bitter experiences. Many denominations are witnessing the disrupting force of the cult of "fundamentalism," the mailed fist of self-created orthodoxy. The movement is gathering to itself the aberrations and excesses of demented chiliasm. The mental pathologist has named this sort of movement "pandemic psychosis,"† a functional mental disorder that tends to spread through large groups of people. It grows out of what has been crudely called "mob psychology" but a better name is mental contagion. The present age is neurasthenic from war shock and industrialism, and this state of nerves provides good ground for propaganda. Neurologists know that nothing is more characteristic of neurasthenics and hysterics than their tendency to yield to the potent influence of suggestion. This mental contagion spreads, and, on a pandemic scale, it goes far to explain the neurotic conditions working in the cult of "fundamentalism."

There is an underlying sense of vague apprehension, "a sense of impending evil," as the nerve specialists call it. When this gathers momentum we have the furor of fanaticism. Complex thinking is not possible for crowds. Everything must be brought to a focus, until the one idea becomes an obsession, and it is transmitted from brain to brain as a sort of unreasoning impulse, very much like what is observed when a herd is stampeded. Chiliasm has been carried everywhere by the so-called Bible Institutes, tabernacle evangelism, "prophetic conferences" and a voluminous literature gratuitously distributed. Vast numbers of people from orthodox communions have been herded to stampede the "unregenerate new theology infidels in churches and schools." It is well known that the standard divinity schools requiring a degree of A. B. or its equivalent for matriculation report a diminishing number of students. But the Bible Institutes, whose attendants have little or no equipment, many having nothing beyond sixth grade in grammar school, report an increasing enrollment from year to year.

ALL DOUBT IS SIN

These Bible organizations, whose fundamentals of the faith are based on literal infallibility, are not places of serious study. To question is to doubt. A founder once said that doubt is like a plant, there is always a sin at the root. These schools are markets where the goods are carefully wrapped and handed over the counter. Men from these institutions are in churches of every fold. They have no sympathy with the communions whose pulpits they occupy. Their lack of sound learning is atoned for by a continuous denunciation of colleges and theological schools. They yield their allegiance to the "fundamentals of the faith" program. They propose, led by the Bible Institutes, on the basis of great numbers, to control every denomination in the United States. The Baptist society, because of its democratic organization, has been chosen as the first field of battle where the reactionary forces plan to crush "the evolutionists and modernists and higher critics."

A very frank confession is made by the editor of the Moody Bible Institute Monthly, September, 1920, of the part that institution has had in the attempt to disrupt the Northern Baptist Convention:

We seldom go into denominational matters in these columns but the victory of the conservatives at Buffalo, 1920 is more than a denominational matter. The modernists in that body were amazed at the strength of the opposition put up to them, which as a contemporary says, seemed to come from nowhere. It came from God, however, as we truly believe. That the Bible conferences during the last five or six years have had much to do with it, there can be no doubt but they were merely the means in God's hand to revive his people and stir them earnestly to contend for the faith. That word "contend" needs emphasis just now in more places than the Northern Baptist Convention and what has been accomplished there and in the arrest of the Interchurch World Movement in other denominations ought to encourage evangelicals everywhere to exert themselves in opposition to error and in bold propagation of the truth. We never felt more ready for battle than now.

The Baptist society of the north with one million five hundred thousand communicants faces disruption at its next general convocation in Des Moines, Ia., in June. Not having standards of faith the denomination never has had heresy trials except by religious newspapers. Baptists have always stood for religious liberty, freedom of conscience, the right of private judgment and the competency of the soul in religion. But the cult of "fundamentalism" has summoned the great religious democracy to abandon its mind. There will be an attempt to control the teaching of ten thousand five hundred churches, eight divinity schools, nine training schools, twenty academies, and thirty one colleges among which are Chicago, Brown, Vassar, Rochester, Denison and Colgate.

*"The Crisis in College and Church."

†See "Mental Contagion and Popular Crazes" by James Hendrie Lloyd, M. D., Scribner's, February, 1921.

A BOSTON EPISODE

Not long ago in Boston a group of orthodox clergymen held weekly meetings in a church near the Common. It came to the ears of the chief of staff of the largest church in New England that a minister had invited a Unitarian brother to lecture in his vestry on "Jesus." In spots, Boston is like Palestine, "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." The chief of staff, pained by this breach of faith, appeared at the clergy conference near the Common, coming directly from his knees in prayer, and announced to his brethren that he had a resolution which they must accept, without debate, before it was read. They all, with one accord stoutly voted "nay." The resolution stated that if an orthodox brother should invite a heterodox brother to his pulpit he would be disfellowshipped. The chief of staff discovering the spirit of Roger Williams in Boston ordered the non-conforming clergyman to vacate the meeting house. Like Martin Luther they could not do otherwise. These outcasts like the strange creatures in the prophecy of Ezekiel "went everyone straight forward." They were harried not, from Boston Common, but from the house of the Lord.

A modern inquisition against scientific scholarship has begun. A committee of investigators is at work and will report its findings at the next convocation of Baptists. The appointment of this committee was determined in a convention on "The Fundamentals of the Faith." The regular convention held in Buffalo* in 1920 heard voluminous charges of heresy against the colleges and divinity schools and in a spirit of generosity appointed the committee named by the prosecutors of modernism. This is the first time in the history of Baptists that they have been so universally accused of intelligence. An ardent southern brother—like Saint Saul, "being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions," lest the committee should fail to secure evidence—has circulated a questionnaire among the accused. To simplify matters all questions are to be answered by yes or no. Some of the questions are: "Do you believe that Joseph was the natural father of Jesus?" "Do you believe in the bodily resurrection of Jesus?" "Do you believe in the bodily resurrection of believers?" "Do you believe in the bodily ascension of Christ into heaven?" "Do you believe in the bodily return of Christ?" Whoever writes nay is a heretic. It will be seen that the standard by which modern men are to be tried is that of literal infallibility.

It would seem that the Andover controversy, the trials of Robertson Smith and Henry Preserved Smith and Charles A. Briggs and David Swing will be like pink teas compared with the trial all modernists are to face in their struggle for freedom.

*Report of Fundamental Conference and Annual of Northern Baptist Convention.

Not long ago, in the Moody Bible Institute monthly*, widely circulated in orthodox communions, a prominent "fundamentalist" issued a call for the founding of a Protestant Evangelical League, an essential object of which was to draw a line through all churches and refuse fellowship to those who do not hold such doctrines as infallibility, verbal inspiration, bodily resurrection and the premillennial coming of Christ. With these dogmas there is a vicious attack on the character and motives of all who dissent. Those who differ are called traitors, blasphemers, Judas Iscariots and assassins of Christ.

The cult of "fundamentalism," with its verbal inspiration and infallibility, is chiliasm or premillennialism or adventism with a new name. The doctrine has had an unenviable history as well informed people know. "Each creative epoch," says Dean Shailer Mathews, "has been marked by a variant type of religion which, if not fanatical, was opposed to culture, regarded all efforts to unite religion and the current science as atheistic, looked to the speedy end of the world, and in many cases was marked by actual hysteria. We recall the Montanists, the Donatists, the fanatics of the Reformation, the Fifth Monarchy men of Cromwell's time, the Millerites, the religions demanding jerks and speaking with tongues. These extremists do little constructive work, they show remarkable degrees of censoriousness but have not stopped either the intellectual progress or the development of the Christian religion as it enriches itself by finding truth in the various enlarging spheres of human activity. Where would our great body of sound thinking be, if Tertullian's diatribe against Greek philosophy had become the law of the church? What would our Protestantism have become, if the chiliastic movements that dogged the steps of both Luther and Calvin had really become the dominant force in the church?"

DRAW THE LINE

Concerning this growing menace which threatens to rend asunder not merely Baptists of the north, but all the leading bodies, there is a strange lack of information. Few perhaps, outside those who have been studying this bolshevistic movement in religion, know of the vigorous and strongly financed propaganda of the revamped chiliastic cult that proposes to ride rough shod into power. It has a creed. This it attempts to force with mailed fist. It has a system of theology, fatalistic, based on an impossible verbal inspiration and infallibility. With this system no modern man can live. It is the chamber of horrors of orthodoxy.

A book, "The Crisis in Church and College," widely circulated, proposes the following plans in dealing with modernism:

We must organize and mobilize. . . in order to destroy the anti-Christian influences in our educational and religious life. In order to purify the institutions where modernism is taught we must discipline and reform these institutions. The management of local churches must be taken in hand by men and women of proper Bible education, of iron will, and the pulpits must be protected from the new theology. Let everyone agitate against the new theology in his own circle, his own home, his church, his place of work. . . Our present universities, reeking with the unbelief of an evolutionistic false philosophy, are the most dangerous centers in America. . . Our government has undertaken to regulate business, but the hour has come to regulate our education. . . The use of the evolutionary hypothesis must be abandoned. . . the new theology and modernism must be separated from our institutions of learning. . . If the new theology preacher is in the pulpit what shall the church do? . . . Dismiss him even at the cost of disruption. It is better to divide the church in a righteous effort to get rid of the false teacher. . . We appeal to the local churches to withhold their gifts from every teacher of modernism. . . Let us as with one voice declare that the new theology must go from our pulpits and institutions of learning. . . God give the courage necessary to perform our holy task. . . writing letters to members of the church, and bringing influence to bear on officials, against the false teacher, in public press, and in pulpit if possible, and through other channels, it would be impossible, for the new theology teacher to long endure such a holy and worthy publicity and propaganda against him. . . Once out of the pulpit this splendid organization would see that the false teacher does not get another church in America. It could, in all probability succeed in cutting off most of the financial support from these institutions, if not actually bringing about their total destruction.

*Christian Workers Magazine, XVII., 16 pp.

Such is the purpose of the cult of "Fundamentalism." The Baptists of the North face this organized attack at their next General Convention in June.

FANATICISM AND RELIGION

"An ordinary sinner," says the late Borden P. Bowne who also like Phillips Brooks, suffered much at the hands of his brethren, "may be restrained by considerations of humanity or public opinion, but fanaticism knows no bounds. And when this fanaticism is joined to religion, then we have all the conditions for the persecutions and religious wars which have covered the pages of history with infamy . . . are they not written in the books of the chronicles by Buckle, by Draper, by Lecky, by White and many another? In the light of such facts we can not call the church the pillar and ground of truth without very great limitations. The most ignorant will be the most orthodox. Having little knowledge and no intellectual interest, they will desire to stand in the old paths, stand by the old formulas or the old phrases. All that is needed for this is a competent and active ignorance and a belligerent conceit. With this furnishing they read out all modern science, modern history, modern sociology, and modern thought in general. This has been so largely the character of self-styled orthodoxy that one might have ground for a suit for slander or libel in being called orthodox."

A religious journal in New York, managed by a Southern propagandist, announces a call for another convention of Baptists on "fundamentalism," and states that "there is widespread feeling that what the rank and file of our denomination would consider heresy is taught in some of our colleges and seminaries. . . There will be great disappointment at Des Moines if the committee fails to make a report that will clear the atmosphere. The denomination wants to know the attitude of our schools on the great fundamentals."

"Fundamentalism" will be satisfied with nothing but submission to a creed, formulated by the founders of a Bible Institute, which the teachers must sign every year or the property will revert to the heirs. Baptists have no creed. No modern denomination will receive a statement of faith without criticism and open discussion. Modern men will not accept an impossible dogmatic creed even though it is handed by the mailed fist of a self-styled orthodoxy. The spirit of Protestantism is not dead. Premillennialism is morally impossible. It is a system of fatalistic theology that out-Calvins Calvin. It is a deadening pessimism. It is based on an impossible verbal inspiration and a fatuous infallibility. Only a demented textarian can accept it. The Bible itself is its greatest foe. The scholarship of the world turns from it with loathing.

A WORLD WITHOUT HOPE

1. It asserts that there is no hope for the world for the present age is dominated by the devil. The forces of evil dominate and the world will grow worse and worse. Its world view is stated by the Bible Institute of Chicago: "Our civilization took form when Cain, the rationalist and fratricide, "went out from the presence of the Lord . . . and builded a city."

"As awful," says the Dean of the Los Angeles Institute, "as conditions are across the water today (this was written during the war), and as awful as they may become in our country, the darker the night gets the lighter my heart gets."*

"The nominal Christian world," says a writer in Prophetic Studies, P. 170, "will be one vast mass of baptized profession, a corrupt, mysterious mixture, a spiritual malformation, a masterpiece of Satan, the corruption of the truth of God, and the destroyer of the souls of men, a trap, a snare, a stumbling block, the darkest moral blot in the universe of God."

2. It asserts that some will be saved at the visible bodily appearance of Jesus at the head of an armed force assuming his rightful place as ruler of the world.

3. It asserts that Jesus will establish himself in his capitol at Jerusalem as the head of a Jewish world empire for one thousand years. Rehabilitated Israel, the restored Jewish nation, will be supreme in all the earth. Sacrifices will be begun and all the world will go up every year, for a week, to the feast of tabernacles. All prophecy will be fulfilled and also the imprecatory Psalms. (Halderman, Morgan, Scofield, Gray, Goebelein.)

In 1809, William Ellery Channing, then a minister twenty-nine years old, wrote of ultra-Calvinism. "A man of plain sense, whose spirit had not been broken in this creed by education or terror, will think that it is not necessary for us to travel to heathen countries to learn how mournfully the human mind may represent Deity." An unsophisticated mind will be at pains to find nine words which shall more thoroughly express ultra-Calvinistic premillennialism, "how mournfully the human mind may represent the Deity."

"KAISER JESUS"

Few writers are quite so frank or brutal as the author of the "Coming of Christ," distributed by a Bible house for propagandist purposes. He translated millennial militarism into a picture of the returning Christ (or "Kaiser Jesus," as R. A. Torrey says,) as a great military leader, striking down his enemies and killing them with the sword as men of war have always done with the eyes of one who is aroused and indignant, in whose veins beats the pulse of hot anger. . . He comes forth as one who no longer seeks either friendship or love. . . His garments are dipped in blood, the blood of others. He descends that he may shed the blood of men. . . He will enunciate his claim by terror and might. He will write it in the blood of his foes. He comes like the treader of the winepress, and the grapes are the bodies of men. He will tread and trample in his fury till the blood of men shall fill the earth. He will tread and trample them beneath his accusing feet, till the upspurting blood shall make him crimson. . . He comes to his glory not as the Savior meek and lowly, not through the suffrage of willing hearts and the plaudits of a welcoming word, but as a king, an autocrat, a despot, through the gushing blood of a trampled world. And those who follow this emergent, wrathful King of Heaven are represented as armies. They come forth as a body of fighters. They come forth to assist the Warrior to make war on the earth. In this way the kingdom is to come, not by the preaching of the Gospel and the all-pervasive power of the Spirit of God.

*Christian Workers Magazine, 1917, p. 554.

This is the gospel of militaristic "fundamentalism" as against the gospel of grace. And this brutal cruelty and blood thirstiness it offers at the close of the world's most terrible war, to a world weary of the sword and needing above all else the gospel, not only as the wisdom, but also the power of God. It has surrendered all hope that the world may be saved by love and grace and truth. Its sole appeal is to brute force. Its War Lord cometh to destroy. It is a wonder that men who thus preach "propose an organization that covers America whose activities could be directed from the parent society and carried out by all the local societies throughout the nation . . . to bring to terms the largest educational institutions as well as the smallest . . . bringing about their total destruction, should the method be necessary, in behalf of the cause of Jesus Christ."

(Concluded next week.)

The Country Church

By Edmund de S. Brunner

THE celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of her national life found America at a critical turning point. For the first time in her history, the farmer and the rural group have ceased to be a majority factor. Three hundred years ago, American interests were of two kinds—rural and spiritual. From the soil came food, and from the church came a kind of Spartan consolation and inspiration.

Though the grim and forbidding "meeting houses," with their separate seats for men and women, their utter poverty of beauty and their clergy who occupied five hours of every Sabbath with sweeping denunciations of the flesh and the devil, were open only on Sunday, they were yet centers of the community life. To them came the Pilgrim fathers and their family flocks, thankful for a day which propriety and religious instinct demanded should be spent otherwise than at the bleak business of tearing scanty bread from unproductive New England soil. Even the small Prudence and Samuel of the family esteemed the day, though frequently in the midst of the droning discourse they had to be "tapped awake" by the warden who lay in wait for nodders armed with a long pole topped by a squirrel tail or less merciful knob of wood.

From the American countryside, established and continued upon such a basis has come the best of America's leadership and almost all her food. Prosperity for rural America has meant prosperity for the country at large. Upon the condition of the farmer remaining contented at his task has hung America's economic supremacy. For nearly three hundred years the farmer has stayed at his post. All this is an old story.

But the turn of the century has seen a change. American rural life has declined. The city has grown eight times as fast as the country and in the last census period has gained eleven millions over the rural population. Economically, the situation is serious. Economists will tell you so and shake their heads as they tell you. To supply the city with fresh blood, clean bodies and clear brains to endure the terrific strain of modern life, there must be development of men in the open country spaces. At the same time, there must grow up a race of soil-men, boys and girls who for pure love of Mother Earth will hold firm the ranks of tillers. The physical and the financial health of the nation demand a cessation of the exodus of too much of the farm's best blood to the city.

INADEQUATE FORCES

But while we argue thus, the exodus continues, constantly augmented by those who want higher education, better financial returns, a higher type of recreation than the rural districts are able to afford. Only in communities where some agency has recognized the new needs and proved sufficient to the task of erecting a satisfactory life for all people and elements in the country has the deadly march been stayed. But the number of agencies, with organization, money and desire to carry out this service to the nation is pitifully small and the forces at work hopelessly inadequate.

Harking back to the well-nigh indispensable part the church has played in the development of rural America to the present point, it would seem that in her rural pastorate lies the salvation of American country life. But here alas, is tragedy again and a case for more trained leaders. Because the church has not in adequate numbers adjusted herself to changed conditions, she is declining with the population. In a recent study of 700 rural counties representing every state in the union, nearly half the Protestant churches had less than fifty members. The same churches had no provision for interesting young people and often no young members, no up-to-date educational features, no live recreational methods. They had almost no full-time pastors, for a church so small can pay but scantily for pastoral supplies. As a result, ministers must serve three, four, even ten and twelve churches, travelling thousands of miles in the course of a year to reach the scattered preaching points.

Yet, if economists please, here at least is a start. Here are buildings closed six days and sometimes seven days in a week. Here is the plant all ready for the superintendent and his aides. The country church was once the sole gathering place for the rural community. Today, it stands in practically the same relation to community life. But since that life has grown a trifle easier, new demands are being made upon the community center. Rural residents are asking for some of the pleasures their city friends enjoy. And if they do not get them in the country, they will go to the city to search for the things which will fill their needs.

THE COMMUNITY MOTHER

That the church in most cases is failing in her task of community mother is obvious. The reasons for her failure are of interest to more than the churchman, for after all, she is the readiest and if she can be awakened, the most willing, to undertake the problem of reconstructing American country life. Why is she failing? Small congregations, part-time ministers—these are part of the answer. But there is more.

Instead of at least two services on Sunday, churches with memberships as small as fifty must be content with one or two in a month. Verified figures show that there actually are 12,000 of the 17,000 churches of a great denomination in the United States which on a given Sunday are without services. Nine tenths of the thousands of churches of three others of the country's largest denominations have pastors who live from one to 150 miles from their parishes. In Indiana, a minister travels 700 miles to preach at one church twice a month. Another in the same state journeys 416 miles in a month to serve his two charges, and a third goes 396 miles to hold services at three widely-separated pastorates.

A quaint case of "pussy wants a corner" at which the unregenerate well may smile is reported from a small western town where there are three churches and three resident ministers. The three ministers, however, are pastors of churches in another county. And services in each of the town's three churches are held every month by three ministers from still another county. But all records are broken by a minister in a middle western state who must travel 350 miles every time he holds a service! This travelling preaching which apparently is unavoidable in small churches does not appeal to the best type of clergyman and so in those denominations which are chiefly rural in membership, four-fifths to nine-tenths of the pastors have no college or seminary training. The modern farmer who usually has had a college or agricultural school course himself, soon tires of listening to a preacher whose education is not so good as his own and on Sunday morning forsakes the church for a farm or newspaper or neighborly gossip. Such ministers, unsuccessful in their work, depend upon revivals once or twice a year to keep the church going. The result is not always just what is expected, nor in the majority of cases what it should be.

THE REVIVAL HABIT

As proof of this, one has only to inspect the record of a middle western county where revivals are a habit. Thirty years ago, the county had ninety-six churches. In the thirty years, 1,500 revivals have been held. While other developments of the period probably did not result directly from the revivals, they do brand them as failures in the work of socializing and community-building. They included: the abandonment of thirty-four churches; net decline in church membership, 500; increase in petty crime, feeble-mindedness, tuberculosis and other infectious diseases; growth in political corruption and increase in the practice of vote-buying; steady decline in the quality of schools.

To the business man, such a state of affairs is scarcely surprising. He might even have predicted it with perfect certainty if the facts had been laid before him. He would never expect an annual or semi-annual visit from a business expert to put on a paying basis a business over which was an inefficient permanent manager. Yet the business of the Lord in the average country church is conducted upon much this slipshod basis.

Nor is the tale of churchly blunders yet told. Mistakes in location of churches have brought about a shockingly unequal distribution of religious forces. It is an incontrovertible fact that there had never been a minister within the boundaries of a western village fifteen years old until one was sent there the early part of last year to conduct a survey. There are seventeen counties in central and far-western states with no churches at all. In contrast, a middle western town of eight hundred inhabitants is the proud possessor of seven churches. In an eastern state, adjoining a churchless township is an area where within a radius of six miles, there are thirty-six churches.

WELFARE PROGRAMS

This and most of the problems enumerated have confronted the church for sometime. But the six millions of foreign-born now found in rural America present a new element of which the church has yet even to take adequate cognizance. Census returns show that one-third of all the foreign-born in the United States have settled on farms or in rural industrial areas. In North Dakota and Minnesota, where the Non-Partisan League, greatest political experiment of the day, is strongest, every other farmer is foreign-born. In fifteen additional states, the count is more than one-fifth of the rural residents. The church appears to have made little effort to reach these strangers within their midst. One community reported that thirty-four families in the neighborhood had never been asked to attend church because they were all "furriners."

While it may be said that the majority of country churches have not yet awakened to the great mission which awaits them in meeting community needs, enough have experimented with welfare and recreational programs to prove that such schemes will go a long way toward solving the problem of keeping the boy and girl and the father and mother, too, on the farm. A salient feature of the programs mapped out by these farther-seeing churches of the minority, is the minimizing of differences and the laying of emphasis on agreements.

"We Universalists still hold to our beliefs," recently declared the layman spokesman for his congregation at a conference of religious leaders to consider a program for combined religious activities in an eastern county. "Yet in spite of this, we are ready to become either Methodists or Presbyterians if such a change will give us a man of God to live in our midst who will care how our children play because his children play with them, who will be interested in our school because his children will be taught there, who will care for our community because he is living within its boundaries, occupying one of the three vacant parsonages in this village of 550 people."

These words brought hearty endorsement from leaders representing eight denominations. Nor has the sentiment taken always the form of words. In Carroll County, N. H., where a survey disclosed in a section twenty-five miles long, eight abandoned and deserted churches, with not a single church organization, action took exactly three weeks. The survey results were placed in the hands of the denominations to which the empty churches belonged and a full-time pastor was put to work successfully salvaging the remnants.

In Vermont, since 1918, the good Yankee practice of "swapping" has been in vogue. In that year, the three largest denominations in the state decided that one strong church with adequate ministerial leadership for the average small community was preferable to three weak and inadequate bodies. Accordingly two denominations withdrew from a number of points, leaving the field to the strongest. Those withdrawing were then compensated by being allowed to become sole survivors at some other points. Though methods differ slightly, the procedure in the main provides one minister, one set of services and other joint activities, with a joint committee from each church represented to handle joint affairs. More than twenty-five equitable exchanges have been arranged in this manner among the three denominations.

CONSOLIDATION OF FORCES

This plan, it is seen at once, goes far toward eliminating conditions which have made the church inadequate to undertake community work. The consolidation of forces under a single church provides a resident minister and the higher salary which results from pooling of resources makes possible a trained man for conducting a program of service for the community. Living among his people, such a pastor becomes a member of the community in a very real sense, interested in community concerns and anxious to support community enterprises. On Sunday, his sermons reflect his daily associations with the affairs of his parish. Day by day, he bases his church program more and more firmly upon the truth which is becoming increasingly evident—that nothing which is fit to enter the lives of people is to be shunned by the people's church.

It was a Methodist minister from Lakeville, Ohio, who went to the experimental station of the agricultural college of the state a few years ago to get cholera serum when the hogs in his district were dying of the disease.

When the official in charge of the serum station was preparing to make note of the request, he asked the minister: "Who are you?"

"Oh, I'm the Methodist minister," was the reply.

The dumfounded official gasped for breath, then demanded: "When did the church begin to take an interest in hog cholera?"

"I am interested in all the animals down our way," returned the self-possessed minister. "If my farmers lose their hogs or their sheep, they lose their spirits and believe it or not, spirits and spirituality have a closer kinship than just being derived from the same root."

SEVEN DAY CENTERS

A minister of the same type is Earl E. Harper of Holbrook, Mass. When he installed a motion picture machine for use at Sunday evening services, one of his older members prophesied that he was leading his people straight to the devil. Instead, by this recognition of a need for healthful amusement, Harper doubled attendance and contributions and made his church a seven-day center of community activities.

Nor are examples lacking of pastors who in times of need can go into the field of promoting. Dirk Lay, missionary to the Pima Indians of Arizona, recently persuaded President Seiberling of the Goodyear Rubber Company to lend his Indian parishioners $500,000 with which to develop their cotton holdings. Interest was named at six per cent, no security was asked and the only condition stipulated was that Mr. Seiberling be permitted first chance to buy the cotton at highest market prices. In Geraldine, Montana, when one goes to the movies, one goes to church. There are no others in town. Practically the same thing happens with a town meeting. The athletic association meets under church auspices. Eight denominations are represented in the membership of this community church and clean-up day and go-to-church Sunday originate with equal frequency in its councils.

A great aid to national digestion is the church kitchen. Home demonstration agents used it as a center for training innumerable women in food values during the war. As a result of this beneficent aid, families are eating better, becoming better citizens and giving out more to the community in spirit and energy.

These and other assets which the church is bringing to American rural life are just at the threshold of their usefulness. The fact that they have succeeded a few times points to the hope that they may be entirely successful—that they may prove the staying hand which shall check the exodus cityward. In combination with the home demonstration agent and the county worker, they can bring a new prosperity into the home and a new spirit to the farm, changing ere the next count roll 'round, the discouraging tone of the census figures.

The Main Street Mind

By Robert W. Frank

WHEN Nathaniel asked Phillip, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" he revealed a skepticism about village life that is voicing itself distinctly in current literature. For there has been an unwonted irruption of the small town and its affairs into the contemporary novel. Nazareth is in the literary limelight. Several of our best sellers focus their interest and problems in American town life and of these perhaps the ablest is "Main Street" by Sinclair Lewis. Critics, as usual, are divided as to the motive and merits of this book. Some consider it a commendable bit of realism, a rather long bit to be sure, but accurate, a sort of ten reel word-film of things as they are. Mr. Lewis, they aver, has held the mirror up to life. Others see in it didactic propaganda, an attempt to stir and prod the small town to an appreciation of the finer but forgotten elements in our civilization. Still others call it a literary sneer, the attitude of a supercilious easterner toward the small town of the middle west, the most ancient form of snobbery in the world,—the laugh of the citified chap at his awkward, unpolished and provincial country cousin.

Individual reactions cannot be uniform, and critics, no doubt, have placed their fingers on both the strong and weak spots in the book. Most of them must confess, however, that Mr. Lewis has at least one good and great idea in the story and he has written of it well. It has been said that Boston is not a city but a state of mind. Now Main Street, as Mr. Lewis envisages it, is a state of mind. He has given it "a local habitation and a name" in Gopher Prairie, Minnesota. But it is not to be found only in the Gopher Prairies of our country. Indeed, it is as apt to appear in congress, the international peace conferences, and in university faculties as on Main Street. Even the minister, it would seem, succumbs with fatal facility to the Main Street mind. Of all professional surrenders this is the most tragic. For the prophet, though he live on Main Street, should think beyond Main Street and be above the Main Street mind.

DIMINISHING PERSONALITY

What is the Main Street mind? Put as compactly as possible it is the mind that refuses to grow. It is that state of mind in which one's personality becomes smaller and smaller, dwindling slowly away until, for all useful and creative purposes in the world, it has reached the spiritual vanishing point. We think the marks of this mind have been fairly limned by Mr. Lewis. They are worth the minister's consideration.

The Main Street mind is characterized first of all by the desire to be undisturbed. The denizens of Gopher Prairie resented the interference of the meddlesome and officious Carol Kennicott who sought to stir their interest in a richer culture and a wider commerce with human thought. So far as they were concerned human culture was coterminous with the village limits. The sun rose at one end of Main Street and set at the other. All the stars of first magnitude wove the magic of their illumination about this village. They were a provincial, complacent and self-sufficient folk. They wanted to be let alone.

The acute peril of the minister is that he shall have the parish mind, shall be tempted to think only in terms of its boundaries. Or what is equally unpardonable, he confuses the limits of his denomination with the frontiers of outer darkness. To be sure one's parish interests are immediate, vivid and insistent and are not to be deserted in the hot lust after abstruse and speculative interests. Nor are denominational affiliations to be despised. But in these times when science has made of the world a whispering gallery so that we know almost instantaneously what our brothers are thinking in the uttermost parts of the earth, when transportation has transformed the world into a neighborhood, in a new and vital sense the minister's parish is the world. He must orient himself and his parish with reference to world movements and interests. "The common man," writes Mr. Wells, "cannot shirk world politics and enjoy private freedom." The minister does not sink into the pocket province of parish and professional interests and expect to retain an intelligent following as a prophet.

GROOVES AND GRAVES

Perhaps the most serious danger confronting democracy today, and humanity for that matter, is that it shall be atomized—broken up into small, self-sufficient and conflicting groups. In the vernacular of sociology the problem now is one of social unity, not of social differentiation. No common ideal or motive is yet serving as a sort of international glue to hold humanity together. Science and transportation have wiped out boundaries and made it necessary for us to live together, yet we have not the spirit which will enable us so to live—the spirit of a united family. We used to lament that half the world did not know how the other half lived. That was not so bad after all. Today, one one-thousandth does not know how the other nine hundred and ninety-nine thousandths live—and often does not seem to care. The denominator might be increased ad infinitum. In such a world the minister does not dare remain professionally isolated. He needs to be jostled out of his groove, for as Charles Sylvester Horne was so fond of saying, "The only difference between a groove and a grave is a matter of depth." His gospel should be the glue to bind a shattered social order together. He should know and understand the vivid inwardness and urge of as many group experiences as possible. He should be able to interpret conflicting groups to one another so that light and love will prevail over heat and hate. Not long ago a writer suggested that great social good might ensue if the mails should suddenly become mixed and those who took The Atlantic Monthly, The Bookman, Scribner's, et al., would begin to receive The New Solidarity, The New Majority, The Socialist Weekly and The Hobo News. Perhaps equal benefit would follow if ministers who read only The Hibbert Journal, The Christian Century, The Journal of Religion and The Homiletic Review unexpectedly received The Black Cat, Snappy Stories and The Police Gazette.

Such a suggestion is like a dash of cold water in the face, but who will deny that an interchange of mental pabulum, of viewpoints, interests and ideals, though all such may not be disinfected, might prove profitable—for understanding if not for inspiration. No doubt one group would be as mystified by the new experience as the other.

RIGHTEOUS BECAUSE AT REST

The Main Street mind will resent such suggestions—it does not wish to be disturbed. It is a state of mind that calls itself righteous because it is at rest. The greatest pain of the individual, as of the race, is still the pain of a new idea, and some individuals fear the travail. There must be work for such grooved personalities in this world, but is it in the ministry? Permit another quotation from Mr. Wells' Outline of History. Writing of early life on our cooling planet he says, "Drying up was the fatal thing in those days against which life had no protection." Even in misty, humid Chicago, or foggy London,—nay, anywhere, drying up is the ever-present peril to the intellect. To acquiesce in the desire to be undisturbed is the first step toward such an arid death.

A second feature of the Main Street mind is its ready submission to the prevailing current of opinion. The herd instinct is strong in most of us. We prefer to run with the pack and not alone—with the hounds rather than with the hare. The peril is that this instinct will control our reflection. Minds in the Main Street drawn by Mr. Lewis were the "me too" type. Their thinking was more or less regimented, their judgments goose-stepped by the more vigorous and vociferous members of the Gopher Prairie social set.

There is a genuine temptation in the ministry to become a parrot in one's thinking. The carbon copy intellect is all too frequent in the profession. There is room, no doubt, for commonplace men who will say with Mark Rutherford in his Autobiography,—

For I was ever commonplace;
Of genius never had a trace;
My thoughts the world have never fed,
Mere echoes of the book last read.

But even commonplace minds need not be servile in opinion and judgment. The veriest ordinary man should carry around a private debating society under his own hat wherein the questions of the day are threshed over if not threshed out. Now thinking has never been easy. "To act is so easy, to think, so hard," said Coleridge. Thinking is especially difficult today with the ubiquitous press inevitably influencing us with its hypnosis of repetition and suggestion. Yet our growth depends upon the intellectual initiative and freedom of every individual, however humble.

MASS MANIA FOR MILITARISM

Take the issue which the war, we are told, would settle—the issue of armaments. Today the principal interest in Main Street would seem to be whether one shall patronize the American Legion dance. One's patriotism may be suspected if one does not favor it. This, at times, seems to be the only war problem that has survived the post-war psychology. The thinking clergyman cannot rest content with such forgetful reaction. He knows that Tallyrand was right when he said, "a government can do anything with bayonets but sit on them." The militarists affirm that we can sit on them—indeed that we can sit nowhere else with safety. Comfort is a negligible detail. To them the chief end of man is to glorify armaments and enjoy them forever. We have succeeded in glorifying them, to be sure, but there is serious doubt whether we or any people can enjoy them. It requires a challenging intellect, one that dares to think for itself, to withstand the mass mania for militarism today.

Or take another example. The prevailing current of opinion in Main Street assents passively to the teachings of Jesus. Many would be horrified if they were told His teachings had anything to do with conditions in Main Street, however. Samuel Butler, in "The Way of All Flesh," tells of an English congregation where the people would be profoundly shocked if anyone questioned the truth of the Sermon on the Mount and would be equally shocked if anyone attempted to practice it. The minister with the Main Street mind is liable to succumb to this theoretical faith in and practical skepticism of the teachings of Jesus. What could be more paralyzing? Emerson said that society was in conspiracy against the independence of its members. It is fateful when the minister submits to—or joins this conspiracy.

PREJUDICES AND CONVICTIONS

A third mark of the Main Street mind is that it generalizes its prejudices, or what is worse, makes postulates of them. Josiah Royce was fond of saying, "The wise shall live by postulates." He would have been quick to add, however, should one have questioned, that the postulates of the wise are criticized and tested postulates. Now the Main Street mind is apt to regard its prejudices as something ultimate and final, beyond the necessity of criticism or revision. An actual case in point suggests itself. Having to deal with an especially irritating minister of a sister denomination a certain pastor acquired a decided prejudice which he generated until he saw the entire denomination of his offensive brother through a jaundiced eye. Such instances are not infrequent.

Or the minister may develop a menacing "high brow complex." Because he reads a certain type of periodical, forsooth, he may come to think there is something ultimate in his feeling of superiority over the rest of the world. The bookish man in the ministry can afford to be wary in the face of this tempting prejudice. Once it fastens itself it is like a cancer. "White collars are nice, but I hate to think of all the interesting people I've evidently been missing because of 'em," writes Whiting Williams in "What's On the Worker's Mind?" How many interesting people there are who are missed by the so-called "high brow" minister.

There is a story told of a doctor of divinity who sat in a secluded corner at a formal reception with brow wrinkled and lips pursed. "Dr. Blank must be thinking upon a weighty matter tonight," remarked an observer. "Not at all," said a sarcastic parishioner who had to listen to him each Sabbath, "he's not thinking—he's just rearranging his prejudices." The minister needs to fight the Main Street mind which never lifts its prejudices off the level of emotional approbation into the white light of critical reflection.

REFORMERS AND COMRADESHIP

Justice would not be done unless Carol Kennicott received her deserved appraisal. She illustrates blunders which the minister may be guilty of. Leadership can never afford to be patronizing. Carol Kennicott failed to win the confidence and love of the people whom she would uplift. She came among them as a superior, as a sanctified and certified reformer; she continually looked at them as through a diminishing glass. What could be more futile in a leader than such condescension? She thought art was to be found in art galleries alone and she pitied those who did not share her tastes. She missed the gleams and glow of beauty in Gopher Prairie. She loved the poetry found in books. But her ears were not unstopped so she could hear the swing and sing of music in common life. And one who does not love those whom he would serve finds neither beauty, nor music, nor truth in their lives, however rich they may be in such treasures. The most stimulating form of leadership is after all hearty comradeship.

A second blunder of Carol's was that of an impatient philosophy. Bertrand Russell attributes the failure of bolshevism to an impatient philosophy which aimed "at creating a new world without sufficient preparation in the opinions and feelings of ordinary men and women." No leader can afford to be impatient. He must live with people through their growing pains. Progress never seems to be in a hurry. It takes its time. It moves without haste yet without rest. The minister should not be obsessed with the modern mania for acceleration but learn the pace of progress. He needs to think often of those fine words of self-restraint which came from the lips of the Master as he bade farewell to his tardy minded and obtuse disciples: "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now."

These are reflections stimulated by a reading of Mr. Lewis' book. His story may seem to many to be a travesty on the small town. This is an issue worthy of debate. Yet he has sketched in bold and broad outlines a type of mind to be found frequently in these days. Where life settles down into the snug contentment that resents disturbance, where opinions and judgments are but repetitions of what one reads or hears, where prejudices are uncritically acquiesced in and control behavior, there you have the Main Street mind. And where leadership is patronizing and top-lofty, or feverishly impatient, you have what may be worse than the Main Street mind, ability made ineffective because of priggery and nearsightedness.

If Not a United Church—What?

By Peter Ainslie

THE first of a series of Handbooks presenting the proposals of a United Christendom. Dr. Ainslie, who has been a pioneer in the cause of unity, has given much thought and labor to attempting a solution of the difficulties which bar the progress of the movement. This volume deals with the necessity, growth and outlook of Christian unity, to which is added a copious appendix. The argument adduced is that if unity be not attained, the church inevitably faces an era of gradually weakening power. Dr. Ainslie writes vigorously, yet without heat or partisanship, and presents a cogent and lucid plea for the cause that must be answered.

Price $1.25 plus 10 cents postage
THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

RELIGION AMONG AMERICAN MEN

A GREAT cross section of American life—this our army in the World War has surely been. What it has shown of the real religious life of American men, and the vital lessons which the church should learn from it, are presented in this, the first of the studies made by the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook. Every minister who wishes to know the heart of the average American man—and especially the young man—should read this significant volume. Cloth, $2.00.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

Contributors to This Issue

OBADIAH HOLMES, a pseudonym for a prominent and influential Baptist minister.

EDMUND DE S. BRUNNER, executive secretary Commission on Church and Country Life, Federal Council of Churches of Christ.

ROBERT W. FRANK, instructor in sociology and religious education, McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago.

EDWARD SHILLITO, see special introductory word on page 9.

"MAIN STREET"

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

The chief merit of this latest "best seller" is that it holds up the mirror to the provincialism of our small town life.

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn Street Chicago

The British Miners' Background

A FEW days ago England faced a condition in industry that looked almost as black and threatening as did the international situation in the mid-summer of 1914. If the Triple Alliance declared a sympathetic strike with the miners it would have carried some 4,000,000 workmen out and involved all the unions in the country, as well as millions not in them. Mr. J. R. Clynes, M. P., one of the foremost labor leaders is authority for the statement that there are now 7,000,000 dues paying unionists in Great Britain.

In this perilous situation, on one side is the Tory and conservative cry, led by the Premier, of "reds," "radicals," "socialism" and "bolshivism." On the other extreme are those very elements hoping that out of the struggle there may issue a turn toward their extreme positions. But the strike is not that of "reds and radicals" nor is it even socialistic. Lloyd George's denunciation of the labor party as socialistic is voiced for purposes of the coming elections and is the same cheap political hypocrisy that took him into the last election promising to hang the Kaiser and make Germany pay every penny of England's war debt. The unions and the labor party have both, by definite votes, voted down "direct action" and all socialistic contentions, and even the extreme left wing of labor, the Independent Labor Party, voted with overwhelming majority against Leninism and all its associations. British labor is progressively democratic, but it is not socialistic or revolutionary. The surest way to drive it toward socialism and revolutionary theories is to deny the principle of democracy in industry and to throttle labor's reasonable demands.

* * *

The Demand for Nationalization of the Mines

The fundamental demand of the miners is for nationalization of the mines. If this is socialistic then let the reader remember that it is the recommendation of a commission appointed by authority of parliament, made up of men who were not socialistic and headed by a chief justice, who himself wrote the report and whose name it bears. The miners' demand is based squarely upon the famous Justice Sankey Report which recommended that the mines be nationalized. Lloyd George gave every promise of abiding by the findings of the commission when it was appointed; but no sooner was the report made than he followed his Tory supporters in repudiating it. In the days before the war when he was the progressive leader and hope of liberalism in Britain he was talking about dukes and landlords in a fashion that he himself would now denounce as socialistic. In those days he was coining striking campaign phrases about "Britons who are aliens in the land of their birth" because they had to pay rents and royalties to heirs of favorites to whom kings had given estates in centuries long gone. It was not Lenin or the English socialists, but a great English judge and a parliamentary commission that built the platform for nationalization of the mines.

It has been thirty years since Professor Richard T. Ely wrote down in scientific fashion the discrimination between a natural and an artificial monopoly, writing at the same time a scholarly and complete refutation of socialism. It has now been some years since the United States government following their discrimination made it forever impossible for individuals or corporations to own mineral lands belonging to the government. That very action was a repudiation of the old system of allowing individuals and corporations to draw royalties from nature's gifts but a full recognition of society's right to draw those royalties or to forego them on behalf of a cheaper product. The Sankey Report and the British miners' demands for nationalization involve other things in way of administrative processes, but it is this private use of unearned increment that is at the bottom of the issue.

The Dead Hand of the Royalty Privilege

Charles II once turned 15,000 honest, hard-working Englishmen off an estate in order that he might give it to an illegitimate son. These people produced from this soil the provender for their own and their fellow-countrymen's needs. Some turned fishermen, some became poor laborers and some tried pathetically to farm the sands on the sea shore. But here is the tragedy of it: the heirs of that illegitimate son have for many years drawn a million a year from the coal royalties on that estate, still owned by them. They have not mined the coal—they have simply lived in a luxury more glorious than Solomon's, toiling not, nor spinning, while before the war the men who worked down in the bowels of that earth lived on the lowest standards of any workmen in the English speaking world. Today some 4,000 of these royalty owners rent their mines to 1452 operatives and British coal paid an excess profit—that is a profit over and above all fixed charges and average profits—of $100,000,000 in eighteen months of the war.

Failing to secure nationalization the miners demanded a pooling of excess profits in order that a living wage might be paid in the less productive and less profitable mines. This was rejected by the operators. The writer of this article is not well enough informed to discuss the merits of that phase of the problem, but only to state it. Along with it is the contention of the miners that the operators desire to break up the national union and to substitute the system of each dealing with his own separate group. This is just what such American employer leaders as General Atterbury, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, are advocating and is a favorite device for the breaking of labor solidarity and the effectiveness of the unions.

* * *

The Big Human Issue Involved

The big human issue involved is that of a living wage for the English miners. Before the war their standards of wages and of living was the lowest. Even a casual trip through a few English mining villages would be sufficient for the average man who had a human interest in living conditions. They now declare the operators' proposals would thrust them back into those unspeakable conditions; they claim advantage is being taken of unemployment and the temporary depression in the coal business to lower wages so greatly that when the coal business picks up they will be on low wages and profits will be high. They offer to accept a sliding scale of wages based upon the changing cost of living, but stipulate that it must be fixed by an independent commission which will furnish a scientific cost accounting system, publicity of profits, wages and the cost of living.

The national wage scale they refuse utterly to surrender. Frank Hodges, their executive secretary, says the "output has declined, cost of production has increased, the output per man has gone down, though the number of men employed and the wages have increased, and in spite of all these symptoms, profits have continued to increase." The causes he believes to be in the fact that it is a basic national industry without coordination. This he contends cannot be effected in the peculiar conditions of British coal mining without the cooperation of workers and operators. This cooperation he thinks can never be obtained so long as the profits of cooperative effort go to private pockets. Under nationalization he says royalties and excess profits could be abolished. The psychological factor which keeps the miner from producing is the thought that the profits of his toil go unduly to the operator and owner. This mental condition would be changed. Under nationalization "defects can be remedied, the industry can be made self-supporting, good conditions can be enjoyed by the workmen engaged in it, the public would benefit and the industry as a whole could expand in such a way as to provide for the continuous well-being of all dependent industries."

The demand for nationalization is the most advanced phase of labor's contention. It is not socialism but it is a step toward a socialization of nature's gifts to man. It involves serious innovations and should be approached with caution. It may prove unworkable. Open minded men will keep open minds in regard to it. None but small or prejudiced minds will befog the issue with epithets. The favorite device of inanity, prejudice and self-interest today is to shout "red" and "radical" about everything that offers reform. It is the cry of "wolf" that will at last bring the wolf.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

CORRESPONDENCE

"Debilitating Questions"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Dr. Jefferson has written a remarkable article that is almost saved from utter absurdity by the last paragraph. The article is remarkable not so much for what it says—for, as a matter of fact, it merely repeats what other mid-nineteenth century doctors have been saying—but remarkable for its lack of appreciation of the point raised by the entire series which your paper is placing before the minds of the "nonentities" who cannot or do not write books.

Dr. Jefferson gets all "het up," or extremely excited (which ever you wish, or rather, according to whether you live east or west of the Alleghanies) about a stuffed man which after he has filled it with the rags and stubble of his own imaginings he sets about knocking over. Well, he sure knocked that scarecrow over and stepped upon it heavily as the boys used to sing regarding the bugler. He finished him to his own satisfaction and the rest of the world's amusement. The real enemy threw dust in the eyes of this modern Don Quixote and left him struggling against straw men and windmills. It was to tackle that real enemy, not to tilt with a toy lance at tin soldiers, that the present series of articles was written; but the eminent doctor engaged in his large congregation is apparently unaware that there are any real enemies to struggle against. He says:

"If a man wants to be of service to his generation let him shake off these debilitating questions. If the church is sick, let him deal in great affirmations. A physician does not stand over his patient asking: Can you survive? Is your energy ebbing?"

Now, on the contrary, is not that exactly what the physician does ask? Of course, what Dr. Jefferson really means is that the physician does not say those things out loud. And by the illustration is it not evident that what he means is that we must not ask our questions out loud, no matter how fearful we may be of the patient's life? In other words, the policy of the Christian church should be that of keeping up a good front. Let us turn Dr. Jefferson's illustration around. What should be the attitude of that patient? Should he refuse to put out his tongue? Should he hide his hand under the bed clothes when the physician asks to feel his pulse? Rather, he will welcome the diagnosis of the physician. If the church is sick—I do not say that it is; I am no eminent doctor as Dr. Jefferson is—if the church (that is, to make it very plain, the organization) is sick, who shall be her physician, the hostile critic or the sympathetic critic? And shall that physician deal in "great affirmations," or shall he ask the very questions which Dr. Jefferson finds so "debilitating"? There are some of us, obscure preachers with our little congregations, who feel the need of the diagnosis which The Christian Century is making, and who are able to perceive the motive behind that diagnosis and catch the point of the general discussion. We thank you and wish you God-speed.

THEODORE DARNELL, JR.

Worthington, Pa.

Is the Church Historically Christian?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your able treatment of "An Unescapable Question" prompts me to the suggestion that what you have said has a full and bold illustration in our historical gospel. Christianity was put to its supreme test at the start when the first church abandoned all claim to personal ownership. All the critics of the church know this and that this supreme social spirit was its leading characteristic. The first followers of Christ held all things in common. A second striking mark was the courage given to the believers to withstand the rulers and to rebuke them. Very different indeed from that is this present church which patterns its official administrations after the state, whatever the state's form may be, whether autocratic or democratic. And as for the mart, Christianity has not touched it. In these and in other respects the church is an echo of the old world ordering of things.

Of the social units which Christianity had to meet it has exerted its greatest power and benefits upon the family and the church next and upon the state to some extent, but upon trade and commerce not one ray of christian influence has yet been shed. It remains as heathen and selfish as ever and Germany, the highest educated of the nations, has given us a practical illustration of unchastened greed.

I believe you could do a great service by going back and showing how far our whole Protestant movement has been "too excessively Pauline," as Hugh Price Hughes once said. Paul's churches were probably the best at the close of the first century, and yet see how they had fallen away. Ephesus was told to repent and do her first works having lost her first love, and Pergamos was giving ear to Balaamite teachers, and Thyatira had a Jezebel leader, and Sardis was dead, and Laodicea was to be espewed from the Master's mouth.

Christianity is so much bigger than the church that it leaks through the cracks and shines in many social groups in spots brighter than through the church, most of all in the great moral reforms in which real Christians in the churches unite with outside people to force the church into a Christian "going concern." But it follows. It is intolerant of changes which our ever changing world requires. The spirit of God that at first moved upon the waters lives and moves now upon minds and hearts, even upon those who, with unveiled face look as in a glass and are changed from glory to glory even by the spirit of the living God.

Holland, Mich.

JASPER S. HUGHES.

Modern Literature and Christ

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just read with a great deal of interest the article in The Christian Century on "Is Modern Literature Christless?" by Joseph Fort Newton. To my mind, there can be no doubt that there are many indications that the twentieth century is increasingly and predominantly religious. As the interest of the nineteenth century was scientific, so that of the present century is to center around religious themes and to be moved by religious inspirations. The tone of fiction is one indication of this fact. Nothing is more barometric of human interest than the world of fiction. Now there is much that is vicious in the fiction of today, but the novel that tends to soil the mind of the reader is not, after all, popular. A salacious, vulgar, or anti-religious story is never—no matter with what skill it is written—a best seller. Only a few years ago it was rare to hear the religious note in fiction. Men wrote about human sorrows and temptations and inspirations, and the "visitor from Mars," reading their books, would never have dreamed that religions and Sundays and worship and the teachings of Jesus existed.

But now, in fiction and drama, the inspirations of religious faith, the warning of religious instruction and especially the social teachings of religion, are coming to the fore and holding the center of attention. Even the titles of books attract by their religious significance: "The Inside of the Cup," "The Woman Thou Gavest Me," "The Servant in the House," "The Son of Mary Bethel," "The Fool in Christ," etc. And these books abound in quotations and incidents which can only be apprehended by one who knows the Scripture to some extent. Remember also the popularity of such dramatic presentation of religious themes as appeared in "The Servant in the House," by Charles Rann Kennedy, or "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," by Jerome, or the remarkable interest which was shown in the revival of "Everyman."

The religious spirit is at the heart of "The Dawn of Tomorrow," by Mrs. Frances H. Burnett, "The Vigil," by Harold Begbie, "The Son of Mary Bethel," by Elsie Barker, "The Piper," by Josephine Peabody, and many other modern works of drama and fiction. But perhaps the most significant fact with regard to this revived religious interest is that it is not confined, as these books which we have indicated might suggest, to English speaking lands. There is "The Fool in Christ," by Hauptmann, the German, and "John," by Sudermann. In France there is Rostand, characterizing the personality of Jesus, and summarizing his teachings in the "Samaritan," and in Russia Andreyev in "Judas Iscariot," portraying the conflict between the two realms of action revealed in the contrasted personalities of Judas and Jesus, with a wonderfully beautiful revelation of the charm of Jesus; and Selma Lagerlof of Sweden, with her "Anti-Christ," an attack on socialism for the purpose of showing its inadequacy as a solution of human problems, and the final ascendancy of Christ and his kingdom; and Pontoppidan of Denmark with his story of "The Promised Land," in which the hero seeks the solution of his doubts and the ground of his hopes in every direction, and finally learns that the longed for Saviour of humanity is Jesus of Nazareth.

With these might be mentioned many others, like Frenssen of Germany, Widmann of Switzerland and Fogazzare of Italy, all of whom have portrayed for us definitely the life of Jesus or men in whom the spirit of Jesus was reincarnated. These are indications of the supremely significant truth that there is today no other character who so dominates the dramatic world as Jesus, and no personality who so holds the place in the center of the masterpieces of fiction, and no spirit so often chosen for the inspiration of modern creative art as the spirit of Christianity. Never before has the figure of Jesus so fascinated the minds of men outside the professedly religious sphere. Men are realizing as never before that the solution of the troubles of human society is to be found somehow in the example, spirit and teachings of Jesus.

They do not yet see clearly, but the light is increasing. One thing seems very certain: That modern literature is impregnated with the spirit of Christ.

OSSIAN DAVIES.

Friendship, N. Y.

An Embarrassing Privilege

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have been reading in this column on the propriety of the minister accepting and using special rates on the railways. I am inconsistent. I dislike all these favors and wish we had none of them, and yet I use the clergy permit, have used passes and on occasion accept the ten per cent discount sometimes offered us. I do not like any of it and always feel belittled when I do it.

I am not ready to acknowledge that I or my fellow ministers are so economically deficient that the merchant, railway or any other business individual or group has any occasion to extent financial sympathy. It hurts the fine-souled man to accept these belittling contributions and our accepting doubtless hurts us in the esteem of the fine souled people who observe.

I am very definitely opposed to special privilege for any one. The minister has no more right to it than any one else. I am always ashamed to display my clergy permit. I never make it easy for any one to give me discounts on my purchases. I want remuneration for my contribution to the welfare of society and I want the privilege of paying my way as others pay theirs.

Let us reduce the number of pastors until every man will have a man's job to do in a community large enough to pay him for a man's work. Let us eliminate all this gadding into other men's parishes under the guise of service.

I am in favor of every man doing a man's work in a manly way and getting a man's wage and paying a man's price for his purchases.

Oak Park, Illinois.

JAMES W. VALLENTYNE.

Regrets Omission of Prayer Editorial

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Please allow one subscriber to express his real sense of loss in the absence of the prayer from the editorial columns of his most stimulating weekly, The Christian Century.

Princeton, Ill.

HENRY JAMES LEE.

Books by

Edward Scribner Ames

Associate Professor of Philosophy in the University of Chicago.

The New Orthodoxy

A popular, constructive interpretation of man's religious life in the light of the learning of scholars and in the presence of a new generation of spiritual heroes.

$1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Psychology of Religious Experience

"Should be read by every thoughtful minister."—The Outlook.

$3.50, plus 15 cents postage.

The Higher Individualism

Sermons delivered at Harvard University.
"Good philosophy and excellent religion."
—The Congregationalist.

$1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn Street,
Chicago, Ill.

British Table Talk

London, April 5, 1921.

AT the moment it is scarcely possible to talk of anything but the coal strike, but by the time this letter is read the issue will be plain. Grave as the situation seems, if we really believe in the eternal realities of which we sing and speak, not even the gravest social menace of which we have had experience should make us utterly cast down. If we could see the whole of things in their true perspective, it might well be that this crisis, threatening as it is, would not be the only or even the chief concern. Nevertheless it is hard to talk of anything else.

* * *

The Ever Live Question of Reunion

If we do talk in church circles of other things, there is the discussion of reunion ever before us. Lambeth spoke last year; the Federal Council of the free churches has now answered and the next word remains with the bishops. The free church answer is admitted to be a worthy document. The drift of it will be known to my readers, but it may be useful to repeat that while it accepts most warmly the idea underlying the appeal of the bishops for unity, "we feel," the answer says, "that the religious separations and alienations often made by our ecclesiastical divisions contradict the whole thought of the church of Christ, which is his body." The free church spokesmen add to this their eagerness to share in any form of religious fellowship open to them, and most of all do they long for the meeting together at the Lord's Table.

But there are three stages of reunion. (1) There must be the right brotherly spirit between churches; (2) there must be real agreement on vital principles regarding the church and still more regarding the gospel. (3) A scheme of practical proposals.

After laying down their principles they examine in a courteous spirit the ambiguities of the Lambeth report. They make their position plain, for example, in regard to reordination. This plainly they regard as impossible if it is taken to mean that by the act of episcopal ordination they are made for the first time "ministers in the church of God." Did Lambeth mean that? It is not clear. But no account of this reply would be just if it were not made perfectly clear that the free churches long no less than others for a growing fellowship which may lead in the fullness of time by the guidance of the divine spirit to the union of all the scattered churches of Christ.

"We ask our Anglican brethren, on their part, to welcome and to promote closer spiritual fellowship among the churches, especially through the pulpit, at the communion table, and in the work of the kingdom. These may seem small things in face of the problem of reunion. They are not small if the Spirit of the Lord go with us in doing them; and that the Holy Spirit by his presence sanctions intercommunion, and, indeed, precedes us in every step we take towards it, seems to us—and we think must seem to anyone looking impartially at the facts of Christendom—far more manifest than that he makes any particular form of order or polity essential in the church. So we conclude that the immediate duty of the churches, in this high and sacred matter of reunion, is to unite in the fellowship of the world and sacrament of Christ's gospel and in the work of the gospel at home and abroad; and we believe that his spirit, who goes before us in these things, will go before us to yet greater things, and will lead us in the light of the gospel, if thus together we proclaim and serve it, to learn the mind of Christ concerning his church, which is one in him.

"We pray that the Holy Spirit may guide the churches in their decisions, and that grace may be with our brethren of every name in Christ Jesus."

Is the Free Church Response a Rebuff?

"A rebuff and we deserved it," is roughly the judgment of The Church Times which has been uncomfortable ever since Lambeth. It thinks and has always thought more of the affinity of the church of England with Catholics rather than with Protestant Christendom, and it feared that the bishops had gone too far. Now the free churches have put the matter right by their candid reply. "Let us wait; scholarship has not said its last word, but let corporate reunion with the Protestant bodies be deferred," that seems to be its inference though not its language. This remarkably able paper speaks for a large body of churchmen. It is the organ of the stern, unbending Catholics in the Anglican church of whom for many years Lord Halifax and Mr. Athelstan Riley were the leading laymen. Mr. Riley still writes, so a critic puts it, as if the church of England were in his back garden. But there are other and growing forces with which the Anglo-Catholics have to reckon.

The Bishop of Manchester says: "One thing, however, is plainly apparent; a way is still open for hopeful negotiations." The Bishop of Hereford thinks the free church answer gives good hope for the future. "When both sides in a discussion manifest so keen a desire to come to an agreement, the way must surely be found." The Bishop of Lincoln greets in the reply "the message of earnest men seeking to fulfill the will of Christ." He declares that probably a solution of the problem from the side of history is impossible, but "there is another point of view, that of the urgent and desperate need of the world." Furthermore other papers like the Challenge and the Church Family Newspaper do not treat the free church answer as a rebuff at all. Therefore on this matter we need not lose hope; the explorers are at work and the union when it comes will be all the richer and the more stable for the honest and careful preparations. Besides, we shall learn much on the road to reunion.

There is a place no doubt for ambiguity in negotiations when the parties are moving one stage at a time. Mr. Gladstone was a master of the art of leaving the next stage in the mist till he came to it. Perhaps that is why the Lambeth proposals are left ambiguously. But with masterly skill the free church representatives have fastened on the formula which might have two meanings and have begged for a sharper definition. I have been, let us say, a Congregationalist minister for twenty-five years. On my head, when I was ordained, were laid the hands of men of God, my fathers in the faith, the hands of my own father, of my principal Dr. Fairbairn, of the chairman of my county association and now after a quarter of a century, let it be supposed that the hands of a bishop are laid on one. I am ordained. Does it mean that I am made a minister of the church for the first time or that my right to minister over a certain range, hitherto debarred from me is recognized? Am I ordained to the ministry or to this ministry? A clear and unmistakable answer must be given. Vagueness here might lead to a swifter result, but a united church could not be built on ambiguity.

* * *

A Missionary Center of Publicity and Inspiration

Edinburgh House is in the west of London. It is one of those places which are gathering associations and memories of great moment for the church of Christ. The name prolongs the story of the Edinburgh Conference of 1910. And for those who think imperially of the church, that house in the west end is a center of energy and hope. In it are housed the secretary and the staff of the British Conference of Missionary Societies. The secretary, Mr. J. H. Oldham, is no stranger in America. In this land in their dealings with governments and in all vexed missionary problems, the societies rely on his wise judgment. There, too, is the home of the United Council of Missionary Education with its business director, Mr. Kenneth MacLennan. Under the same roof the "International Review of Missions" is planned and edited by Miss G. R. Gollock, while Mr. Basil Mathews on the second floor, with a very small but remarkably gifted staff, edits "Outward Bound" and directs the press bureau. They who carry through these operations are all laymen; they are of various churches, Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist. They are a fine team and any publishing house that knew its business would be glad to claim the gifts which are given without reserve to the propaganda of the kingdom of God.

* * *

Do Christians Have Second Rate Minds?

It pleases certain critics of Christianity to assume that no first-class minds are Christian in these days. The argument apparently is "Since we do not believe and we are first-class minds, therefore others who differ from us and still remain Christian are second-rate minds." As Gilbert put it in another connection:

"If what's good enough for other young men isn't quite good enough for me, Then what an exceedingly good young man this good young man must be."

To those who look at the whole field of intellectual achievements in this country, it is plain that there are many anti-Christian forces and still more forces indifferent to the Christian faith, but it is equally plain that the church of Christ claims in its services many minds of the first order, and it is true today, though it was not in Corinth, that not a few of the wise and learned are called and answer the call.

It would be hard, for example, to find a student of history better equipped than Mr. Edwyn Bevan, who writes in the "International Review of Missions" the first of a series of articles with the title, "The Christian Explains Himself." During the war, Mr. Bevan was recognized as an authority upon the inner life of Germany. He has written moreover upon "Stoics and Sceptics" and upon other phases of ancient thought and history, and a book upon India shows still further the range of his interests. To this same writer we owe a "Memoirs of Leslie Johnston," an Oxford don of great promise, who fell in the war. Such a story reminds us how heavy, and it seems irreparable, a loss the church of this generation has suffered. The army that was "enlisted beyond" was a great army, and we are the poorer. When any judgment is passed upon the church in the next generation, let it never be forgotten that this church has suffered losses such as the church in no previous generation was called to suffer. It looks as though the ranks were closed up. But often the thought must come to us, would that these men, seers and thinkers and statesmen, were with us again!

* * *

Sunday School Reconstruction

The spring and summer conference season has begun and Swanwick in Derbyshire, the hostel set apart for such assemblies, will be occupied till the autumn is over by relays of eager enthusiasts. The leaders in Sunday School work were there at Easter, and from all that is reported they had a most profitable time. Religious education is a great concern with many of us in these days, and it would be ungrateful to ignore the debt we owe to America for its leading and inspiration in this matter. There are many special concerns within this one big concern. The Sunday School is one; and within it are those who are at work on the primary section and others on the junior, intermediate and senior sections. On every side it is admitted that the old methods are not enough for the present. Mr. Archibald and his daughter of Westhill, Birmingham, have been doing a valuable service for years, and in other places enthusiasts are at work planning experiments. But it is a time of transition in biblical interpretation and in educational method, and progress must be slow. We were told by the traditionalists a short time ago that the reformers with their methods were wonderful, but they were emptying the schools. Even that reproach might be incurred without fear as a temporary stage. (There was once a church of which it was prophesied that it would never prosper until there were some influential funerals—but that is neither here nor there.) But even that reproach is stingless now or may be soon, for the schools after a time of decline have begun to grow again.

Another of the departments of the same vast concern is the provision of religious education in the public schools. It is admitted in the schools where the keenest interest is taken, that the boys, especially the senior boys of seventeen and upwards, should be taken much more into consideration. There must be room for frank discussion and the real situation in the modern study of the Bible must not be kept from them till after they leave school, when it may be too late! A conference in Oxford during the autumn to which senior boys from several of the great public schools will be invited for a serious course of study, with ample room for discussion, is being planned. Upon this very serious phase of the problem, those who have had experience with summer camps and members of the student movement, with certain head masters, are hard at work.

* * *

The May Meetings

The May meetings will soon be upon us. Those of us who are not much given to assemblies are tempted to underrate their value. There is too much rhetoric, and the apparatus for converting the emotion into practical service is not at hand. Sometimes the platform seems like the steamship on the Mississippi which won the prize for the biggest row made by its sirens and had no steam left to move. But without any doubt, these meetings are a rallying point and bring cheer and encouragement to many hard-pressed workers in the church, and there are few of us who have not known times when in the dingy hall we saw the Lord high and lifted up, and heard his call. Last year the Sadhu Sindar Singh was the great figure. There is no outstanding name published so far, but that fact too may have its compensations. The Sadhu was a great man, worthy of all honor, but the interest in him was not altogether free from idle curiosity.

* * *

Is There a Short Cut to a Good World?

Among our wise counsellors we count Canon Peter Green of Manchester. He is among the company who preach through the press as well as through the pulpit. In the press he is "Artifex." He has been protesting against the current fallacy that there is a short cut to a state of things in which everyone can be comfortable without anyone being good: a League of Nations—while every nation remains as it was! a social system where everyone shall be comfortable without anyone making any sacrifice! It cannot be. "And I am quite sure that we shall not discover the desired short cut. . . . I have ventured to write in this strain, even in a daily paper, because many people are saying to the churches, 'You give us no practical guidance for daily life.' To which the churches must reply: 'If you mean that we do not show you any way of being happy without being good we can only reply that we do not believe there is any such way. And if there were, it would defeat the real end and object for which man is in this world.'"

It is between Easter and Pentecost. That seems to represent the spiritual position of many in our churches. They are sure of Christ, their risen Lord. They have peace and comfort in fellowship with him and with one another, but they are still in barracks. Oh, for the mighty rushing winds and the tongues of fire! Then the church would take the field. And though it seems late in the day, yet the Lord God would make the sun stand in the heavens, and night should not fall till Christ became king.

EDWARD SHILLITO.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Recreation *

NOW here is something that I know about—rest—recreation. Work may be discussed theoretically. Education may be a matter of speculation—but rest—am I not sitting on a porch looking fifteen miles over pines and lakes? Are not the flowers blooming in the yard and window boxes this February day? And have we not just come in from a drive to the golf course? I know what I am talking about. But, if I must confess, it took me a year and a half to bring myself to this, to cast work aside and come away for a few weeks of complete rest and recreation in this southern paradise.

It is a sin to overwork. Look at the number of men who fall dead in the fifties or early sixties. Driven by fierce ambitions to make money and establish a place for themselves in the estimation of society, they wear themselves out, or they reduce their resistance to the minimum and thus become easy prey to malignant disease.

I remember how indignant my father once was when I overdrove a horse. Is not God indignant with us when we drive our bodies and brains overmuch?

Recently, at a club where I often meet him, I said to a noted author, "You are the youngest looking man of your age I ever saw." "Yes," he responded, "would you like to know the secret?" Being assured that I would, he said, "I never work when I am tired." Yet he has prodigious accomplishments to his credit, six widely-read volumes among other things. That is worth remembering—never work when you are tired.

Jesus set us a good example when he took his tired disciples away to the quiet place to rest, and we must remember that he was only with them three years and that the manners and customs of those days were simplicity itself compared to our complex and exhausting times. No telephones, no roaring trains, no sputtering autos, no clanging bells, no grinding street cars—no patent riveters!! Moreover the indoor employments of our northern clime are particularly devitalizing. There is little use working when one is peevish and irritable and nervously exhausted.

Every man needs recreation. He must play in the open until the raw nerves are soothed and wrapt in velvet, until the exhausted blood is packed with red corpuscles, until the muscles are like iron and the mind keen and happy. It is all for the glory of God.

A man cannot call himself consecrated until he gives himself at his best to God. Valuable, then, to the father, are the days when his children run away to play—to play so that they may return for finer service. Nor must these rest hours be taken only annually. One of our biggest American business men takes every Wednesday off, as well as Saturday afternoon and Sunday. Every Wednesday he spends on his farm—but how he toils Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday! More than other persons, teachers and preachers are dependent for success upon attractive personality. It is impossible to possess this save by relaxation and recreation. Holy, then, are the hours spent in the gymnasium or on the golf links or in the country. I want Christians to be more attractive than authors or actresses! Our beautiful religion should teach us this.

JOHN R. EWERS.

*Lesson for May 8, "Rest and Recreation." Scripture, Lev. 23; 39-43; Deut. 5:12-15.

What Would Happen If

THE Three Mountain Schools

well organized, would close their doors and a Thousand Young People would go back into ignorance and superstition. They would be lost.

MAY

OFFER- Five Negro Schools

would turn away thousands of young Negroes hungry for knowledge and send them into ignorance, superstition and death.

ING

Five Oriental Schools

on the Pacific Coast would cease to radiate light and life to the heathen in our midst.

FOR

HOME Four Christianizing Centers

would stop their work of winning the vast army of foreigners in four of our great cities from the old world church to Christ and the Christian ideals of America.

MISSIONS

SHOULD One Hundred Forty-Nine Pulpits

in strategic towns would be silent because preacherless. There would be no gospel message because no gospel messenger.

FAIL?

THE MAY OFFERING WILL NOT FAIL, BECAUSE WE WILL NOT LET IT

Promo- UNITED CHRISTIAN 1501
tional MISSIONARY SOCIETY Locust St.
Dept. St. Louis

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Baptists and Evangelical Christians Opposed by Bolsheviki

The boasted liberty of the new Russia is not much appreciated by the religious leaders of that unhappy country. Pastor William Fetler has succeeded in bringing out of Russia letters from prominent leaders both of the Baptists and the Evangelical Christians. Mr. M. Yasnovsky asserts that unless the governmental attitude is changed the Baptists and Christians will try to emigrate from the country where they may enjoy the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of their own conscience. Under the regime of the Czar, the Evangelical Christians were comparatively free, but the Baptists, on account of their German origin, were subjected to periodic persecutions.

Pastor Fetler Holds Russian Meeting in Spurgeon's Church

Pastor William Fetler is touring England at this time, and is holding meetings in various Baptist churches. He recently spoke in Spurgeon's church in London. The zealous preacher had gathered a congregation of thirty Russian soldiers with their officer, and these went to Spurgeon's church nine o'clock at night. The caretaker was found, and they were admitted to the prayer room of the church. Here Pastor Fetler preached the gospel to the soldiers with his characteristic apostolic zeal. In the congregation was a Jewish woman who had followed along because she heard her native Russian language. She heard for the first time in her life a gospel sermon.

Ft. Worth Elects College Professor as Mayor

In the spring election Dr. Egbert R. Cockrell, a teacher in Texas Christian University, was elected mayor of Ft. Worth. Dr. Cockrell is a prominent Disciple of Texas, exercising a wide influence in his home town. His election means the dominance of the reform element in Ft. Worth. He replaces Mr. William Davis, who has held the office for a number of years. Ft. Worth is the city whose chamber of commerce publishes church statistics in order to boost the town.

Oak Park Goes Forward in Religious Education

Oak Park, a suburb of Chicago, has been carrying on an interesting work in religious education the past year. Since the middle of October, 1921, over 800 pupils of the sixth, seventh and eighth grades of the public school have been dismissed from school for two forty-five minute periods each week to attend classes in religious education in nearby buildings. The work is done in just one building in each school district, and the public school buildings are not utilized as in the Evanston system. The teaching is upon a salary basis, and the teachers must be of a rank equal to that of the public school system. In addition to the work for the grade school pupils, there is a similar work for the high school pupils.

There are 160 of these under instruction in a nearby church, and these take two forty-five minute periods each week. Rev. Frank McKibben directs the system of religious instruction, his time being divided between the work in Oak Park and that in Evanston.

Methodists Adopt Resolutions on Ireland

The Methodists of Milwaukee have spoken right out on the Irish question. At a recent meeting the editor of the Wisconsin Christian Advocate, Rev. A. J. Benjamin, delivered an address on the "Irish Republic," asserting that it represented Catholic propaganda to embroil the United States with Great Britain to the advantage of Roman Catholic world interests. A part of the text of the rather lengthy resolution is as follows: "Whereas, It is even more humiliating to find that the senior senator of Wisconsin in an address in this city last night positively identified himself with this propaganda that seeks to stir up strife between this country and Great Britain in spite of the plain facts recognized by all well informed and fair-minded people that Ireland today has greater freedom than either Scotland or Wales and that she has more representatives in parliament according to population than England herself, therefore be it resolved, That we the Ministerial Association of Milwaukee of the Methodist Episcopal church are unalterably opposed to this Roman Catholic propaganda under the guise of sympathy for Ireland."

Miss Maude Royden Speaks at St. Botolph's

In spite of the written request of the Bishop of London that she should not do so, Miss Maude Royden, the well known English preacher, spoke at St. Botolph's on Good Friday at the Three Hours' Service. The bishop stopped short of an absolute prohibition. Miss Royden said the bishop had shown her many kindnesses, but since his only objection to her conducting the Good Friday service was that she is a woman, it would be a betrayal of her sex not to preach. Meanwhile the conservatives who belong to the English Church Union are demanding that "the religious bolsheviki be brought to book." They are circulating a large petition to be signed by the church women insisting that no woman shall be allowed to preach in the Church of England. Miss Royden has preached the past year in the Kensington Town Hall, but she is now negotiating for the use of a free church building during the coming year.

Would Let Clergymen Go to Parliament

The clergy of England are under the present law forbidden to sit in the house of parliament. This is an ancient law which was designed to keep up the professional distinction between religious and secular workers. In America there is no particular comment if a minister holds a public office, and many of them do in various parts of the country. It is proposed that the law of Great Britain shall be changed so the clergy shall not be barred from participation in the proceedings of the lower house. Bishops are members of the House of Lords.

Disciples Mission in Central India Reports Scarcity

Conditions in Central India are far from good. The annual convention of Disciples' missionaries faced the facts with regard to the work of the orphanages. An unusual number of children are seeking admission, and the buildings are full to overflowing. This condition results from the very unsatisfactory condition of industry in the country. The orphanage work has been continued for a whole generation, and there are many Christian families that have been formed by the marriage of Christian orphans. The missionary force has been greatly depleted by the furloughs. These had been postponed on account of war conditions. The missionaries are making insistent demands for reinforcements.

Presbyterians Raise More Money

The New Era Movement officials report that the Presbyterians have gathered for their benevolences $800,000 more than was received last year. This includes $415,000 gathered for the underwritings of the Interchurch World Movement. The total amount for the year ending March 31 was $2,236,276. The books of the various societies are being held open until April 10, and it is thought that the reports for this year for Presbyterian benevolence will go considerably beyond the figures above given. These facts are held by the people friendly to the New Era national movement for church funds to justify the organization of the special machinery for the support of such causes.

Dr. R. J. Campbell Will Visit California

The Episcopal bishop of California has invited Dr. R. J. Campbell of "New Theology" fame to visit his state and make a tour of the churches in May. Dr. Campbell will remain in America during the summer, returning to England in the autumn. As a preacher he has been much less talked about since he entered the Anglican church.

Quakers Ask Help in Securing Limitation of Armaments

The Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends in session from March 28 to April 1 has issued a solemn appeal to all Christians of the United States to do their utmost to bring about disarmament. They urge as an act of loyalty to Christ that Christians individually and through their churches bring all possible influence to bear upon the President of the United States and upon Congress to postpone consideration of naval and military appropriations pending the calling of an International Conference for the Limitation of Armaments. It is asserted by these Quaker leaders that the United States has spent an amount equal to one thousand dollars for every family in the land on military expenses since the armistice was declared. It is held that the United States is making the same mistake now that Germany made before the war in refusing to cooperate with the plans for world disarmament.

Humane Education for Presbyterian Children

April 17 was observed as Humane Education Sunday by the children of the Presbyterian households in America. This was under the direction of the Presbyterian Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare. The last General Assembly directed the board to establish a department of Humane Education. Professor Scanlon of the board asserted with regard to this movement: "It is in harmony with the spirit of the gospel, and the example and teaching of Christ. Both the direct and reflex influence of humane teaching is elevating. Practical experience had demonstrated its beneficial influence on the character and conduct of children, and justice and mercy are the right of all sentient beings."

Union Church Has Fifty Years of History

The idea of some bishops and secretaries that union churches uniformly end in disaster is not borne out by the facts. Bethany Union Church of Chicago, located at 103rd and Wood Streets, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its founding on April 17. On that occasion the happy memories of the past were revived by addresses given by former members, and by the members of the present time. There is another union church at Lindenwood, Illinois, which has about the same period of existence. The chief difficulty in the administration of union churches has been the lack of fellowship with other churches, and the frequent lack of cooperation in the great national enterprises of religion.

Versatility Marks Minister's Course

Rev. Roy Rutherford, pastor of First Christian Church in Amarillo, Tex., has attracted considerable attention by the versatility of his gifts. While in college he was a baseball pitcher and he is now serving in this capacity for the church league of his town. He often serves as a soloist in his own church and in other meetings. He not only knows how to put the curve into the ball, but he is in demand to address mothers' meetings. If ministerial success requires all this, it is no wonder that candidates for the ministry are scarce.

Cardinal Gibbons Was Preacher of Thrift

Among the memories of the late Cardinal Gibbons a common observation is that he was a preacher of thrift. He taught some homely virtues as the basis of national prosperity, these being work, patience and thrift. About thrift he once said: "In the third place I would name economy—thrift—as one of the most vital assets in success. That sounds trite, I know. It is very trite, very old. Yet no matter how often it is repeated, the number of men who take it really to heart is all too few. I recall the campaign that we conducted against the Louisiana lottery. We were able finally to sweep that great spreading evil forever from America. But the spirit that had made the lottery possible we did not destroy, and it is working its destruction in the hearts and affairs of men as much today as ever before. The economy of God is one of the striking features of the universe; have you ever stopped to think about it? Not a single dead leaf is wasted; it goes to enrich the soil for future growth. Not a drop of water that is not used again and again—flowing down the river to the sea, only to be caught up by the sun, and showered down upon the grass and trees again."

Navajo Children Without Schools

The Navajoes are numerically the largest surviving Indian tribe and they occupy a territory as large as the state of Pennsylvania, with a population of 31,500. Eight religious denominations are at work among them, but in spite of this fact there are over seven thousand Navajo children who are without proper school facilities. The home missionaries that labor among these people are calling for an enlargement of the man power and the equipment with which the Christianization of the great Indian tribe is to go forward.

Disciples Make Move Against Corrupt Movies

Rev. Paul B. Rains, of the department of religious education of the United Christian Missionary Society, has drawn up a suggested resolution with regard to the moving picture situation which will be brought to the attention of all district, provincial and national conventions this year. The resolution pledges the church people not to patronize movies that exploit crime or immoral relationships, which undermine the home. The point of view is partly constructive as set forth in these words: "We wish to assure those interested in the moving picture industry that we will heartily support, endorse and encourage the patronage of a higher type of film. We urge the production of more plays of human interest, but which do not over-emphasize sex, and which do not glorify villainy. We want to go on record as determined to exercise our influence to make the photoplay realize to the utmost in constructive amusement, entertainment, pastime and education."

Religious Education Association Officers

The Religious Education Association looks to Chicago again this year for a good deal of its leadership. Professor Theodore Gerald Soares is the new president, having been elected at the national convention at Rochester March 12. Other members of the University of Chicago faculty who are on the executive committee are Professor Ernest D. Burton, Dean Shailer Mathews, and Professor Herbert L. Willett.

Evangelize the Students of America

The student work of the Young Men's Christian Association grows in importance with the years. In connection with this work one associates the names of some of the most eminent leaders of the Association, such as Sherwood Eddy and "Dad" Elliott. The meetings held in the colleges this year have been particularly fruitful. In many colleges the net has been drawn, and in a dignified and rational way the claims of Christ have been presented. Following this the stu-

Interchurch Winds Up Its Affairs

THE final meeting of the general committee of the Interchurch World Movement was held in New York recently. Since there are still a large number of outstanding pledges due the movement, it was agreed that an office would have to be continued for a considerable time yet. However, the obligations of the movement are believed now to be provided for if the churches come up on their underwritings, and it was thought unnecessary to incur further expense in holding sessions of the general committee.

Three men now have carte blanche to wind up the affairs of the movement. They are Mr. James M. Speer, Dr. Raymond B. Fosdick and Mr. Trevor Arnett. They have been empowered by the general committee to act in any emergency that may arise and the office routine of winding up the affairs of the movement will be carried out by them.

The general committee considered the matter of cooperation at this meeting, and it was recognized that the field of interdenominational cooperation was already much overworked and there needed to be a federation of federations. It was recommended that there be a Committee on Consultation which should be made up of three representatives of each of the following agencies: The Foreign Missions Conference; the Home Missions Council; the Council of Women for Home Missions; the Federation of Women's Boards of Foreign Missions; the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations; the Council of Church Boards of Education; the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America; the Reorganization Committee of the Interchurch World Movement.

The survey materials of the Interchurch World Movement will be turned over to the various interdenominational organizations that would be the most concerned. This means that the foreign mission people would receive the foreign surveys and the home mission people the surveys made in America. Thus Protestantism's biggest bubble has burst, but in the bursting has left behind many a useful lesson which is worth the money.

dent converts were related to the local churches, and to each one was assigned a Christian friend. Discussion groups have been formed for further study of the application of Christianity to life. The courses generally used have been "How Jesus Met Life Problems," "What Is the Christian View of Work and Wealth," "World Facts and America's Responsibility," and "America's Stake in the Far East."

Needy Mexican Immigrants Are Being Evangelized

Mexican immigrants living in this country have been willing to accept low living standards because they were accustomed to these standards in Mexico. They often live in wooden shacks with dirt floor in dire poverty. Being unacquainted in Mexico with the advantages of education, they do not readily accept the opportunities of the free schools in this country. Already eight religious denominations are at work among these people: Methodist Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal South, Congregational, United Brethren, Presbyterian U. S. A., Presbyterian U. S., Southern Baptists and Disciples. The work of these denominations is mostly in California, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas and Colorado. There is a Protestant church membership in these states of ten thousand which indicates that the Mexicans do not have minds closed to the evangelical message.

Baptist Convention Will Face Interesting Issues

The annual convention of the Northern Baptists will be held in Des Moines this year June 22-28. One of the items of greatest importance will be the report of the committee on schools and colleges. This committee was sent out on an expedition to ascertain if there was heresy in the Baptist institutions. The report of the committee will be the signal for a renewed contest between the reactionaries and the progressives in the denomination. The Baptists have had a great year in money raising and administration, and are one of the vigorous denominations in the evangelical family. The task of their leaders is to prevent the denomination going out after the false gods of premillennialism, and to head it in the direction of reasonable interpretations of religion and practical programs of service. For this task of leadership there is a large group of brilliant and competent men.

Episcopal Church Workers Hold Conference

The church workers of the Protestant Episcopal church will hold a conference at Racine, Wis., July 12-22, which will be attended by workers from the entire middle west. Arrangements are made for a certain amount of recreation every day, but the purpose is serious, and the recreational features are subordinated to the demands of a heavy work day. The noon-hour lecture each day will be given by Bishop Johnson of Colorado on "The Development of the Church of England." Rev. Dr. Hall of the General Theological Seminary will lecture on theology, showing the relation of the faith to the chief current problems of life. Bishop Reese has been asked to speak on "The Missionary Challenge of the Fifth Province." Other topics will be "The Devotional Use of the Old Testament," Rev. F. D. Tyner, Minneapolis, and "Building Up the Devotional Life of a Parish," Rev. C. H.

Young. Courses are offered in "The Treasures of the Prayer Book," by Rev. C. E. McCoy, Kenosha; "Moral Problems," by Bishop Webb; "Teacher Training Methods," "Church Service League," "Social Service in the Parish," "Church School Problems," "The Successful Small

Churches Face Unemployment

THE Social Service Commission of the Chicago Church Federation has been making an investigation of the unemployment problem in Chicago. The facts discovered are challenging. Since they are in all probability typical of the condition in every large city in the nation, they demand the careful study of church leaders. There are a hundred thousand idle men in the city. Some of these are idle every winter, being the city's force of seasonal workers who travel about the country to work at different jobs such as ice packing, berry picking, harvesting and other seasonal employment.

Dr. A. H. R. Atwood recently visited eleven places of refuge for these men on the west side. He found 1684 men sleeping in these eleven places. Some had good quarters at the Dawes Memorial Hotel; others were on the floor at Hogan's Flop at ten cents a head. There are scores of places in the city where they are now feeding men free. The favorite device is the soup bowl. At one place they are able to make a hundred bowls of soup for one dollar and this soup has a great deal of nourishment in it.

In the army of the unemployed one finds the widest variety of the human kind. They are not all of the uneducated, nor are they all men who have had no homes in their youth. One finds in the soup line a considerable number of former soldiers. These incline to be cynical concerning the outcome of the war. Sometimes one will run across a man of a university training who has been a misfit. Some of these come back, as anyone knows who takes the trouble to read the biography of such an individual as the poet Masefield.

The reason there has been so little disturbance this year with an unprecedented number of people unemployed has been the scarcity of whiskey. Even those who have been opposed to the eighteenth amendment recognize that it has been a blessing this year.

The social service commission have their ideas with regard to the remedy for the situation which they have found in Chicago. They insist that the industries make every possible effort to employ the full quota of men for either full time or part time. It is also insisted that the money now being held for various public works, including road building, be released at once so that large numbers of unemployed men may go to work at these tasks. The building situation receives special attention in the report of the committee. There is now a deadlock between the labor unions and the bosses in Chicago over the question of wages. There is no evident intention on the part of the unions to abate in any measure their demands. They argue that the increase of rents has made living costs higher than ever. At the same time, the idleness in the building trades only increases the scarcity of houses. The social service commission urges that every right means be taken to end the building deadlock. The mayor is also memorialized to appoint a commission on unemployment. This commission has been authorized by the City Council, but has never been appointed. It is felt that there is much that might be done to alleviate the lot of the idle workers if the situation were given intelligent direction.

There seems also need for a special fund to provide food and shelter while machinery is being put into operation for the employment of the workers. The city is urged to open and equip more municipal lodging houses. It is also believed that the church must adopt measures of relief. Already large numbers of churches are facing concrete parish problems. The churches least prepared to meet these burdens are the very ones which must bear the heaviest load. Unless the wheels of industry begin turning at a very early date it will be necessary to organize a great common fund in the more fortunate neighborhoods to carry the burdens of the poor in those sections where there is the direst need. To what extent the Chicago situation is typical of the whole country is not known except in a general way. The exodus of workers from cities where there have been large automobile and tire factories is well known. The workers tend to increase the problems of other communities to which they go. The world needs economic goods and the workers need employment, but no one seems able to solve the problem of coordinating these two great human needs.

The April Number of THE CHRISTIAN UNION QUARTERLY, 504 N. Fulton Avenue, Baltimore, Md., marks the close of its 10th Volume.

Interdenominational and International.

The April number contains the following outstanding articles:

"Practical Steps Towards Christian Reunion," by Rev. Arthur C. Headlam, D.D., Oxford, England.

"The Outlook for Christian Unity," by Rev. Joseph A. Vance, D.D., Detroit, Mich.

"Towards Christian Unity," by Rev. Alexander Ramsay, D.D. London, Eng.

"The Dogmatic Versus the Experimental Approach to Union," by Professor Alva W. Taylor, M.A., Columbia, Mo.

"Has the Denominational School a Place in Present Day Education?" by Rev. Peter Ainslie, D.D., Baltimore, Md.

50 Cents a Copy. $2.00 a Year.

Sunday School," "Weekday Religious Instruction," "Dramatic Work and Paganry" and "Americanization." Normal courses are offered in the Christian Nurture Series. Mission study classes and young people's meetings are arranged on vocation.

Plan Outdoor Evangelism for Chicago

Dr. Charles L. Goodell, executive secretary of the Commission on Evangelism of the Federal Council of Churches, held a conference on open air evangelism in Chicago on April 18. The conference was held in the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, 19 S. LaSalle St. Dr. Goodell has had a successful experience in preaching from the steps of the city hall in New York to thousands of people. Among the Chicago speakers who addressed the conference was Dr. Norman B. Barr, whose topic was "Evangelization and Americanization."

New Officers in the Federal Council

The Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of Churches met in New York on April 8. A number of important positions were to be filled. Rev. John M. Moore, D.D., pastor of Marcy Avenue Baptist Church, of Brooklyn, was chosen chairman of the Administrative Committee. He is pastor of one of the most influential Baptist churches of the country. He has served as secretary of the department of Missionary Education of the Northern Baptists and was the originator of the five year program of that denomination. At the same meeting Rev. Rufus W. Miller, D.D., secretary of the Board of Publication and Sunday School Work of the Reformed Church in the United States, was made vice chairman and Professor John R. Hawkins, colored layman, was made second vice chairman to succeed Bishop George M. Mathews, of the United Brethren in Christ.

Great Tribute to Dr. Gunsaulus

The ministers of Chicago had luncheon together at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium on April 4. The occasion of their meeting was to pay tribute to the memory of the late Dr. Gunsaulus, well recognized as Chicago's greatest minister in a generation. The accommodations were taxed to their utmost by the ministers. Many unable to lunch stood about the room. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis of New York delivered a tribute to the memory of his departed friend which seemed to the assembled group the greatest effort in the life of the distinguished preacher of New York. Dr. Hillis traced the genius of Dr. Gunsaulus as it expressed itself in education, preaching, lecturing, writing and other forms of self-expression.

Cleveland Pastor Resigns

Rev. E. B. Barnes is pastor of one of the outstanding Disciples churches in Cleveland, Franklin Circle Church. Previously he was one of the most prominent of the Kentucky ministers. He is known for his journalistic gifts, many interesting articles having come from his pen in recent years. It is reported that he has resigned his work in Cleveland to accept a position in connection with the Near East Relief administration.

Christian Endeavor Alumni Have a Chance to Help

The Christian Endeavor Society has lived long enough to have large numbers of people, former members, who are now too old to work in young people's organizations. These are called alumni and are asked to have a very definite interest in the work of the young people in the different churches. They are also being asked to become sustaining members for the general work of the society in the state and national organizations. The support of these overhead organizations has been precarious in the past, depending upon the contributions of local Christian Endeavor societies.

Woman Question Disturbs the Presbyterians

Since the Garden of Eden, the woman question has been a vital one, each society undertaking to settle the status of women in the social group. With the coming of woman suffrage throughout the world, the status of women in religious organizations is coming to be the subject of live debate. The churches with congregational polity pass the question down to the local congregation, but those that are more closely organized must face the woman question as an issue in state and national meetings. The Presbyterians will be confronted with no more urgent or difficult question at Winona Lake, Ind., in May, than the right of Presbyterian women to occupy the eldership. The presbyters have been voting on the subject and it is significant that the small presbyteries have been voting in favor of the female eldership. New York presbytery, which is liberal in theology, has voted on the conservative side of the issue. For once there is a discussion which will make a brand new alignment of forces, for both conservatives and liberals are divided in their attitude toward the question of having women in the Presbyterian session.

Ritual Dance and Virgin Mary

The glorification of ritual and the revival of discarded religious customs marks much of the activity of those in the Episcopal church who are pro-Roman in their sympathies. In St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie of New York there was recently a ritual dance based on the Adrea Della Robbia plaque of the "Annunciation." The rector, Rev. William Norman Guthrie, gave an address preceding the dance in which he made some remarks concerning Jesus Christ and Mary which are characteristic of a certain group in the Episcopal fellowship. He said: "For those who are scandalized at a Protestant church showing reverence to the Virgin Mary, may we state that for three hundred years Christendom paid its chief homage to her, and then, having cast out from our world of ideals and divine symbols the woman, the Protestant reformers left woman without an adequate spiritual expression and naturally compelled the feminization of Christ to meet the need. If we have suffered from an effeminate Christ it has been because we have not been allowed to express our ideal of womanhood in a normal way by the cult of the Mother of Jesus. It is humorous enough to see, that having rid ourselves of the Virgin Mother of Jesus and not being able to understand Isis or Demeter or the great Persephone, in spite of Pater, George Meredith, et al, we are succumbing to her oriental expression and shortly every one will have a little shrine to Kyanyin. It is, of course, so much more intelligent to import an emanation of the Buddha

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

Publish a Parish Paper

A Parish Paper will advertise your church and put you to the front as a live, progressive pastor.

By our co-operative plan you can publish a Parish Paper without cost to you or church. Many churches are making a nice profit from their paper.

Samples and particulars sent free. No obligation on your part.

The National Religious Press
Grand Rapids, Michigan

750 BIBLE & GOSPEL STUDIES
Brief Complete Outlines of Sermons, Talks, Studies; for Christians, Students, Teachers, Bible Preachers. Covering Old and New Testaments. Ready Help for Leading Meetings. Many Important Questions Answered. Apt References and Short Spiritual Explanations. All Subjects Fully Covered. Vest Pocket Size, 120 pages. Cloth, 25c. Morocco 35c, postpaid. Stamps Taken. AGENTS Wanted.
GEO. W. NOBLE, Monon Building, Chicago, Ill.

GROUP OR WHOOP-ING COUGH
120 YEARS OF SUCCESSFUL USE
RELIEVES PROMPTLY AND SAFELY
ALSO FOR BRONCHITIS, LUMBAGO, RHEUMATISM.
W. EDWARDS & SON
157 QUEEN VICTORIA ST.
LONDON, ENG.
ROCHE'S HERBAL EMBROCATION FOR ALL DRUGGISTS OR
E. FOUGERA & CO. INC.
90-92 BEEKMAN ST. N.Y.

from China, the mother of mercy, than to turn this stream of idealization and tender admiration to the mother of our Lord Jesus Christ! The Episcopal church, thank goodness, has never been so Protestant as to have forgotten the honor due the mother of her Lord."

Detroit Baptists Face Negro Problem

In the good old days, Detroit had a Negro population of five thousand. A year ago this population had increased until it totaled a hundred thousand or more. The industrial depression has made the lot of these Negroes, recently come from the south, very hard. The churches in Detroit are compelled to face the question of relief for them. Meanwhile the Detroit Baptists have been organizing Negro churches until they now have a roster of 14,598 members. The value of the Negro Baptist buildings is now very close to a half million dollars. Among the plans for the future is a Negro Baptist center in the down town district employing the social devices. This will be housed in a building to cost between fifty and a hundred thousand dollars.

Catholics Organize Their Students

The Christian work among students carried on among students by the Y. M. C. A. in different countries in the world was once an exclusively Protestant activity. In recent years the Catholic church has organized the students in their universities to fight socialism, which finds a more fertile field among these than in any other class except workingmen. The Catholic student movement is particularly strong in Spain. The International Association of Catholic Students has headquarters in Fribourg, Switzerland. The association hopes to extend its influence throughout the world.

Theological Professors Send Word of Appreciation to Wilson

The instructors of Union Theological Seminary, evidently moved by the loneliness and illness of the man who for eight years carried the burdens of the world war on his shoulders, have sent ex-President Wilson an affectionate greeting in which they assert that they still look to him for moral leadership. Among the signatures were those of the president, Dr. McGiffert, Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, Dr. William Adams Brown, Dr. Gaylord S. White, Dr. D. J. Fleming and Dr. C. P. Fagnani.

Contributions to China Fund Reach Five Million

The contributions to the China Famine Fund have reached five million dollars. Over seven hundred thousand dollars was cabled to China during the past week. The Christian Herald has collected a half million on its own account. The Red Cross has contributed a million, and a large part of the remainder has been given by the churches. Meanwhile the need in China continues unabated, for it is three months to the harvest and even when the harvest comes, it is uncertain whether it will be sufficient for the needs of the people. At the best millions of people will perish before any relief reaches them.

Ministerial Ethics a Topic of Discussion

Every profession gradually evolves an ethical code. If this has been greatly delayed for Protestant ministers, yet most of them recognize certain obligations as arising primarily out of their professional relationships. The Presbyterian ministers of Brooklyn recently held a session at which ministerial ethics was the topic. They discussed the right of a minister to invite neighboring church members to unite with his church. The minister in his relationship to the denominational leaders was a topic of live debate. Has the minister any other duty than that of blind obedience to secretaries and national movement leaders? There was a strong disposition to hold that the parish minister has some rights in the adaptation of methods to his local situation. The obligation of the Presbyterian minister to uphold the creed of his church occasioned a warm discussion. Shall the minister accept the creed blindly or follow the leadings of truth? On this topic speeches were made of the most diverse sort.

Quakers Have Cared for the Babies

One of the shocking features of war is the brutality and lust that is let loose at such a time. The Quakers have been carrying on a work for babies in France, and have received 1,000 abandoned babies and 1,200 mothers whose babies were born in their institution. Many of these mothers have been the victims of force, and are not able to give their children any love. Large sums of the American fund have been spent in this work, and now the French are beginning to finance the task. The Quaker leaders will be continued until native leadership is secured.

The Sword or The Cross

By KIRBY PAGE

COMMENTS ON "THE SWORD OR THE CROSS"

Charles E. Jefferson, Pastor Broadway Tabernacle, N. Y.:

I like the style of your presentation, and also the noble Christian spirit that breathes through what you have written. You know that I am not able to go quite so far as you do, but I am always happy to have men who feel as you do express their convictions, for it is possible that you are right, and that the rest of us will have to come up where you are.

Norman Thomas, Editor of "The World Tomorrow:":

I have read your manuscript with deep interest and real personal thanks to you. You have done a valuable piece of work. My immediate reaction is one of unqualified approval. Within your own carefully defined limits you have dealt with the problem admirably.

Peter Ainslie, Minister Christian Temple, Baltimore:

I have taken the time to go over your manuscript and find it very informing and ringing true. A book so well prepared as yours may not have the deserved circulation, but it is certainly worth putting on the market.

Miss Maude Royden, recently of the City Temple, London:

I have read your manuscript with the deepest interest and with the most complete agreement. I admire especially your insistence on the spirit as distinct from the letter, and your dismissal of the idea of non-resistance. Nearly all criticism of our position is aimed at these two points—which we do not hold!

Price of the book $1.20, plus 8 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Story Sermons and Programs

Story Worship Programs for the Church School, J. S. Stowell. $1.50.

The Use of the Story in Religious Education, Eggleston. $1.50.

The Sunday Story Hour, Cragin. $1.75.

Story Sermons for Children, Chidley. $1.25.

52 Story Talks to Boys and Girls, Chidley. $1.25.

Wandering Stars, Hansen. Ten minute sermons for the Junior Congregation. $1.25.

Tell Me a Hero Story, Stewart. $1.75.

The Shepherd of Us All, Stewart. Stories of Christ retold for children. $1.75.

Tell Me a True Story, Stewart. Tales of Bible heroes for children. $1.75.

Add 10 cents each book for postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The Shorter Bible

The New Testament

By Charles Foster Kent

THE AIM of the Shorter Bible is to furnish in logical order those parts of the Bible which have especial bearing on the present age. Here can be read in a straight-ahead narrative the thrilling account of the life of Jesus and his teachings as they began their work of revolutionizing the world's life. Short, pungent sentences characterize this new translation by Professor Kent, who stands almost alone in his especial field. A most compelling presentation of the New Testament story.

$1.00, plus 10 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

"The Daily Altar" and the Devotional Life

WITH current developments in church history and life it becomes increasingly evident that the real need of the churches is the deepening of the devotional life of their membership, the attainment of true spiritual poise. The church cannot bring the world to Christ unless it reveals evidence of having the spirit of Christ in its own heart-life. Organizations of churches, however vast and efficient, cannot of themselves put the spirit of true religion into the heart of a single man.

"The Daily Altar"

By Herbert L. Willett and
Charles Clayton Morrison

has come into being for just such a time as this. Rev. Walter M. White, of Memphis, Tenn., reports that he is growing a new religious spirit in his great congregation through the ministry of this book in the homes of his people. Rev. B. S. Ferrall, of Buffalo, N. Y., is equally enthusiastic. And there are scores of other church leaders who are strong in their praise of The Daily Altar as the ideal manual of daily devotion needed for these strenuous and stressful times.

*Have You Considered "The Daily Altar" for Your Congregation?
Note Our Special Prices in Lot
Purchases.*

Full Leather (Gift) Edition: 5 copies for $11.00; 8 for $17.00; 18 for $35.00; 50 or more at $1.75 per copy, net.

Popular Edition: 5 copies for $7.00; 8 for $10.00; 18 for $20.00; 50 or more at $1.00 per copy, net.

Special Note: Add from two to 5 cents per copy for postage when ordering in lots, or instruct us to send express collect.

Price of Single Copies

De luxe full leather, gold stamp and gilt edges, $2.50 net. Popular edition, purple cloth, $1.50 net.

(Add 6 to 10 cents for postage.)

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St. Chicago, Illinois

The Outline of History

A Plain History of Life
and Mankind

By H. G. WELLS

Written with the advice and editorial help of Ernest Baker, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir E. Ray Lankester and Prof. Gilbert Murray. Illustrated by J. F. Horrabin.

HERE is history from the beginning of life on our earth so far as we can trace it by paleolithic records, through the civilizing and decivilizing ages down to yesterday. And much of it is history from the standpoint of common sense. We would hold this view even after you pointed out that Mr. Wells does irreparable damage to many an ancient convention and orthodox tradition. He trains his guns fearlessly on superstition, on corrupting tradition, on historical malpractice.

The author's conclusions stimulate thought. He is an optimist. He sees a new sanity emerging from the hatreds of the war. He looks for a revision of ideas and institutions and the development of a citizenship of the world, with the breakdown of nationalism. Religion to his mind has been obscured by creeds—"the old political and social assumptions, the old religious formulas have lost their conviction." But he expects the future to bring a brotherhood of men rather than of nations, wider education and a religion apart from forms and creeds. Man is to become happier and more contented on earth. He does not seem to fear that, judging by the rate we are going, the old ball may become cold before we achieve that ideal.

This is the big book of the season. Every thinking citizen of these pregnant times should have it.

In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.
Special terms: $5.00 down, balance 30 days.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Books by Joseph Fort Newton

The Religious Basis of a Better World Order

An application of Christian principles to world affairs.

The Sword of the Spirit

City Temple Sermons.

The Eternal Christ

Studies in the life of vision and service.

The Ambassador

City Temple sermons.

Each $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

("The Sword of the Spirit" is $1.50)

Of Dr. Joseph Fort Newton the American Journal of Theology says: "It is a striking fact that from a town of the Central West, whose very name is unknown to England, a preacher should have been called to the City Temple, London, a pulpit made famous by Joseph Parker and Dr. Campbell. Mr. Newton is a mystic, but of a different type. He goes back of the long line of doctrinal and ecclesiastical development to Jesus of the Gospels, to the ideal human life in whom God dwelt and through whom God revealed his redemptive love, the divine Saviour and Master of men. This life of the living Christ, touching every life, the soul of every redemptive movement, actually working in men and with men for the world's salvation. His sermons speak especially to cultivated minds, yet through their simplicity and naturalness and humanness, they make the universal appeal. Here is the real power. They do not speak the language of the church, but the language of humanity. They are real sermons of a warm, spiritual, enthusiastic manhood."

Dr. Newton is one of the favorite contributors to The Christian Century, and his books are particularly popular among our book-loving constituency.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

Four Great Books for Thinking People

Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City, on being asked what are the outstanding books of the day for alert churchmen and churchwomen, submits four titles. He considers these essential books:

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1860. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 So. Dearborn St., Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

Can Education Be
Christian?

By Robert E. Speer

Has Protestantism Served
Its Purpose?

An Editorial

Fifteen Cts. a Copy

May 5, 1921

Four Dollars a Year

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT

Sir. W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL. D.

A Commentary as well as a Greek Text and Translation

Its Purpose

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT was conceived by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL.D., and carried out under his careful editorship. His purpose was to produce a work which should include all that was most reliable and sane in the international exegesis of the New Testament and to present it in the form of a critical edition of the Greek Text. Scholarship which was scattered through several languages and many books, so that it was accessible only to the few, he purposed to bring together into one comprehensive survey which should have the harmony of critical freedom combined with reverence of faith.

Its Plan

The preparation of the critical introduction and notes to each book of the New Testament was allotted to a separate scholar who was an expert in that department of exegesis. The notes, printed below the Greek Text, are historic and critical in nature; they are suggestive of the deeper spiritual meaning of the context and keep definitely in view both the needs of a student seeking religious insight and the requirements of a minister engaged in a pulpit-ministry.

Description of Books

The set consists of five handsome large quarto volumes—beautifully and clearly printed on paper specially prepared for this work. Bound in durable red buckram. The price is $25.00 for the set complete, with an additional charge, if sent by express, of actual cost of transportation. The price of any single volume is $6.00 plus 20 cents postage.

Special Offer to Christian Century Readers: Send $10.00 and the complete set will be sent to you on condition that a second remittance of $10 be mailed to us in 30 days, and the balance ($5.00 plus postage) in 60 days.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it. we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage. (Pocket ed., $1.35 plus 8 cts.

The Shorter New Testament (Kent), $1.00 plus 10 cents postage.

The 20th Century New Testament, $2.00 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, $1.50 plus 8 cents postage).

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

YALE TALKS

BY CHARLES R. BROWN, LL. D.

ALTHOUGH these "Talks" were delivered at Yale, Harvard and other colleges, they afford a wealth of illustrative material for addresses and sermons to young people, especially to young men. Among the themes are "The True Definition of a Man," "Unconscious Influence," "The Lessons of Failure," "The Men Who Make Excuse," "The Wrongs of Wrong-doing," etc.

Price, $1.35 plus 8 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, MAY 5, 1921

Number 18

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

Where the Church Stands in Its Own Light

WHILE a great many American youths of today have been persuaded by their elders to believe that the big thing of life is to make money, there are still many who run true to a higher human type and dream of big ideal exploits. The dangerous, the mysterious and the noble have always had a great fascination for the young mind, and in this fact lies one of the reasons for optimism about the human race. The community is ever being spoiled by the counsels of prudence on the part of the middle aged, but is ever being renewed by the young. In the choice of vocation among the young people of the colleges this is very well illustrated. At the University of Illinois there are twelve young people of one denomination who have volunteered for religious work. They have without exception chosen to go to the foreign mission field. There is not a man in the group who is planning to be a minister of religion in this country. This situation is being duplicated in many other communions. It is easier to command the best blood of the colleges for the mission field than for the parish ministry. Just what does this mean as to the attitude of young people toward the work of the home land? Is it mere lack of an urgent voice to counsel them to take up religious work in America? Or is there a feeling on the part of young men that the gospel ministry is not heroic and no longer a calling that satisfies the soul by the inherent nature of its work? There are many who believe either that the minister has no chance to make good or that there is not in his occupation that which constitutes a call to the higher ideals of young men. Meanwhile there is need of an interpretation of the place of the minister in the modern community, not in terms of carping criticism but in terms of constructive suggestion. The possibilities of shaping a community's higher life through its religious organization should afford the most alluring career open to the youth of our time. But the imagination of youth cannot visualize such possibilities until the churches find their life more vitally in relation to their own communities than their present denominational loyalties allow.

Chinese Students Probe American Faith in God

THE group of Chinese students at the University of Chicago which has been investigating American faith in God has been greatly puzzled by the results secured. A questionnaire was sent out to several hundred American men representing many vocations. In this group were included seventy ministers. All were asked if they believed in God, and also what they believed about him and why. When the answers came back, over half of the men on the list set themselves down as agnostics and unbelievers. The agnostics were more numerous than those who would completely dismiss the idea of God. The most disappointing thing to the students was the wide variety of the concept of God. The first impression this wide variation made upon the mind of the students was to discourage them in finding a real faith. Since so few men agree in what they mean by God, is there after all any reality in the concept? This investigation will probably do us Americans more good than it has done the Chinese. The churches and church people must get back again to some fundamental thinking. It is evident that we must have more doctrinal preaching, not of the sort that dogmatically settles our problem, but of the kind that lays new foundations for faith. The church cannot live upon humanitarianism alone. It is the one organization in human society which is set to the task of facing the everlasting questions. Fortunately a beginning has been made in fundamental thinking. Several new books have appeared in recent years dealing with the concept of God, most of them from a Christian point of view, but interestingly enough some of them set forth positions out of harmony with the Christian position, as for instance that of H. G. Wells. Every age has to square its fundamental thinking with the facts of life as it experiences them. Neither movie shows nor jazz music can still the anxious questions that arise in human hearts with regard to the great spiritual realities.

Prohibition Progress

ONTARIO gave "bone-dry" enforcement a majority of more than 200,000. Prominent Canadians predict dominion-wide prohibition within five years. New Zealand has recently declared Samoa dry; Uncle Sam should do the same for the Philippines. The President of Chili recently told Miss Anna Gordon of the American W. C. T. U. that he was actively for national prohibition. He told a committee representing the Chilean wine growers that he would introduce such a bill in the national congress soon. The wine growers, he said, must find their profits elsewhere; the government would stop the curse of alcoholism if he could bring it about. In Denmark the prohibitionists have introduced an effective bill providing for the complete prohibition of manufacture, importation or sale of spirits or strong wines. They believe they will win. In Sweden, parliament is debating a bill that would allow a national referendum in 1922. Holland has increased the liquor tax from 100 per cent to 150 per cent through a striking victory for temperance in the parliamentary elections. In this country the passing winter's legislatures have taken action tending strongly to make for "bone dry" enforcement. Even New York state joins the procession. The one big loss has been the Palmer ruling on beer as medicine and with a dry congress it will no doubt be effectively remedied soon. Dr. Saleby, the famous British scientist, after a trip through this country, returns home to warn his countrymen that they will not be able to compete with America in world markets unless they go dry also. English students are beginning to take up systematic investigation into the problem. If the students make it a subject of scientific research today England will go dry tomorrow.

From Workhouse To Westminster

WILL CROOKS, M. P., requested the other day admittance to the Chiltern Hundreds, which is the English way of resigning from a seat in parliament. His health has failed beyond repair after a life of arduous toil, first in the shops and for the last half of his life in untiring service of the laboring classes. War work brought on the breakdown, the last straw being the frightful bombing of a school house near his home and the murder thus of a score of children, with the consequent exposure and nervous exhaustion in the work of rescue. This man, who was as remarkable as Abraham Lincoln for his rise from poverty into eminence without schooling, for his irresistible story telling and humor, his unconscious democracy which made kings, peers, scholars and the lowly all his friends, and for his unbending but tolerant conscientiousness, still lives in his cottage in East London and receives visits from the great dignitaries of the realm and from his lowly neighbors, all of whom alike come to inquire about his health and to offer tokens of their esteem. The queen sends a special messenger every few days, and oddly enough on one day when her equerry came with a tribute of flowers a little working class girl came at the same time with a little bunch of hand picked blossoms. Mr. Crooks' career began nearly seventy years ago as one of the six children in the family of a poor ship's stoker. The father dying, the mother and children were sent to the workhouse, or infirmary for the poor. At twelve he was helping to earn the family's livelihood, and before he was twenty had known the bitterness of tramping for a job, penniless, hungry and defeated. At thirty he was a councilor in his municipality, then mayor and next a member of the house of commons, where except for a single election he has been ever since. There he became the friend of great statesmen and one of the most forceful of labor's spokesmen. He was always rather independent in alignments and sought ever to do the next thing that was better. He has been one of those rare personalities whom hardship made philosophical but not bitter, and whose faith in men was irresistible.

Variety in Preaching

THE man in the pew thinks he likes variety in preaching. He is so insistent on this point that he often becomes a church tramp seeking the variety he wants by going from church to church. In this way his mind becomes confused and his habits of loyalty unloosed, and he often ends by going to no church at all. The trouble was that in the kind of variety he found there was no unity. Most great preachers have had a single sermon. Amos talked about the justice of God. Hosea sounded the note of God's mercy. Isaiah had a single sermon with four heads. Savonarola was essentially a preacher of civic righteousness. St. Augustine sounded the note of the wondrous grace of God. Beecher was a preacher of freedom, and Brooks gave his life to the thesis that religion is life. These men of a single sermon managed to preach a whole lifetime without ever letting their congregations find out that they had only a single sermon. They discovered a kind of diversity in pulpit utterance which was not inconsistent with unity. There was diversity in the matter of illustrations. Jesus could set forth the fatherhood of God by a reference to lilies or birds or by the story of the lost sheep. He has many parables on the kingdom. A single theme is thus made real to a great variety of men by the simple device of illustration. Jeremiah knew how to connect his message with contemporaneous events. There is a newspaper preacher who seeks only the cheap sensationalism of talking about a current events topic. A deeper note is sounded by the man who ever reads the newspapers with his fundamental interest in mind. The typical prohibitionist speaker knew how to use the testimony of the wettest of the wet newspapers to preach the cause of prohibition. The man interested in world disarmament often goes to the jingo papers for his best arguments. Lay readers are ever delighted with the preaching which makes the old theme look modern and respectable. The great preacher knows what he wants to say. His greatness is best proved by his ingenuity in making a single sermon seem ever new.

The Minister Advertises For a House

THE church bulletin of First Christian Church in Springfield, Ill., contains an appeal to the members of the church to provide the minister with information about a house to rent. His home has been sold and he has nowhere to go! Some ministers are unable to accept calls to new fields these days on account of the uncertainty of housing a family. Rents continue to mount, thus making inroads into the ministerial pocketbook, and there is the continuous uncertainty about the future. In spite of the nation-wide demands for houses, but few are being built on account of the cost of labor and materials. If anyone can afford to break the deadlock and set the idle labor of the community to work, it is the church. The church never expects to sell its manse at a profit. If it is rightly built, it will last through this generation as the home for the minister and as the center of the social life of the parish. One of the first demands of the hour is for a manse in every parish. In many communities it should come before the new church building which is being insistently talked about. The building of a manse is one way to raise the minister's salary. In many cities the rent now eats up a thousand dollars of income. A good home means a thousand dollars per year added to the minister's salary for all the years to come without anyone feeling it. When the church has a manse, the town always knows where to find the minister, and that is certainly an advantage. The people in trouble sometimes miss the minister because they do not find him readily. In the Presbyterian denomination a generous appropriation to the building of homes for ministers has been made by the church building society. A similar policy has been adopted by the Disciples church extension board.

Liberty of Speech in America

THE echoes of the attack made by the Dearborn Independent on the Jews have not yet died away. If anything, the echoes are louder than the original noise. The Jews of the country might very well have waited for the Gentile press to answer Mr. Ford's sinister and foolish case. It would then have been apparent that liberty is the remedy for an abuse of liberty. Good citizens everywhere have raised their voices in protest against even the suggestion of an intellectual pogrom against the Jews. But the heat stirred up over the matter has resulted in a method of meeting the attack that is even worse than the attack itself. In Chicago the Dearborn Independent may not be sold upon the streets of the city. Such action has been taken in other cities. Cheap politicians who ever have their eyes upon the Irish vote or the Jewish vote, or upon any other group that is likely to act with solidarity, have been willing to commit an offence against American institutions. The ideal of a free press and free speech involves the right of a journal or an individual to make a fool of itself or of himself. Society knows how to take care of those who speak improperly. The whole incident shows how far the war has taken us from the old-time convictions in America. It is a part of the constitution of the United States that the freedom of speech and of the press shall not be abridged. The criminal use of speech to urge people to the commission of crime has been limited by libel laws. Gradually there has been an extension through the courts of the various kinds of speech and writing which are forbidden until there is less real liberty of speech in America than in many countries of Europe. With war censorship passed, there is need of a campaign of good old fashioned Americanism with its insistence upon the rights of the individual. The remedy for error is truth, not the jail nor the boycott.

Cooperation in Christian Unity Declined

ONE of the curious phases of the present effort to bring about closer relations between the various communions of the church is the survival, even among those most interested in the effort, of ancient prejudices and partisanships that obtrude themselves in the way of true cooperation. Two of the most purposeful of these movements today are the Continuation Committee of the Conference on Faith and Order, whose preliminary meeting was held in Geneva last summer, and the American Council on Organic Union, whose proposals are now being presented to the judicatories of the various denominations. A suggestion was recently offered to the former of these organizations by one of the officials of the latter to the effect that there ought to be some plan of mutual relationship and cooperation between the two. This was considered by the Continuation Committee, and the response was to the effect that while sympathy was expressed with the objects of the American Council, cooperation seemed impossible. If this action is a typical illustration of the spirit of the Continuation Committee, the difficulties it encounters in being taken seriously by American Christians will be increased rather than diminished. It is unfortunate that it should assume the attitude of exclusive right to the idea and effort taking form under the name of Christian union.

Conference of Y Leaders and Churchmen

IN connection with the meeting of the executive committee of the Y. M. C. A. in this city a week ago (the first meeting of that organization to be held in the west, as we understand) there was a gathering of Association officials and ministers and laymen representative of the churches of Chicago and vicinity, to consider the relations between the two groups. At the last convention of the Y. M. C. A., held in Detroit, one of the most important commission reports dealt with the relation of the Association to the churches. At the time it was understood that this was to be followed by the appointment of a permanent commission to make a more exhaustive and a somewhat continuous study of the situation, with the object of removing some of the grounds of criticism and estrangement on the part of the churches toward the Association. It was understood to be in the interest of this movement that the Chicago conference was called a fortnight ago. The attendance was sizable and representative. Excellent addresses were made by Dr. Mott and others. Many reports on various phases of Association work were given. But beyond very general references to the need of good feeling and cooperation between the Y. M. C. A. and the churches, nothing was done to advance in any degree the understanding between the two groups. This we believe to have been a lost opportunity. What is needed in such gatherings is not a list of set speeches by men who have a policy to advocate, however admirable it may be, but the opportunity to face frankly the difficulties of the present estrangement, and the way out. Twenty representative men in a round table conference, unhurried and definite, would accomplish far more in a day's time than many formal programs of speeches. And this is what the Association needs to do beyond all things else in this hour when its policies, both industrial and in relation to the churches, are under anxious observation and deliberate criticism.

Demand Reverent Treatment of Religious Things

THE Federal Council has made a formal demand on the moving picture producers of the country that they treat the Christian institution of marriage reverently. In a great many films the representation of the marriage ceremony has been such as to break down what little respect still exists in the public mind toward this institution. There are already agencies enough at work in American life to destroy the sanctities of the home. A school of "realists" in literature have spent a generation glorifying adultery as freedom, and representing domestic fidelity as bondage. The cabaret and the dance hall have also done their evil work, the results of which register in the divorce mill. It is time for the church to speak in stern tones with regard to any profanation of the religious ceremonies by which the home is founded. At the same time there has been a protest made by the Federal Council against the misrepresentation of ministers upon the screen. This is made not in behalf of the ministers themselves, but in behalf of the millions of people who every Sunday wait upon the ministrations of these ministers, and who believe that from the worship in the church they receive some of life's choicest possessions. It has long since been taboo in movie circles to misrepresent a priest. He is always given a decent role on the screen for the arm of Rome is long, and she is able to make the malefactor understand. It is time for the show people to understand that Protestantism is not quite the disintegrated and individualistic thing it once was. It is beginning to be able to act as a whole and to make its convictions register in contemporaneous life.

Has Protestantism Served Its Purpose?

DURING the past fortnight much thought has been bestowed upon the anniversary of Luther's appearance before the Diet of Worms, and his fearless declaration of loyalty to the truths he had maintained in his theses. It is a mild aftermath of the great Luther celebrations of last year which were widely observed, and which furnished favorable moment for the union of three of the most important groups of Lutherans. But the later observance is sufficient to bring to mind once more the courageous words of the Doctor of the Sacred Scriptures from Wittenburg, "I can and will retract nothing, for it is neither safe nor expedient to act against conscience. Here I stand; I can do nothing else. God help me. Amen." With that utterance the movement that is known historically as Protestantism began. Four centuries have passed since then. Has Protestantism served its purpose? There are two ways of considering the question. One may ask whether the movement was of value to the cause of Christianity, and provided an essential stage in the progress of the church toward its ideals. Or it may be asked whether that period to which Protestantism belongs has come to its end, and another era must be ushered in. To both these questions we are convinced that an affirmative response must be made.

That the movement set on foot by the reformers was necessary to the vitality of the Christian society few informed students of church history will stop to debate. It is true that some of the more conservative, in all the periods since the breach with Rome was made, have maintained with Erasmus that the separatist campaign was a mistake, and that the reformation should have taken place within the church as at that time constituted, and not as a divisive enterprise. But there are few who can maintain that thesis in the light of all the facts. Nothing but the shock of a protest so vigorous that it jostled the entire edifice of the autocratic church could have availed. Protestantism shattered the tradition of an infallible and world-ruling ecclesiasticism. It set free the soul of man from the shackles of dogma and superstition that for centuries had confined it.

Protestantism did much more than this. It gave to the Bible its rightful place as the commanding literature of religion and the trustworthy source book for the Christian church. At the same time it liberated the minds of its leaders from the thralldom of early Jewish and Christian tradition which had made impossible the free inquiring into the nature of the Bible which a vigorous and courageous faith demands. It turned the mind of the church to the serious task of thinking through the nature of the gospel it was proclaiming. The spirit of Protestantism was essentially the spirit of the new learning. The renaissance and the reformation went hand in hand. The renaissance was the reformation of the European intellect; the reformation was the renaissance of the European conscience. From the externals of ritual and ceremonial Christian leaders turned to prolonged and arduous study of the Christian sources and the history of the Christian institutions. That intellectual quality came into the church with the reformers. There had been great scholars before. But with the reformation scholarship became a primal necessity of the pulpit and the church school.

With the coming of the new spirit Rome ceased to be the intellectual and spiritual leader. Compelled to reform itself by the very pressure of opinion, it exchanged popes like the Borgias for those of the Caraffa type, organized the Counter-reformation, and sent out missionaries like Francis Xavier to evangelize the non-Christian lands. But its great opportunity was gone forever. It has remained a powerful ecclesiasticism, skillful in promoting the interests of its own officials and communicants, but a declining force in either thinking or morals. It retires slowly and with poor grace before the advance of intelligence, and where it is not compelled to adjust itself to the enlightened conditions made possible by Protestant influence, it still retains the obscurantism and mediaevalism of its past.

For four centuries Protestantism has been the ruling force in the intellectual and spiritual life of the western world, and of late has gained something of the same place in the orient. But it is handicapped by limitations inseparable from its origin, and fatal to its permanent efficiency.

In the first place it is, as its name implies, a protest. And that attitude of opposition to the Roman organization has too much obsessed and limited its effectiveness. It has tended to make negative and hostile its spirit and program. Even today the majority of the Protestant groups are practically ignorant of their fellowship with a vast company of Christians beyond the limited circle of Protestant and Romanist. The horizon has been confined almost entirely to the controversies between the two branches of the western church. And that controversy has no longer either point or issue.

Again, the Protestant group received an exaggerated impulse toward dogmatic considerations at its very inception. It turned from the liturgical and mystical elements of religion to the doctrinal, and by its emphasis upon the Pauline teaching set the current of Christian life in the new channels of philosophical and theological definition. This was the salvation of the church in the age of the Reformation, but has been the cause of numberless sterile and futile controversies since. It finds its result in the insistence that our holy faith must find its groundwork in a uniform doctrinal statement before we can proceed with a fruitful method of cooperation. To this self-refuting position the Lutheran Church, in which the dogmatic attitude of the first reformers finds its best illustration, has recently recommitted itself as against the acceptance of the overtures for Christian fellowship from the other free and evangelical bodies.

And most of all is Protestantism proving that it has served its purpose by the fact of its divisions. At the first these were unavoidable. It was vastly better to have the church broken into fragments than kept in a formal unity which had ceased to be vital. But with the fall of Rome from its position of leadership, and the growth of the spirit of free inquiry, the various denominational groups ceased to be significant as interpreters and defenders of neglected and endangered truths, and set about the more partisan task of strengthening their separatist organizations. Today the Christian world is as tired of the vagaries and weaknesses of sectarianism as the pre-reformation world was of the folly and iniquities of Rome. Rome has passed as a determining factor in the religious life of the modern age. And Protestantism is passing. Out of the struggle of soul which resulted from the failure of the Roman church to meet the need of the new Europe came the Reformation and Protestantism. Out of the travail of spirit through which most of the churches, and a host of Christians outside of all the churches, are passing today, a new, more vital, more constructive phase of religious organization and ministry is being born. It will be catholic, but not Roman; it will be evangelical and reformatory, but not Protestant. These terms belong to obsolescent phases of the Christian society. Let them become obsolete as the new day is dawning.

The Language of Religion

THE contrast between the Tower of Babel and the Day of Pentecost is as striking as it is complete.

The vaulting ambition of man, seeking to invade the heavens, ended in confusion worse confounded. The humility of the church on its knees, in one accord and in one place, brought a baptism of fire and the power of harmony. At Babel one language was made many and men were scattered abroad; at Pentecost many languages were made one, drawing the ends of the earth together. The contrast is at once a parable and a prophecy, and it has many things to teach us if we have ears to hear. For one thing it shows that preparation must be made for a divine visitation, as if to teach all after ages that our Christian faith is a social rather than a solitary religion, and that its secret of power is realized in fellowship.

There are times when the church must be on its feet in an attitude of service, but at Pentecost it was on its knees facing God in quest of power. Humane ministry and divine intercession have both their place of honor and of usefulness, and neither can take the place of the other. How the prayer of the church was answered, in what measure and manner, is told us in a narrative not only startling, but dazzling. There are two ways of describing an event, one prosaic and the other symbolical; and the writer of the Acts chose the right way. He clothed the scene in the vivid drapery of oriental imagery, in which we hear a sound like as a rushing mighty wind, and see tiny "tongues as of fire"—symbol of the fervor that leaped like flame from heart to heart. The church became aware as it had never been aware before of the dynamic available to united faith and prayer. It spoke under this high impulse of kindled power, and men cried out in amazement: "How hear we every man in his own tongue, the wonderful works of God!"

Here is a scene to ponder in a day when the church is so sadly bereft of power, and its voices have lost their momentousness of accent and appeal. Howbeit, in our time there are signs to show, and there are many who are praying, that we may be visited by a quickening and renewing impulse of divine power, "a common wave of thought and joy, lifting mankind again." What form it may take no one can foretell, save that it will be in answer to yearning prayer and in response to the deepest need; but in essence, in power, it will be akin to that which flashed and glowed on Pentecost. For on that day, while there was the unity that belongs to those who have a common need, a common purpose, and a common promise, and are joined in fellowship, yet the outpouring came to the seekers one by one. The tongues of flame parted asunder, and the fire of the Spirit sat upon each of them separately. They were committed to the same crusade; but liberty was as necessary as unity, and each of them was endued with his own special insight, his own spirit of adventure—"knights to the quest of life abundant sworn."

Thus, if there was one spirit of light and power, there were diversities of gifts, diversities of ministry, no two bearing witness with the same insight and emphasis. James the man of common sense, Peter the man of action, John the mystic—and, later, Paul, "born out of due time"—each had his own point of view, his own vision; and the variety of their witness added to the richness, the fullness, the effectiveness of their testimony. Differing as they did—sometimes to the point of controversy—they were yet describing, each with his own eloquence, the same reality common to all. Our point is that now, as then, and always, the different types of religious experience—and, by the same token, each of the Christian communions—are trying, each in its own tongue, to say the same thing. They have a like precious faith, and a like profound experience—mystic, rationalist, and sacramentalist—and this reality is a common treasure, if only they knew it, despite the differing dialects in which they express it.

Some, indeed, go further and find a like fundamental unity underlying the great historic religions; that they are variations of one motif, differing less in essentials than in point of emphasis, depth of insight, and method of appeal, each expressing, in a memorable way, the one great human experience of fellowship with the Father of spirits. Religions are many, but religion is one, and unless we read our own faith in that universal context we cannot understand that Christianity, so far from being a competing religion, is a completing religion. Truly the divine life in the soul of man is one, and it means much to realize that it is so. Such an insight is not only unifying and satisfying, it is emancipating—it sets one free from many things which else would limit his appreciation of the wonderful works of God. It gives one a key whereby to understand and interpret many religious dialects, and helps him to discern beneath differing creeds and cults the foundations of the church of God—meaning by the church no sects, hierarchy, or polity, but the historic fellowship of the seekers and finders of God. Wesley saw this truth and rejoiced in it, making the words of William Law his own:

Perhaps what the best heathens called reason, and Solomon wisdom, St. Paul grace in general, St. John righteousness or love, may be only different expressions for one and the same blessing, the light of Christ shining in different degrees under different dispensations. Why then so many words, and so little charity exercised among Christians, about the particular term of a blessing experienced more or less by all righteous men.

Once a man has this vision of the Spirit of God moving within all the multicolored forms of religion, his life will be an adventure of discovery and enlarging fellowship. He will recognize friends of his soul in many garbs, as Woolman rejoiced in finding a-Kempis a brother, albeit wearing a different habit and far removed ecclesiastically. Surely no one can read Spinoza and not see that he was a "God-intoxicated man" trying to fathom the reality of a profound religious experience, or the Emerson essay on "The Over-Soul" and not find another version of the truth of the over brooding, indwelling Spirit, which has been the life of the church and the altar fire of its pulpit in all ages. For the devout life is the same, however the outlook of the intellect may differ: Emerson and Newman were akin of soul, and were moved by a common and high religious motive. Not only is the divine life the same in essence, but all the richer for its variety of expression, and if a man is born of the spirit both Moody and Martineau will speak to him in the language wherein he was born.

Here is the real Christian unity of the spirit—never broken through the centuries—and if it is discovered, realized, and developed, it will unite us in the bonds of peace, good will, and service. Our diversities are superficial; our unities are fundamental. Perhaps, after all, the profound meaning of the vast restless mood that is now upon us, may be the divine intention to throw us back upon God, the Holy Spirit. If natural law seems to be inviolable, it is that the whole creation may appear miraculous, the garment that God is weaving for himself on the roaring looms of time. If the Bible now comes to us in a new binding, it is that we may know the divine inspirer of it. Theories about the Bible have their day and cease to be, but the Bible remains the monumental witness to the presence in man of the Holy Spirit. If we live in God we shall see that the Bible lives in God; if God lives in us we shall know that God lives in the Bible. There is no hope for the church save in the Holy Spirit, and if we live, think, and toil in the strength of the Spirit there is nothing but hope.

But the Day of Pentecost, with its burst of illuminating, revealing vision, marked more than a revelation of things unseen, new and far reaching in its extensiveness. It also gave birth to a revolution in practical conduct new and deep reaching in its intensiveness. Not only was Peter transformed from a coward who disowned his Master before a slave girl, into a champion who denounced the whole nation for the murder of the Master; but the social spirit and objective of the whole company of disciples was changed, making it for the first time in history a beloved community of people more anxious to give than to get. Can the wonder of Pentecost, with its light and power, be repeated in our confused and troubled age? Indeed, yes. The need is the same, and the Spirit of God is still the secret and source of power. If today men should come from the ends of the Christian world—and beyond—not to argue, not to dicker, not to criticize, but to continue steadfastly in an ecumenical council of prayer, what forces might be liberated among us! Puny we are while we ply an oar, but when we hoist a sail we move triumphantly into new adventure and achievement.

Seeing the Elephant

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me a man who was in perplexity.
And he said, I have given up the attempt to understand Life. I believe the old hymn which saith,

This world is all a Fleeting Show,
For man's illusion given.

And I said unto him, I have had the advantage of a Colledge Education. And among the things that I learned in Colledge was a song, which said:

The Elephant now walks round,
The Band begins to play;
The boys before the Monkeys' cage
Had better keep away.

For the Elephant now walks round—

And thus did the song proceed, forever citing the Fact itself as the Explanation of the Fact. That is the philosophy of the Ding an Sich, which meaneth, the Thing-in-Itself.

And he said, That is a Fool Song, and is hardly worth four years of Colledge.

And I said, Consider the Ding an Sich, the Elephant. He is the Thesis. He is tangible, ponderable, undeniable Reality. He answereth to all the Categories of Kant. But behold how he resolveth himself into an Antithesis, even as Hegel taught. He is not Statick. He walketh around. That should prepare us for an Hegelian Synthesis. And he is not unrelated. He is preceded by the Band, and followed by Monkeys in their Cage. That suggesteth Einstein's Relativity. But consider also the boys. Wherefore should they keep away from the Cage of Monkeys? Is that theorem referable to Ethicks or to Casuistry or to Politickal Economy? If it were not for the boys with their Peanuts and their Quarters, the Elephant were not here, but in Ethiopia. And in that event, would he be the same Elephant? Is a Wild Elephant in Ethiopia the same Elephant as a Tame Elephant at the same time in Jersey City or in Kalamazoo? Can we answer save as we go back to Plato, and discover the Ideal Elephant who is before and necessary to the interpretation of all Particular Elephants?

And he said, Much learning hath made thee mad. Thou and Plato and Hegel and Einstein and all those other old boys are a Bunch of Nuts.

And I said, I am not so mad as those who give up the problem, or who have not the courage to think it through. Neither am I content to explain the Fact by the Fact, as doth the Song.

And I said, I have sat in for some time at this Greatest Show on Earth, and I have ceased trying to explain it by reckoning with the Elephants and the Monkeys and the Camels and the Asses and the He-goats and the Clowns and the Acrobats. Above them all, yea, above the Ringmasters and the Billstickers and the Lionhunters in Ethiopia and the Snake charmers, and the ships and railroads that bring them together, is the Manager and Owner, who pianneth and accomplisheth.

And the man said, What thou sayest Listeneth good.

And I said, I am not yet finished. I am more than a spectator on Life's bleachers. I am part of the Show. Humble is my Stunt. I leap through no Hoops and I do not perform on the flying trapeze. Yet do I seek to make my round in the saw-dust orbit of this Highly Moral Performance as an Honest man may and ought, and to do mine humble part so that when I come round again to the place where I entered the ring, whether men applaud me or no, I shall have made Life's show to every man and woman I have known a little better worth the price of admission plus the war-tax.

And he said, I did not quite get thee in all that lingo about Einstein and Plato, but what thou now sayest I understand, and thou art Dead Right.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

Glints

I

What is life?
The uncertain promise
Of a certain Dawn.

II

They alone are blest
Who are victims of dreams.

III

There is no day,
Says the blind eye;
There is no God,
Says the stubborn will.

IV

The Heart of God
Welcomes the repentant heart of man
Like the great deep
The returning raindrop.

V

The morning dawns in vain
To children of the night.

Song

WHEN May arrives,
And warbler choirs again are carolling
As if they had but one desire—to sing,
Then from our snug retreats we haste away
And tune our hearts for one long holiday
Among the woods and hills, by blue lakes shimmering—
When May arrives.

Then should we fret
Because the winter winds like tempests blew,
Because the friends we loved proved oft untrue?
No, for today the world is fair and new,
And through the trees the winds are whispering
Of violets full-blown and roses burgeoning—
When May arrives.

Can Education Be Christian?

By Robert E. Speer

[At the celebration of the semi-centennial of the Ohio State University last fall Dr. Robert E. Speer delivered an address on "The Ideals and Principles Which Should be Laid upon the Lives of Young Men and Young Women in Our Universities." His audience included many distinguished educators from the leading institutions of learning the country over. Within a few days after the delivery of the address Dr. Speer received from the head of one of our leading universities a letter saying that he disagreed with practically everything he had said. To this communication Dr. Speer addressed a reply. The three documents: the original address, the critique and the reply, are given herewith.—THE EDITOR.]

MR. PRESIDENT, Ladies and Gentlemen: No one could have listened to the greetings which have been presented here this afternoon without, I think, detecting their underlying unanimity of implication as to what the great end of education is. We would hold that end, truly defined, to be citizenship, the training of persons in order that they may be adequately prepared to fulfill all their duties and relations in organized human society. It is no doubt possible to define the ends of education in terms of culture and of character, but we would believe these to be, if ends at all, only subordinate ends, and in reality not ends, but means toward the attainment of the real end that lies beyond them. Character and culture we would believe to be for the purpose of and obtainable only in, the service of mankind.

It is essential in thus conceiving education that one should construe aright the ideal of the society for which men are being prepared. Full citizenship cannot be adequately interpreted in any narrow racial or nationalistic terms. Nobody can question the place that race fills in the education of mankind, nor the place that nationality has filled in the history of the world during the last four hundred years. But neither race nor nationality is a finality. We believe them to be departments essential to the school in which the different sections of mankind are being made ready for a larger unity. We believe them to be the divisions within which each different section can most readily develop its own contribution, which it is then to bring at last into the common treasury of the whole.

WRONG AND CROOKED THINGS

In conceiving education in these terms, two great things are discerned to be essential in it. It is its business to define clearly to young men and young women who are to be the architects of the new day, the right ideals for their own lives and for human society, and it is its business to lead them to those fountains of moral energy and reinforcement, drinking from which they shall be enabled to make these ideals which shine before them actual realities. If there ever was a time in human history when this function or this conception of education was necessary to the world's welfare, that time is today. If anyone argues before us now that there is something radically awry about the world we are living in, we have no disposition to disagree with him. We believe that there are wrong things, that need to be set right; that there are crooked things, that need to be made straight; and that the new day can only come when men have a clear apprehension of what these wrong and crooked things are, and are furnished with the moral resources that shall enable them to translate their dream of a better and more righteous time into the actual experience of mankind.

It is here that our difficulties arise. What are the radically wrong things that must be set right? What are the crooked things that need to be made straight within human society? There are many on every side today who are prepared to point them out to us. The political parties, with which we have to act, have sought, each in its turn, to set out its program, to hold out its ideals, to indicate to us some of the processes by which these goals are to be won. But we have the deep feeling that all of these things might be conceivably carried through and yet we find ourselves not very much nearer the great ends that we seek. Can we in this day, for the guidance of the young men and young women whose duty it is to see that the world we have lived through is ended and that a new and different world is begun, see clearly enough ourselves to hold up before them the ideals for their own lives, the ideals for social development, which will help them to play their part intelligently and efficiently in changing the old order and bringing in the new? It is, as one standing among the young men and young women who are to do this work, that I should like to speak to you responsible guides of American education today.

I

I believe we have first of all, to set for the young men and young women who are to make our world a fundamentally different principle and spirit of human relationships. We have got to replace in some fashion, and completely, the old principle of competition by a radically different principle of cooperation. It is a commonplace statement to put in words, but it is not a commonplace thing when we look out on life and see the reasons for the necessity of that change.

We have lived through a day when our most trusted leaders have taught us that the necessary life for mankind was the jungle life, that all human progress could be won only as strong forces put down and out weaker forces, that gain could be won by individuals or nations only at the loss of other individuals and other nations. That has been a popular result of the doctrine of struggle and development in which we have been schooled for the last fifty years. There were great teachers even who in the name of that principle antagonized all forms of protective legislation that were designed to throw around weak wills safeguards which those weak wills did not find in themselves. Professor Sumner used to argue against all prohibitory legislation in the liquor traffic and many other forms of legislation as well, because these were only making sure that society would continue to be cursed by its weak elements. If a man did not have a strong enough will to save himself from being a drunkard, the faster he drank himself into the grave, the better for society, and the quicker we would be left with the men who had strength of will enough within to protect themselves, without nursery legislation on the part of society.

THE COMPETITIVE IDEA

This competitive idea has lain at the base of all our modern economic life. There was a convention held in Cincinnati, not long before the end of the war, reports of which were published in the newspapers with captions like these, "The War that Is to Come After the War," and the idea was of course that in the new commercial life that was to follow the cessation of military strife, the old principles were the only principles on which the world could be carried on, that for one nation to gain, other nations must lose. It was a warfare in which the strong would carry off the booty and the weak be driven back against the wall. It is that principle that has begotten no small fraction of our wars. I do not say that it has produced them all, but these wars that spring out of national ambition or national greed, and many if not all the wars that spring from economic roots, had at their base the principle of competitive strife as the necessary principle on which alone human life could be organized and social progress won.

Now those ideas rest on a conception of humanity which we are slowly learning to repudiate, on a conception of humanity which ought to have been repudiated hundreds of years ago as Christianity did repudiate it, a conception which conceives the world as a great jungle of warring forces where the strong profit at the expense of the weak. We begin to recognize now that humanity is a great organism, and to conceive of it exactly as a man conceives of his body; so that it would be as irrational to apply the principle of competition to human society as to apply it to a man's body. As if his hand should say, "I have first chance at the food, therefore I will claim this food as my own, and the mouth shall have no part in it, nor the eye nor the ear." The whole body is one. If one member suffers, every other member suffers with it, and no member can gain save as the whole body shares in that gain.

We are slowly beginning to see that this biological principle is the principle on which we have to organize the economic and political life of the world. What is Thomas Hardy doing in "The Dynasts" save interpreting human history in terms like these, conceiving it as one great organism,—all that was, all that is, and all that is to be, in one common organic life? And what are the ablest and most honorable bankers we have in America, men like Mr. Davison and Mr. Lamont, whom notorious politicians go up and down the land denouncing as "international bankers," trying to do except to construe the economic life of the world in terms of the facts as to the real constitution of mankind. We must realize that all mankind can profit only as every section of mankind profits, and that no section of mankind can permanently gain at the expense of any other section, that America cannot isolate itself economically from the rest of the world, imagining that she can pile up wealth at the loss of other nations. How can we gain anything from other nations for any long time unless those other nations continue to gain mutually by the same processes by which their trade advantages us? We have to realize that the world must be remade on this radically different principle. The relationships inside each nation economically, the relationships between all nations, must repudiate the falsehood that has organized these relationships in the past, and give us, instead of the old law of conflict and competition, a new law of cooperation and service.

THE PRINCIPLE OF RIVALRY

That does not mean that the principle of rivalry goes out of human life. We know well enough in every educational institution the place of rivalry in the winning of excellence. But it changes the things for which men enter into rivalry. It makes them rivals, not to see who can amass to himself the largest share of what is produced, but rivals to see who can put forth the largest energies in the field of production. It leaves men to compete still, but no longer under the principle of gain, but under the principle of use. And I say it quite plainly, gentlemen, the education, scientific or ethical or economic, that is training the next generation to live on under the old ideals is simply seeking to perpetuate a discredited and outworn order. We must raise up a new generation of men and women who will seek to live by the diametrically opposite law.

II

In the second place we must teach this new generation to elevate personal values above all material and property values. Now, it is not hard to see how in primitive social states, which knew only subsistence measures, property values rose above personal values. Here in the tribe a man owns a stone ax. His father and grandfather wrought on that ax until it is now the best ax in the tribe. The man who owns that ax is economically the equal of five ordinary men. It is not hard to see that its owner and the tribe will value that material thing over against at least four human lives.

And here is a man in the tribe who has a knife, as Mowgli had among the jungle folk. For purposes of war or for purposes of work, the knife's possessor is equal to ten men. It is not hard to see that he will kill many men before he will lose that knife. In that primitive society that knife will be valued at least at nine times the value of a human life. In productive and protective power it is worth that much. And that society thinks in no higher terms. But the pitiful thing is that these ideals continued in social development after the primitive stage of human society had passed away. Even after personal values began to emerge in their true significance, the old ideals lingered on. They were embodied in our penal legislation down to the beginning of the last century, in the laws that punished a debt by taking away the productive power of the debtor, and made petty theft a capital offence. Thurlow Weed tells us in his autobiography of his boyhood, as a child in the village of Catskill on the banks of the Hudson River. He was the son of an honest drayman, whom misfortune ever pursued. His horse would back off the dock or someone would owe him money and refuse to pay. The family was always in penury despite his toil. Again and again the father would be cast into prison for debt. And Thurlow says the dearest memory of his childhood days was when he would go down to greet his father at the prison on Sunday, when the prisoners in the debtors' prison were allowed to come out. All the day long the father and the little boy roamed to and fro within the limits which were permitted. Because he owed a little to society, society took away from him the power to contribute enough to cancel his indebtedness. For debt a man's personal worth, even his economic worth, was obliterated. How long and how tenaciously those notions clung.

THE GOOD OLD TIMES

I read not long since a Scotch biography, the life of J. P. Struthers of Greenock. Struthers grew weary of hearing about "the good old times" in Scotland, and he prepared a lecture on the subject, "A Hundred Years Ago in Scotland and Now," to show exactly what the social, religious and economic conditions in Scotland were at the beginning of the Nineteenth Century. Nobody who heard that lecture ever cried again for "the good old times." Among the incidents of his lecture he tells of the execution in Glasgow of two boys for stealing eight and sixpence. We know how long our penal legislation was disfigured by such ideas of the exaltation of property over persons. It was one of the great warfares that Christianity began—to change this ideal. Its founder held that no religious institution, like the Sabbath, was to be held sacred against personal values, that one little child's soul was worth all that could be counted or weighed of wealth.

It is hard for us still to rid ourselves of the old tradition. If one begins to talk in these terms, the economic bourbonism of our time at once begins to denounce him as one who wishes to undermine the foundations of society. But if we wish to build a new world, we cannot build it on the old economic values. We must build it on the new. And the new alone can save us. Our only safeguard against the communistic tendencies that pulse across the world today, is to help men to see that private ownership in property, for example, finds its deepest and most sacred sanction in its necessity to the preservation of the rights of personality and the maintenance of the independence of the individual. What freedom is there for an individual when you have communism of land? Does the villager in India have any freedom to adopt a new faith that may come to him? Does he have any freedom to follow his own conception of duty? The community starves him out. They will not let him work on the community land if he does not surrender to the community judgment. It is only when the private individual can stand on his own possession and say, "This is mine, out of this I draw my sustenance," only then that he is securely free and that we have a sure and impregnable foundation laid for independence and personal liberty.

Man in this new day is to breathe a larger freedom than men have ever breathed before, for he is to know new liberties and new emancipations, of which the old order knew little, and in this new order persons, free spirits, powers that are not to be enslaved are set in the first place of value, and all other values, many and real, are derived from them.

III.

In the third place, in this new day we have to help the generation that is rising to find the principle on which all education fundamentally rests: I mean the principle of unity, that truth and life are one. Long enough have we constructed the institutions of men on the idea of division, stressing the things that separates the discords. No one denies the place that party government has played in human history. No one denies the place it has played in our own national life. But when it has come to the great national crises, it has had to be laid aside. We simply have to realize that days come when issues rise so great that in the face of those issues all principles of division must yield to the deeper principles of cohesion and solidarity and unity.

During the last eighteen months in our own nation, what a spectacle have we presented! It would not be proper in this audience for one to express his own personal convictions as to the distribution of responsibility and of blame, but one can here or in any audience lament the obvious fact that we who could be one in the great crisis of war gone by have found it impossible to be one before the still greater crisis of peace. We could be one for tearing down, but not one for building up. We could be one for ripping open an old world, but we would not be one for unitedly laying the foundations of the new. What one has wanted to do during these days of division was somehow to get into men's minds some inkling of that principle of unity that underlies all our divisions and that for a time emerged but has now disappeared.

NOT MYSTICAL AND NEBULOUS

When we express the principle of unity over division to many people in these days it seems mystical and nebulous to them. But it ought not to be so, for the principle that lies nearest to us, that we know most about, is the principle of unity. We have it in the family. That is what the family is built on. We have three great institutions, the institution of rights, called the state, the institution of duties, called the church, and the institution of affections which we call the family. And this last was first and will be last. Its principle is indissoluble unity. You cannot destroy it. My father cannot unson me. I cannot unbrother my brother. You may break up the family life, but the fact of unity is there still, an indestructible reality. For my part I believe with all my heart in the Roman Catholic view of the indissolubility of the human family. And that, as constituting the principle on which we are of necessity going to rebuild the world, that ideal of unity is the principle which we have to find a way to apply within the state and to the whole world life of man.

It would be an easy thing to multiply these new ideals by which the next generation is to live and do its work, if it meets its duty. I will add only one other to these three, out of many that throng into one's mind. We have somehow to make stronger among the young men and the young women who are to live in this new day the conscience and consciousness of the sense of diffused leadership, of collective social responsibility. Too much is said in our colleges and universities still about individual leadership. Too much is made of the isolated characters in human history as furnishing models and ideals for the generation that is to come. The day for that has gone by. There was an old monk in the twelfth century who used to say that the day of the Son had passed and that the day of the Spirit was at hand. What he meant was that the time for isolated leadership had gone, that the world was to depend on collective and associated leadership. There was truth and error in his view. The truth of it we are not getting clearly enough before the conscience of the coming generation of men and women. We are talking to them still the old language about the old kind of leadership. We say to them "Stand up in front of your mirror and behold a leader; get ready now to go out into the new generation where men are waiting to hear your voice and to follow your call." We are likely to breed a generation of prigs by this process, and not a new generation of men and women who realize that the day of that kind of leadership is past, that the time is come for a totally different sort of leadership for social reconstruction.

COLLECTIVE LEADERSHIP

Philip Gibbs, in one of his last articles, takes Anatole France's despair about Europe as his text, that Europe is not altogether dead, but is dying fast. Only Gibbs will not go as far as France. He believes still there is a possibility of life for Europe and the world, a possibility that can be realized if great unselfish leadership arises and the voice of a prophet is heard. The voice of no new prophet will be heard in our day. But the new day nevertheless waits for the prophetic voice, the collective prophetic voice, the voice that will be born out of the sense of corporate honor, made strong and resistless in our higher institutions of learning, that shall give men a strength not drawn from a sense of isolation from their kind, but springing from their consciousness of unity with their kind and with those great forces that have moved all through history and are moving, more strongly and powerfully today than ever, and from the spirit and power of Christ who lived and died in the vision of a new world and to make that new world possible, and who, living now, is the only individual leader that the new generation needs. Thus shall be bred into the new generation that sense and conscience of collective leadership on which the building of the new day depends. We do not need to postpone long its coming. Today might be the dawn of it, for that for which ten million thought they were dying, we should now realize that it is our business to live and to lead the men and women whom we are training to live.

A Letter to Dr. Speer

The following extracts are taken from a letter written by a University president to Dr. Speer after hearing the above address:

My dear Mr. Speer:

I listened with very great interest to your address at the University of Ohio, at Columbus, on October 13.

I wondered at the time, and I have wondered many times since, whether you have thought down deeply, so as to be absolutely sure that you are right in the several propositions you develop. . .

Frankly, I think that, with the single exception of the matter of property, I did not find myself in agreement with you at all. What you say about cooperation and competition is susceptible of grave criticism. You may be right, but I wish you would make sure.

What you said with reference to unity, carried out logically, means internationalism, pure and simple, and the utter abrogation of nationalism. In this I am sure you are wrong. It is a dangerous doctrine to preach, especially in the present crisis of world affairs.

I am sure that you will pardon me for writing you in this frank way. . . All I ask is that you review over again the implications of the several points of your address so that you may be absolutely sure that you are preaching truth, and not insidious error.

Dr. Speer's Reply

To the above letter Dr. Speer replied as follows:

My dear Dr. —

I am sincerely grateful for your kind letter. It was a friendly thing for you to do and I am glad to have the opportunity to answer your questionings. There must have been something very clumsy in my way of stating things at Columbus, or, as sometimes happens, the occasion and the mode of approach did not fit, or you surely would not have come away with the feeling of disagreement of which you write. What I said seems to me to be nothing but the simplest teachings of Christianity and those teachings of Christianity, moreover, which the strongest and best tendencies in human thought and action have been trying to express for many years and are more and more succeeding in expressing. I do not see how any one can read the New Testament, on the one hand, or know, on the other hand, the literature of the last twenty-five years and the thoughts of men today without perceiving this. The fact is, as Mr. E. S. Martin says, that "Christianity has broken loose in the world again."

You ask whether I am sure that I am right. I think I am. I well know how easy it is for men to be intellectually or morally color blind and to be surest that they are right when in fact they are dead wrong. Our Lord told his disciples that those who killed them would conscientiously believe that they were serving God. The history of thinking is the history of unconscious self deceptions. But we Christians have our court to appeal to. We at least can bring our ideas to the test of the standard of the New Testament. And every one of the points I tried to make at Columbus seems to me to be an elemental teaching of the New Testament. Indeed they all seemed so obvious that I was afraid they would appear commonplace to that audience and I was only encouraged by Phillips Brooks' principle that before such audiences the wise thing for a Christian man to do is to state fundamental Christian truths in the simplest and plainest way he can.

I tried to make six points in my address. Two were preliminary.

(1) The first was that the end of education is citizenship, to prepare men to fulfill all their relationships in organized human society, that character and culture are essential values which are not the end of education in citizenship but are means to that end and to be won only through it. (2) That such citizenship must be adequately conceived, that race and nation are facts belonging to it, but that its end is the citizenship of all humanity and of all eternity foreseen in St. John's city: "And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it; and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it. And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day; for there shall be no night there. And they shall bring the glory and honor of the nations into it."

Education that was to accomplish such ends and to fit men to carry the world forward into a better and truer order, I went on, must present to them the ideals of such an order and introduce them to the sources of moral energy and reinforcement by which such ideals could be realized and I named four such ideals. I described them in economic or general terms, as the occasion required, but are not all of them indisputably Christian?

I

The law of gain must yield to the law of use, selfishness to service. The principle of competition must be displaced by the principle of cooperation. The former conceives human life as a struggle between strong and weak and human progress as the elimination of the unfit by the fit, for the advantage of the fit. We repudiate this conception of human society. We believe humanity to be an organic whole, a body which must suffer or be honored together, whose true law of life and progress is not internecine struggle, but mutual brotherly effort to achieve gains in which all share and in which the profit of each is not the loss of others, but the profit of all.

This is the Christian doctrine. Luke xxii, 25-27, Mark x, 45, Rom. xii, 4, 5, xv 1, 1 Cor. xii, 12-27, Gal. vi, 2. It is the conception of history and politics which some scholars set forth long ago, and which is at last slowly making its way into all men's minds. Orestes Brownson had clear glimpses of it. It is the principle of the new economics. Judge Gary got the steel manufacturers together in a partial acceptance of it. Bankers like Mr. Lamont and Mr. Davison see it clearly. The new Chinese Consortium is a recognition of it. Mr. Gompers ostensibly repudiates it, holding to the idea of a necessary conflict of interest between capital and labor, but I think in his heart, as a brotherly human being he accepts it. All men must accept it except bad men or the color blind. It is the simple fact about the constitution of God's family, humanity. This fact does not exclude rivalry but it does change its object. It becomes rivalry in service, not in profit.

II

Personal values must be recognized as above and behind material and property values. This too is the clearest Christian teaching. Matt. vi 24; vii 12; xvi 26; I Cor. iii 11-13. Christianity, not so say any religion whatsoever, or even any spiritual view of life, rests on this judgment of values. It was one meaning of the incarnation and the Crucifixion, and it was just what the Resurrection asserted—the spirit sanctifying all things, and yet supreme over all things. The contrary estimate of property as superior to persons, long controlled men's thoughts and lasted on into the penal legislation of modern times. Political economy was written in terms of things and nineteenth century industry rested on that economy. But the Christian view has won its way. Materialistic opinions are now, for the most part, held deliberately only by some of our college faculties or by red factions. The world doesn't hold them and the war experience discarded them. And economics and industry and politics recognize the personal factor as the central factor. President Hadley told me he was writing a new book on economics from this view-point. I pointed out that this recognition of the supremacy of personal values was the true sanction of private property; that private property was essential to the security of individual freedom and the right of personality; that the new day must be a day of richer freedom, of ampler and larger persons and that material wealth is meant to be tributary to this and not preventative of it. No class is free from the peril of forgetting these things.

III

The principle and ideal of unity must prevail over the principle of division. This was the third point. Surely it is valid. Education rests upon it and seeks for it—the unity of truth and life. It is the central most distinguishing principle in Christianity as is clearly seen from the study of comparative religion. And the New Testament teaching is unmistakable. Acts xiii 26; John x 26; xvii 21; Eph. 1, 10, 21, 23; iv. 4-6, 16, 25; 1 Cor. xv, 28; Col. 1. 16, 17. All human history is the struggle of this principle against the forces which oppose it. It is the principle embodied in the human family, which, for that very reason, is the institution which has held mankind together. Partisan and separatist influences have their part to play in developing the possessions which are to be brought into the common inheritance. The forces of division and unity, intermit and oscillate but all in the interest of the ultimate unity. Have you read President Tucker's "My Generation," and his studies of this oscillation? The modern world in sanitation and hygiene and in international finance has set itself resolutely for the achievement of unity on the broadest scale. We knew something of the meaning of it while the war lasted. It remains for us in the life of the nation and in world politics in peace to be as clear sighted and as resolute. This principle of unity does not mean, as you suggest, internationalism in any evil sense. Nationality is obviously a part of the machinery of God's education of man. But the principle certainly does mean in the future new and truer forms and spirit of human organizations. Can anyone think otherwise? Can he suppose that we have reached the goal? Is the work of Christianity achieved or is human progress ended?

IV

The last point had to do with the conception of leadership. I quoted the saying of a twelfth century monk about the passing of the time for personal leadership and the coming of the day of collective leadership. He was but paraphrasing Christ's word in John xvi. 7. My point was only an effort to make it plain that democracy means not no leadership but collective leadership, and that our modern education should breed in men the sense of corporate honor and wisdom, the solidarity of common vision and loyalty. What hope is there for us if in a democracy, the people are not, under God, responsible and therefore both free and bound to do their own thinking? I know that there are many people in America who do not believe in democracy. I do. And I think our colleges ought to be its stronghold and that they should raise up men who think of all men as Christ did, and who as one with all men are open to the illumination which is available only to the body. This is no new idea. It is as old as Christianity and older. John x. 34, 35; xi. 8-11; Acts 11, 17. Professor R. E. Thompson set it forth in a great book, a generation ago, now too little read, "The Divine Order of Human Society," in which he quoted the New Testament passages which assert the collective principle in knowledge and progress. II Cor. iii, 18; Eph. iii. 18; iv. 13, 16. Who writes a book on psychology or social or political science today and does not recognize this principle?

As to further authorities for these opinions, the New Testament, and the moral order of the world which confirms it, is enough for me. But it would be easy to cite a good part of the literature of the last generation. The dynamic and biological conceptions, which are in the New Testament, have crowded out in the living world the old static and mechanical notions.

And these are surely the thoughts of the coming generation in spite of many of their teachers. This is what reassures us. The destructive influences of today, economic or social, bourgeoisism at one extreme and the red forces of communism or lawlessness at the other, can be overthrown only by truth or by authority resting upon truth. Each one of the four truths which I tried to set forth confronts and counters these influences. There is no other way as effective of meeting and overcoming them. It would be easy to show this in detail if it were necessary. These truths are fatal to class dominion whether of bourgeois or proletariat, to violence and disorder, to selfishness of individuals, group or nation, to disrespect for rights on one hand or to the substitution of rights, real or fancied, for duties on the other, to the warfare of interests which leave the non combatant majority to bear the burdens, to whatever is wrong and to whatever is unbrotherly.

I can not conceive that you should disagree with these principles if once they are clearly stated, unless I am wrong in supposing that they are among the principles of Christianity. I can conceive that two groups would not agree with them. Those who reject the Christian ideals will disagree, and those Christians also who think that the Christian principles are theoretically ideal but are applicable only in heaven or in a world which is perfectly Christian and that meanwhile the opposite ideals are the only valid ones and that Christians must conform to them and must regard any effort to displace them with the Christian conceptions as revolutionary and wrong.

I have written at too great length but it has been difficult to write so briefly. I do thank you for your warm friendship, never more truly shown than in your letter, and with kind regard, I am, very cordially yours,

ROBERT E. SPEER.

The Threat of Millennialism

By Obadiah Holmes

(Concluded from last week)

"FUNDAMENTALISM" declares that the hope of democracy is vain. If we fought the war to make the world safe for democracy and to further it in the earth, then our treasures of life and goods were spent in vain. Says T. M. Haldeman:

The Son of God lived in a society full of conditions against which the natural man revolts today—war, slavery, profiteering, poverty. He said no word against this social condition. On the contrary, he affirmed he came into the world to bring a sword and not peace, to produce conflict, not harmony. So far from holding out the hope that he came to set in motion a force that should do away with poverty and abolish the inequality between men, he announced that poverty and the distinction of class would continue during the whole period of his absence. . . . The church is exhorted to clean up Sodom instead of coming out of it."

Premillennialism is committed to a fatalistic scheme which it finds marked out in the Bible, and, in that scheme, democracy has no place. Democracy is not only vain as a hope, it is false as an ideal. "The American system of government," says one of these writers, "is based on the principle that governments receive their just powers from the consent of the governed, which principle is false. . . . Democracy (self-government), is the antithesis of autocracy, God's ideal of government. . . . Self-government whether in a nation or in an individual is abhorrent to God's order for the creature." And the editor adds, "that it is inconsistent for a Christian to make himself part of a system whose principle is the apotheosis of man." The late J. H. Brookes refers to "idle talk affirming the inalienable rights of man to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, to trial by jury, to vote and other fancied privileges . . . man has no inalienable right except the right to be damned."

Just before our entrance into the war for democracy, the Dean of the Los Angeles Bible Institute, R. A. Torrey, declared, in a Bible monthly, "They had a great democracy in France at the time of the great revolution and the streets ran with blood. What we need is an emperor, but there is only one emperor that will bring peace and that is not Kaiser Wilhelm but Kaiser Jesus."

THE BRITISH CULT'S MANIFESTO

At a time when Great Britain was summoning her sons not merely to repel a great danger, but to fight for a new world order, the English premillennialists issued in 1917 a manifesto, called "The Significance of the Hour," signed by A. C. Dixon, G. Campbell Morgan and others. Its seven points were as follows:

1. That the present crisis points to the close of the times of the Gentiles.
2. That the Revelation of the Lord may be expected at any moment, when he will be manifested as evidently to his disciples as on the evening of his resurrection.
3. That the completed church will be translated to be forever with the Lord.
4. That Israel will be restored to its own land in unbelief and afterwards converted by the appearing of Christ on its behalf.
5. That all human schemes of reconstruction must be subsidiary to the second coming, because all nations will then be subject to his rule.
6. That under the reign of Christ there will be a further great effusion of the Holy Spirit upon all flesh.
7. That the truths embodied in this statement are of the utmost practical value in determining Christian character and conduct with reference to the pressing problems of the hour.

VERBAL INSPIRATION

The United States government took action at Los Angeles and Brooklyn and other places relative to the premillennial programs. It is well known that some men served terms in the penitentiaries. The interference of the government, and the convictions, had a disturbing effect on all premillennial camps.* The pessimism was carefully camouflaged. Conferences scheduled on the "Coming of the Lord" were changed to "Prophetic Conferences." The federal authorities were reported to have suppressed premillennial activities in Los Angeles, and caution, on the parties to the propaganda, seemed the better part of valor. "I have been speaking for the Third Liberty Loan two and three times each day. . . and have not been in a single community that some evangelist. . . had not been preaching there 'the last days' idea."

"Fundamentalism" claims that its doctrines are trans-

*See "The Menace of Premillennialism" by Prof. S. J. Case, University of Chicago.

cripts of the Word of God. That word is verbally inspired, it comes from God "to the smallest word and inflection of a word." The original manuscripts however are not at hand. Those that we have afford no such assumption. The whole scheme involves literal infallibility, the basis of premillennialism in all its forms, Russellism, Dowieism, Adventism, Chiliasm, the programs of Bible Institutes and the new literalists, "Fundamentals of the Faith." It claims an unbounded loyalty to the Word of God and manifests a highly developed censoriousness against all who seriously and soberly study the Scriptures with unfettered minds. Its use of the Bible is mechanical, arbitrary, unethical and violent.

The cult teaches that the imprecatory Psalms will be literally fulfilled. There could be no sharper contrast between the implacable bitterness of these Psalms and the spirit of Jesus. Not even in the terrible world war did any nation dare to set forth principles like these. And when such deeds were wrought they called forth universal horror and execration.

God shall let me see my desire upon mine enemies—Ps. 59:10.

Consume them in thy wrath, consume them, that they may not be; and let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth. And at even let them return; and let them make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city. Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied.—59:13-15.

O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed; happy shall be he that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us. Happy shall be he that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones.—137:8-9.

The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked.—58:10.

The spirit of vengeance is not satisfied with punishment of the guilty, but goes back to the parents and on to the children. It does not wish to see repentance and forgiveness but asks that even the prayer of its foe may be turned into sin. The Anglican church excludes these Psalms from use in church services as being "most un-Christian in character and an insult to the divine majesty." John Wesley excluded them from the book of worship which he prepared for the Methodist Church in America, declaring them unfit for use in a Christian congregation.

PAGANISM, NOT CHRISTIANITY

The Sunday School Times, Feb. 3, 1917, says: "The imprecations upon enemies spoken by the prophet-psalmists were inspired of God. . . The imprecations do not belong to us; they do belong. . . to the dispensation of law and judgment. . . In that day the imprecatory Psalms again shall have a literal meaning, their true fulfillment. . . They are great prophecies. Like all prophecies they will be literally fulfilled."

This is paganism, not Christianity. The mind not obsessed by a theory revolts in horror. This teaching is propagated in Sunday Schools all over the country. A journal for Sunday school teachers announces that "world conditions, unmistakably and positively, point to the end of the age. Prophecies relating to that end may soon begin to be fulfilled.* For the faith of earnest honest young men and women no current infidelity is more pernicious. In the truest sense such teaching is infidelity. Premillennialism rests ultimately on an ultra-Calvinistic conception sovereignty that is fatalistic. The world is evil; it is growing worse because God has determined this as his plan. That plan is revealed in his word; it is ours to accept, but not to debate. God says so and that decides it.

Similar is the position of the editor of another Bible monthly. He holds these terrible imprecations as inspired and sure to be fulfilled. With that strange Judaism that colors this pessimistic fundamentalism, he declares that "the pious Jews living in that time of trouble will utter these words" and "that they will be answered by the majestic appearing of the heavenly King." The paganism of this position is more fully realized when one notes the author's constant insistence upon literalness of fulfillment.

A PROPAGANDA OF MISCHIEF

Not even the children of the Sunday Schools are exempt from this propaganda of mischief. All institute magazines carry the Sunday lessons. In all these publications there are persistent attacks on colleges and seminaries. Here is a sample from a New York publication: "The Chicago University maintains a department called 'The American Institute of Sacred Literature.' It is widely advertised. Its propaganda takes in all denominations. What is it? It is camouflaged infidelity of the worst and most dangerous type. . . The demons of destructive criticism are at work in this institution which is a lineal descendant of the German infidels through whom the murderer and liar from the beginning prepared the land of Luther for the horrors through which the world has passed in recent years. The saloon was a great curse. The institutions which deny the word of God and the gospel of Jesus Christ are a far greater curse. Their damnation is not far off."

This is the kind of language in papers carrying the Sunday School lessons. One must read such magazines as "The Kings Business," "Our Hope," "Christian Workers Magazine" and "Sunday School Times" in order to be convinced.

In many churches there is an increasing tendency to form organizations that under premillennialism stand the supreme test. Sunday school teachers are compelled to sign the articles of the "fundamentals of the faith." Scores of churches have been already rent asunder. Maranatha ("lo he comes") churches and missions have been established. Missionaries have been sent to foreign fields, increasing the burdens by breeding strife. One association of fourteen Baptist churches has withdrawn in Michigan and has organized the "Orthodox Baptist Association." The churches of every communion are reaping the harvest of a frenzied evangelism expressing the purposes of the Bible Institutes and prophetic conferences to control the leading denominations. A champion of orthodoxy says:

Radicalism is rampant in most of the universities. . . New England is where it is most in evidence. . . Our duty is to expose and bring these false teachers to realize the fact that they can not stay in our institutions. . . They are the victims of a false education, of a great religious delusion. . . There should be some way devised to compel these institutions to give a full account of their work and teaching to some strong orthodox board. . . All teachers and preachers of modernism can be disciplined, humbled and silenced, and the educational institutions, and the local churches where it is taught can be dealt with effectually.

*See Sunday School Times files.

*"Our Hope," March 1921, p387.

VAST FINANCIAL RESOURCES

A few years ago a single Chiliastic minister had a fund of three hundred thousand dollars placed at his disposal for the furtherance of premillennialism under the name of Fundamentals. Ten volumes were published and gratuitously sent to English speaking ministers, missionaries, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. secretaries all over the world. This was the beginning of the propaganda in a wholesome way. It has grown alarmingly. Four distributing centers, Los Angeles, Chicago, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Minneapolis, and Grand Rapids, literature is spread broadcast. Blackstone's "Jesus is Coming" has been sent to every minister in America. Other books, periodicals, tracts and pamphlets are circulated in enormous quantities. "Prophetic conferences" are held in leading cities and towns of the north and lately there has been an invasion of the orthodox south. Evangelistic campaigns are held that are nothing less than agencies of propaganda. A busy agent of the propaganda says: "We demand that the false teacher of modernism shall be unfrocked. I fully expect to see the day when a new theology teacher will not be found occupying a chair in any institution throughout this broad land, for the hour of his exit is at hand." These things get the attention of the great mass of folks, and, since high grade religious journalism is past, they are like sheep "exploited and skinned alive."

In "Our Hope," March 1920, A. C. Gaebelien says of the "Scofield Reference Bible"; "It teaches clearly and fearlessly the inerrancy and infallibility. . . and especially his second coming and all events connected with it." In the same issue C. I. Scofield says: "The destructive criticism and the theology which goes with it are taught from practically all the university chairs of England and the United States, and, alas, also from practically all the theological seminaries."

The flaming "fundamentalist" sends Darwin and Huxley and all higher critics and modernists and new theologians to hell. He also consigns to the flames, Emerson, Longfellow, Holmes, Whittier, Lowell, and Phillips Brooks, "that dirty, stinking, rotten Unitarian bunch," to use the billingsgate of an evangelistic champion of the cult. Is it to be wondered at that a very outstanding member of this cult replies to ideas in a tract, "Will Christ Come Again," not in ideas, but in personal abuse, saying that this tract by a well known educator is the work of a blasphemer, an intellectual trickster—a sneaking and cowardly infidel method?

"Men are spending enormous sums of money," says Dean Shailer Mathews, University of Chicago, "to induce Christians to regard scientific thought as atheistic and any attempt to appropriate the results of scientific thought as atheism. The inevitable happens. Throughout the country we see extremists who are handling the Bible in the interest of ignorance and fanaticism, assailing bitterly those from whom they differ and alienating educated men and women from the church."

Statements of professors in colleges and seminaries are carefully collected and forwarded to centers of propaganda. Articles and books are carefully read for sentences that can be used against them as heretics. These statements may be had in book form from Minneapolis and Yonkers. The persistent attack on the educational institutions may be read in any of the publications of Bible Institutes, Bible Conventions and Prophetic Conferences. The most vicious attacks come from the Bible Institutes.

It is time for the churches to take seriously the spread of premillennialism. One very prominent exponent of this doctrine announces that his denomination is "cracked from sea to sea." If the activities of the cult were confined to a few obscure sects the danger would be insignificant but the poison was spread through all the larger bodies. The menace has assumed such proportions that Christian leaders among Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and other influential bodies realize the necessity of meeting this cult in the open.

"Questions of scholarship," says Professor Bowne, "can be settled by scholarship. Questions of fact can be settled by evidence. This is modernism. The very notion of deciding them by authority is absurd. How many papal bulls, or how big an ecclesiastical club, or how large a majority of ignorant votes would be needed to overturn the Copernican astronomy? Ignorance, in high or low places, is entitled to no opinion on these matters. Authority only makes itself ridiculous when it assumes to dictate. Majorities are equally absurd, unless they rest on the facts and the evidence."

SCHOLARSHIP OF WORLD ALMOST A UNIT

In twenty eight leading theological seminaries, in eight denominations, with two hundred and thirty six professors, there are only seven professors who teach premillennialism even in mild form.* The scholarship of the world is against it. And this is the reason for the attacks on colleges and seminaries.

A professor in one of the outstanding divinity schools says: "It would be too much to say that most of those who are conducting the "fundamentalist" movement mean to be fair or tolerant towards those who dissent. The movement is not grounded in reason; its basic assumption is the danger of using reason in dealing with the Bible, and it can hardly be expected to be reasonable in its treatment of dissent from its methods. It is easier, and, with the crowds, more successful to call dissenters hard names and to cast suspicion upon their soundness. The last thing to which the propagandists would assent would be a fair discussion in their Bible Institutes, summer conferences, "prophetic conventions" and magazines, of the question: "Is the Bible an infallible book?"

Have we reached the cross roads in the churches? At the general convocations of orthodox communions, men of modern mind, who believe that questions of scholarship must be settled by scholarship and questions of fact must be determined by evidence, will face the machinations of

*J. H. Snowden, "The Coming of the Lord."

Which is the Better Way?

WHEN wages were high and labor was in demand there was a tendency among workingmen to slack on the job, to work when it suited them and to use their power in a selfish manner. Man for man the workingman is no different from the employer. There is the same amount of selfishness in human nature on both sides the line. Both are inclined to "charge all the traffic will bear," that get all they can for the least service. Now that there are millions out of employment the employer is inclined to use strong arm methods on the unions. As one of them said not long ago, "We have them down and we will pound hell out of them." There is a low-brow element on both sides that believes in nothing but force and regards all talk about conciliation and mutual service as buncombe.

John Skelton Williams, comptroller of the currency under the Wilson administration, recently took the United States Steel Corporation to task for its high prices on steel. He showed that they made from $30 to $35 per ton on steel furnished the government for war purposes and laid up hundreds of millions over and above regular dividends, besides setting aside extra large sums for depreciation, etc. Judge Gary replied that the government fixed a price and said it "would have been utopian" not to have charged it. Mr. Williams replied that the government only fixed a maximum price and that there was nothing utopian about a corporation of unparalleled wealth taking advantage of that maximum at a time when the very men who used the material it made were giving their lives and limbs as a sacrifice. We have heard much about shipmaking labor receiving $10 per day while soldiers fought for a dollar a day; here is the other side—millionaire steel makers making hundreds of millions out of the machinery by operating which thousands gave their lives for their country.

And now, says Mr. Williams, while all other metals have gone back to pre-war prices steel, just because it can, through powerful organization, holds the price up, holds it so high that freight cars are costing three times what they did before the war and with interest almost doubled their actual working cost is up 500 per cent. Thus both transportation and building are in a perilous situation.

Mr. Williams says to Judge Gary: "You have the power to aid enormously in stilling disturbances now existing and worse threatening—a voluntary and sweeping reduction of your prices and diminution of your profits would give powerful argument to those who are trying to persuade labor to relinquish some of its charges."

* * *

Steel's War Ultimatum to the Unions

On April 18, Judge Gary, addressing the stockholders of his corporation in New York, issued a sweeping ultimatum to the labor unions. Here are his war passages: "They may have been justified in the long past" but today "there is no necessity for labor unions and no benefit or advantage through them will accrue to anyone except the labor union leaders." He charges that "the workmen do not voluntarily join the unions" but that "self appointed leaders, who expect to receive pecuniary profit, have been and are constantly soliciting the workingmen to become members." The men join, he says "through intimidation, over-persuasion, false promises, misrepresentation or because of the use of other vicious or unworthy methods." He declares that unions do not keep books or render accounts, that the leaders determine their own salaries and dictate the policies, and that "as the result of coercion, threats, insults or wild promises, members of the unions, not previously consulted, may and do temporarily join a movement precipitated by the leaders and thus for a time nominally increase the membership."

With a striking contradiction to what the Interchurch Investigating Commission actually found in the mills, the Judge admits that if a workman desires to join a union he should have that right and that he "should not be discriminated against by the 'open shop' so long as he respects the rights of his employer and co-employee and obeys the laws of the land." This ultimatum speaks for itself. It is the old story of the Bourbon never learning.

* * *

The United States Railroad Labor Board on Unions

In striking contrast is the ruling of the United States Railroad Labor Board as laid down on April 14. This board represents the public and has been dealing with the labor problems arising under industrial relations between four times as many men and many times as large an investment of capital as is represented in steel. In regard to unions it lays down the following fundamental rules: "The right of railway employees to organize for lawful objects shall not be denied, interfered with or obstructed." In other words, it is a fundamental human right; it could no more be denied by employers than the right of organization could be denied by a democratic government. They further lay it down that "the right of such lawful organization to act toward lawful objects through representatives of its own choice, whether employees of a particular carrier or otherwise, shall be agreed to by the management." Thus the effort of certain companies to segregate their men into a railroad system organization is flatly denied.

In the next rule they expressly forbid the "closed-shop" as a means of discriminating against non-union men; the "big four" brotherhoods have always been "open-shop," relying upon the efficiency of their organizations to bring the overwhelming majority of the men into them. That is certainly the most effective type of unionism. "Collective bargaining" is expressly stipulated and arbitrary "hiring and firing" forbidden; discipline for the sake of effective service is guaranteed the management but the employee is also guaranteed "a fair hearing by a designated officer of the carrier"; he must have notice of charges, opportunity to produce his own witnesses and to be "represented by council of his own choosing." Here again he is guaranteed some such right in regard to his vocation and his livelihood as is property, which cannot be taken without "due process of law." Judge Gary defends the twelve hour day; this board lays down the eight hour day as basic and demands eight hours actual work for that day.

Which most adequately represents the democratic viewpoint of life and human relations and is thus most nearly 100 per cent American—the United States Steel Corporation or the United States Railway Labor Board?

* * *

A Significant Sign of Sanity

The employers are on top today. The so-called "open-shop" drive has been characterized by the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches and by practically all other non-partisan and disinterested observers as in fact a campaign against the unions. Judge Gary is the high-priest of all such employers and his ultimatum most adequately sets forth their intentions. Under fair words about the "open-shop" he declares radically against the very existence of unions.

A significant sign of sanity is shown in the report of the Merchants' Association of New York, issued on March 14. The railroad security holders have taken the same sort of a stand and signs are ripening that the saner, less bourbonistic employers are awaking to the menace of wild radicalism on behalf of autocratic employer suppression. The New York Merchants' Association says: "It is time to abandon the methods of opposition and strife and to set up the machinery of friendly intercourse and cooperation between employers and employees." They warn that the so-called "open-shop" crusade has "delayed the establishment of peaceful industrial relations" and declare "that the establishment of the open-shop should not in any way affect the employees' right to join or not to join a labor union"; in such words they take their stand with the United States Railway Labor Board.

They "deplore the disposition on the part of some employers who are using the term 'open-shop' to work toward a condition of the closed non-union shop by discriminating against union men." Warning that a strong-arm policy in a time of advantage only brings anger and reprisal at more advantageous times, they declare for "plans of employee representation" and for "consultation on all matters in any plants which affect the employees in their relations with the employers." Autocratic suppression by use of sheer power only begets anger, rebellion and radicalism. In a democratic society the employer autocrat will make a thousand radicals while the bizarre agitator makes a score.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

CORRESPONDENCE

Tithing in the Old Testament

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: That is a capital article that you have published—in the issue of April 21—namely, H. D. C. MacLachlan's "Is Tithing Christian?" Two points I offer, that the article does not cover.

First, the Jewish tithing was the payment of a state tax. The Jews did not know the distinction between church and state, a distinction not only familiar but necessary to us. The word church does not occur in the Old Testament. The theocratic concept underlies the whole of Old Testament history and literature and legislation. State and church, as we should say, are one back there. More strictly, the state is all in all; among its various functions there is a religious one, but there is not a church. The state is all, and God is its rightful ruler, and the priest and prophet are state officers quite as much as the king, and the king is a religious functionary quite as much as the priest or the prophet. The Jewish religion was a state religion, and its laws were state laws, its temple was a state temple, its various rituals were state rituals, and its tithing of flocks and fields were ordered by the state, and were therefore a form of tax. For us that state does not exist. For us its forms and laws cannot exist. We are Americans, gentiles, Christians. We are under a different state; we embrace a different religion. The Jewish law of tithing is no more Christian than the law of circumcision, or of the animal sacrifices, or of the priesthood, or the seventh day Sabbath, or of clean and unclean animals.

Secondly, it is hard to construe the law of the tithe. Did the law call for the tithe alone or in addition the first fruits of the ground, of the trees, of the cattle, and even of the family itself? See Neh. 10, 3ff. Lev. 27, 36f. These passages and others call for the tithe plus the first fruits. But Deut. 14, 22f calls for the tithe only. Again: What was to be done with this tithe and these offerings? According to Numbers 18, 24 the tithe was devoted to the Levites, the priestly tribe to which no inheritance in land was allotted. According to Deut. 14, 21f the tithes were to be brought to Jerusalem and to be used in a great family feast to which the stranger, the fatherless, the widow, and the Levite, must be invited. If the way were too long the tithe must be turned into money, and—"Thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth. And thou shalt eat there before the Lord thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thy household." Not many churchmen, I fancy, would want that part of the law of the tithe reenforced in these prohibition days.

Again, it is generally assumed that the tithe was an annual tax, and that is probably correct. But Deut. 14, 28 makes it a triennial tax and feasting time. There is a possible explanation of these discrepancies. The law was changed from time to time just as the laws of all growing and changing peoples are.

The above are some of the difficulties in the way of the Judaizing tendency which would impose on Christians the laws and forms of an ancient, defunct theocratic state. One of the lessons we have yet to learn from the Master is to treat the Old Testament with the freedom with which he treated it, and to pass by Jewish forms and rituals and laws as he passed them by.

The tithing system breaks down in two directions. There are devout people so hard pressed that they should not have the tithe mentioned to them even as a suggestion. For the "widow's mite" today they will have the Master's blessing, even though they keep and use the widow's earnings tomorrow. On the other hand there are wealthy people who should give not a tenth only, but a fifth, or a fourth, or a third, or a half, or all their income, and then heavy portions of their capital to the Lord, and the Lord's work, and the Lord's poor. Christian giving is not a matter of hard and fast legalism, but of love and joy and spontaneity in the Holy Spirit.

Liscomb, Iowa.

W. J. LHAMON.

Christian in Name or in Fact

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: This is my first letter to you from the standpoint of an ardent admirer of your paper. The first thing that I do after receiving it on Saturday afternoon is to read it from "cover to cover," but I think that aside from the editorial which I especially enjoy, the section devoted to "Correspondence" interests me most, and I would like to call the attention of Mr. Howard C. Wilson of Pittsburgh, Pa., whose letter appears in The Christian Century of April 7, to the crying needs of our home mission fields. He says he would like to challenge any one to prove that there is a shortage of ministers. That statement is absurd, and if he really desires proof

Two Great Biographies

By Prof. David Smith, M.A., D.D.

The Life and Letters of St. Paul.

The publication of Dr. Smith's great work is an event of first importance in the world of religious literature. This monumental life of the great Apostle presents the results of archeological findings and scholarly investigations of the past two decades. It takes its place at once as the one indispensable life of Paul for Bible students. Octavo, with series of beautiful new maps in color.

Price $6.00, plus 20 cents postage.

The Days of His Flesh.

"It is not going too far to say that there is no 'Life of Christ' in which the whole gospel narrative is reproduced in so readable and intelligible a form."—Principal Marcus Dods.

Price $3.50, plus 15 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St. Chicago

he should communicate with any of the "boards." For example, there are two large Presbyterian churches in a city of Colorado without pastors and they are not on the mission board, and there are many such places that I personally know about. "Young man, go west."

In the same issue I read with mingled disgust and surprise the two articles on the subject, "Is the Christian Church Christian?" and the editorial which preceded them which seemed to indicate the fact that The Christian Century would rather agree with the discussion of Miss Scudder than that of Dr. Jefferson. My sympathies are with Dr. Jefferson and I little wonder at him "stamping on such a question," but I wonder greatly at him discussing such a question. It reminds me of the question "Is a black horse black," or "Is a wildcat wild," "Is water wet." The question answers itself. Had the question been stated "Is the Modern Church Christian?" then there might have been some reason for using eight pages in such a discussion, but "Is the Christian Church Christian?" if there is such a thing it has to be Christian.

I am exceedingly glad to be counted among the members of the great Christian Century family, and to try to help uphold it in the fight that it is making for a purer church and ministry.

ROBT. J. BLACK.

First Presbyterian Church, Victor, Colo.

British Table Talk

A Significant Warning and Appeal

London, April, 1921.

A remarkable manifesto, recently issued over representative signatures, has received little notice and evoked no perceptible response. But it is a statement that future historians may value as giving a picture of the times in which we live and a clue to present-day tendencies that may have grave developments. "No lover of mankind or of progress," write Bishop Temple and two other bishops, Canon Barnes, three free church college principals, Dr. Clifford, Edward Carpenter, Gilbert Murray, three titled ladies and other important people, "no student of religion, of morals, or of economics can regard the present trend of affairs without feelings of grave anxiety. Civilization itself seems to be on the wane and everything that makes life really worth the living in process of extinction. The nations are filled with mistrust and antipathy for each other, the classes have rarely been so antagonistic, while the relation of individual to individual has seldom been so frankly selfish. The vast destruction of life by war and the acute suffering the war created seem to have largely destroyed human sympathy. Hence the unprecedented misery into which the war has plunged so many nations often fails to excite those feelings of humanity which, prior to the war, thrilled the people of every country when the world was visited by misfortunes quite insignificant in comparison with the present disaster. Never was greater need of all those qualities which make the race human, and never did they appear to be less manifest." in short, "the world has taken a wrong turn, which if persisted in may lead to the destruction of civilization." In these distressing circumstances, the signatories appeal to the right-thinking of all nations and classes, and invite their cooperation in applying the true remedies. "It is only by maintaining the highest possible standard of right between nations, classes, and individuals that the present situation can be adjusted and the dangers overcome." Nations and individuals must not consider their own interests, but the common welfare of all classes and communities. "A renewed sense of right is needed, as well as a renewed determination both to do and maintain what is right, internationally as well as nationally and individually. Only when statesmen and citizens, employers and employed, do this, even when apparently it is against their interests, "can the spiritual and moral health of the nations be renewed and the general economic well-being be once more established."

* * *

A Lack Supplied

The above warning is timely, the dangers indicated are real, but the appeal lacks dynamic. No religious motive is appealed to, no spiritual sanction is invoked: the non-Christian signatures doubtless explain the omission. At the Free Church Council meetings, referred to below, Rev. Arthur Dakin declared that today thousands, especially adolescents, are asking, Why should a man be good? Why should I live a pure life?

Why should I be scrupulously honest? The indispensable motive is given in an appeal issued by the Society of Friendship: "As Christians we are called to practice the method of Christ's own way; he seeks reparation for wrong, not by force, but by redeeming the spirit of man. He draws forth the new life by his call to the spirit of good in man." In the name of Christ the society solemnly calls for an act which will liberate the great constructive forces of goodwill and of mutual service. A similar appeal was made by Mr. Fred B. Smith, "Official Delegate from the Church of the United States to the Churches of the United Kingdom," in the first public utterance of his present mission. At a meeting in the church house, Westminster, presided over by the bishop of London, he said, in effect, that civilization has reached the most momentous moral crisis in its history, and that shrewd observers, some not themselves Christians, realize that the motive and method of Jesus is the only thing that can save it. He described, with dramatic effect, how President Faunce paused in a recent public address, put his hand to his head, and, with deep emotion, exclaimed, "O God! has the sun begun to set on this white race of ours?" and also how "Filine, the Jewish merchant prince of Boston," having invited a number of Christian leaders to lunch, explained that he had brought them together that he might say to them, "In the name of God, get the Christian church into action! It is the hope of the world." Similarly, the prime minister of New South Wales, though not himself a religious man, had said, at the American Luncheon Club's welcome to Mr. Smith, on the same day as the Church House meeting, "If we have any hope, it is with these ministers and churches." In Mr. Smith's judgment this is the supreme hour of the Christian church, and if it fails now its failure will be more disastrous than any in the past. At the luncheon just mentioned Lord Robert Cecil also struck the religious note in his appeal for friendship and trust between America and Great Britain and vehement assertion that the English people hate and loath war. "Do not," he said, "underrate the religious feeling of the English people. The Bible is still by far the best known book in England, and it is because they saw or thought they saw in Mr. Woodrow Wilson the embodiment of their hopes that they received him with the enthusiasm they did."

* * *

Report on Prohibition in America

Mr. Fred B. Smith, who has spoken in public in every state in the union and crossed the Atlantic twenty-five times, is touring England for the purpose of interpreting to British churches the world-call to unity and cooperation in Christian leadership. His references to the work of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America make us wish we had an equally vigorous, well-organized and comprehensive council in this country. He has made public the replies he has received from twenty-six of the forty-eight state governors to whom he addressed in January questions as to the effect of prohibition in their respective states. Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Idaho, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina and the commissioner of prohibition of Virginia all testify to the beneficial effects of the "dry" system upon the health, happiness, morals, industry and economics of the community. Governor Morrow, Kentucky, says prohibition has emptied the jails of the common "drunks and disorderlies," breakers of the peace, etc., and Governor Russell, Mississippi, says that "the greatest piece of legislation in the history of America" has saved his commonwealth "seventy-five per cent of the court cost and more than this much in crime records." Intense interest is taken in Great Britain in the working of prohibition, of which we receive many contradictory accounts, and we should much like to have the witness also of the other state governors.

* * *

Pathos and Tragedy

Born under conditions of pathos and tragedy at Constance on August 1, 1914, the very day that the great war began, the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the churches has been the background of the sad conclusion of a picturesque ecclesiastical visit from east to west. On March 1 the head of the eastern Orthodox church, Monseigneur Dorotheos, archbishop of Brusa, arrived in England on a mission from the holy synod. Only once before has an ecumenical patriarch journeyed to the west—in 1439-40 to the Council of Florence—and he, like his latest successor, died before his return. The locum tenens of the patriarchate of Constantinople came to London to plead the cause of the unredeemed Greeks in the east and in particular to ensure that territory inhabited by Christians and at present in allied hands should not be returned to the Turks; and also to urge the importance of the patriarchate being independent of the sultan. Ten days after his arrival Monseigneur Dorotheos proceeded to Lambeth Palace to present to the archbishop of Canterbury—on behalf of the holy synod of Constantinople, "as an earnest of the brotherly feeling" of the eastern orthodox church towards the Anglican church, hoping that it would "serve as an augury of the union of the two churches in the service of our Lord"—a historic ecclesiastical emblem of great value and beauty known as an enkolpion, bearing the crowned double-headed eagle of the patriarchate originally made for the illustrious Patriarch Joachim III, and worn by five successive patriarchs as the emblem of their office. A week later, under the auspices of the World Alliance, a representative meeting was held at Sion College to welcome the distinguished visitor and to thank him and the Orthodox church for their sympathy and cooperation in the alliance movement. A message came to the meeting that the patriarch was prevented by an attack of bronchitis from attending, his secretary read the address he had intended to deliver, and the next day his holiness died at the Ritz Hotel. His death, at the age of 61, was attributed partly to the privations he voluntarily endured when living the life of a monk, and partly to the shock of the news that the aged mother and other relatives of his dearest friend, the metropolitan of Chataldia, had been outraged and murdered in most bestial circumstances by the Turks at Ismet. On hearing this terrible news the patriarch sat speechless and trembling, and not long after died. Almost with his last breath he gave a message to the English church, saying that one motive of his journey to England was an ardent desire to make personal acquaintances among the English clergy and their leaders, and especially to greet the archbishop of Canterbury. The World Alliance now consists of 100 members, representing twenty-three countries and many denominations. It was Dr. George Nasmyth, the international organizer, who, traveling from America to the east, introduced the alliance to the Orthodox church.

* * *

Parliament of the Free Churches

We now have two bodies representing organized English nonconformity: (1) the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, consisting of delegates chosen from local free church councils on which the various denominations are represented, and also of personal members; (2) the Federal Council of Evangelical Free Churches, consisting of delegates officially appointed by the annual assemblies and conferences of the various free churches. The latter, formed recently on the initiative of Dr. J. H. Shakespeare, is still in the experimental stage; the former, under the inspiration of Alexander Mackennal, H. Price Hughes and J. Guinness Rogers, was launched twenty-six years ago, with the object of federating the non-established churches and increasing their individual and collective efficiency. In recent years the council has lacked vigor and effectiveness, but at its annual assembly in March at Manchester, its birthplace, it showed signs of revivification and a firmer grasp of reality. The thousand delegates, supplemented by the general public, met in Albert Hall, Wesleyan Central Mission; the usual civic welcome was given; and the bishop, Dr. Temple, offered a cordial Anglican greeting. The new president, Rev. R. C. Gillie (recently in America) was the guest at the deanery of Dr. McCormick—who at one of the sessions "chaffed free church ministers on the sartorial rapprochement to the church of England, shown by the multiplication of 'dog-collars,'" while the dress of an increasing number of Anglican clergymen is approximating to that of the laity. The general subject of the discussions was "The England of Tomorrow." To the president the most obvious need of our day is a renaissance of personal morality, which can only be brought about by the re-Christianization of Britain. "The church of today needs above all things," said Principal Selbie, "to recover the freshness, radiance, and power of that first impact of the gospel, and to preach the love of God with the conviction of experience. We are sure, perhaps, that he loves us and people like us, but does he love Germans or Roman

Princess Salome

A Tale of the Days of Camel-Bells

By Dr. Burris Jenkins

A vivid picture of the Palestine of Christ, a vital story of the dawn of faith, and an inspiring message that touches the heart with the spirit of a warm and living Christianity. Dr. Jenkins is known to thousands as a minister of the Disciples of Christ, as a publisher of a large Kansas City Daily, and as a man of many and varied activities. Nation-wide reputation as a writer of religious fiction, however, was reserved until the publication of PRINCESS SALOME. It fulfills the promise of great literary achievement that was given in his previous work, THE PROTESTANT.

George A. Miller, President of the International Convention of Disciples of Christ, says of PRINCESS SALOME: "It will produce faith and love in many cold and indifferent hearts and lives." Price $2.00 (12c postage).

For Sale by all Bookstores, or

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

Published by J. B. Lippincott Company

Catholics or Unitarians? Each church or denomination claims some monopoly in the avenues to the love of God, and the last thing they like to think of it is that it is 'boundless, full, and free.' The assembly authorized the executive to take steps to organize the two years' evangelistic campaign proposed by Dr. Clifford, whose method, it is recalled, is identical with that indicated by the motto of Professor J. G. Tasker when president of the Wesleyan conference—"Each to reach one, each to teach one."

* * *

Pressing Problems

After the reading of an impressive message from Lord Robert Cecil, who sees in the application of the principles of Christ the only hope of world peace, and a journalist, Mr. H. Jeffs, had urged churches to follow the example of Dr. Horton's church and join the League of Nations Union in a body, the prophecy of the delegate from the United States, Dr. H. A. Atkinson, that, "With the present cabinet and the general feeling in America, my country will be within the League of Nations within three months" evoked delighted, if somewhat incredulous, applause. He assured us that America feels the humiliation of being outside the league, and that if the Republican party does not bring the United States into the league, that party will pass into oblivion. In moving a resolution denouncing equally Sinn Fein outrages and official reprisals, and demanding an inquiry into both, Dr. Scott Lidgett, alluding to the international effect of the situation in Ireland, said he would utter only one word—"America." Many delegates wanted a stronger resolution, directly censuring the government, but it was officially contended that to do that would be to take political action, which was not the council's function; and the assembly acquiesced. Dealing with "Christianity and Industrialism," Dr. Horton outlined an economic program that was unanimously approved. From the postulate—a "necessary revolution which the church must preach till it is realized"—that "the principle of mutual love and concern for each other's interest should be carried into all industry, production, distribution, exchange, commerce," economic laws being subordinate to it, among the corollaries that followed were: competition changed into friendly rivalry; cordial cooperation of employers and employed; capital held and administered for the good of the community, not for the boundless profit of its owners. An important step was the formation, after conference with the foreign delegates, of the provisional committee of a "Federation of Federations of Protestant Churches." Eight countries are ready to join, and it is estimated that by the proposed nexus 200,000,000 Protestants will be linked up. The council elected as president for 1922 Rev. Samuel Chadwick, principal of Cliff Wesleyan Methodist Lay Students' College, an eloquent preacher, fervent evangelist, and able Bible expositor. [The discussion on reunion at the council was dealt with in a separate article by Mr. Dawson two weeks ago.—The Editor.]

* * *

"Ecclesiastical Bolsheviks"

Two years ago the rector, Rev. G. W. Hudson Shaw, invited Miss Maude Royden, a friend of many years, to conduct the Three Hour Service on Good Friday in St. Botolph's, one of the ancient city churches, now a center of modern movements. Owing to episcopal disapproval and uncertainty as to the legal position, the service was held in the schoolroom. This year Mr. Shaw renewed the invitation, and, waxing bolder, decided to hold the service in the church itself. Appealed to by the secretary of the English Church Union, the bishop of London stated that if Miss Royden took the service it was not only without his sanction but against his expressed wish conveyed in writing both to Mr. Shaw and Miss Royden. Dr. Winington-Ingram stopped short of formal inhibition; otherwise a more critical situation would have been precipitated. Miss Royden's public comment on the bishop's letter is that personally he has been most kind to her, but as his only objection to her taking the service was that she is a woman, to comply with his request would be a betrayal of her sex. She duly conducted the service, the church being crowded to overflowing, and gave seven brief addresses on the Seven Words from the Cross. Through the "Church Times" a Nottinghamshire clergyman has implored the bishop of London "to bring these ecclesiastical Bolsheviks to boot"—let us hope he meant book! The English Church Union is promoting a memorial "to be signed by churchwomen throughout the country" protesting against the resolution passed by the bishops in the Canterbury House of Convocation in favor of allowing women to preach or minister publicly in churches. Miss Royden has been suffering from "clergyman's sore throat," and for some time to come will have to be more sparing in the use of her voice. A wit suggests that she has now shown she possesses the final qualification for the preaching office! On the completion of the first year of Fellowship Services at Kensington Town Hall, Miss Royden and her colleague, Dr. Percy Dearmer, were presented with identical vellum-bound albums containing grateful and affectionate addresses, followed by the signatures of members of the Fellowship. As I write, negotiations for acquiring a large free church for the Fellowship are reaching the decisive stage.

* * *

Personal

Having accepted an invitation from the bishop of California, Dr. R. J. Campbell leaves England in May.—Mr. G. H. Shakespeare, son of Dr. J. H. Shakespeare of the Baptist Union, has become one of Mr. Lloyd George's secretaries.—Dr. Norman Maclean, St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, will be one of the delegates to the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Pittsburgh in the autumn.—The death has occurred at Bournemouth, in his eighty-fifth year, of Rev. Thomas L. Johnson, the colored evangelist, who for twenty-eight years lived in slavery, who was in turn pastor of a negro church in Denver City, Colo., minister of Providence Church, Chicago, a student at Spurgeon's College, London, and an evangelist in England.—Rev. Edward H. Smith, Oshkosh, Wis., where he has been Congregational minister for nearly thirty years, has reached England on his tour around the world.—Rev. Dr. G. P. Gould, ex-principal of Regent's Park Baptist College, has passed away at the age of 73.—The House of Commons has voted £5,000 to Rev. F. W. North, formerly British chaplain in Moscow, in recognition of the great services he rendered to British prisoners and others "during one of the most difficult and critical periods of our relations with Russia."—Rear Admiral Sir Walter Cowan, who was in command of the Baltic fleet, "found it impossible to extract from Mr. North any record of his services," and obtained his information from prisoners and refugees.—Pastor Theodore Monod, the French preacher, author and hymn writer, has died at Paris at the age of 84.—"Like many other trenchant and witty writers, the dean of St. Paul's uses sentences which ought not, I think, be taken too seriously. Originality and sometimes eccentricity of thought are among his prominent characteristics," writes the archbishop of Canterbury, to pacify Woolwich arsenal workers, who protested against some of the dean's remarks on education.

* * *

General

Mr. P. W. Wilson, American correspondent of the "Daily News," states that at least a million Americans will visit England this year. Members of the English-speaking Union in the United States are invited to give their friends who may be coming to England letters of introduction to the London headquarters of the E. S. U., Trafalgar Square.—A bill to enable clergymen to become members of parliament has been read a first time in the House of Commons.—Dr. J. D. Jones proposes that the Congregational Union should raise £500,000 for various denominational purposes. He has been promised £12,500.

ALBERT DAWSON.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Diseased Member *

PAUL'S figures are worthy of attention. Like Watkinson, the noted English preacher, he always employs new and striking illustrations. Now it is a race—you see the tiers of shouting spectators and the fleet Grecian runners. Now it is a prizefight, and the sturdy preacher will not be found pounding the air. (How Paul would have enjoyed seeing a World Series ball game!!) Now it is a complete outfit of armor—sword, shield, sandals and the rest. Paul was thoroughgoing and demanded a whole armor or none. Here the figure is physiological. It was a very crude science that Paul possessed. It would be hundreds of years before the circulation of the blood would be accepted by the medical fraternity, but Paul could see how the hand depended upon the eye, how the foot depended upon the hand, how the ear needed the eye and how all were interrelated. He saw how all needed to cooperate in order to secure the best results for the body. None could be exalted, none could be neglected.

Paul had a great time with that Corinthian church so recently carved from idolatry. Corinth—the New York of that day. Corinth—with its rushing commerce and its debasing sex-life. Corinth—with its money and its ambitions. We think we have church troubles today—but think of what Paul had to face in that early congregation! All that we ever had to deal with and more and in a rawer state. How he pleads, rebukes and strives to correct these faults. "Keep the unity," "Maintain cooperation," he urges.

But we cannot study all the interesting angles of this strong figure. Let us consider only the 26th verse, "And whether one member suffereth, all the members suffer with it." No doubt the primary idea here is that of sympathy. This is a beautiful conception—this weeping with those who weep and rejoicing with those that rejoice—but we cannot pause to develop that. It is equally true that the whole body suffers because of the disease of the single member—a cinder in the eye, a splinter in the finger being enough to absorb the attention of the whole organism and divert its activities.

It is a terrible thing to be a diseased member of a church. Are you that kind? Does your sin of any kind—your greed, pride or self-indulgence injure the whole organization? Many a church is thus weakened and made ineffective.

Some years ago one of our strongest churches prepared elaborately for an evangelistic meeting. Passing over professional evangelists, one of our noblest pastors was secured. A singer was found whose charming personality and sweet songs had been honored of God in the winning of souls elsewhere. For four weeks all worked terribly—all, did I say? No, not all—for there was in that church one sinner (let us use the correct term—"sinner") and he caused the meeting to fail. In vain the strong sermons, in vain the sweet songs, in vain the heroic efforts—the meeting failed miserably. Does it seem unfair? No—is not the body rendered powerless by a corrupt tooth or appendix? The pastor of that church, an old man full of grace and truth, told me that the failure was due to this sinner. I am not asking for church discipline, but I am imploring every member of a class or church to be healthy in soul and wholesome in spirit for the sake of the whole organization. Does any institution suffer because of you?

JOHN R. EWERS.

* May 15, "Working With Others." 1 Cor. 12:14-27.

Contributors To This Issue

ROBERT E. SPEER, President Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; Secretary Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

OBADIAH HOLMES, a pseudonym for a widely known Baptist minister.

Avoid Trouble

BY PLACING YOUR MONEY
with the UNITED CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY on the ANNUITY PLAN

You will:

AVOID LAW SUITS

Half the wills containing bequests to Christian work are subject to litigation.. They are either attacked in the courts or compromised to avoid litigation. Money placed on the annuity plan is safe beyond the possibility of litigation.

AVOID QUAR- RELS AMONG HEIRS

Heirs are often dissatisfied with the wills that provide bequests for religion, benevolent or educational work. They often quarrel with each other or the organization receiving the bequest. Bad feeling lasts.

AVOID LOSS

Litigation or compromise means loss. The hard-earned, economically-saved money intended for the blessing of humanity is consumed in lawyer's fees and court costs. The kingdom of Christ suffers loss.

GAIN

A safe investment.

A good income for life.

The satisfaction of administering on your own estate.

The joy of knowing that your life will continue to bless the world after you are gone.

Samples of our new annuity pamphlet,
"LIFE ANNUITY BONDS,"
and application blanks may be had free, for the asking. Write the ANNUITY DEPARTMENT

of the

UNITED CHRISTIAN
MISSIONARY SOCIETY

1501 Locust Street, ST. LOUIS

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Get the Correct Date in Mind!

Let no Christian Century reader be misled by an error which crept into a recent issue giving the date of the Disciples Congress at Springfield, Ill., as May 4-6. The correct date is May 9-12. Hotel headquarters for the gathering will be the Leland Hotel. First Christian Church is providing accommodations in homes of the city but for the most part the group that gathers in Springfield will be entertained at the hotel. The attraction of Springfield because of the mementoes of the life of Abraham Lincoln will add to the crowd which would naturally assemble to hear the congress papers. The Northern Illinois Ministerial Institute will hold a business meeting in connection with the congress sessions, but will not give a program this year on account of the presence of the congress in the state.

Boston Ministers Consider Japanese Problem

The Boston ministers at their meeting on April 4 considered the Japanese question. Dr. G. L. Cady spoke on "America and the Yellow Peril." He has recently been in Hawaii and California. He reported that no new Japanese are coming to California and that at present the Japanese number but two per cent of the total population. These are reclaiming waste lands until they own one twenty-fifth of the tilled land of the state. The Japanese, he argued, are just as necessary to the Californians as the colored people are to the southerners. According to Dr. Cady, "the causes of anti-Japanese agitation are first and foremost Hearst, then politics, race prejudice and economic competition."

Baptists Will Have a Cathedral in New York

Fifth Avenue Baptist Church of New York has been looking around for a new location before erecting a new building. They have secured the corner of Park Avenue and Sixty-fourth Street. On this location they will erect a building in Gothic architecture which will cost $1,500,000. The enterprise is interesting to the general public by reason of the fact that the Rockefellers worship here. When completed, the building will probably be the finest Baptist structure in the United States. The largest Baptist building in the country is that being planned for Dallas, Texas.

Great Hymn Writer Castigated

Rev. S. Baring-Gould is known wherever the English tongue is spoken as the author of the hymn, "Onward, Christian Soldiers." He has had a large and varied literary output. Belonging to the high church party, he has recently written a book called "The Evangelical Revival" in which he has severely handled all those of the evangelical school both inside and outside of the church. He expresses the conviction that there is no genuine sudden conversion, in spite of the stories of such widely different individuals as St. Paul and Cardinal Newman. The description of Charles Wesley will bring resentment in the evangelical camp, for he mentions Wesley's "long absences from home, with a swarm of women dancing to his pipe, pursuing him in admiring crowds, as the damsels pursued and hovered about his prototype Glycerius."

Boys Will Have a Week in Chicago

In the increasing list of special days in the churches, it is now proposed that we shall have a Boys' Sunday. The day set in Chicago is May 8, which this year is being observed in most churches as Mothers' Day. It is planned to have the boys attend the churches in groups. The pastors will be asked to take special notice of the boys on that day. On other days of Boys' Week the public schools and other community organizations will be asked to take special notice of the needs of boys. It is significant that Friday night of Boys' Week is the boy's night at home, and that each home should plan something of special interest for the boys.

Prominent Churchman Helps China Famine Fund

Mr. Sherwood Eddy has turned aside from many other urgent interests to give his attention to the promotion of the China Famine Fund. He spoke at Orchestra Hall in Chicago on April 22, before a large gathering of Chicago people with the ministers on the platform. It is now believed that the five million Chinese who are yet unprovided for can be saved if energetic measures are taken. The plan of relief is a China Life Saving Stamp which is affixed to the mail. This stamp is sold for three cents, and it is estimated that a stamp saves the life of a Chinaman for one day. Chicago church people have given to most of the famine fund but they are not lacking in zeal in furthering the cause of China relief.

Preacher and Professor Becomes Mayor

Prof. E. R. Cockrell, for many years an instructor in Texas Christian University, a Disciples institution, was recently elected mayor of Ft. Worth. The issue on which he went in was reform, and it is interesting to note that he carried the city almost two to one over his opponent, the former incumbent in the office. The old tradition of American politics that a preacher or a teacher has but little chance has been sadly shattered by events in various parts of the country this year.

Y. W. C. A. Makes Big Development

The past year has been the greatest one in the service of the Y. W. C. A. in Chicago. Under the new organization, the local association is once more in fellowship with the national organization. This has brought efficiency and progress. The record shows that 33,464 girls were served in 1920, an increase of 30,274 over the record for 1918. Temporary housing is provided for girls, and of these there were 11,391. Educational work is being promoted, and 2,761 girls were enrolled in the various classes that were conducted. Religious education is not neglected and over a thousand girls were reached with Bible study classes. The summer camp work is also a feature, and 2,387 girls were given an opportunity of a pleasant summer outing.

Travelers' Church in New York

A unique church in New York is that known as Travelers' Church. It is a Methodist institution run on a broad plan with a large program of social service. The church is located near the downtown hotels and it has a considerable program of social work. Scores of run-away girls are restored to their parents. A Girls' House provides refuge for those who do not wish to return to their homes. A School of Religion meets every day in the week and gives moral and religious instruction to the children of travelers. The church has a large number of associate members scattered over the world. These pay five dollars a year or more to the work, and agree to visit the church when they are in New York. By this device the financing of a church in a down-town section has been solved.

Chicago Ministers Consider Motion Pictures

The Disciples Ministerial Association on April 25 listened to an address by Prof. E. W. Burgess on "The Sociology of the Motion Picture." The professor is connected with the Chicago Church Federation Commission which is investigating the matter of the movie houses. Students have been used to gather data, and the address was a presentation of a variety of cases indicating that the films now being produced have a most unwholesome effect on the young people of Chicago. A number of Chicago churches are now using motion pictures in their work, securing film which has educational and religious value for their young people.

Rights for Spanish Protestants

While Roman Catholics in this country assert proudly that this is a land of religious toleration and freedom, no such boast can be made in Spain. There the law prohibits the display of the cross or any other religious symbol in front of a place of worship that is not Roman Catholic. The doors of the meeting house must be closed. There is a provision in the Spanish constitution which states "no other ceremonies nor manifestations in public except those of the religion of the state will be permitted." In 1906 there was a diplomatic investigation of the rights of Protestants in Spain which brought about some betterment of conditions. Rev. John Lee of the Methodist Episcopal church is asking President Harding to have a similar investigation made at this time. There are liberals in Spain who are in favor of religious liberty in their country. These assert that outside pressure is the force which will most surely bring the matter to a focus. It has been through the friendly offices of the American government that the South American republics of Peru, Ecuador and Bolivia have abated their opposition to Protestant religious work. A word from the Vatican would be enough in these countries to guarantee to every man his right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. But religious liberty has not come that way in the past. It is to the American republic that the eyes of the oppressed turn for relief.

Vicious Bills in Illinois Legislature

With the victory of last autumn, the political leaders of Illinois feel a large measure of irresponsibility in relation to the moral elements of the state, for their majority was overwhelming and not all of it will be needed next time. As a result bills are in the legislature with a fair chance of passing which would make the state the most backward in the nation. Gambling at race tracks would be permitted by one bill. This would allow the use of a parimutuel machine in an enclosure where minors might not enter. The prizefight bill is sufficiently liberal to guarantee that henceforth the national milling contests would be held within the state of Illinois. The National Reform Association is busy already, and under the leadership of this organization the churches of Illinois will offer vigorous opposition to the breaking down of moral standards in Illinois.

Disciples Have Home for Girls at University

The Illinois Disciples Foundation is an organization committed to service at the state university at Urbana. A home for girls is maintained, and the past year seventeen girls have been under the care of a house mother. Large numbers of teachers take special courses at Champaign during the summer, and the house will be kept open during the coming summer for the accommodation of these teachers.

School of Religion Gets a Field Man

The Indiana School of Religion, a Disciples foundation adjacent to the state university at Bloomington, has purchased considerable land, but has not yet erected any building for its work. In recent years the promotional work has been carried on by Prof. Joseph C. Todd in connection with his instructional work. Recently the board called Rev. E. L. Day of Marion, Ind., as the promotional secretary. He will have an office in Indianapolis.

Disciples Will Observe Pentecost Day

Pentecost falls this year upon May 15. It is the day chosen by the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity for the teaching of the duty of Christian unity. A call is issued for a prayer-meeting to be held in the afternoon of that day. In these union gatherings, Christians would voice their petitions for the closer fellowship of Christ's followers. The use of Pentecost as a day in which to emphasize Christian unity has been approved by the American Council on the Organic Union of Evangelical Churches. The Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, with headquarters in Baltimore, is sending out large quantities of Christian unity literature.

Getting Ready for National Convention

First Christian Church of Warsaw, Ind., will be host to the international convention of the Disciples of Christ this year, which will meet nearby at Winona

Lake. In preparation for the national convention the church has rebuilt its house of worship and this was dedicated on May 1. Outside speakers were invited to grace the occasion, among these being Rev. C. W. Cauble, state secretary, and Rev. Z. T. Sweeney of Columbus, Ind.

Employment of Students at Home Mission Tasks

The Home Missions Council realizes the potential energy of the Christian students of the nation in the summer time. It is making suggestions to these students about summer religious work. Vacation Bible schools in various parts of the country are calling loudly for teachers.

How Men Live in the Logging Country

RELIGIOUS workers connected with the Interchurch World Movement made a survey of the logging camps of the northwest and this information is now accessible to the general public. The facts about the physical environment of the men help to explain, in considerable measure, the radicalism that is alleged to have developed among them.

In the summer time many of the camps have had no adequate facilities for keeping the flies away from the food. The toilets and sleeping quarters are disgustingly filthy. The result is that men are either mentally unhappy or else are physically sick. Many of these workers, indeed the far larger percentage of them, are immigrants little acquainted with America and their impressions of this country is warped and distorted by their sufferings.

Not only is the physical environment bad, but the mental environment is equally bad. Previous to the coming of national prohibition the use of liquors, with the consequent fights and periods of idleness, were marked characteristics of the camp. Since prohibition has come, the conditions in this regard are very greatly improved. Few of the camps have any magazines or other decent reading matter. In most of the camps the light is given by smoky kerosine lamps hung at the top of the bunks so that reading in the evening is impossible. This means that men who might normally show some interest in politics and world affairs occupy their time telling filthy stories. The mental degradation of this situation is appalling.

It is scarcely to be wondered at that in such a soil the I. W. W. agitator finds a fertile field. These agitators are opposed in their efforts by the workers of the Lumbermen's union. This organization is not working together with the I. W. W., though the I. W. W. will cooperate with any organization which for the moment is engaged in controversy. In view of I. W. W. activities, with its program of syndicalism, it is not to be wondered that the bosses become suspicious of all forms of organization. Had they been more intelligent, however, they would have readily seen that they had prepared just the soil for radicalism with their inadequate provision for the mental and physical welfare of the men.

So far as religious life for these men is concerned, there has been practically none. The territory in Washington state is one that has been assigned to the Presbyterians and for a long time the local presbytery was left to wrestle with the situation without outside aid. Ministers had all they could do in caring for the normal needs of people in the towns. They also felt the difficulty of reaching the men of the lumber camps, for only the specialized religious workers could hope to do this successfully. They were further intimidated by some of the bosses, who asserted that no religious workers came to the camps except "ranters," and these did more harm than good.

The constructive program of religious service for these men is provided in the Interchurch report. Two men who will specialize in work among lumbermen in Washington state should be located at Scotia and at Eureka. These should be equipped with stereopticons so they may have some approach to the men. Each of these two religious workers would have two thousand men to care for, and scattered as these are, there would be plenty to do.

Some of the very methods employed by the I. W. W. propagandists may be employed as well in behalf of Christian propaganda. The I. W. W. had the policy of boring from within. In these lumber camps are many men who were once Christian and still have enough loyalty to be counted on in any definite Christian movement. Once the workers have their own stalwart advocates of the Christian principle, the battle is half won.

The report of the Interchurch recognizes frankly that there is a work for the bosses as well as a work for the men. Christian leaders can countenance no incipient feudalism in the labor situation. The gospel makes all men brothers. The bosses must be converted to a humane view of labor and brotherly attitude toward the men whose labor they direct. Of course there are already men in the group of bosses who have a fair attitude. These need only to be strengthened in their conviction to constitute a great leaven in their social group. It is by such means that Christ is to be brought to the lumber camps.

In many isolated rural sections there is a demand for rural ministers. Some societies are employing colporteurs who will travel with horse or automobile to distribute Christian literature, conversing with people on religious subjects on the way. Some men will be sent to the lumber camps. These will need to be the red-blooded kind. A few of the boards will place men in factories as common laborers in order to learn of the industrial conditions, and to exert a Christian influence among the employees. The labor spy has been exposed. This Christian propaganda will learn something, however, from the operations of the labor spy and use it for the benefit of workmen and bosses. Young women will be sent into the berry picking camps to exert a good influence among these workers. Naturally the appointments are made by the denominational missionary societies, and each young person will be directed to apply to his or her own society for appointment to Christian service.

Ohio Federation Holding County Conferences

The making of surveys is a favorite occupation for Ohio religious workers. These surveys have already brought light to the study of the rural problem in various sections of the country, for other states are beginning to make surveys as well. During the months of April and May surveys will be made in fifty counties of Ohio. In some of the counties local federations are being set up. The county conferences are not devoted to set addresses, but are bent upon securing information that may be used in the formulation of a religious program. The Ohio Federation of Churches is publishing the reports of the various county surveys in pamphlet form.

Presbyterians Lose Missionary Leader

Dr. A. Woodruff Halsey, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, has passed away. He was 68 years of age at the time of his death. He graduated at Princeton in 1879 in the same class with Woodrow Wilson, and was president of the class. He became a secretary of his mission board in 1899 and has ever since then been an useful executive in the detail work, as well as a popular expounder of the cause of foreign missions.

Church Issues a Bulletin on Sunday Observance

The inroads being made on the Christian rest day has led the Presbyterian church at Chevy Chase, Md., to issue a pamphlet on the Lord's Day. In this pamphlet the great scriptures on the subject of the Lord's Day are printed, and there is a page of preachment on the observance of the Lord's Day under modern conditions. Certain commercialized invasions of the day are opposed. These include: Sunday picture shows and Sunday theaters; almost all Sunday traffic and travel; the Sunday newspapers; Sunday merchandising, including real estate; Sunday professional games. The householder also comes in for a rap. Sunday gardening and Sunday house repairing are opposed by the church. The influence of a Christian Sunday on the growing children of the community is urged as one motive for a better observance of the day of worship. The church is inviting suggestions for the amendment of its statement, particularly with reference to forbidden uses of the day. Meanwhile the Truth Seeker Company, with offices in New York, is flooding the country with a circular in which great literary men and clergymen are quoted as being opposed to any regulation of Sunday by law. Cardinal Gibbons is quoted thus: "Read the Bible from Genesis to Revelation and you will not find a single line authorizing the sanctification of Sunday as Sabbath."

Schism in Sunday School Ranks Is Healed

The forces of religious education have had a serious schism in recent years. The International Sunday School Association has had the very broadest kind of cooperation. Unitarians and Universalists as well as other liberal organizations were included with the evangelicals. Partly as a protest against this liberality, the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations was organized. It had for its chief supporters the Sunday school workers employed by the various religious denominations. The result was that the denominational workers and the undenominational workers were in many territories real competitors. At last the schism has been healed and the denominational and undenominational workers will operate with a single plan of action. They hope to reach the 26,000,000 children of the United States who are not now receiving religious instruction. A fund of $150,000 will be sought with which to carry on aggressive work in new territory. Rev. Robert M. Hopkins has been elected as the chairman of the board which will direct the operations.

President Faunce Replies to Chinese Students

The Chinese students at the University of Chicago who sent a questionnaire to 1000 American churchmen inquiring as to their religious faith, received from President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University the following reply: "My idea of God is an idea, and not an image. He cannot be painted or carved, since God is spirit and not body. He is like our human spirits—invisible to eyes of flesh, but conscious and personal. God must be like the highest we know—which is personality. If he is not like wood or stone, so he is not like blind unconscious energy. He is like the purest spirits we have ever known, 'like as a father,' like the saints and heroes of history, only infinitely beyond and above them. They are fragments of personality; He is the one fully realized person. His infinite spirit pervading all time and space, sleeps in matter, wakes in mind, and reveals itself supremely in Jesus of Nazareth.

"In such a God I believe, because without him nothing can be explained. Unless behind the stars there is intelligence, it is useless for intelligent men to study them. But the deeper we go into nature, the more clearly we perceive intelligence, adaptation, wisdom. And the more deeply we study the souls of men or our own souls, the more clearly we perceive the image and superscription of God. To live deeply is to have experience of God.

"I believe in such a God, because otherwise I could not believe in anything but should be an absolute skeptic. If I did not believe in God I could not believe in any permanent laws of nature or any abiding virtue in men. It is either God or chance and chaos; either a spirit at the heart of the universe, or no spirit anywhere, no duty, no truth, no law, no life. Since God explains all things, he, himself, cannot be explained. He can only be worshipped, trusted, used each day by his children."

Fixed Date for Easter Seems Probability

The present method of fixing the date of Easter was the result of compromise after a long period of controversy. There is a strong movement in England at the present time to go back to the older practice of fixed date for Easter. It is said that both Catholic and Anglican scholars have reached essential agreement that the second Sunday in April shall be the day, and that the change will take place in 1922. It is expected that the British Parliament will act and fix the date for the Anglican church, while the Pope will make a decree for the Catholic world. It is thought likely that the other communions would follow the lead of the older historic bodies. Should this change take place, the Easter just past would be the last one held under the old order. The date of Easter affects a number of other church anniversaries of the Christian year such as Ash Wednesday, Whitsunday and Ascension.

Ancient Whitby Abbey Will Be Restored

The British government now hes under way the task of restoring the famous Whitby Abbey. It is one of the oldest religious structures to be found in England. The existing ruins comprise parts of the choir, early English architecture, the north transept, early English of a later date, and the rich decorated nave. Expert workmen will be employed at the task of restoration and it is estimated that five or six years will be required to finish the work. The abbey was founded by Oswy, king of Northumbria, in 638, in fulfillment of a vow of victory over Penda, king of Mercia, according to the traditional account. At first the building housed both monks and nuns of the Benedictine order.

Institute of World Christianity

On six Monday evenings the world situation of Christianity is being presented at the University of Chicago, running from April 4 to May 9. Mission needs in India, Japan, China, Africa, the Near East and Latin America are being presented. Illustrated lectures will set forth the facts with regard to the different fields. The lectures will be given by eminent experts in each of the fields. The University of Chicago is one of the great centers of missionary instruction of the entire country, large numbers of returned missionaries attending this university every year.

There is also a large group of student-volunteers. The university has under consideration the plan of opening a distinct school for the instruction of those who will go to the mission field.

Finds Parallels in Ancient Religious Situation

Prof. Paul Shorey, head of the department of Greek of the University of Chicago, recently gave the McNair lectures at the University of North Carolina, taking as his subject "Plato's Relation to the Religious Problem." The three lectures delivered on this theme all had an interesting modern slant. A materialistic interpretation of nature was offered the world in Plato's day, and was rejected by the great philosopher. Instead he adopted a religion which dealt with ethics and the inner life. The three lectures were entitled respectively "Plato and the Irreligion of Pseudo-Science," "Plato and Natural Theology" and "Plato and Ethical Religion."

Methodist Church Puts in a Baptistry

Although the Methodist ritual of baptism provides that the minister shall ascertain the preference of the candidate for baptism and administer the ordinance in the way the candidate prefers, there are very few Methodist churches where the conveniences permit immersion. The Methodist church at Normal, Ill., has recently constructed a font in the basement of the church for the convenience of an increasing number of converts who insist that baptism involves a burial in water. Had this been the common practice of Methodist churches, it would have had an interesting effect upon the growth of those denominations which practice immersion exclusively.

New Dean Visits the Colleges

Dean W. E. Garrison, who was recently installed at the head of the Disciples Divinity House of the University of Chicago, is beginning his career by seeking to become acquainted with his constituency. He has visited four Disciples colleges in the middle west already and come in contact with the Disciples ministerial students in three institutions.

Presbyterians Will Consider New Era Movement

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church will meet at Winona Lake, Ind., May 19-27. Among the many topics which will engage the attention of the assembled presbyters will be the question of the future of the New Era Movement. There is considerable demand that this piece of machinery for accomplishing cooperation among the various cooperative organizations be changed in name and modified in its program. The premillennialists also threaten to make things lively. They come over from the Pacific coast strong in numbers and divisive in spirit. They are led by former Moderator Mark Mathews of Seattle, pastor of the largest Presbyterian church on the continent. This is the minister who is reported to have modestly confessed that his church would be quite able to care for the religious needs of Seattle without the aid of any other church. Among Presbyterians there is too much light and education for the obscurantist forces to hope to win.

Unitarian Newspaper One Hundred Years Old

The Christian Register is the organ of the Unitarian denomination. It is not the oldest religious newspaper in the United States, but is nearly so. At a meeting of the Unitarian ministers of Boston recently the history of the journal and its influence upon the denomination was traced. Few denominations have ever had a more persistent faith in the value of printer's ink than the Unitarian. The result is that their doctrine is understood throughout the length and the breadth of the land, while some much larger denominations that have depended chiefly upon the spoken word are not yet understood by their public.

Unitarians Plan Extensions in the Southland

There is a considerable rebirth of missionary activity among the Unitarians as a result of the raising of their national fund. Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, president of the American Unitarian Association, has been making a tour in the south, seeking places where new Unitarian churches should be planted. There are but three churches of this faith and order in Texas, and it is planned that three more cities shall be entered in the near future. The cities he suggests are Ft. Worth, Austin and Beaumont.

Ministers Use the Publicity Weapon

Violations of the Volstead Act are going on in various parts of the country. What part the church shall take in law enforcement is a problem that admits of more than one solution. Evidence gathered and brought into court will not be properly used by the prosecution unless there is an aroused public opinion. In Watertown, New York, the ministers tried without success to get the police to act, but were not able. They secured detectives, who collected evidence on every saloon in town. Instead of giving this evidence to the courts, the ministers gave it to the newspapers. In the public indignation that followed, the officers of the law were compelled to take action and the result is that there is now a new respect for law in Watertown.

New Date for the End of the World

The end of the world has been heralded at different intervals all through the history of Christianity for the chiliastic interest is of pre-Christian origin. In recent times, there has been an unusual number of prophets who gave themselves the task of warning a waiting world of its early destruction. The latest of these prophets is Wilbur Glenn Voliva, successor of Dr. Dowie at Zion City, Ill. He sets the date at 1923. Of course if nothing happens in that year, an error can easily be found in the figures which will move the date up a bit. Meanwhile an Evanston, Ill., pastor is offering to become a trustee for all pre-millennialists. Since the latter do not expect to need their property for long, the minister suggests that all premillennialists hand over what they have to him. He has not up to the present time been greatly enriched by this offer. End of the world prophecies are also made by the Millennial Dawnists and the Seventh Day Adventists.

Cable Ireland About Irish Relief

In various parts of America there have been appeals for relief in Ireland. The fund has been called "non-political and non-religious." The American people have been led to believe that there was destitution and suffering in the Emerald Isle. The Protestant League has cabled to Belfast and inquired the facts. The reply is that the bank deposits in Ireland are the largest in the history of the country and that there is less suffering than common there, though there are always many poor, of course. These facts were reported to the Ministerial Union of

BARGAINS IN BOOKS

THE following named books are only slightly shelf-worn, and are here listed at from 25 to 50 per cent below their regular price. Add 6 cents on each book for postage.

At $1.00

The Awakening of Asia. Hyndman.
Christopher. Sir Oliver Lodge.
Historical Documents. Young.
Fairhope. Edgar DeWitt Jones.
Reconstructing the Church. Harper.

At 60 Cents

Every Morning. Cluett.
Day by Day With the Master. Cluett.
Elements of the Great War. Hilaire Belloc.
Christ, Lord of Battles. Haushalter.
Onward to Christ. Edwin A. McAlpin.
The Protestant. Burris A. Jenkins.

At 40 Cents

The Witness of Jesus. Alexander Proctor.
Letters to a Soldier on Religion. Gardner.
Tender Pilgrims. Edgar D. Jones.
Progress. By E. S. Ames, Burris Jenkins and others.

Do not send money, as the books you wish may be sold when your order reaches us, as we have but from one to five copies of each title on our shelves.. Order on a post card what books you desire.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

Pittsburgh on April 4 and given to the public press. The British government offers to relieve any case of distress that is authenticated, and the people of Ireland assert that they themselves can care for their own poor. The implication is that the "American Committee for Relief in Ireland" is more interested in international politics than in philanthropy.

Church Operates a Jitney Line

The movement to make the Sunday schools more accessible to the children is spreading to various parts of the country. Plymouth Congregational church at Sherrill, N. Y., has arranged with a local jitney company to haul children from the remote sections of the city to their Sunday school. No fares will be collected, but any child is privileged to add the price of the fare to the Sunday school offering. At Evanston, Ill., the Disciples church is providing a number of automobiles to gather up children before Sunday school, and deliver them at home again after Sunday school. In every case these must be children whose parents do not own a car.

Baptists Appropriate $150,000 for Work at State University

The Francis Wayland Foundation has been established by the Baptists for religious work at the University of Ohio. This foundation brings into cooperation the national Baptist organization, the state convention and the Tenth Avenue Baptist church of Columbus. The Baptist New World Movement has appropriated $150,000 to the Foundation as a significant beginning in their work. The new Foundation has not yet announced what plans for religious work will be operated at the great state university.

Chicago Disciples' Club to Hear Dr. Ainslie, Dr. Garrison, Dr. Paul and Others

An event of much importance has been set by the Disciples' Club of Chicago for Monday evening, May 16, in the form of a dinner at the City Club. Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, Dr. W. E. Garrison, new Dean of the Disciples' Divinity House; Dr. H. O. Pritchard, Pres. Charles T. Paul and others will be speakers.

Summer Study for Religious Workers

An increasing number of ministers attend summer schools of theology. The University of Chicago pioneered in this field, being the first institution to offer the regular courses. This school was such a success that other summer schools of theology have been organized. Harvard University will have a summer school of theology the last three weeks in August this year. This school was largely attended last summer on account of the activities of the Unitarian Laymen's League in sending Unitarian ministers to the school.

United After Seventy-five Years

Seventy-five years ago a Methodist church was organized in Guilford, Conn.

Previous to that there had been the historic Congregational church. Later the number of sects operating in this town of three thousand souls came to be seven. These disappeared one by one until only two were left. The federation of the two churches brings the town back where it started originally, with a single institution of religion. This history is being duplicated in a number of cities and seems to be a symbol of the thing that will eventually come to pass throughout the nation. That sectarianism has about run its course is evidenced by this as by countless other current facts.

Heads Church Organizations' Get-Together

An interesting and unique meeting of the heads of various Protestant organizations of America was assembled at the

MAKE YOUR CHURCH DEVOTIONAL

by putting into your homes the most beautiful book of personal devotion and family worship ever published—

"The Daily Altar"

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

FOR each day of the year a theme, meditation, Scripture, poem and prayer. 400 pages. In two editions: Gift edition, full leather, $2.50. Popular edition, purple cloth, $1.50 (Add 8 cents postage). The beautiful purple cloth edition may be had at $1 per copy in lots of 50. Write for full list of discounts.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

"Now here is a book for that Pastor of yours"

"Of course he doesn't need it; if he did you wouldn't dare to show it to him. It is called 'Wanted—A Congregation,' and its author is Lloyd C. Douglas. It is part fiction and part pastoral theology, but it is all wonderfully good. Not even the night watchman could go to sleep over it; and while your pastor, as I said, doesn't need it, he knows some pastor who does, and will know just how to get it to him without hurting his feelings. One big thing about this book is that it makes a distinction between a congregation and an audience. Any one of a dozen recipes can be written for getting an audience; it is a matter of tricks or of special aptitudes. But every preacher, no matter what his limitations as a performer, must get a congregation or get out of the ministry."

This is what The Epworth Herald says of Dr. Douglas' remarkable book, "Wanted—A Congregation." Buy a copy for your pastor—or for yourself.

Price, $1.75 plus 10 cents postage

The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

offices of the Federal Council in New York recently. These came together to discuss the keynote to be sounded in the great church gatherings of the coming year. Dr. Robert E. Speer presided over the meeting. The need of better educational work and a more effective evangelism were among the interests stressed. The social and international problems were discussed and the attitude of the church toward these defined. Among those present were: President Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin, Ohio, Moderator of the National Council of Congregational Churches; Mr. E. L. Tustin, of Philadelphia, President of the Northern Baptist Convention; Bishop Eugene R. Hendrix, of Kansas City, Senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church, south; Rev. Frederick H. Knubel, of New York, President of the United Lutheran church; President George W. Richards, of Lancaster, Pa., Moderator of the General Synod of the Reformed church in the United States; Rev. David J. Burrell, of New York, Moderator of the General Synod of the Reformed church in America; Rev. George A. Miller, of Washington, D. C., President of the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ; President J. Ross Stevenson, of Princeton, N. J., and Rev. John A. Marquis, of New York, both former moderators of the Presbyterian church in the U. S. A.; Bishop William M. Bell, of Harrisburg, Pa., of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ; and Rev. F. G. Coffin, of Albany, Mo., President of the American Christian Convention.

Busy Minister Does Not Pity Himself

While a good many ministers are conscious of their hardships, Rev. John Gordon, pastor of Second Congregational church, of Rockford, Ill., has quite a different feeling about the whole matter. The log-book of this man constitutes a challenge to every minister who reads it. He says: "I get up early and write a sermonette for the daily paper; then I turn to study and give the forenoon to hard work. Sometimes we hear it said that good sermons are thrown away on poor listeners, but I know that good listening is sometimes thrown away on poor sermons. To be a minister today means a constant mental output; to have a fresh message every Sunday calls for constant study during the week. But what a thrill there is in a new vital message! In the afternoon comes pastoral work. Every minister ought to make ten calls a day for five days a week, that he may know the people of his church; and above all know the children. Then there is an afternoon a week visiting the hospitals, dropping a word of cheer, and offering a brief prayer; there are the city activities and the community work; there are funerals, baptisms, committee meetings—all this keeps a man active for fifteen hours a day. But the joy, satisfaction and thrill of it all! No man gets more out of life than the minister who is consecrated to his work. Many of the seeming difficulties are wings instead of weights."

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

Any book now in print can be secured through The Christian Century Press. Give publisher if possible.

SWORD OF THE SPIRIT

Which is the Word of God
Complete Help to Personal Work. Convincing Scripture Answers to Excuses. Quick Reference Index. Aid in leading others to Salvation and Guide for the Christian Life. Most recent book on these subjects. Practical, Spiritual, Scriptural, vest pkt. size, 128 pgs., Cloth 25c, Morocco 35c, postp'd; stamps taken. Agts. wanted. GEO. W. NOBLE, Monon Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful.....	1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)
Green tea—1 glassful.....	2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)
Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz.....	.61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

Beware of Contagious Diseases

THOMAS INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE

SAVES 1/4 COST OF OTHER SERVICES

Clean and sanitary. Used by over 40,000 churches. Send for catalog and free trial offer. Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 495 Lima, O.

HYMNS FOR TODAY

A complete hymnal for both Sunday School and Church. New, beautiful hymns on all the vital subjects that leading religious thinkers are advocating today, with Orders of Services for S. S. departments and church, and Services for Anniversaries.

The use of Hymns for Today will educate both youth and adult in the essentials of the Kingdom of God. Price, $75 per 100. Returnable sample sent. Orchestrated.

FILLMORE MUSIC HOUSE,
516 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

"Life of Christ," and other films for Sunday showing.

The Church Film Exchange
Crawford, Neb.

Peake's Commentary on the Bible

An Entirely New Commentary in One Volume

Just published and received with extraordinary enthusiasm as an epoch-making work of marvellous value and indispensable to all intelligent lovers of the Bible, whether lay or clerical.

Edited by ARTHUR S. PEAKE, M.A., D.D.

Rylands Professor of Biblical Exegesis in the University of Manchester.

With the assistance for the New Testament of
A. J. GRIEVE, M.A., D.D.

Principal of Congregational Hall, Edinburgh.
Introduction by

MELANCTHON WOOLSEY STRYKER, D.D., LL.D.

Formerly President of Hamilton College, author of
"English Bible Versions and Origins," etc.

A STAFF OF SIXTY-ONE CONTRIBUTORS

Numerous Special Supplemental Articles.

The Latest Scholarship. Over 1,000 Double-column Pages with Maps, Full Index, Bibliographies, Etc.

"The best work of its kind."—PROFESSOR SANDAY.

"Such a book as this has long been wanted."—Times Literary Supplement

"The very best handy Commentary published."—Methodist Times.

Price $4.00, plus 20 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

FAITH-BUILDING BOOKS

Belief and Life

By Principal W. R. Selbie

Price $1.25

Modern Belief in Immortality

By Newman Smyth

Price 75 Cents

Through Science to Faith

By Newman Smyth

Price $1.75

Belief in God

By Jacob Gould Schurman

Price $1.50

The Christian Hope

By William Adams Brown

Price $1.75

The Religion of a Layman

By Charles R. Brown

Price $1.25

Add 10 cents per book for postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Suggestions for Commencement Gifts

The Daily Altar.

By Willett and Morrison. Full leather, $2.50; purple cloth, $1.50. Add 8 cents postage.

Touchstones of Success.

By Francis E. Clark, Bishop Quayle, Cyrus H. K. Curtis and a hundred other leading Americans. An excellent book for young men. $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

Nelson Bible, American Revised.

Genuine leather, morocco grain, divinity circuit, silk sewed, round corners, red under gold edges, title stamped on back in pure gold, India paper, only one inch thick. $6.00 plus 12 cents postage.

The Outline of History.

By H. G. Wells. The ideal gift for thoughtful young people. In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

HASTINGS' ONE-VOLUME Dictionary of the Bible

Clear, concise, popular and yet scholarly. The skill of its able and experienced editor, Dr. Hastings, is in evidence at every point. Unimportant subjects are treated briefly, making it possible to devote more space to vital themes. Among its contributors are found 100 of the leading Biblical scholars in England and America and each gives the results of his own special knowledge and research. The articles on the different books of the Bible are especially valuable. The point of view is that of progressive, modern Biblical scholarship. Extreme theories are avoided. In general, the conclusions which are destined to be the basis of present-day preaching and teaching, are fairly and convincingly set forth. The historical, geographical, and archæological data are also classified and presented with rare skill and effectiveness. effectiveness.

OVER 1000 PAGES. BOUND IN CLOTH.

Price $7.00 plus 25 cents postage

Special India Paper Edition, $8.00.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Everyday Life Books

Inspirational, Devotional Books by Writers of Spiritual Vision

Over a half million "Everyday Life" books have been sold. The little volumes are put up in a compact, handy, pocket edition, printed on thin paper, bound in art leather.

THE MANHOOD OF THE MASTER

By H. E. Fosdick

THE MEANING OF PRAYER

By H. E. Fosdick

PSALMS OF THE SOCIAL LIFE

By Cleland B. McAfee

This book shows how the Psalms grew out of the actual lives of men who were vividly conscious both of God and the social group.

THE MANY SIDED DAVID

By Philip E. Howard

A new and sympathetic interpretation of the character of David, which brings the real man vividly before the reader. The treatment is full of challenge to truly Christian living.

A LIVING BOOK IN A LIVING AGE

By Lynn Harold Hough

The theme is built around the living power of the Bible. The book carries the conviction that this living power is as strong now as ever and as sure in its revitalizing influence.

PAUL IN EVERYDAY LIFE

By John Douglas Adam

A stimulating use of Paul's intense experiences and forceful teaching to make possible a closer application of Christian standards to personal problems.

UNDER THE HIGHEST LEADERSHIP

By John Douglas Adam

A book that deals with realities, in presenting what living under the leadership of Christ may mean.

BUILDING ON ROCK

By Henry Kingman

A book meeting the demand for reality in religion by indicating what Jesus showed to be essential to a life built on eternal foundations.

CHRIST IN EVERYDAY LIFE

By E. I. Bosworth

The words of the Master made luminous by comment and helpful quotations in prose and poetry.

THE CHRISTIAN ACCORDING TO PAUL

By John T. Faris

A virile study of the elements, from Paul's viewpoint, which enter into the complete Christian life, with an extraordinary amount of rich illustrative material.

MEETING THE MASTER

By Ozora S. Davis

Our Lord's conversations with individuals studied to bring out the essential traits of His character, and the effect upon the lives of those who talked with Him.

HOW GOD MADE MEN

By Frederick Harris

The careers of outstanding Bible characters are studied, to obtain light upon the supremely important question of individual life work. Of special interest to young people.

Each $1.15, plus 6 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

reviewing Kirby Page's new book, just published by the Christian Century Press,

The SWORD or The CROSS

says:

"Six years ago," writes Kirby Page, the author of the book, "it was generally believed that the church was opposed to war. It was—in theory. It remained so until crowned heads and other rulers made declarations and mobilized their fighting men. Then the church did what it has consistently done for a thousand years—it flung itself unreservedly into the struggle. Can it be that the church has been wrong in holding this attitude toward war?" The author is almost inclined to answer in the negative. But although war, at the moment of its inception, may be said to be favored by the majority, the still more searching question arises whether the majority is infallible. Majorities, including the church and the government, have opposed and persecuted many of the world's greatest benefactors—men who brought new light to bear on science, men eminent in religion, in the great movements for human freedom, as well as in needed reforms and in many other lines of world progress. Every student of history knows it; surely the majority is not infallible!

What might have been the history of the last twenty centuries if the church had consistently opposed war? The writer of this book reminds us again of the teachings of Jesus, many of them still but dimly comprehended or even wholly misunderstood. The "sword," of which he spoke in Matt. 10:34 and Luke 22:36, was to mark the line of division between right and wrong, to make a cleavage, not in the bodies of men, but in the ancient philosophies and age-old customs, and especially in the interpretation of religion. His teachings to his followers, his rejection of the tempter's lure of worldly greatness and power, his new standard of love and kindness, of forgiveness, of brotherhood, were all against war and bloodshed. His kingdom was not one of power and possessions and mighty armies and wars. It is, as clearly as his words could express it, a kingdom in the hearts of men who place love and faith and kindness and mercy above all the prizes of the world, with its fightings and conquests. This was the meaning accepted in the early church. Has the modern church wholly forgotten the glorious vision?

We commend this little volume. It is timely and inspirational.

Price of the book, $1.20, plus 8c postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The Outline of History

By H. G. WELLS

A SURVEY OF THE 41 CHAPTERS

The World's Dawn.

The world was old long before the coming of man, those immeasurable ages of life's first faint stirrings of which most of us know so little and are unable to learn much from professorial monographs. The "Outline" gives this marvellously interesting story in language which brings before the mind's eye a thoroughly understandable realization of those ages through which mass and matter passed, up to the crude beginnings of living creation, and thence to the giant reptiles and animals—a brilliantly told story, covering millions of years and culminating in the advent of man.

Man's Advent.

The dim mystery of man's origin is wisely dealt with. Sources are examined—the Bible, Evolution, and so on, in the light of actual discoveries of the Neanderthalic and other ages, and so is composed a picture of earliest human life and origins, which is full of enlightenment on the question. After that picture, the reader is shown mankind's victories and failures in the struggle for life against mammoths and monsters, his gradual rise from the primitive, the instinct of love and hate, the family idea, the earliest methods of protection and reasoning, the growth of intelligence. And so he emerges from savagery, he takes his first step along the path which leads to today.

Civilization's Cradle.

It is curious to picture an inarticulate world, yet it was so until man began to think; then came speech, which for long was the only means of record, a time of mythology and superstition out of which religion grew. The next steps in communication were signs, picture-language and writing, then art and culture. How, gradually over many centuries, all this came about in different parts of the world is told in the "Outline" and a marvellously fascinating story it is, of a world in civilization's cradle, still in the swaddling clothes of development.

History's Beginnings.

When mankind woke up to a realization of cause and effect, history began; sanguinary wars, brutal enslavings of nations, wholesale magnificent though crude conceptions. Thrilling pages these make in "Outline," wherein graphic portrayal is given of how these early races, some vanished, others surviving, made history, and in doing so wove the fabric of the world's polity, out of which evolved both the freedoms and oppressions of today.

In Anno Domini.

A right understanding of these years is necessary to the student of social and political questions, particularly in early Anno Domini when the world consciousness was keen and its conscience impressionable. It was the age of mind over matter, of noble chivalries struggling amid selfishness and greed, of Crusades and Magna Charta, the dawn of light and freedom. These two thousand years of progress are vividly outlined by Mr. Wells in words which get at the truth through the glamour and glitter and leave the reader in good view of the facts in accurate perspective.

What of Tomorrow?

After coming down to recent years, traversing the nineteenth century and revealing much about the Great War, the author takes the reader to the top of the high tower of his farsightedly practical imagination and shows him the world as it is to be if right and freedom are to sway and mankind is to gain good from the trials which have lately been tearing civilization. Without doubt such a coherent and common-sense plan of world co-operation as here depicted is an ideal worth the sacrifice of the War years, and if it is to come it will only be by united and unselfish action. Such a plan to study and work for is alone worth many times the cost of these volumes—invaluable as they are in other respects.

In two volumes: $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

Special terms to Christian Century readers, $5.00 down, balance 30 days.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

Miss Maude A. Royden

England's Outstanding Woman Preacher

By Joseph Fort Newton

The Denominational School

Should It Be Fostered By Christian People?

By Peter Ainslie

100 Religious Books

A list prepared by Charles Clayton Morrison, Herbert L. Willett, Joseph Fort Newton, Alva W. Taylor and Thomas Curtis Clark

THE CHURCH AND PREACHING

- Psychology and Preaching. C. S. Gardner. $2.50.
The Building of the Church. C. E. Jefferson. $1.50.
The Christian Ministry and Social Problems. Bishop Charles D. Williams. $1.25.
Can the Church Survive in the Changing Social Order? Albert Parker Fitch. 80 cts.
A Community Church. H. E. Jackson. $2.00.
Ambassadors of God. S. Parkes Cadman. $2.50.
Modern Theology and the Preaching of the Gospel. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
Wanted: A Congregation. Lloyd C. Douglas. $1.75.
Six Thousand Country Churches. Gill and Pinchot. $2.00.
The Little Town. Paul H. Douglass. $2.25.
The Course of Christian History. McGlothlin. $2.25.

THE BIBLE AND THE LIFE OF JESUS

- Popular Lectures on the Books of the New Testament. A. H. Strong. $1.50.
The Jesus of History. T. R. Glover. $1.25.
The Manhood of the Master. Fosdick. $1.15.
Our Bible. Herbert L. Willett. $1.50.
That One Face. Richard Roberts. $1.25.
Archæology and the Bible. George A. Barton. $3.00.
Christ in the Poetry of Today. Martha F. Crowe. $2.00.
Jesus—The Master Teacher. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
Jesus—Our Standard. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
New Testament in Modern Speech. Weymouth. $2.00.
Moffatt's New Testament. $1.50. (Pocket ed., $1.75.)
Jesus in the Experience of Men. T. R. Glover. $1.90.
The Proposal of Jesus. John H. Hutton. $2.00.
Epochs in the Life of Paul. A. T. Robertson. $1.50.
The Life of Paul. B. W. Robinson. $1.50.

SOCIAL

- Social Principles of Jesus. Walter Rauschenbusch. $1.15.
The Ethics of Jesus and Social Progress. Gardner. $1.50.
Christianizing the Social Order. Rauschenbusch. $2.00.
Christianity and the Social Crisis. Rauschenbusch. $2.25.
Democratic Christianity. Bishop McConnell. 80c.
Jesus Christ and the Social Question. F. G. Peabody. $1.75.
Psychology of Social Reconstruction. G. T. Patrick. $2.00.
The Great Society. Graham Wallas. $2.25.
The Social Problem. Charles A. Ellwood. $2.25.
The Church and Industrial Reconstruction. $2.00.
Labor and the Common Welfare. Samuel Gompers. $3.00.
Poverty the Challenge of the Church. Penman. $1.00.
Religion and Business. R. W. Babson. $1.50.
Fundamentals of Prosperity. R. W. Babson. $1.00.
The Sword or the Cross. Kirby Page. $1.20.
The Science of Power. Benjamin Kidd. $2.50.
The Gospel for a Working World. Harry F. Ward. $2.00.

MISSIONS

- The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War. $2.00.
Christianity the Final Religion. S. M. Zwemer. $1.25.
Modern Religious Movements in India. Farquhar. $2.75.
The Religions of the World. George A. Barton. $2.00.
Mary Slessor of Calabar. W. P. Livingstone. $2.00.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

- The Experience of God in Modern Life. Lyman. $1.50.
What and Where Is God? Richard L. Swain. $1.50.
Holy Spirit in Thought and Experience. T. Rees. $2.00.
The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation. Denney. $3.00.
The Christian Hope. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
Can We Believe in Immortality? J. H. Snowden. $1.50.
Immortality and the Future. H. R. Mackintosh. $1.50.
The Truth About Christian Science. Snowden. $2.50.
Originality of the Christian Message. Mackintosh. $1.75.
Basic Ideals in Religion. R. W. Micou. $2.50.
What Christianity Means to Me. Lyman Abbott. $1.75.
Outspoken Essays. Dean W. R. Inge. $2.25.
Public Opinion and Theology. Bishop McConnell. $1.50.
The Meaning of Baptism. Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.35.
Living Again. Charles R. Brown. $1.00.
The New Orthodoxy. Edward Scribner Ames. $1.50.

PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

- The Meaning of Prayer. Fosdick. $1.15.
The Meaning of Faith. H. E. Fosdick. $1.35.
The Meaning of Service. H. E. Fosdick. $1.25.
The Religion of a Layman. Charles R. Brown. $1.25.
Psychology of the Christian Soul. George Steven. $1.50.
The Psychology of Religion. J. H. Snowden. $2.00.
The Religious Consciousness. J. B. Pratt. $2.50.
Finding the Comrade God. Walter Fiske. $1.15.
Religion of a Mature Mind. George Albert Coe. $1.75.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

- Training the Devotional Life. L. H. Weigle. 75 cts.
Talks to Sunday School Teachers. L. H. Weigle. $1.50.
Social Principles of Education. G. F. Betts. $1.50.
The School in the Modern Church. H. F. Cope. $1.50.
How to Teach Religion. G. F. Betts. $1.25.

INSPIRATIONAL BOOKS

- The Daily Altar. Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.50. (Leather, $2.50.)
The Eternal Christ. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
The Ambassador. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
Things Eternal. John Kelman. $1.75.

THE NEW AGE

- New Mind for the New Age. Henry Churchill King. $1.50.
A Better World. Tyler Dennett. $1.50.
The Christian Faith and the New Day. McAfee. 90 cts.
Church Facing the Future. William Adams Brown. 80c.
The New Horizon in the Church and State. Faunce. 80c.
World Facts and America's Responsibility. Patton. $1.25.
The Gospel and the New World. Robert E. Speer. $2.00.
Some Aspects of International Christianity. Kelman. $1.00.
The Democratic Movement in Asia. Tyler Dennett. $1.90.
Is Christianity Practicable? William Adams Brown. $1.75.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature. Davis. $2.50.
Everybody's World. Sherwood Eddy. $1.90.
Princess Salome. Burris Jenkins. $2.00.
First. Henry Drummond. 50 cts.
The Strategy of Life. Arthur Porritt. $1.25.
Life of Theodore Roosevelt. W. R. Thayer. $1.00.

(Add 10 cents postage for each book)

The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, MAY 12, 1921

Number 19

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly

By the Disciples Publication Society

508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

How Do the Ministers Live?

THE editor of the World Call, that handsome missionary monthly which the Disciples missionary societies publish, is gathering statistics on the support of the ministry. The figures of the denominational year book show on their face that the great body of the ministry is resorting to other means of support to supplement that received from the churches. Otherwise there would be far more vacant pulpits than there are, for no family either of a workingman or of a minister can live on the average salary of the Disciples minister, or for that matter, on the average salary of the minister of any other evangelical denomination. How do they do it? What is the secret of the persistence of these men in gospel work against these heavy odds? A questionnaire has been sent out and the men are asked to return the blanks without signature. The envelope in which it is mailed will be destroyed. Thus the facts contained will be entirely anonymous. The ministers are asked to state the various sources of their incomes. This will indicate just how far the church is allowing the energy of her men to be diverted from religious work to the tasks of tent-cloth-making. The ministers are asked also to state the amount of their property holdings and the amount of their debts, school debts and other debts. When it is learned how many men after twenty years still owe the money they borrowed to go to college on, something of the hidden tragedy of the manse will be revealed. It is not stated what use will be made of the facts when they are gathered. They may be used to enlighten the leaders who are planning a campaign for church pensions. The most obvious use of the facts will be to start a campaign for more adequate support of the parish minister. The minister has to speak for every cause under the sun. Meanwhile no one speaks for him.

The missionary secretaries tell him he is the key man. Yet little is done to keep the key man alive. The problem of ministerial support is primary amidst the problems of the evangelization of the world, and if the Disciples or any other denomination can solve it in any reasonable degree the whole round of church interests will be forwarded immeasurably.

Still a Desperate Need in China

A VERY remarkable piece of relief work has been done in famine stricken China. The Chinese government has itself done more than ever before in the history of that hoary country. It has laid extra taxes, given free transportation and raised all the cash by loans its credit would permit. America has sent more than $5,000,000, of which amount the Red Cross sent $1,000,000 and the American Relief Committee about $3,000,000. It is now estimated that three dollars will save a life until the harvest. The American churches, as such, have sent a little under $1,000,000. This does not represent all they have done as many have sent their contributions through the relief committee instead of through their missionary organizations. A dollar sent by the Christian people through their missionary societies represents a good deal more than famine relief; it represents, in a visualized manner to those helped, the fact that American relief is emphatically Christian benevolence. That fact impressed upon the mind of China will do more to help the missionary cause than any other one single thing could do just now. The church does not take initiative in such things as this often enough. It is so busy looking after denominational missionary and benevolent enterprises that its leaders all too often fear the intrusion of emergency campaigns lest they disturb the regular inflow of funds for established work. It would be great gain to the church to be found always ahead in such philanthropies. It has the organizations already set up and working and could thus undertake the initiative better than others. Ninety per cent of all such funds are contributed by church folk, and Christianity should have full credit through its church organizations. There is still a population of 5,000,000 to be saved from starvation. The work is still in desperate need.

Chinese Minister Honored in America

MINISTER ALFRED S. SZE of China has been given the freedom of the three great cities in America, which makes him for the present one of the most popular foreign representatives in this country. In recent weeks he has abandoned his post at Washington, and gone to various large cities in this country where he has addressed thousands of people on the matter of China famine relief. The full approval of our own federal authorities has been given to the work of Minister Sze. In the course of his travels many dramatic incidents have occurred. Society ladies have given their jewels and the sympathy of the people has been expressed in many other striking events. In not a few cities the women of the churches have taken up the cause of selling famine relief stamps. Each three cent stamp is the equivalent of subsistence for a human being for a whole day. There are a few people callous enough to assert that they will not give anything to keep a Chinaman alive. This racial prejudice is backed up by every-day stinginess, and indicates how far we are yet from a universal consciousness of the brotherhood of man. America has given this year to many relief funds. This has been done in the face of war taxes and financial depression. While so many forces are operating to accentuate the war-passion and nationalism, these great relief funds have been an avenue of expression for the millions in America who would rather spend their money on bread for the starving than for bombing planes and battleships.

The Birthday of Florence Nightingale

HOSPITALS in America have properly made the birthday of Florence Nightingale the occasion of an annual campaign of publicity in behalf of their work. In many cities this year May 12 was the commencement day for hospital training schools. The public was invited into the hospitals and shown the equipment with which the sick are brought back to health again. Special effort has been made this year to interest high school graduates in the profession of nursing. The recruiting of the nursing profession has gone on only haltingly in recent years, and nearly every hospital finds itself in dire straits at the busy time of year for help. In Chicago the board of health has been compelled to recruit and train short course nurses who can go into the homes of those unable to pay the fees of the registered nurse. The modern hospital movement is largely the work of the church. In many large cities, the great majority of hospital accommodations are those which are provided by Christian charity. The personnel of the nursing force is also predominantly Christian. The care of the sick is peculiarly a Christian duty and it is Christian women who respond to this call of duty. The so-called "city hospital" often has its charity work almost entirely financed by the gifts of the churches. Though organized in a seemingly secular way, the work that is not on a purely business basis is that which is paid for by the gifts of the churches. One of the urgent tasks of Christian benevolence is to enlarge the institutions now operating, and to establish many new ones where they are greatly needed. Some denominations use their national organization of benevolence to carry on hospital work. Other organizations leave this task to local initiative. Here is a field, if there is any field, where interdenominational cooperation should result in a stronger Protestant work.

Forcing Opium on China

THE International Reform Bureau has been gathering information on the revival of the opium traffic in China and finds that the responsibility rests primarily upon Japan and Great Britain, but that our own country is not without guilt. It is a moral tragedy that after a great people have arisen to such moral heights as to banish the opium vice stronger nations should conspire to pull her down again. Above all it is a moral tragedy that the two foremost Christian nations in the world should be parties to the wrong. While we do not directly market the poisons in China, we do sell to the Japanese, who are the peddlers of the drug, taking advantage of their territorial rights and of their new aggressions in Shantung and Manchuria. In five months enough opium and morphine was shipped out of Seattle to give everyone of the 60,000,000 users in China a smoke a day for a week. For generations the Indian opium trade was fixed upon China. It was on account of it that the Opium War was fought more than three quarters of a century ago, England joining forces with the government to put down the rebellion. Hongkong has been the seat of traffic for generations and the Indian government has been the recipient of large taxes from the traffic carried on from there through Hongkong and the treaty ports of China. There is now before congress a bill known as the Jones-Miller bill that will, if passed into law, make it unlawful to export morphine, heroin or other derivatives of opium. The opium merchant undoes much that the missionary accomplishes. One of the valuable services the churches at home can render is to push this bill through congress.

The New Field Museum

ON Monday of last week there was opened to private inspection, upon invitation to a select list of citizens, the Field Museum of Natural History, the successor to the Field Columbian Museum of World's Fair fame. At the close of the exposition of 1893, Marshall Field was approached by a committee of interested men who thought that the remarkable collection of materials gathered for exhibit during the exposition ought not to be dispersed, but retained in a permanent collection, to be augmented from year to year. They proposed that one hundred thousand dollars be raised for the purpose, and asked Mr. Field to contribute one-tenth of the sum. He told them to come back in a week for his answer. When they met him next he made the offer of one million dollars for a really great museum on strictly modern lines, and with an adequate and accessible building. That was in 1893. Up to the time of his death Mr. Field's gifts to the enterprise amounted to a million and a half. His will provided four millions for a building, and an equal sum for maintenance endowment. This majestic plan is now realized, and the Field Museum is already the third in magnitude among the great museums of the world, being exceeded in size only by the British Museum founded in 1753, and the American Museum of Natural History, in New York. Already the collections of jewels, minerals, birds, animals, boats, pagodas, idols, totems, monuments, mummies, anthropological casts, costumes, botanical specimens, and endless other objects of interest, are valued at more than fifteen millions of dollars. For six years the beautiful marble building has been in process of construction, at the south end of Grant Park. It is just east of the Illinois Central station, which is soon to disappear to make room for the new union station of modern and companionable architectural design. Wonderful as are the collections, the structure in which they are housed is even more of a marvel. From this time on no visitor to Chicago should miss the chance to see the greatest assembly of natural science materials in the western hemisphere, and one of the three greatest museums in the world.

Vermont Amends the Sunday Law

THE amendment of the Sunday law of Vermont looks like the passing of the old time Christian Sunday. In reality it means moral progress in that state. The old law forbade all games on Sunday. In recent years games of baseball were publicly advertised for Sunday and admission charged. When the officials arrested the baseball players, the golf players were also arrested. No jury could be found to convict either group. The law was therefore nullified by the fact that the people refused to enforce it. The state legislature recognized that this condition was bad for the state. Respect for the law was broken down by having laws upon the statute book which could not be enforced. The new law provides that no games shall be played for which an admission is charged. When recreation becomes a business, it must submit to the law regulating all other forms of business. This kind of distinction seems at the present time about the only one that can gain support from the majority of the American people. Millions of our people have come from continental Europe. To them Sunday sports seem quite legitimate. Meanwhile the evangelical churches will do well to make a distinction between what may be enforced by law in the matter of Sunday observance and what should be left to the action of the individual conscience. To the churches it will not seem right to sacrifice the worship of God on Sunday either for gold or baseball. The Lord's day comes to us as an opportunity for spiritual growth and to use it for smaller purposes is to miss the best things in life. Let the law of the state protect workers from exploitation on Sunday, by closing business and industry, but the conscience of the individual may still have free play in the use of Sunday, recognizing always, on the other side, the equal right of Christian and ethical agencies to carry on a process of educating the public conscience to desire to make the best possible use of the day.

Religious Persecution In Russia

THE revolution in Russia is running true to form. Learning nothing from the French revolution of more than a hundred years ago, the revolutionary leaders are once more persecuting the church. The free sects that have never been connected with the czarist regime complain that under the soviet government they have even less liberty than under the czar, and many of these Christians went to Siberia for Christ's sake during the reign of Nicholas. The leaders of the most religious country in all Christendom are trying to abolish religion and establish in its place a barren materialism and an ugly tyranny. History tells a clear story of what happens to such governments. It requires no outside intervention. The peasants of Russia are in an overwhelming majority. The food supply is in their hands. Their religious conscience will endure only so much outrage—then the beginning of the end will be seen. The United States has demonstrated that it is possible for a nation to disestablish religion and survive. But human history has no example of a people that has long maintained a national life without religion. Such a thing would be an innovation in the life of the world. The unhappy leaders of Russia, having but little respect for history, insist upon carrying on old experiments whose formulas are now known to all the world, instead of trying truly new experiments. Meanwhile the attitude of the Christian world must be one of waiting. The blood of every martyr in Russia will give fresh vitality to a church which was threatened with death by inanition. In the end Russia will be both free and Christian, and that without any military aid from the outside. But the prayers of the Christian world should go up for those who are these days giving fresh testimony of the power that Christ still holds over human hearts and lives.

What Shall Children Do in Vacation Time?

THE child labor laws of Illinois and other states have been a great boon to the children, but a new problem has been created by their operation. What shall the children do in the summertime when there is no session of the public school? It is well known to the workers in the juvenile court that at this particular time of year the maximum amount of juvenile delinquency appears. There are play grounds in Chicago and other large cities but not enough to serve the great population of children, for, as statistics show, they will not travel more than a half a mile to a playground. The churches have in recent years been undertaking to meet this need in some measure by the vacation school. Last year there was a total enrollment of 21,400 children in the vacation Bible schools of Chicago. The number of schools conducted was 164, and the average expense to each school was $124. The work is headed up by the Chicago Church Federation. The vacation Bible school does not spend all of the forenoon in religious instruction. Many of the manual arts are taught, and various kinds of recreation are provided. The children receive as much religious instruction each day as they can assimilate. There is a generous use of religious music. Habit talks are given by those expert in such instruction. The teachers are paid a modest stipend and in this way regular service is secured. The schools are non-sectarian in character and are so conducted as to make a special appeal to the immigrant. Last year only 60 per cent of the enrollment in the schools gave a preference for Protestant churches, although all the schools were conducted in Protestant church buildings. The number of nationalities reported was 35. The daily vacation Bible school idea is practicable in smaller cities. It helps in some measure to solve the problem of adequate religious instruction for the young. The Sunday school period is not long enough, and the public schools are prohibited by law from teaching the Bible. In consequence the daily vacation Bible school is an important factor in making the Christian citizens of the future.

Labor Disturbance Over the World

THE British are just now worrying through a strike which threatened to grow into a revolution. Had the three big unions continued to cooperate, it is impossible to foresee what the issue would have been. The coal miners had a program for the nationalization of the mines which was clearly socialistic in character. The British mind is not very keen over socialism, particularly in view of the common interpretation of events in Russia. The working class was not willing to stand together behind a socialistic program and the strike failed. In America there are a number of strikes and lockouts in progress at the present time. The issue is not primarily wages but hours. The printers demand that the working week should be cut down from 48 hours to 44. Having achieved the eight hour day, they are now seeking a further limitation in the hours of labor. At the same time the employers are seeking to accomplish a cut in wages, with the result that negotiations have come to a deadlock. In Chicago the building trades have refused to accept a cut in wages from $1.25 per hour. Many of the bosses have been charging the time of decorators to the house owner at the rate of $1.75 per hour. Unskilled labor has been receiving 70 cents per hour. With the city full of unemployed men, the bosses have asserted that the price of unskilled labor is too high. In the stock yards a strike of the men who drive the cattle from pen to pen has resulted in a quick defeat for the men. The employer insists upon gauging wages according to the law of supply and demand. The workingmen assert that wages should be gauged by a standard of living and the current level of prices. Though food has come down, there has been but slight reduction in clothing, while there has been an increase in rents which tends to eat up all the savings resulting from cheaper food and clothing. The employee will not be content with lower wages and the equivalent of the war time living costs. The controversies of the year will challenge America to look deep at the underlying principles of the labor problem.

The Y M C A and Industry

RECENT contributions to the correspondence columns of The Christian Century have discussed some of the phases of the Young Men's Christian Association's policy in reference to the industrial situation. Particularly significant have been those of Mr. Messer of Chicago Association, and Mr. Lewis of Cleveland. These are both men in high official relation to the Y. M. C. A., and yet they appear to represent decidedly different attitudes toward the problems which the Association and many other organizations are facing in the industrial realm. We are not here concerned with the particular statements made in those two letters, but with the general conditions confronting the Christian conscience today.

The traditional attitude of the Association has been one of earnest desire to reach men in all ranges of business and industrial activity with a vital message regarding their physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual welfare. For a long time this involved no consideration of the issues which were increasingly dividing people into the two groups of capital and labor respectively. It was felt by the Association that it could maintain a position of neutrality, and need not commit itself on questions that were becoming acute in the world of industrialism. It was the purpose of the organization to enlist the interest of the proprietors and managers of large industrial plants in the welfare of the men they employed, and thus promote the best interests of all.

Very much has been done in the furtherance of these programs of good feeling and helpful relationship. Much of the welfare work in factories and industrial communities has been stimulated by the Y. M. C. A., and has aroused the approval and even the enthusiasm of men of wealth who have become generous contributors to it. From many points of view it would seem as though the improvements made in working conditions, and the generous provisions made in behalf of working people, ought to satisfy all concerned. There is a certain surprise and resentment on the part of the employing and administrative class when further modifications of the old system are demanded. And in a very real sense the Association men of the old school, whose best friends have been the better type of industrial captains, have shared this view. They have felt that labor ought to be satisfied with the concessions made to it; and, much more to the point, they believed that the Association ought not to concern itself with matters which were at issue between employers and employees. That was the danger zone, into which they did not care to penetrate.

For this reason they preferred the very mild and colorless statement prepared for incorporation in the resolutions of the last general convention of the Association held in Detroit, to the somewhat more specific, though still extremely moderate, industrial platform of the Federal Council of Churches. But the latter was called for from the floor of the convention, and by an overwhelming vote was adopted as the voice of the organization on industrial matters. This was clear indication of the fact that the rank and file of Association men wish to stand with the forward-looking religious bodies, like the Presbyterians, the Methodists, the Baptists and several others, who are no longer contented to seek for neutral zones of safety and non-committal in the present agitation. They are ready to take up matters involving the problems of collective bargaining, profit sharing, the sharing of shop control, the minimum wage, cooperative ownership and similar issues of current significance, and they know that the churches are involved in such questions whether they wish it or not.

It is not to be doubted that a very large section of the world of capital and industrial management is still committed to the belief that the church has nothing to do with such matters and ought to keep out of all entangling alliances with either group in the industrial struggle. These are the men who furnish large sums of money for Y. M. C. A. support. It is not surprising that their opinion should have weight with Association leaders. There are many men in the churches, whose interests lie in the manufacturing area, who resent all effort on the part of the churches to ascertain the actual facts which are at the base of industrial unrest. They are frankly of the opinion that the ethics of Jesus have nothing to do with business, and that to attempt to apply them to industrial matters is a dangerous approach to radicalism. In such a tense time, conservative Association leaders take refuge in an imaginary zone of safety, where all such discussions are avoided. But this is a futile and impossible policy.

The time has come when thoughtful men of all creeds and professions must choose between the illogical and indefensible attitude of non-committal and that of aware and anxious consideration of the merits of the industrial agitation. The latter is the position of the leading denominations of Protestantism, and even of the usually conservative National Catholic Council, as well as the Central Conference of American Rabbis. It is the stand taken by the Federal Council of Churches through its Commission on Social Service, simply because the cooperating denominations of which it is composed demand a policy of intelligent leadership in industrial affairs, as well as in matters of evangelism and Christian education. The Young Women's Christian Association, with great caution and in response to a sense of duty to its own very large membership in industry, took the step of undertaking a first hand study of industrial conditions as they affected young women. And the progressive element in the Y. M. C. A. is coming rapidly to the same conviction that the opportunity of the churches and of all the Christian organizations is to be met only by an intelligent inquiry into the merits of the controversies between capital and labor.

This attitude of awareness and solicitude is termed radicalism by some of the employers of America, who have organized a campaign to beat back the oncoming wave of social concern, and who would like to restore the stand-pat conditions of unconcern which prevailed in industry before the war. They concede the fact that if one is to apply the principles of our Lord to social problems their policies of reaction are in danger. One of their recent pronouncements in criticism of a Christian leader who had written on the social responsibilities of the hour, includes these words of astonishing frankness: "He intimated that the teachings of Jesus Christ should be brought into the industrial fields and that the cardinal principles set forth in the Sermon on the Mount should be injected by the churches into industrial relations." It is in protest against such wise and timely efforts to interpret the gospel in industrial as well as personal terms that the present campaigns of misrepresentation and detraction are being conducted by certain capitalistic publications against the Y. W. C. A. and the Federal Council of Churches.

In the light of these and many other similar facts it is interesting to learn that one of the very foremost leaders of the Association movement, whose voice has been heard in eloquent pleas for personal conversion and for missionary enthusiasm all round the world, has recently announced that he would henceforth devote all his time to the presentation of the industrial question throughout the country, and that if this policy was disapproved by the Y. M. C. A. he was ready to sever his connection with the organization. Much to the surprise of many who were persuaded that the Association would be unwilling to assume such risks, the proposal was approved by a very large majority of the various governing boards. This is a partial assurance at least of alignment with the forward moving Christian forces of the age in the effort, not to seek a zone of safety, but to assume the sort of leadership which in other fields the Association has so nobly held.

If the Y. M. C. A. in the spirit of fearless confidence in its mission and the holy message it mediates to men and boys, is willing to face the industrial issue, the most serious one of the present generation, it has still a great ministry of light and leading for the coming generation. But if in a spirit of timidity and blind subservience to a capitalism which is willing to contribute to its treasury as long as it keeps silence on vital themes, it seeks to save its own life and hold a position of neutrality on an issue which is irrepressible in the present hour, it will forfeit much of the confidence which it has so fully enjoyed, and will be smitten with the mildew of ineffectiveness in a moment of supreme opportunity.

The Sunset That Followed Us

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came for me an Automobile, that it might convey me unto another City, where they desired me to speak upon an Afternoon. And the daughter of the daughter of Keturah desired that she might go with me.

And I said, Let her go. There will be a long ride, and a long program; but we shall have a good time.

And when her mother consented, then did the little maiden weep. For she said, I want to go, but it is Very Far and Very Long.

And I said, Weep not. Thus doth thy Grandmother ever when a Good Thing cometh her way, and she considereth whether it will cost a Dollar that she might give to the Poor, or cause her to be absent from a Missionary Meeting.

And we had a Great Ride for an hundred and three score furlong. And when we arrived in the place of Assembly, then the little maiden sat on the Front Seat among people whom she had never seen before and looked up at her Grandfather and was not afraid.

And we drove back as the sun went down, and she watched the Sunset out of the back window of the Car, and she said, See, Grandpa, the Sunset is following us; it is just a Mile Behind us.

Now on that day she had learned how far a Mile is, for I had showed her certain Barns and Houses and other things that were a Mile away. Therefore did she know how far away the Sunset was.

And she said, The Sun is going to sleep, but see how beautiful it is.

And it was even so. For as the Sun grew more sleepy, it smiled as its eyelids drooped, and the West was very Beautiful with the Happy Farewell of the Sleepy Sun. And the little maiden thought she had never seen anything so wonderful.

So we came again unto our home as the night came on, and the little maiden was so weary she could hardly open her mouth to eat her Bread and Milk before she went to Bed; and she scarce touched the Pillow till she was fast asleep.

And I thought of the Adventures of faith that our Heavenly Father doth invite us to undertake, and how far they seem and how perilous, so that we weep even while we desire them. For so do folk at Weddings and at the other solemn and wonderful experiences of life. But there is a blessing that followeth all the way, and is never so much as a Mile Distant.

VERSE

Magnificat

(The Prayer of a Converted Papist)

LIGHT! blessed light! The fear and groping past—
Veils of Tradition torn from Truth at last!

I see as chaff beneath that burning ray

The sacerdotal pomp consumed away.

Oh God! how infinitesimal the soul

That would confine thee to the musty scroll

Of priestly dogma, or the crumbling bands

Of images and altars carved with hands!

How starved was I who sought the spirit's needs

With dismal chants and by the counted beads,

And bowed before, in dark and narrow tryst,

The self-appointed usurper of Christ!

I thought I knew thee then, Oh Sacred Heart;

'Twas but an idol of my fancy's art—

Like her who, morbid, to the graveyard fled,

I sought the Living One among the dead.

Free! I am free, thy fullness to imbibe,

And all the praise to thee would I ascribe,

Unleashed from ritualism's cold restraints,

Nor share again my homage with the saints

Or that fictitious queen to whom the See

Would force me down on sacrilegious knee.

The souls departed live, but need no more

Our earthly intercession. Gone before

Have they into the precinct which is thine;

Shall we presume to bribe the Judge Divine?

Alas, we have enough to do to pray

For those whose feet still falter on the way!

Thou, God, no fetish art, or potent charm

Which Caesar's coin need buy to banish harm;

Nor yet a prince, in temporal splendor 'rayed,

Of some vain hierarchy by mortals made.

Thy greatness wants no temple which must fall—

But oh! what human columns, fair and tall,

To stand when time shall yield its final hour,

Eternal emblems of thy gracious power!

So let my life thy burning taper be,

My prayers the incense I would waft to thee;

So let me find thine altar in the mart

Of human need, nor seek Thee drawn apart,

There lay my sacrifice—oh, Great World-Heart!

EDNA MARIE LE NART.

I Saw God Wash the World

I SAW God wash the world last night

With His sweet showers on high,

And then, when morning came, I saw

Him hang it out to dry.

He washed each tiny blade of grass

And every trembling tree;

He flung his showers against the hill,

And swept the billowing sea.

The white rose is a cleaner white,

The red rose is more red,

Since God washed every fragrant face

And put them all to bed.

There's not a bird; there's not a bee

That wings along the way

But is a cleaner bird and bee

Than it was yesterday.

I saw God wash the world last night.

Ah, would He had washed me

As clean of all my dust and dirt

As that old white birch tree.

WILLIAM L. STIDGER.

Maude A. Royden

Third Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

THE story of how the greatest woman preacher of our generation was discovered is after this manner. As had been anticipated both by myself and by the officers of the City Temple, it soon became plain that I must have a colleague in my work. Indeed, it had been so agreed before I landed in England, and as a condition of my acceptance of the Temple ministry. The strain of three sermons each week, with so many outside demands, had taxed the strength of a giant like Dr. Parker—who often enough “warmed over” old material on a Thursday—and it had nearly killed R. J. Campbell. Besides, invitations were pouring in upon me from all over the kingdom, and the City Temple people sympathized entirely with my plan for a larger ministry of interpretation between the two countries. But to find a colleague was no easy undertaking—so many preachers were already at the war that churches had to double up.

THE NEW LIFE OF WOMAN

Since England was at that time a world of women, and woman was entering upon a life new and strange and difficult, it seemed to me that if a great woman of genius could be found the problem would be solved. Such a thing could not have been done before the war without a hubbub of criticism, and it would have been denounced as a Yankee innovation. But the war had changed everything. Woman had been in revolt; now she was triumphant, the vote, about which there had been so much bother, having become a mere bagatelle to be taken for granted. She had shown her worth in the war, taking the place of man even in hard, heavy work. There was need of a woman of vision to interpret the new life of woman, its spiritual meaning no less than its obligations and aspirations, if only the right one could be found to meet the need.

Of women preachers there had been a few in England before, and many in America—from the days of Mary Livermore down—but on neither side of the Atlantic had any woman ever been chosen as a regular assistant in a great city pulpit. Fearsome things were prophesied of so revolutionary an arrangement; even a few of the City Temple folk hesitated, much depending, as they said, upon the woman selected. Fortunately we found in Miss Maude A. Royden the woman exactly fitted by genius, by training, by temperament, and by courage to attempt a great work and do it. Yet, as a fact, though devout almost to asceticism, she had never tried to preach, and apparently had not thought of doing so, knowing, as a loyal daughter of the church of England, that she would not be allowed to preach in her own communion. She did not know whether she could preach or not. Nor did we. Finally, not without misgiving and much persuasion, she agreed to try, and, as all now know, the attempt was brilliantly vindicated. The secular press welcomed the innovation with enthusiasm, and even the religious papers—with exceptions, of course, chiefly among the Anglican journals—accepted it as an inevitable “sign of the times,” watching the experiment with interest and concern.

Sunday after Sunday large congregations gathered to hear Miss Royden, some drawn by curiosity at first, but all remained to pray; and if the majority of her audiences were women, it was to be noted that many men in khaki found her preaching a blessing. Naturally, in private, I had to bear the brunt of criticism, in a flood of letters sometimes angry, and often ugly. Of course the words of St. Paul about women keeping silence in church were worn threadbare—so few knew what he meant—and the gibe of Dr. Johnson about a woman preaching being like a dog trying to walk on his hind legs was not forgotten. More than one letter reminded me of the dictum of Montaigne that “women are hardly fit to treat on matters of theology”; and so it went, with much ridicule of “petticoats in the pulpit.” One Anglican layman did, however, modify the saying of Henry Sidgwick for my benefit: “Of course, it’s nonsense, but it’s the right kind of nonsense.” As often as I met the Bishop of London, his chief concerns seem to be whether Miss Royden actually stood in the pulpit of the City Temple, and whether or not she wore a hat! It did not matter; I was content to let facts refute folly, and Miss Royden soon made her place in what proved to be her rightful sphere.

SHOWER OF CRITICISM

The daughter of Sir Thomas Royden, Bart., formerly Lord Mayor of Liverpool, in a home at once high church and ultra tory, Miss Royden was born to a life of wealth, luxury, and culture. Like Beatrice she might have said, “Then there was a star danced and under it I was born”; but it was a pilgrim star making her a pioneer, a radical, a reformer, a leader of unpopular causes. Unlike Beatrice, she did not feel the sadness of the world only when she was asleep; the more awake she was the more she felt it, though never in a way to becloud a spirit to whom joy was native, beauty a sacrament, and life an adventure and a challenge. She was educated at Cheltenham College, going later into residence at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford, where she took honors in modern history. After some work done in the slums of Liverpool and in a midland country parish, she became the first woman lecturer under the Oxford University Extension scheme, her subjects being history and literature. Always her interest lay less with the classes than with the masses, where, as Dostoevski, her favorite novelist, had shown, so much of divinity is to be found.

For some years Miss Royden devoted herself to the cause of the enfranchisement of women, and as editor of The Common Cause, she very soon won a place of leadership in the law abiding suffrage movement. To a smaller public she was known as an original thinker, an expert in all matters relating to the life of woman and child—having much the same position in England that Miss Jane Addams has long held in America—and a writer in behalf of a new internationalism. Indeed, she was a pleader for all great human causes, but especially for a purer social life, based, not upon legalisms, but upon a higher standard, equal for men and women, in morals, health, and culture. Yet, during all those labors and agitations, she kept an inviolate altar in her heart—true to the church in spite of its laggard and reluctant interest in prophetic human enterprises—uniting the devotion of a saint with a flaming social passion, and keeping both in poise by a dauntless faith, a calm reasonableness, and a rich and sparkling humor.

AN ALTAR IN THE HEART

Frail of figure, slight unspeakably, with a limp in her gait, as an orator Miss Royden is unique in her simplicity—direct, forthright, winsome. She reminds me more of Frances Willard—"St. Frances, of Evanston," as I love to call her—than anyone I remember to have heard, albeit with more verve and fire. Rich, mellow, unfaltering, her voice is singularly revealing, her articulation perfect, and, without a trace of sentimentality, she speaks to the heart. There is no shrillness in her eloquence, no impression of strain, no affectation. She speaks with the exquisite ease of long practice, in a style more conversational than oratorical, and is more at home in an assembly where the people can answer back, whether on a chair at the street corner, or at a conference of a band of rescue workers, or wherever the common people foregather.

At first she was not at home in the pulpit of the City Temple, until she started an after meeting in which her hearers could have their say, discussing questions suggested by the sermon, or the problems of the religious life. Some of her epigrams are unforgettable in their quick-sighted summing up of situations, as when she said in the Royal Albert Hall, to the horror of deans and bishops: "The church of England is the conservative party at prayer." One secret of her influence and power may be found in the faith thus confessed: "I am convinced that what I can see others can see, and nothing will persuade me that the world is not ready for an ideal for which I am ready." Untrained in theology—which some hold to be an advantage—she deals with the old issues of faith as an educated, spiritually minded woman in sensitive contact with life, inspired by a lofty faith and guided by a sanctified common sense worth more than much dogma. She casts aside the "muffled Christianity" which Wells once described as the religion of the well to do classes, holding resignation to be "a detestable virtue," however canonical, if it means that worship is to be an opiate and the sermon a dose of soothing syrup. Not only stimulating but provocative—seldom provoking—it is no wonder that she shocked many of the staid, unco-respectable folk when she made her advent in the City Temple.

Nothing was plainer than that the best way for me to help Miss Royden was to let her be entirely free, and I did so. Usually we had a conference once a month, or more often in case of emergency, and we never had but one difference of judgment—regarding sending a petition from the City Temple to the British government to lift the blockade, which, as an American citizen, I could not do, though I assured her she was free to denounce the blockade as she liked. Not the least important feature of the work of Miss Royden at the Temple, aside from the three services a month which she conducted, was what I called her "clinic"; that is, two or three days a week when she was in attendance at the City Temple, acting as guide, confidant and friend to hundreds of women, and as priest and confessor to not a few. Here she did what no man born may ever hope to do. Woman can comfort and counsel woman in a way unique. Tactful, large souled, wisely sympathetic, she entered deeply into the problems of those who consulted her, gaining a clear insight into the real needs of the modern soul astray in its own life—wistful, lonely, troubled, longing for an experimental sense of spiritual reality, yet only half willing to submit to the discipline of the quest. It meant much to young women bewildered by perplexity, or broken by bereavement, to meet and take counsel with a woman like Miss Royden. And this ministry of conference and confession reacted, in turn, upon her preaching, making it peculiarly effective in meeting the issues, both spiritual and social, confronting present-day womanhood.

There was a brief outcry of criticism when Miss Royden christened a child one Sunday—a service performed with such grace and impressiveness that it was not soon forgotten—but not for long. Personally I should have been glad to have had her administer the Lord's Supper, but she thought it best not to do so, lest it expose her to rebuke, if not to discipline, by the authorities of the Anglican church, to which she remained loyal, and which resented her ministry in the City Temple. Indeed, the Bishop of London inhibited her from conducting a Good Friday service in one of the churches under his obedience, to the horror of multitudes of Christian people who felt that on that day, of all days, no voice of prayer should be hushed.

THE WOMAN'S POINT OF VIEW

It was an honor to have a colleague so gifted and so gracious, and our fellowship was the more completely harmonious, no doubt, because each could do what the other could not do. As the war went on, bringing a still further degradation of morals in respect to the relations of the sexes, more than one issue came up with which Miss Royden could deal in a manner impossible to any man. She showed how a woman of ethereal refinement and spirituality, while speaking plainly, can handle such delicate and difficult subjects as no man can do. In short, the woman insight, the woman touch, the woman point of view was needed in the pulpit, as elsewhere, and it added to the City Temple ministry a hint of that beautiful thing which we feel in the Gospel of St. Luke. Anyway, I gave a great woman a great opportunity, to which she measured up, vindicating the possibilities of a woman of genius in the service of the Christian ministry; and together we gave an example of that Christian unity of which we heard so much and saw so little.

The ministry of Miss Royden at the City Temple—memorable in many ways, especially during the dreadful days of war—terminated with my own. She did not wish to embarrass my successor, and she feared that no British minister would work with her as I had done.

Later she and Dr. Darmer, of King's College, held services in the Kensington Town Hall with conspicuous success—he speaking in the afternoons and she in the evenings. Today she is a preacher with a large audience, which follows her wherever she goes, to whom no church will open its doors—a strange situation at a time when so many churches, both Anglican and free, are empty! It is nothing less than a reproach to the church of every name and order that the greatest woman preacher in the world should thus be an outcast, a wanderer. Whatever may be her future, it was the City Temple that discovered her as a preacher and gave her an opportunity equal to her powers. There, in a setting and service often described—never more vividly, albeit with Anglican condescension, than by Archibald Marshall in his story, "The Greatest of These"—the dark little woman in the big white pulpit seemed in accord with the fitness of things; and her genius shone as a light of God in the cruel days of war and the still more cruel days of rancor and reaction which followed.

The Denominational School

By Peter Ainslie

I AM told that there lived in a village in Texas four boys, who played together, attended school together and lived in each other's homes as though the home of each were the common property of all four. Apparently they had in themselves the seeds of lifetime friendships until they were sent to their respective denominational schools—Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, Baptist and Disciple. That somewhat isolated each from the other, so that on returning home during vacation their friendships were not quite as cordial as formerly.

Later each entered the ministry of his respective denomination and this removed them still further from each other. The new made Roman Catholic priest claimed his denomination to be the church and his three separated brethren of other denominations to be living in schism and therefore out of the church. The new made Episcopal priest claimed his denomination to be the church, looking somewhat anxiously toward the new made priest of the Roman Catholic church, who, however, did not recognize his priesthood, and looking rather indifferently toward the two ministers of the two Protestant bodies, which he termed the sects. The new made Baptist minister claimed his denomination to be the apostolic church, refusing his three friends of the other three denominations and all other Christians the Lord's Supper, which, however, neither the Roman Catholic nor Episcopal priest recognized as the Lord's Supper. He further rebaptized all who sought membership in the Baptist church, whether they had been baptized by sprinkling, pouring or immersion. The new made Disciple minister claimed his denomination to be the restoration of the primitive church, allowing all Christians at the Lord's Supper, however, but no one of his three friends would come. At the same time he refused membership in his church to all who had not been baptized by immersion and maintained a critical attitude toward his three friends of the other Christian bodies which he designated as the denominations.

A GRIM PICTURE

This is the grim picture of the educational system of rigid denominationalism with its thorns unconcealed and its barren waste uncovered. In relating this instance, Originally read before the Church History Club of Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

which can be duplicated many times in principle throughout the world, I would not have you to think that I have in mind the slightest idea of reflecting on the denominations named as though they were sinners above all others. Similar instances have singled out other denominations. The whole church is involved in this practice, some perhaps not quite as denominational as others, but all are parties to the practice. The men standing apart from each other, ministering at their separate altars, have no doubt honestly stood for the traditions of their respective denominations. They have generally been men of learning and piety. In spite of their separate altars many of them have been voices for God and truth in the world. But is it not pertinent to raise the question whether a system that maintains such a condition is not a fundamental error in present day education?

The beginning of the denominational school may be traced back to the Council of Trent, especially the beginning of theological seminaries. The intention of the originators was to safeguard truth and this was an admirable idea, but the method of separation has been hurtful both to the church as the message bearer of the truth and to the world as the recipient of the truth. Prior to the Council of Trent the clergy were educated in the universities and consequently they were in touch with the advance thinking of the world, but with the rise of the denominational school they were not only removed from the centers of thought at the time when the whole world was seeking new paths for thinking, but they unconsciously partook of all that goes with an isolated system of education, including the setting up of a division between religion and reality. Protestantism yielded itself to what it regarded as a necessity in order that its varied, correct interpretations of the Scriptures might become permanent in the thought of the world.

Every new movement must have a school of its own and the school in turn perpetuated the movement. No denomination could get fairly under way unless it could point to its own school or schools, where genuine orthodoxy was maintained in the midst of other denominational schools, representing all grades of heresy from extreme to moderate, depending upon the angle of approach. Erasmus says, "The doctrine of Christ, a stranger formally to battle over words, came to be made dependent on defences of philosophy. This was the first downward step towards the ruin of the church." The schools of each denomination became the centers of denominational philosophies. All denominations honestly felt that they were divinely called to plant schools wherever they could get a piece of land donated, or its equivalent in money for the purchase of land, and there erect school buildings until in America in particular nearly every denomination is overburdened with its multiplicity of schools.

EDUCATION AND BEHAVIOR

It is not, however, in the province of this paper to discuss the motives that led to the establishment of these schools nor the multiplicity of denominational schools, nor to inquire as to whether their equipments are poor or ample, or whether their teachers are living on meagre or sufficient salaries, although these elements enter vitally into the education of a nation. The last report of the Commission on Education of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America says: "The report (survey) called attention to the fact that notwithstanding a widespread and growing interest in religious education throughout the country, and several promising experiments in various centers, yet, taken as a whole, the teaching work of the churches was alarmingly meagre in amount and ineffective in quality." Neither is the question raised as to whether the men coming out of the denominational schools are as well equipped in their knowledge of the languages and sciences as the men from other schools. They may be equally as well equipped in those things. But education is not expressed in terms of intelligence. It is rather in terms of conduct and character. William James says: "Education cannot be better described than by calling it the organization of acquired habits of conduct and tendencies of behavior." But the denominational school breaks the process of organization, separating themselves according to denominations as though each possessed something which the other did not have and therefore could not impart. Laying aside the fact that the claim is purely fictitious, the policy shatters the spiritual universe into as many parts as there are parties, disturbing the fundamental principles "of conduct and tendencies of behavior."

THE DENOMINATIONAL SCHOOL

Education must deal with the wholeness of life. We are in a world of the incomplete. Schools are necessary in order to the development of the incomplete. Education involves both training away from something and training toward something. A system of education may strengthen those inherent elements of social adjustment or it may weaken and divide them, but a system that weakens and divides them is certainly not functioning properly, and such a policy must be a matter of concern to all, because it trains the individual away from the real destiny of human life, debarring him from his rightful place in the social whole. Education must be a unitary process or it is defective. The denominational school is not a unitary factor. It may be for its own denomination, but the little less than two hundred units separated as in American Christianity may be ever so well united in themselves, but if these units are not uniting and adjusting themselves to each other for the benefit of the whole, the educational process has not been conducive either to right conduct or proper behavior.

"Education is," as Nicholas Murray Butler says, "a gradual adjustment to the spiritual possessions of the race." The trend of the denominational school is not in the direction of adjustment. It is the guardian of denominational traditions, which are separative in character. Its very presence, whether it teaches its denominational tenets or not, is an attempt to keep alive a breach in spiritual thought, perhaps centuries old or only reaching back a few decades, which then was regarded among the infallible interpretations by its honest advocates, but perhaps now held only as matters of opinion by the honest sons of those same advocates. Consequently the very fact that the denominational school is here, bearing the stamp of a divisive element, although it may not give denominational instruction in the class room, contradicts the unitary processes of present day education and raises at once the question as to the propriety of its continuance as a denominational school.

OUR NEW DAY

Times have changed. Severity has been taken out of most denominational teaching, but there is always a rigid side to denominationalism. Canon B. H. Streeter says, "A century ago we were all eyes for the errors of every religious body but our own; today we are recognizing the truth in one another's positions; but there is one more stage, and that is for each to awaken to the errors in his own views—this is the hardest stage of all." We can approach this stage more satisfactorily if we attempt to approach the error that is common to us all rather than touching some distinctive position that may have lost its interest to other denominations, but is still sacredly guarded by the denomination that originated it or restated it. The common error is the denominational school. That it has grown in efficiency and in general fellowship with the schools of other denominations is apparent to all students of social problems. Nevertheless its system of education, being conducted upon a divisive principle, will train some temperaments to the severity of the original advocates, such as those extremes that may now be found in all denominations, while other temperaments yield to the broadening influences of general education and are fellows with those of other denominations as far as their denominational traditions will let them go. If we find an educational system that pushes an individual away from his fellows, let us not deceive ourselves by thinking that that system of training has in it high merits of education. Such a system always stands for a fundamental error and always will so stand.

The function which education has to discharge is, according to Herbert Spencer, "to prepare us for complete living." No institution that represents a party in Christendom, such as a denominational school, can aid to his fullest development a student whose duties are inherently to all Christendom in particular and to society in general. That individual has in him latent powers with the possibilities of adjustment to the highest demands of God and his fellows. Consequently development is a necessity for the completion of manhood and education is the normal aid to that development. It is not enough that one should be prepared for the other world; he must be prepared for complete living here. That is the purpose of human life as clearly as apple blossoms are the antecedents of apples. Jesus says, "Ye therefore shall be perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect." We are developed into perfect living in our sphere of human life as God is perfect in his sphere of divine life; and, out of our perfect human life we will come into the perfection of divine life, as the perfect apple blossoms develop into perfect apples, or as the perfect child develops into the perfect man.

UNFETTERED EDUCATION

Life at best is difficult. There must be an unfettered educational system—unfettered by party attitudes and divisive approaches—if we are to find the art of adjustment to the spiritual necessities of mankind for growth into the ideals of complete living. Education is to train the individual away from the incomplete into the complete, so that breaking with the past is as necessary as union with the future. In the process individuals grow into helping others to find how to grow away from the incomplete into the complete. Education is to remove those barriers, which hinder cooperation, and is not to maintain them. Most of our theological barriers are fictitious, certainly among Protestants. There is not a Protestant theological seminary now, either in this country or abroad, but would produce better ministers if the outstanding Protestant interpretations of the Scriptures were taught under the same roof by those who are the advocates of those interpretations instead of separating students to one interpretation and giving the other interpretations at second hand, which is as uncomfortable to the student's thought as second-hand clothes are to his body. To say the least such a method would tone down many of our Protestant interpretations that need toning down to find a normal adjustment. The same principle applies to Roman Catholicism. Protestants will never understand Roman Catholicism nor will the Roman Catholics ever understand Protestantism until the schools of each are open to both. However independent and arrogant toward each other now, both of these interpretations need each other.

"Truth has nothing to fear in mingling with unbelievers, much less with believers. It is the divine method of its transmission and it mingles better in human flesh than in books. Jesus went himself among the people and left no commentaries, but left his life, and the spirit of a message is seen in the conduct and behavior of its adherents far more than in its theological statements. Universal fellowship with the saints is the model of God, while exclusiveness is the den of provincialism and sectarianism. It cannot be true that associating with other denominations destroys the truth of another. It may destroy its narrowness and shame its sectarianism, but to its truth is given vision and vitality. He who has convictions can mingle with all Christians and retain those convictions as certainly as, mingling with the thousands on the street, he keeps his individual name. The scourge of a message that has in it the call of God is giving to it a contracted horizon and making it provincial (as every denominational school must do). It is the violation of a divine principle, for the atmosphere of provincialism is as repulsive as the musty smell of an ill-ventilated room." It is abandoning the sunshine of the great universal world for indoor light.

BRIDGING CLEAVAGES

The world abounds in cleavages—cleavages of race, nation, religion, creed and class. It is the function of education to span these cleavages, making a highway to the brotherhood of humanity. The denominational school stands for the cleavage of creeds, whether those creeds are written or unwritten, and consequently it cannot function in this task beyond the cry of the prisoner for freedom. No man can teach complete living unless he is approaching it himself, unfettered by denominational barriers. Whatever this generation may owe to the next generation the debt of providing unitary processes in education, if the path of mankind is to go upward toward God.

Present day education needs religion. I do not refer so much to a deepening of the recognition of God by both faculties and students, although this is evident, but education is going wild over efficiency to the frequent loss of personality. The tendency is to put production over humanity. A crass materialism is crowding spirituality to the wall, but the voices of the prophets of social adjustment and common betterment are being heard in the great universities as well as in the smaller colleges. The chief question remains—not, What have men learned? but, What have men become? It is the individual's being something himself that is the great and only permanent achievement. This cannot be carried to its fullest development without the freest training of the intellect and the emotions and the will. Religion has its opportunity here, but the denominational school is too archaic an institution to function. Religion in it is frequently below that of the great universities and the reason for this is not difficult to find. Hugh Black says, "I found a greater appreciation of religious matters and interest in them in the state universities than in the denominational colleges." Others have borne similar testimony.

THE DENIAL OF UNITY

Politically we would not tolerate here in America the building up by Italians, Russians, Germans, French, Japanese and other nations of schools in their communities in which to teach their national traditions and national peculiarities over all other interests. It would disrupt the American republic in a generation. Yet this is what we are doing educationally in the church of Christ. The denominational school is the denial of unity, which is essential to life: on the other hand, it is the advertisement of discord and competition, which are the elements of death. Happily the tide is turning away from the denominational school as it is from the denominational paper, so that what the denominational school refused to lead the denomination to do, a mysterious hand appears to be guiding in doing; and that tide will never flow back in the opinion of many. So the hopeful condition as regards both education and religion is that the denominational school has seen its best days irrespective of its increasing endowments. Thought is a more powerful factor than money, and present day thought is certainly turning away from the denominational school, and rightly too. Many of these schools in overcrowded centers could be sold to the advantage of mankind and the glory of God; others could be interdenominationalized so as not to reflect merely one interpretation of Christianity, but the whole, as is being done in many instances in foreign missionary work. Standing apart, however, as they are, their messages to the world are neither healthy nor hopeful.

The presence of the denominational school in present day education therefore is a fundamental error because:

1. It follows the prejudices of the denomination and reflects its general thought, whereas the function of a school is to lead the people and to direct the general thought of the community.

2. It is too much absorbed in its own denominational program to the exclusion of the programs of other denominations and therefore is concerned with only a part of the church—and necessarily a small part at that—whereas the function of a school is to cultivate an idealism that is above all divisions, whether those divisions be Christian denominations or political parties, and to give itself to making practical its ideals.

3. It teaches loyalty to the denomination and attempts to establish a denominational conscience, whereas the function of a school is to teach loyalty to society and to establish a conscience so thoroughly Christian as to include the whole church.

4. It seeks to conserve the power acquired by its students for the use of its denomination and to make more evident the importance of its denomination in the eyes of the world, whereas the function of a school is to conserve the power of its students for the good of society and to make more evident the blessings of education.

5. It is concerned with the rights of its denomination and the place of its denomination in religious affairs, whereas the function of a school is to emphasize duties to others and service to the community in general.

6. It perpetuates division in the church and attempts to make sacred the divisions of Christendom as though they were from God, whereas the function of a school is to unify the interests of mankind and to establish the principles of cooperation.

WHOLENESS OF LIFE

Many of the denominational schools are growing toward the schools in other denominations. They are trying to escape the tragedy of uneducational functioning in which they are involved. Like long ago abandoned pedagogical methods in education, the denominational school is passing and must absolutely pass away in order that the coming generations may have fairer chances for their social adjustments and spiritual possibilities. George A. Coe says, "The standpoint of Christianity, moreover, is that of wholeness of life, from which no human good can be excluded." The denominational school cannot function in the wholeness of things because it essentially stands for only a part—whether it be the four denominations referred to in the opening of this paper or to the one hundred and eighty-six according to the United States census table. It is an error in education and is therefore unfair to religion and morals and unfair to the present generation which faces great evils over against which stands the denominational school, through which the highest expressions of religion and morals cannot function because of its divisive capacity and schismatic nature.

An institution may serve one generation acceptably, but that is no reason that it is to serve all generations. Things that have been proper at one time have become improper at other times, and things that have been tolerated in one period, perhaps warmly defended by some, have been entirely abolished in other periods. Because an institution has become established in the thought and affections of a respectable group or groups is no reason for its perpetuity. I am not detracting from any good that the denominational school has done in the past. Circumstances in many instances were such that there would have been no school at all in some communities if it had not been denominational, but that day has gone. Another day is here. Prejudice, always unreasonable, has been in many instances in the past so unreasonable that only a denominational school could get financial support, for the money in the church has usually been in the hands of its most conservative or sectarian elements. This financial support in turn gave a certain rigidity to the standards of the school perhaps unconsciously.

A RIGID ORTHODOXY

But the rigidity of orthodoxy is the inevitable cause of heresy and schism, so that the ordinary method pursued to establish excessive verbal orthodoxy not only defeats its end of making the whole community orthodox, but produces heresy and schism. Orthodoxy and catholicity rivaled each other for centuries until they separated—one into the Eastern Orthodox church and the other into the Roman Catholic church. This made a definite epoch in the rise of sectarian theology, which developed rapidly following the Council of Trent. Arthur C. Headlam says, referring to this council, "A wise observer is reported to have said that by the institution of ecclesiastical seminaries the council exercised greater influence than by any other of its decrees." That may be true, but as the Greek and Latin forms of Christianity became finally stereotyped in consequence of their division, the many divisions in Protestantism likewise became stereotyped, not so rigidly perhaps as those of the Greek and Latin forms, but nevertheless stereotyped, and the greatest factor to maintain this stereotyped condition is the denominational school. Since then the denominational school is the product of medieval thinking and at the same time is divisive in character, necessarily maintaining in most instances stereotyped attitudes, it is not difficult to see that as an educational institution it can and ought to be abolished. This does not call for the closing at once of all the denominational schools. Only those need to be closed that are in close proximity to other schools and the other denominational schools need to be interdenominationalized. This could be handled by a commission on Christian education.

An interdenominationalized policy would mean that the whole Christian sentiment of the community would be represented on the board of trustees and in the faculty, not with any denomination's predominating and therefore controlling, but with all sharing equally in the responsibility of its conduct and in the interpretation of its message. The only barrier to this policy is sectarianism with its distrust of those in other denominations, with its fictitious attitudes toward others and with its belated sense of its own infallibility. Consequently it will doubtless be hard in many instances for the denominations to let go, but the conscience of the church must be so trained that it will be uncomfortable for any one denomination to hold with pride the exclusive control of any one school; likewise to be uncomfortable for trustees to hold their places on boards of denominational schools and teachers to hold their places in faculties of denominational schools, where all are members of one denomination. I wish my own denomination would feel this sense of shame of this whole condition and therefore venture toward this ideal.

CHRIST ABOVE PARTIES

There must be such an interdenominationalizing policy as to lose sight of the denomination in educational training in order that Christ may be lifted up above all parties and all creeds. Theological seminaries would perhaps have more difficulty in making adjustments, but this is by no means an impossibility. If the various systems of interpretation cannot be adjusted and some one denomination contends that it is impossible for it to be wrong, then we face the alternative of one or the other being false or the still severer verdict, which the world is slowly accumulating, that both are false, but adjustment is possible where there is freedom and truth. This adjustment could begin by having representatives of other denominations to be members of the faculty for short periods with the same freedom of instruction as the denomination in control. Finding this to be the more scientific method of procedure than the present method permanent places would be given in the faculty and on the board of trustees until the theological seminary came to be distinctively Christian, representing the whole church instead of a denomination and therefore representing only a part. The church is waiting for such a constructive policy in order to witness to the world the oneness of the disciples of our common Lord.

This day is calling us to repair the breaches of the past, to revise our convictions as to the realities of life, to set up standards that have in them the ethical instincts of the gospel, to abandon fictitious attitudes regarding race, nation, creed and class, to use the spiritual weapons of divine grace in our daily warfare and to interpret love to sinners and saints in the humility and gentleness of Christ in order that we who believe may be able to present the mind of Christ to a weary world. There is not a denominational school on the globe that alone can do this. The wholeness of the church is the heavenly viewpoint for the ministering of the whole gospel to the whole world.

Education must lead us to the fulfilment of those noble ideals for which we hunger and which are beautifully expressed by Wordsworth when he says,

'We live by admiration, hope and love,
And as these are well and wisely placed,
In dignity of being we ascend.'

It is admiration for the true and the universal; it is hope for the ethical use of the five senses and the spiritual development of every possibility within; it is love for the widening of the horizon, refusing to be provincialized by the petty things of religious denominations, political parties or national affairs and abolishing all hindrances to the wider fellowship with all mankind. The promise of Jesus still lies upon the conscience of a waiting world, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

In Excelsis

By Thomas S. Jones, Jr.

SPRING!

And all our valleys turning into green
Remembering—
As I remember! So my heart turns glad
For so much youth and joy—this to have had
When in my veins the tide of living fire
Was at its flow;
This, to know
When now the miracle of young desire
Burns on the hills, and spring's sweet choristers again
Chant from each tree and every bush aflame,
Love's wondrous name:
This under youth's glad reign,
With all the valleys turning into green—
This to have heard and seen!

And Song!
Once to have known what every wakened bird
Has heard:
Once to have entered into that great harmony
Of love's creation, and to feel
The pulsing waves of wonder steal
Through all my being; once to be
In that same sea
Of wakened joy that stirs in every tree
And every bird; and then to sing—
To sing aloud the endless Song of Spring!

Waiting, I turn to Thee
Expectant, humble, and on bended knee;
Youth's radiant fire
Only to burn at Thy unknown desire—
For this alone has Song been granted me.

Upon Thy altar burn me at Thy will;
All wonders fill
My cup, and it is Thine;
Life's precious wine
For this alone: for Thee.

Yet never can be paid
The debt long laid
Upon my heart, because my lips did press
In youth's glad Spring the Cup of Loveliness!

In Re Sermons on Wages

By Lloyd C. Douglas

IT is a great temptation to preach on present economic conditions, particularly in respect to wages, at this hour when more people are thinking of that matter than of anything else. It is more than a temptation: it is a solemn duty. The church has a right to speak concerning an issue that so seriously involves the welfare of the bulk of our American people. But, before he makes this adventure, the preacher needs to consult every reliable source of information, that he may be sure of his "facts"; for merely wishing to be honest and sincere in this matter will not furnish a satisfactory alibi if the figures are incorrect or the natural deductions are misleading.

We must use considerable discretion in the handling of a subject so brimful of high explosives. Many a man, chattering vague generalities about "capital" and "labor," only drives the wedge deeper between the men who work and those for whom they work. One cannot predicate of all capital that it is greedy and soulless; nor may it be truthfully said that all labor is downtrodden. It is a mistake to job all employers and all employees into two grand and militant divisions.

Herein lies one of the pet iniquities of the American process of reasoning. We like to tie people up in neat little bundles, and label them, and card index them. The problem is not so simple as that. We persist in cataloging people into classes and groups; attempting to standardize their place in, and value to, society, with the assurance of the hardware merchant wrapping up packages of four, six, eight, and ten penny nails. Every time we prophets and soothsayers begin mouthing large phrases about capital and labor, we take a chance of widening the breach between the honest people of both causes who would like to arrive at amicable understandings. It is part of our business to operate a sorting machine that will discriminate between the decent folk of both parties; and the others.

SALVATION IN GROSS LOTS

If any profit may be derived from experience, it is about time the church learned that she will have to leave off trying to save humanity in the mass, and by gross lots. We have had an epidemic of huge campaigns—noisy, gusty, windy, bumptious campaigns. Most of them have predicted great results before firing off their master shot. They have been surprised and bewildered when the discharge was emitted from the breech end of the gun into the very laps of the people who had foretold the victory. We must get back to the Galilean idea of talking to people, and dealing with people, as individuals! We can make no headway shouting maxims and truisms at, and of, the "masses," (How I have come to hate and despise that word!) the "classes," "the rich," "the poor," "capital and labor."

Just now this task is all the more important for us because all "capital" and all "labor" seem bent upon being thus tied up in two definite parcels. They have arranged their affairs so that the general public will judge all "labor" as solidly committed to certain propositions—some of which are obviously unfair; and all "capital" as of-a-piece in consenting to practices—some of which are notoriously mean.

PARABLE OF THE TALENTS

The parable of the talents is a delightful setting for a sermon today. It amply repays any amount of study the preacher may care to put upon it. It contains some very effective medicine for all parties concerned in the present conflict. There may be some doubt as to how far one may properly go, in attempting to utilize this story for modern purposes; but, suppose it read as follows:

"For the state of industry is as a man traveling into a far country, who called his own employees, and delivered unto them his goods: and unto one he gave five talents, and to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey.

"And it came to pass that he was no more than out of sight than the local secretary of a labor union came that way, and called a meeting, and did organize those servants. And it was No. 456, Talent Workers' Association. Nor did he go unrewarded who had done for them this thing.

"Now it befell that when each servant discovered what his brethren had received, he recked naught of the difference between their several ability and skill and experience, but thought only of the discrimination made among them; and thereafter they dwelt not exceeding happy together.

"Then he that had received five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents. Likewise he that had received two talents, he also gained other two. But he that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his employer's money. After a long time, the employer of those servants cometh and reckoneth with them.

"And it came to pass that they appeared before him, saying, 'Thou deliveredst unto us five and two and one talents, totaling eight. Behold, we have gained, beside them, five and two talents more, making seven. Grand total, fifteen.'

"Now the employer said, within himself, 'I had thought to receive eight talents on this investment. Lo, these men have taken advantage of me, by about 12½ per cent.' And he did speak his mind unto them to the same effect.

"Then he that had received the five talents, and had gained other five, bowed his head and was speechless; for, albeit he was honest and industrious, he was organized. Likewise he that had received two talents, and had gained other two, dared not speak; for he had passed his word to be a regular fellow, and not tattle. And it came to pass that he who had been a lazy slacker did also hold his peace; moreover he did grin, slyly, the while he leaned upon the spade wherewith he had exhumed the buried talent; and did put his tongue in his cheek, and say, within himself, 'Verily, were it not for this blessed organization, I would now lose my job. Long live No. 456, Talent Workers' Association!'"

No! In this case five talents and two talents and one talent do not make eight—any more than five talents, and two honest men, and one hole in the ground make eight! It isn't fair to anybody—not even to the idler, whose character, as a citizen, should be safeguarded, if he, himself, hasn't the manliness to do it without assistance.

Now—suppose we turn this parable around, and see how it looks from the other side. Suppose it read this way:

THE PARABLE TURNED AROUND

"The state of industry is as if three men, to whom fortune and heredity had been exceeding kind, and who were possessed of much goods, invested their capital in the building of as many factories. And their ability to deal happily and amicably with their laborers was related as five is to two is to one.

"And it came to pass that they were enjoined to organize themselves into a capitalistic combination, lest they be unduly squeezed by their brethren in the next city thereunto.

"Now on a certain day a delegation of workmen came unto him who had five times the usual amount of tact and sagacity, and begged for shorter hours of labor and more pay. And he, being a just man, and knowing he could get about as much work out of them in eight hours, if they were contented, as in twelve, if they were sore at him; and knowing, likewise, that he could pay them more wages without selling his steam yacht, was disposed to listen respectfully unto them; but he could not, for he was organized. Likewise he that had two times the brains and heart of the usual employer was also waited upon by his employes; and, though he was able to treat with them generously, and was of a good disposition toward them, he could not; for, lo, he had passed his word to his brethren.

"Then he who had no more sense than the average, but about the same, was also visited by a committee of his laborers; but he did refuse to see them or speak unto them. And it was so that on the next morning, when they came to work, they read a placard on the factory gate, saying, 'I have locked up the plant, and am going to Cuba for a season. Ye are a hard lot, and I hope to see no more of you.'

"Then did the public speak unto these men, saying, 'How is it ye have enough and to spare, and are able to send your wives to California for the winter, and these men who earn your daily bread for you are living like animals?'

"And they answered, saying, 'We have done the best we could, under the circumstances.' Then did the public say, 'Tell us a little more about these circumstances.' And they were silent. Again did the public inquire, saying, 'How about this fellow who nailed up the sign, and refused so much as to talk with them who had made his fortune for him?' And they, indignant, replied, 'Verily; he is one of us; and we are strong for him. He is our brother. We will all be judged together.'"

That you will not! At that point, we fail to follow! It is Christianity's business to lay this responsibility, and blame, and burden, exactly where it belongs. Honest and self-respecting labor must help. Honest and self-respecting capital must help. Any organization that provides a cloak for selfish capital to hide behind, in these critical days, must go! It is part of the church's task to show it up for what it is—and what it does! Any organization that provides an opportunity for lazy and wicked labor to exploit and menace the cause of the honest workman, must mend its ways or get ready to face exposure! Christianity must say, fearlessly, to the blue laborer, "If you want any sympathy or assistance, in your cause, stop protecting the yellow laborer and the red laborer!"

There must be a disposition on the part of the church to say to the employer who has tried to do the square thing by his men, "Well done, good and faithful servant!" And to him who has followed a policy of grinding his workmen to pieces, at a miserable wage, and then tossing them out the back door for the infirmaries and jails to gather up, "Thou art a low-lived slacker!"

To the honest laborer, Christianity must say, "Thou hast been faithful over a few things. We will help thee to larger freedom and better privileges." To the lazy, sullen obstructionist, who has always been ready to throw down his tolls, and quit, at the slightest suggestion; and to the professional trouble maker, who pretends to be labor's friend, while undercutting labor's cause by petty graft and nefarious dickering, Christianity must be bold enough to say, "Thou art a wicked and slothful servant!"

Whether the church will try to lead in establishing a new relationship between the honest men of both parties to this question, remains to be seen. If one is to judge the future by the recent past, she will not. She has made the mistake of allowing influences, guised as children of light, but quite otherwise as to character, to lead her around by the nose, and lash her into line to serve whatever temporary interests are paramount in the minds of selfish opportunities!

THE CHURCH AND ARMAMENTS

When, twenty-five years ago, the greater nations of the world had gone daft on a great program of building larger navies, if the church had had the sense and courage to say to the powder merchants, and the greedy statesmen, and all other professional disturbers of the peace, "That will be about enough!"—our world would be in a far different condition at this moment. When the war was over, if the church had pointed the way to a quick and just settlement of the issues then confronting the worn and battle tired nations, in a voice of command, we might not now be whetting the scythe for more harvest of blood and tears.

But, whenever the church made as if she would speak, there were always kindly, warning voices, saying, "Better keep out of this. It is really not your business, you know!"

The time has come for the church to engage in some straight talk on the whole labor situation. It is not yet too late for her to make a distinct contribution to this subject, if she approaches the matter fearlessly and fairly and informed. But the preacher who thinks of having somewhat to say, anent this question, must prepare himself to hear his closest and best friends (some of whom provide for the bulk of his church expenses) say, "You are skating on pretty thin ice, old man! You had better confine yourself to your job of pointing people to heaven, and telling them about the Bible!"

That was the trouble they had with Jesus! He didn't talk enough about Moses!—said the scribes and pharisees. He insisted on talking about high rents in Jerusalem, and excessive rates of interest on loans, and shady commercial transactions carried on in the very lobby of the temple! It was for that they nailed him to a cross. And any modern prophet who goes into this business of talking straight goods to all parties concerned—to mean and selfish capital, and cantankerous and unreasonable labor—must promise himself in advance that he has let himself in for something interesting. Moreover, he will find that he cannot enter upon the subject, at all, unless he proposes to take the consequences of his own audacity. He mustn't expect to stir up the animals on Sunday, and be reported in the papers on Monday, with the hope that everybody will forget what he said on Thursday. Not a bit of it. He will find himself in the predicament of the man who caught the bear by the tail, and was afraid to let go! He will be bombarded from both sides—if he has been fair—for both sides are almost equally culpable, unreasonable, and selfish. If he has told the truth about them, on Sunday, there will be certain elements, on both sides, ready to pounce upon him. But he will have the satisfaction of knowing that there are also certain other elements, on both sides, heartily agreeing with him, and hoping he may have the courage and patience to continue making his contribution to the cause of justice and the common weal.

It is time the church spoke! Roger Babson, in his regular letter to his constituency, dated April 18, says, "The need of the hour is not for more factories or materials, not for more railroads or steamships, not for more armies or navies—but for more education based on the plain teachings of Jesus." Babson is not speaking to the Central District Conference of the So-and-So Church, either; but to some twenty thousand of the biggest and brainiest business men of this country!

It would indeed be a cause for considerable chagrin to the church of America, if secular business had to lead the way toward a new appreciation of Jesus Christ.

CORRESPONDENCE

"The Good Man"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The title is a quotation from Lloyd C. Douglas from his recent article, "Saving the Minister's Soul." It is used incidentally; but all the more because it slips out naturally is it an indication of the author's conception. His title is meant to catch interest by turning what is expected upside down. It supposes that the minister is of course already a saved man. His work is saving others; himself he need not save. He is different from other men. What the world wants of him is that he be a scapegoat for their sins, a Levite to their priest, that now the Lord may do them good. The difference between them and him is that while they hope to finish good he must begin good, and stay good through the burden and heat of the day. He must have been a precocious child, preaching from the big rock in the back yard to his little sisters, breathing soul into little clay pigeons, and growing up in the ring of a halo. As for them, they will have their fling and sow their oats and then get converted, after which the minister will pastor them along with the bread of heaven unto everlasting life. In other words, he will follow out in miniature what his Lord is supposed to have done.

But, strangely, the minister does have his little dimnesses. There is a slight sense in which the tables are turned and he needs a little preaching, too. He needs to hear, say, two sermons a year! At present, "piety" is not the most popular word in his vocabulary, due to an infatuation that goes with modernity.

Add a degree to that statement; it is the most unpopular word. If the feeling is due to modernism, that dates back at least to our up-to-the-moment Lord, who checked the suave words of one of his congregation with the quick retort, "Why callest thou me good? One is good, even God." They were not able to pull off that sort of thing on him. Piety implies holier-than-thou superiority, hopeless advantage. Unless we recover for it a place among the common decencies it will be hateful to the real man. Two sermons will not persuade him to take it on. The trouble is with Mr. Douglas' conception of the minister's work. It is sacramental: a saintly person deals out saving preaching; salvation comes to the soul by hearing. But the truth is, salvation comes by preaching; not by the excellence of someone else's preaching, but in spite of foolishness when men do their own preaching.

What, then, is preaching? It is not declamation of some other's message or gospel. It is not being a silver-toned Christian Science reader. It is creating, good original work. It is thinking for God and speaking for him, as God, with authority, the truth, what one has discovered, what one knows is right and wills to be true. It is travail, and it is joy like that of the woman who brings forth a son. Does one stagnate who has such experiences? The heart is taxed, the system cleansed, the soul revived, the whole man renewed. It is with the minister as with the woman who is saved by her child-bearing. After such a thing does one complain of being spiritually depleted? Oh, there is the incidental weariness and weakness. There is peril. Sometimes there is miscarriage. But there is salvation, regeneration, the blessing of Mary, the joy of the Magnificat multiplied by Christmas.

Dare I imply that this sort of thing happens every time a minister addresses his congregation, which may be every day of the week and twice on Sunday? Surely that is too much to believe. Yes; and preaching must not be expected too often. A minister cannot prophesy to order, every time it is desired that he speak. Often he will teach, or illustrate, or tell the stories of old, or even quote and declaim. All this may be good work. The real preaching comes intermingled with his other contributions. It is more given to some ministers than to others. When it comes there is more soul-saving for him to whom it comes than for all who hear; and there is no salvation to be had by him elsewhere that can compare with this. And yet it is by no means for him alone. An audience that really hears, really participates in the preaching, is one with the preacher in labor and in reward. It helps him to open the spiritual reservoirs, to draw down inspiration. A regular congregation, a church, that is at one with its minister, extends its influence back into the minister's study, where, as he prepares, he knows its needs and feels its longings. That is what is meant by a praying church. Oh, a minister can preach much who has a church that cares. Always there are individuals who help him preach, but to have the multiplied power of a united hungry and consecrated church, that is to be a preacher indeed. A preacher can be of no use to sleepers or to the slow of heart. There is no automatic conveyance of good from one to other. There is no substitute for work, the work of receiving and thinking and performing. There is no being wise or being good by proxy. There is leadership, pioneering for those who come after, work for others, but not work in stead of others' work. Each must bear his own burden and do his own bringing-forth. The Protestant who lets the minister preach for him is as vain as the Romanist who lets the priest pray for him. Pray for yourselves, preach for yourselves. Each must work out his own salvation; and it is God that worketh in each.

The letter to the Philippians shows us two great ministers who saved their own souls. One was Paul. He says: "The things that mishappened to me made progress for the gospel, and I know that this shall turn out to my salvation." Paul the preacher in word preached also in deed, and his preaching was his salvation. Paul did not rely for his spirituality on getting in each year one good sermon from Peter and one from Apollos. The other was Jesus Christ. The fact that he saved his own soul the world has been blinded to overlook by the remark at the cross, "He saved others, himself he cannot save." But it is a word of God that the Captain of our Salvation was made perfect through suffering. Jesus saved himself, therefore he is able to captain others to their salvation. This saving of one's own soul is the part of every true man, and the minister is not exempt, for Paul was not exempt, neither was Jesus. What then becomes of this peculiar privileged class of just men who need no repentance, whom the world is trying always to set apart to do its dirty work of being good? The minister is one of the sons of men, having to work for a living, having to win through to salvation; and having suffered being tempted, he is thereby able to help those that are tempted. And whether or not his soul will be saved will depend as in every man's case on his being obedient unto death, dying daily, being baptized for the dead, as Paul was, as Jesus was. Why, saving the minister's soul is as common as saving anybody else's soul, so common a matter, indeed, that it is like breathing, the fundamental necessity, but too common to think of except once in a while, the while one is everlastingly busy doing it.

And that brings us to the bee of Mr. Douglas. We were saying that dying is salvation, and dying is daily, and daily dying is doing our daily business; and, yes, being busy is bee-like. But, O bee, where is thy sting? All America is afflicted with thee, but is it an affliction? Thou art traduced. But stay—Mr. Douglas says he refers to the bee bonnet. We must agree with him about that. We sympathize with his fine humor about the Sunny Sons and the Tri-Mu Fraternity. It is inglorious dying in the cause of fuss to no purpose. But the bee apis is a much needed example. She thinks it over all winter with a fine sabbath calm, she comes out early on her week days, hunts out her treasures, stores them away diligently, attending happily to her work, and when an enemy invades her sacred charge, she strikes red-hot and dies in the act, with no thought for her life, and God keep her true soul! Some contemner may say it is only gathering gold, the same silly process that stultifies the human race. But no; the bee sees the new life that will grow on this same honey; she dreams in her flights of the many queens that may be brought into the world through her sweet work. And so she goes humming to herself about the tasks. The homiletic habit is silly professionalism when one is simply gathering honey out of other hives to stock up one's own. But when one is busy changing pollen dust to ambrosia, or star dust to word of the Spirit, and leading others in the same way, then one is a creator, a happy son of God, and one asks no better salvation. Salvation is doing the will of the urge within, and it is God who urges.

The work of the ministry is not preaching for others to receive, but preaching that others may learn to preach; not telling the conclusion of the whole matter, as one preacher attempted, but stimulating others to think and create. When I preach, my conclusions are for myself, but my example is for my hearers. This work is for the perfecting of the saints unto the work of ministering, just as the Master's work was to get his disciples to be with him in the life he was living, in the sonship of God which was his character. His preaching was not a set of conclusions, or a code of morals for them, as Mr. Douglas says, but a way of life. Who can imagine Paul "struggling to gain a following for an exalted moral code?" His life was spent in challenge of code religion, the very error from which he had come into newness of life; and his gospel was a gospel not of a new content of religion but of freedom from man-made impositions in favor of spirit-conceptions and self-expressions. To be sure, he gave advice, and worked out principles, but his hope for his hearers was Christ in them, formed in them, speaking from them, a power of life and work. I recognize an influence that comes from the content of preaching; but I believe far more in the contagion of preaching. If only we had whole churches consecrated to the ministry we would be rid of the conception of a class of good men who are the people's religious substitutes. Then the professional minister could come into his own as a leader, a specialist in organization, in religious education, in theology, sociology, and other sciences.

"The good man" does not exist; but may the promise of good-men-to-be cheer us, and the danger of the loss of good men grip us. "Lest, while I preach to others, I become a cast-away"—so much Mr. Douglas quotes to good purpose. But he goes on to suggest a way of salvation which if followed by Paul would have caused him to seek the religious mediatorship of other apostles. Better far let Paul finish the sentence himself, giving us his way of salvation: "I buffet my body, I run, I strive in the games, I exercise self-control, I do all things for the gospel's sake, that I may be a joint partaker thereof."

Paul gave himself diligently to the saving of his soul. So must every minister. That will not abstract him from his ministry but will plunge him joyously and self-forgetfully into it. Of course he must study, must hear others, must get new ideas, must avoid peculiarities and conceits. But he must do his own thinking and creating, and therein will he be saved. None gets so much out of preaching as the preacher himself.

Boston, Mass.

MANLEY F. ALLBRIGHT.

The Other Side

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In the article in your paper of April 28 by Mr. Obadiah Holmes on "The Threat of Millennialism" the writer says, concerning premillennialism, "Only a dementalized textarian can accept it." This is a strange statement for a well informed man to make. Translated into simple words it means, I suppose, that only a crazy person can accept the texts of the New Testament as they are written—the many promises of the Lord's return.

The author makes no discrimination whatsoever in his sweeping denunciation. Every one who believes in the premillennial coming of Christ is a "dementalized textarian." Who are some of the people having so far lost their reason as to become fit subjects for the lunatic asylum? Well, for example, there was Charles Haddon Spurgeon, the greatest preacher of the nineteenth century. There was Arthur T. Pierson, editor of the world's greatest missionary magazine and author of the church's greatest battle cry—"The evangelization of the world in this generation." There was George Mueller who, by faith, fathered thousands of homeless orphans and became one of the greatest saints of the ages. There was A. J. Gordon, known the world around for his devotional spirit and his missionary vision. There was Dwight L. Moody, the greatest evangelist since the days of Paul. They called him "crazy Moody" when he was alive. He founded an institution that, in spite of the criticism against it, has sent a far larger number of missionaries to the fields of the world than all the combined colleges and institutions among the Disciples of Christ. Out yonder in China is a white-haired man by the name of Hudson Taylor, who has led eight hundred missionaries to China by his prayers. I think of the beloved Peter Ainslie, world figure, and most outstanding representative of the Disciples of Christ. I think of Dr. W. E. Macklin of China, one of the greatest missionaries who ever went forth. These men, according to the writer, are "dementalized textarians." If they are going to the lunatic asylum I want to go along with them for the privilege of being in their company!

But time would fail me to speak of men in every communion whose consecration and scholarly ability are the equal of any who oppose them, to say nothing of that great host of believers whose simple faith forms the basis for such an unjust caricature as "dementalized textarians."

Professor Harnack has said in one of his articles on this subject that "the advent hope can only be held along with the unsophisticated faith of the early Christians. I am not ashamed, in the midst of this wicked and adulterous generation, to add my simple testimony that for many years the hope of my Lord's return has been the daily inspiration of my life. It has made me a better, purer man, more zealous in missions, more optimistic in outlook. I allow no one to go beyond me in emphasis on spiritual things. I am a mystic. I know that he is in me, the hope of glory, and that when he shall be manifested, I, too, shall appear with him in glory. I cannot deny the deepest experiences of my heart.

I hold no brief for any who may be fanatical on this subject, or who may be taking unfair advantage of their brethren. That there are many such I do not question. There is wrong on both sides. This truth, however, does not make fanatics. It only reveals them. There is not a truth in the sacred Scriptures that has not been shamefully abused. Before us is a scylla and charybdis, the scylla of the scoffer who asks, "Where is the promise of his coming?" and the charybdis of those who wrest the Scriptures hard of understanding to their own destruction. Between the two I propose to sail, with his spirit as my guide, toward the "bright and morning star" until the day breaks and the shadows flee away.

Sir, I deplore bitterness and unbrotherliness, but I declare to you that for intolerance, arrogance and misrepresentation I have never read an article that surpasses the one in question. If these matters are to be brought into your paper I appeal to your sense of fairness to allow both sides to be represented in a full and free discussion in order that your readers may draw their own conclusions from the arguments presented. I suggest the names of Dr. Shailer Mathews and Dr. W. H. Griffith Thomas.

Richmond, Virginia.

J. B. HUNLEY.

Contributors To This Issue

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, member editorial staff of The Christian Century.

PETER AINSLIE, minister Christian Temple, Baltimore; president Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity.

LLOYD C. DOUGLAS, minister First Congregational Church, Ann Arbor, Mich.

The Bethany Graded Lessons

The kind of Sunday school literature that meets modern psychological requirements. Send for returnable samples.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn Street Chicago

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The "Pious"

ALL you have to do to provoke a smile of derision from your normal man is to allude to another fellow as "pious." "What kind of a chap is he?" "Oh, one of the pious kind"—and he is dismissed with a sneer. "Pious" suggests the long face, the white tie, the Bible under the arm, the Pharisaical pose, the questionable character. It is a case of a good word gone wrong. "Pious" is a good word. To be pious means to possess loyalty and to be conscientious in doing one's duty. A pious wife is a dutiful, loyal wife. A pious husband is a devoted and honestly industrious husband. A pious son or daughter is one who in love discharges every filial duty and constantly expresses loyalty. To be loyal and dutiful is to be a mighty fine type. We will do well, then, to strip this word of its garments of rags and to clothe it again in the fair and becoming dress which belongs to it. To be a "pious" church member—one who watches to do his duty—one who is loyal to Christ and his church—is to be the best kind.

Now what we need above everything else today is "pious" homes. A "pious" home would be one where father, mother, and children would live in such a love that every duty would be cheerfully performed and every loyalty happily maintained. There are more good homes (I am not talking about houses) in America today than ever before (I have to bat an eye when I say this!) but the forces that tend to destroy the home were never more subtle, nor stronger.

Housing conditions tend to disrupt homes. The story of overcrowding is a sad one. I once wrote a thesis comparing the housing conditions in Chicago and New York. Sometimes ten or more people live in one room. There can be little joy, not to say decency, under such circumstances. Think of the little children—with white, pinched little faces—with little air and no pure sunshine. As I sit here in a flood of Florida sunshine I shudder to think of the holes called homes of thousands of children. When you go to a city to see the homes, you are shown a few streets, lined with palaces, but you never think of the stinking, reeking, crowded, noisy, smoke-cursed rookeries and shacks where far more people dwell. You cannot have good family life without a good, sanitary house, and much more time and thought should be bestowed upon housing. I commend for your study the garden cities of England.

Another factor which breaks up family life is the diverse interests of the members of the little group: Father is absorbed in making money, Mother is devoted to social climbing, Brother is wild over the movies and games, and Sister is crazy over parties, dances and clothes. There is little in common. The maid serves breakfast to one person at a time, no one is home for lunch and as soon as dinner is over each one makes a break for some different place. Now and then the family gets together at church, although Mother may be interested in Christian Science, Father may be a hard-shelled Baptist—who sleeps in the pew—while Brother and Sister are so exhausted by the week's revelry that they "sleep in." This unhappy situation is varied by the new "week-end" craze, in which case the family goes to four different places on Saturday or Friday and returns all out of sorts Sunday night. As for "family prayers"—this custom is almost extinct—so rare as not to deserve attention in a study of facts. Lamentable—but true.

Every father ought to call together the family and organize it. Some fundamental common sense and some good, reliable religion should be worked into the acute situation. It is one thing to build up a business, it is another to build up a home. It is one thing to shine among the 400, it is another to be a good mother. It is one thing to be a graceful dancer and another to be a gracious daughter. It is one thing to make a touchdown and another to make your mother's heart happy.

JOHN R. EWERS.

*Lesson for May 22, "The Christian Family." Scripture Luke 10:38-42; 2:51, 52; 2 Tim. 3:14, 15.

British Table Talk

London, April 18, 1921.

THE miner's strike is still unsettled, but the greater peril which threatened us last week is averted. It was a near thing. It would be very hard to find responsible citizens who really wanted what would have been almost a general strike, yet in the end the thing which scarcely anybody wanted nearly came to pass. One cause for comfort there is in the remembrance of last week. There may have been blunders on all hands in negotiations. In the triangular dealings between miners, owners and the government it must have been hard for the representatives of each side to know the mind of the others. There may have been a lack of wisdom and even of common sense, but the temper was good throughout and there were fewer rash words than in any previous crisis of which I have had experience. Public opinion was on the whole singularly calm and serious. It is always to public opinion the last appeal must be made. A strike is an appeal to force, but it is never settled by force, and there is encouragement in the memory that during a week when we seemed on the verge of a great disaster the mind of the nation did not yield to panic.

* * *

What Has Christianity to Say?

What the Christian church can do in such hours it is hard to say. There was a time when such men as Bishop Westcott or Cardinal Manning played a great part in the settlement of industrial disputes; Westcott in Durham among the miners and the cardinal in East London among the dockers, showed what powers of leadership the church might have, but I am afraid that in the last two decades there has been a growing impatience on the part of labor to listen to the spokesmen of the church. And yet, even now, a leader with courage and faith and knowledge might win a hearing. One thing however the workers will not tolerate. It has been called "babbling in vacuo"—the sonorous utterance of general principles which are not meant to be brought into any vital relation with things as they are. On this matter Mr. Archibald Ramage, the secretary of the League of Faith and Labor, has written wise and relevant words:

"Either Christianity has something to say or it hasn't; hence the drift from the church. But some of us believe that it has something to say. We do not suggest that ready-made answers are always available for concrete situations, but the fact that answers are not easily found does not absolve us from the task of seeking them. It is by a continual search for Christian principles and examination of modern industry in the light of such principles, an examination illumined by experiment and codified by legislation, that human progress in industry and social life is achieved. In any industrial question some facts are available, although all ex parte statements need to be tested. To these facts, when sifted, certain moral considerations must be applied." The same writer declares that the days are past when the church thought for us—but now it must help us to think for ourselves and he closes with this moving appeal to all preachers: "I appeal to you and to all whom God has given power of utterance to speak to the hearts and minds of men so that after study, experiment, adventure and prayer, the system of modern industry shall be re-created upon a moral basis, having as its pillars human personality, human service and human fellowship."

* * *

The New Speaker of the House

It is certain that the new speaker of the house of commons will be Mr. Whitley. He belongs to a family honorably and intimately connected with Yorkshire Congregationalism, and there is no man in public life whom the Congregational churches could claim as a better example of their gifts to the nation.

Unlike some who began their public life among the free churches and afterwards have conformed to the church of England, Mr. Whitley remains among her own people and is a diligent and faithful member of his church in Halifax. The Whitley Councils bear his name. They were created by the commission of which he was chairman and show how great a concern he has in industrial problems and how in cooperation he finds the way out of our tangles. These councils have done much, and would have done more if labor had looked on them with a more friendly eye. But they seemed to large numbers of labor men only a capitalist sop. They were intended to supply a means whereby all parties concerned in an industry might think and plan together. It is along some such lines that the best hopes of a peaceful settlement of our troubles must be sought, and in the future the Whitley Councils may come to play a great part in the life of the nation.

* * *

Denominational Labels of British Statesmen

The denominational labels of our leading men show a bewildering variety. The prime minister is a Baptist. The particular Baptist church to which he belongs is a small one and has its own distinctive doctrine on the method of administering baptism. Mr. Lloyd George said of it in words like this: "It is a most vital distinction; it is a matter of life and death; I would go to the stake for it—but I forget what it is." The prime minister is a loyal Baptist. The speaker is a Congregationalist. The lord chancellor was brought up I believe but is no longer to be found among Methodists. The leader of the house of commons was trained among the Unitarians. The viceroy of India, the governor of Palestine and Mr. Montague, the under-secretary for India, are all Jews, and the successor to Lord French in Ireland, Lord Edmund Talbot, is a Roman Catholic. It may be said that most Englishmen have reached a point at which they have ceased to think denominationally in matters of state. It is a striking fact, however, that in this country very few men of anti-Christian views hold high place in the counsels of the nation. Mr. J. M. Robertson is at the present time the only exception to this rule that I can recall. He has a place of honor in the Liberal Federation. He is a political writer and speaker, very generally respected for his sincerity and ability by those who count his works on the origin of Christianity dangerous and even blasphemous. But England in this matter is not like France, where many of the leading statesmen are frankly anti-Christian, nor is labor in this country anti-Christian. Most of its spokesmen are Christian in sympathy and some of them had their first lessons in speaking in village pulpits.

* * *

Atheistic and Other Propaganda

Those who have better means of learning the facts than I have, tell me that atheistic propaganda has suffered heavily in recent times. The orators in the parks who try to disprove the Christian faith do not find it easy to win hearers. Some of their former pitches are deserted. On the other hand there is a vast increase in the number of spiritualists, and the question of spiritualistic manifestations has become good copy for newspapers. Several of our Sunday papers give great space to the revelations of the other side and books come in great numbers. It is claimed by its critics, however, that these waves of spiritualism come at intervals and then ebb away. Without doubt a favorable moment came for the winning of many hearts for such teachings when the war desolated so many homes and shifted for countless souls the center of interest to that other side. No Christian minister can escape from the question, "Have I left some questions unanswered which these others are answering?"

It may be with spiritualism, as with Christian Science, they may be protests against a neglect of certain Christian truths. There is always a nemesis which follows upon neglect. But as Browning said, "How hard it is to be a Christian!" How hard it is to keep the fullness of the balance and the amazing breadth of the Christian revelation!

* * *

A Book on Sadhu Sundar Singh

Last year we had with us at our May meetings the Sadhu Sundar Singh. He is no longer to be seen in his yellow robe, or to be heard uttering his eastern parables, but much of his story and of his wisdom is recalled in the book recently issued, "The Sadhu." Here is a work written by two authors in collaboration. One, Canon Streeter, an Oxford don; the other an Indian scholar, Mr. Appasamy, who bears distinctions from Madras, Harvard and Hartford, and the subject a living Christian mystic from the east! There could scarcely be found a more telling instance of the new links and associations which the modern world is making possible. Canon Streeter has suffered as a heretic in his own church, though few men have more weight in scholarship and few in any church have a name like his for disinterested loyalty to truth. He is condemned by certain critics for his views on biblical criticism. He is indeed one of the scholars whom the Sadhu himself would pity because they have the "influenza of higher criticism," and yet with deep sympathy and understanding Canon Streeter writes of his Indian brother in Christ.

It should not be said that Canon Streeter writes alone, because at all points he has worked with his Indian colleague, and yet the final drafting has been by one hand. The Sadhu himself is revealed in at least one new light; in his own words upon hell, so much like the words of other great mystics, he writes, "Thus hell also is a training school, a place of preparation for home. Those in hell know that it is not their home because they suffer there. Men were not created for hell and therefore do not enjoy it, and when these desire to escape to heaven they do so, but they find heaven even more uncongenial than hell, so they return. But this convinces them that there is something wrong in their lives, and thus they are gradually led to repentance." And in the revelation made to him he was told that very few would be lost. "It is so, but don't tell," they said, "because it will make men careless and we want them to enjoy the first heaven, that is, the heaven on earth—as well." The book has a real value for the student of mysticism, and the prayer of everyone who reads it will be for this young Indian mystic, so deeply rooted in Christ, that he may be to India all and even more than all that St. Francis was to Europe. He has survived the persecution in Tibet; he has survived so far the curiosity and the praise of the western world which is more deadly to the soul than persecution, and now may he take to the road again among his own people!

* * *

A Way the Fowler's Eye Hath Not Seen

There is a lovely upland in Sussex where the gorse is very thick in spring, and the heather in August. It was there I spent the days of last week. I had not been there since the late days of August, 1914, when through the heather we went down to the village postoffice to inquire whether the Germans had reached Paris. To that same postoffice through the gorse we went down last week to inquire if the big strike had begun. But the Germans never reached Paris, and the big strike has not begun. Yet in that solitary place, amid the calm of the countryside, the thought could not but visit me, Are we designed forever to live on the edge of disaster, or is there no way of wisdom for man as true and inevitable as the way that the stars keep and the flowers and the seasons? And there was no doubt what is the answer. There is a way that the fowler's eye hath not seen. There is an eternal wisdom revealed unto man, and in the way of that wisdom is life, and every other way leads to death.

EDWARD SHILLITO.

The Books Close in Less than Sixty Days

IN LESS THAN SIXTY DAYS
BY THE BOOKS
of the
ACTION UNITED CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF WILL CLOSE

They will contain a permanent record of your church's giving for missions and benevolences in nine months.

ARE YOU READY?

Has your church raised 3-4 of its budget for the year?
Has your Bible School made an offering?

Have all offerings been sent in?

If yours is not a budget church, has it suffered with Christ to save a lost world?

How about your Bible School, Endeavor Society and Woman's Society? Have they helped even a little to win the world to Christ?

If not, why not?

Will the record be satisfying and gratifying?
or will it be

Disappointing to you, the world, and to Christ?

THE TIME IS SHORT
BUT IT IS NOT TOO LATE

To lead every member of your church into the joy of fellowship with Christ in service.

TO MAKE A RECORD
Of service in these nine months that will give your church an abiding place in the books of men and of angels and that

Will be an EVERLASTING JOY

UNITED CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY

Promotional Department

1501 Locust Street, ST. LOUIS

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Congregational Council Will Meet in July

The Congregational Council will meet in Los Angeles in July. This is a strong Congregational city, and it is believed that there will be a good attendance at the meeting, though Congregational representatives must pay their own expenses, even though representing associations. The Concordat with the Episcopalians will come up for further discussion. Since the Lambeth Conference, the Congregational leaders are much more sanguine about the Concordat issuing in something that is practical. The Congregational World Movement will be considered, and it is likely that the organization will be considerably modified. The number of candidates for the ministry in Congregational institutions is distressingly small, and an effort will be made to increase these. The Congregational denomination has in the past recruited its ministry to a considerable extent from the ministry of other denominations, but there is a growing sentiment in favor of training up their own. In this connection the denominational colleges would have to be strengthened, and much larger funds secured for education. The matter of trained lay workers in the churches will be considered as one of the urgent needs of the hour. The Congregational denomination is increasing in esprit de corps, and in recent years there has been a large increase in the income of the denomination for benevolent purposes. In 1919 this income was $1,697,800, while in 1920 it was $2,730,400. There are six thousand Congregational churches in America, and of these 2,400 gave little or nothing to the denominational funds. It is hoped to recruit these to have some fellowship with missionary enterprises.

Great Gifts in the South for Education

The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will put on a drive on May 29 for $33,000,000 with which to double the present holdings of their educational institutions. Fifteen millions will be used for buildings and equipment and the remainder for endowment. Ninety-one institutions will participate in the benefits of the drive. There are 2,200,000 members in the denomination, and the funds sought will amount to an average of three dollars a year, or five years for each member of the church. This is the second great drive on the part of this denomination, and it is significant that the benefits of this one will all go to education.

Baptist Women Celebrate Jubilee of Organized Work

The masculine contingent in the churches looked on with some suspicion and misapprehension when the women a half century ago or more began organizing missionary societies of their own. Women's organization had always been frowned upon as dangerous. The last week in April the Baptist women of America celebrated the jubilee of their organization. It seems like a long time since people would object to women carrying on a program of education for foreign missions. A half century of missionary effort has discovered for the church a great force which for centuries was unutilized. The woman's society has inspired thousands of young women to give their lives for missionary work, which is all pure gain.

Annual Meeting of World Alliance for International Friendship

The sixth annual meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship will be held in Chicago May 17-19. This event will be far and away the biggest event for the Christian people of the city for the month. Distinguished guests from outside the city will furnish a great program. Among these are William Jennings Bryan, Edward A. Filene, John Spargo, Jane Addams, Dr. Aked, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, Dr. Arthur J. Brown and Rev. Samuel A. Eliot. Among the subjects which will be discussed are the following: "Reduction of Armaments," "The Establishment of Right Relations with China and Japan," "America's Responsibility in World Conditions," International Friendship and the Churches," "United States and Mexico," "Christian Unity the Basis for World Friendship," and "A United World." The evening sessions will be held in Medinah Temple, one of the largest auditoriums in the city. In connection with this meeting there will be a congress on the reduction of armaments. The Chicago Church Federation is acting as host for the meeting.

Welsh Free Christians Hold National Meeting

The national meeting of the free-churchmen of Wales was held recently and the various public questions that are related to religion were considered. The organization pledged itself to the support of the Welsh temperance bill. There has been a movement on in Wales to open the moving picture theaters on Sundays. This will be opposed by the churches. In days gone by the feeling between Episcopalians and the free churchmen was not cordial, but this is improving under disestablishment. The Bishop of St. David's spoke from the same platform as the president of the assembly in a Baptist church on the subject of the League of Nations.

Conference on Christian Ministry

The Fifteenth Annual Conference of Eastern College Men on the Christian Ministry was held in Cambridge, Mass., April 8-10. There were a large number of delegates from many of the colleges and universities of New England. A noteworthy address was delivered by Rev. W. L. Sperry, pastor of Central Congregational church of Boston, who asserted that "the preacher with his two sermons each Sunday has greater opportunities to reach and to influence the lives of other men than has the man in any other calling. The conference laid great stress upon the studious habits of the minister, asserting that his forenoons must be kept clear for scholarly pursuits, if he is to be of real help to his people.

Would Erect Monument to Memory of Missionary Leader

The United Christian Missionary Society has appointed a committee whose duty it will be to plan a suitable memorial to the memory of the late Rev. A. McLean, missionary leader of the Disciples of Christ. The committee is composed of Rev. George A. Campbell, Mrs. T. W. Grafton, Mrs. Maude Ferris, Rev. L. N. D. Wells and Rev. C. M. Chilton. Recently a district convention in Ohio voted to recommend that the body of Mr. McLean should be removed from the Cincinnati cemetery and taken to the Campbell burying ground in Bethany, W. Va. The committee will consider other memorials, however, than the building of a tomb in a cemetery, and is asking for suggestions from the rank and file of the church.

New Testament in the Vernacular

The late King Alexander of Greece allowed the new testament in modern Greek to enter Greece. Formerly it was smuggled in by immigrants from the United States, but at the present time, in spite of the law, thousands of copies are in circulation in Athens. Bible study circles have been organized. The Orthodox church has tried to enforce the circulation of the classic edition of the new testament, but the people will in the long run overrule an order which prevents a large number of believers from being able to study the holy scriptures.

Disciples Encouraged in Underwritings Campaign

At a meeting of the promotional committee charged with the raising of the underwritings of the Interchurch World Movement, held in St. Louis May 3, it was announced that Euclid Avenue Disciples church of Cleveland had voted to give five thousand dollars toward the fund. This equals the largest gift yet given, that of the Union Avenue church of St. Louis. Rev. A. E. Cory is in charge of the campaign and he expresses the greatest confidence that the Disciple money will all be raised for the Interchurch fund within the coming month.

State Convention Season for Disciples of Christ

During May and June many state conventions of the Disciples of Christ will be held. The Indiana convention is announced for Tipton, May 16-19. At this convention the prominent feature will be a series of addresses by Prof. A. W. Taylor. The Ohio convention will be held at Marion, May 23-26. Other May conventions are those in Texas and Virginia. June conventions will be held in east Oregon, Idaho, Inland Empire, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Tennessee. These conventions concern themselves largely with church extension within the state and with methods of church work. A section of each convention is given over to the women, and in most of the states the interests of the national societies and of the state educational institution are presented.

Pessimism in the Christian World

The war has left an amazing amount of pessimism among Christian leaders. Dr. Algernon Sidney Crapsey, an ex-communicated minister of the Protestant Episcopal church, declares that the Great War will be known in world history as the end of the Christian era. A recent statement by Rev. Minot Simons, secretary of the department of church extension of the American Unitarian Association, is less drastic but is full of disappointment. He says: "The secretary's disillusionment is now complete as to the immediate spiritual effect of the Great War on organized religion." In many other quarters there has been similar discouragement. Christian leaders generally agree that a war is no builder of Christianity or of Christian ideals but rather a destroyer.

Dr. Fitch Evangelizes College Students

The task of presenting the Christian gospel to students is no easy one, and in the selection of speakers for this work the Y. M. C. A. and other organizations exercise great care. Recently Dr. Albert Parker Fitch was invited to Brown University to speak to the students. He took as his themes, "Science and Religion," "Morality and Religion," "Was Jesus a Moral or a Religious Leader?" and "The Qualifications of a Religious Man." The students were allowed to question the speaker at the close. Dr. Fitch granted private interviews during the day, and his office was thronged. Four days were spent in this way and the whole university was filled with a new interest in religion.

Town Could Not Live Without Churches

The town of Liberal, Mo., has an interesting history. It was founded by a man by the name of G. H. Walser, a Spiritualist, who conceived the notion of founding a town with liberal ideas. This was to be a haven for spiritualists and free-thinkers. The town charter provided that no church or saloon should ever be located. In time however the saloon came, and then followed the church. The free-thought university located in the town proved to be inadequate for the moral training of the young people. At the present time there are two churches, Disciples and Methodist. The effort to run a community without a church has proven a dismal failure.

Memory of John Huss Still Popular

The name of John Huss is still revered in Bohemia, and strangely enough he is the patron saint of the secular societies as well as of the evangelicals of that country. As an evangelistic measure the Protestant movement recently held memorial services in various sections of Bohemia in honor of the great martyr of human liberty. In connection with these meetings the call was issued to the people to leave the church that killed John Huss. Two hundred thousand people have transferred their membership from the Roman Catholic church this year on this call. Those who brought about the death of John Huss hardly realized that after more than five hundred years this man would still be making converts to the Protestant faith.

Church Union in Jugo-Slavia

The war has not brought religious tolerance to the world but has if anything accentuated religious bitterness. In Jugo-Slavia there has been much religious persecution of late, and this has driven the evangelical bodies to find fellowship with one another in the common cause. There are 480,000 Christians of the various denominations usually called evangelical, and these have agreed to enter into a church union. This will give them a stronger arm in dealing with catholic and political leaders who have made life hard for them.

Unitarians of New England Hold a Retreat

The Unitarians of New England held a retreat at Weston, Mass., recently. This is an annual custom of the denomination in recent years. It represents a definite attempt to turn aside somewhat from the over-emphasis upon the rationalistic elements of religion to those which are mystical. Rev. Augustus M. Lord of Providence preached the sermon from the record of the teaching of Jesus. It dwelt upon the fact that many fell away from the teaching of Jesus because they did not really understand it. The preacher of the liberal message has the consolation of looking forward to larger things for his message through the labors of the understanding few, was the contention of the preacher of the day.

Presbyterians Doing Better by Their Ministers

The agitation for a juster wage for ministers has borne fruit in many sections of the country. The Presbyterians have always been more generous in the way of salaries than some other denominations, but they are making further increases. Henceforth a volunteer for home mission work will receive a minimum of $1,800 per year. In the state of Pennsylvania, the strongest state for Presbyterianism, 436 churches have advanced the salary of their ministers an aggregate of $225,000, or $460 each. In that state there are only fifty ministers receiving less than $1,200 per year.

Unitarian Laymen's League Sends Men to Chicago

The Laymen's League of the Unitarian church which last year sent a large number of men to Harvard to the Summer School of Theology, will this year send a number of Meadville men to Chicago. Meadville instructors will give courses, and the students will be given quarters in the Baptist Missionary Training School of the city. The liberal denominations with headquarters in the east are becoming increasingly conscious of the importance of the middle west in the future of religion in America.

Universalists Find a Job for Their Laymen

The women of the church have long been organized for special duty, but the various organizations for men have had a hard time making good. Some of the denominational brotherhoods have disappeared and others exist only feebly. The Universalists have organized the

Bishop Manning Approaches Confirmation

THE leading religious denomination in New York is the Protestant Episcopal church. The consecration of Rev. William T. Manning, D. D., at an early date as bishop of the diocese is in itself a very significant event. He will be the spiritual father of more than a hundred thousand souls, and it is said that the work of the churches in his diocese will influence a total of 350,000. The work is so great that he has asked for two suffragan bishops. The last bishop is said to have literally been worked to death. The consecration of the new bishop will occur in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on May 11. Bishop Tuttle, assisted by Bishop Lawrence, will consecrate Dr. Manning to his new responsibilities.

Dr. Manning leaves vacant the largest Episcopalian parish in the world. Trinity church has 8,500 communicants, and has endowments invested in lands and city property which bring in an income of a million dollars a year. The leader of this vast enterprise is always one of the most prominent figures of the denomination. Rev. Samuel S. Drury, D. D., rector of St. Paul's School at Concord, N. H., has been selected as the next rector of Trinity parish. The two suffragan bishops are yet to be elected. They will be men of large influence in the denomination.

In the matter of salaries, New York is the most fortunate place for a minister of religion to be. The bishop of New York has a salary of fifteen thousand dollars, and lives in a house which is worth $150,000. His assistants receive $7,500 each. The rector of Trinity church receives a salary of fifteen thousand. While there is a Reformed church in New York paying a salary equally high, there are no ecclesiastical positions in America with a higher salary.

The cathedral in which the next bishop will be consecrated is to be the greatest ecclesiastical structure in America. When completed, it will have cost between $12,000,000 and $15,000,000. While a number of noteworthy cathedral churches are in construction in America, none will excel this one in beauty or magnificence.

Universalist Comrades, and this organization in a single season has shown great vitality. A recent meeting was held in the City Club in Boston at which there were three hundred men present, and in other cities there are strong chapters. They are making a survey of the manpower of the various Universalist churches, and propose to furnish lay speakers for various occasions. A special missionary enterprise is the location of a Boys' Home in Japan, which is making a large appeal to the men.

Viviani Defines Religion of France

M. Viviani, who came to this country recently on a special mission from France, spoke by invitation to the Federal Council Commission on Relations with France and Belgium. He said: "Do not forget that we are a nation of tolerance, believers in religious liberty, that we are a people of strong faith, and that we protect and respect all religious faiths. A great French statesman, who was also an illustrious poet, Lamartine, characterizes France as the 'Christ of Humanity.' It is true in a deep and reverent sense—France has suffered for all peoples. That is still our mission, and we need your moral and spiritual help, and your affectionate cooperation in our future mission."

Disciples Church Builds Clubhouse for Women

First Christian church of Ft. Worth, Tex., called to its pastorate ten years ago a young minister, L. D. Anderson, who would come only on condition that a new church building was erected. Six years ago the new structure was completed at a cost of two hundred thousand dollars, and it is now paid for. The next enterprise of this alert congregation is to erect a building to be used as a clubhouse for women. It will cost $200,000 and will afford a home for 165 young women. Various home conveniences will be provided for them. Half of the money has already been secured and the work will go forward on the clubhouse this coming year. The minister has taken into the church during his ten years' pastorate over two thousand new members.

Chicago Congregationalism Hears Lloyd Douglas at Club Dinner

The Congregational Club of Chicago recently gave a dinner at Hotel Sherman with Dr. Lloyd C. Douglas, minister First Congregational church, Ann Arbor, Mich., as chief speaker. About 300 persons were present. Dr. Douglas spoke on "The Higher and the Highest Education," dealing with objects of religion which appear particularly in a university constituency. Over one hundred faculty members of the University of Michigan are members of Dr. Douglas' church and the church is thronged with students. It would be difficult to say whether Dr. Douglas' address stressed harder the principle of academic liberty and reverence, or his own confession of evangelical faith. His sharp turns of sentences which have made his piquant style peculiarly attractive to Christian Century readers and readers of his charming and illuminating book, "Wanted—A Congregation," kept his audience eagerly listening for an hour and a half. Dr. William E. Barton presented a memorial tribute to Dr. Gunsaulus for the permanent records of the club.

Universalists Establish an Itinerant Ministry

The Universalists think that the big churches should not have a monopoly of the good preaching. They have an arrangement for sending out their very strongest preachers on itineraries among the weak churches that the latter may find encouragement and new strength. At the present time Rev. Frederick W. Perkins, pastor of First Universalist church of Lynn, Mass., is making an itinerary of the smaller churches in Illinois and Indiana. During his absence from his pulpit, Rev. L. S. McCollister of Tufts Theological School will supply his pulpit. The work of Mr. Perkins in the middle west is directed from the western headquarters of the Universalist denomination in Chicago.

Churchmen Favor New Film Measure

The censorship fight with regard to the movie films has been lost in state after state this winter, though there are good indications that such measures will carry in New York and Massachusetts shortly. In California there is a bill before the legislature which is favored by churchmen as obviating some of the disadvantages of putting film control into the hands of a few people. The Eden bill provides that the reviewing of films shall be in the hands of the Superintendent of Public Instruction and a board nominated by the state Board of Education. Submission of the films would be compulsory, but the power to forbid exhibition would not be lodged in this board. In case a film was approved, the teachers would be allowed to announce this fact. Lists of approved films would be on file to submit to those exhibitors who wished to run clean shows. This list would also be useful to churches in fighting the immoral tendencies of the cinema.

Presbyterians Will Have a Church for the Jackies

The naval school at Annapolis brings young men from all parts of the United States to study for service in the United States Navy. It is felt that the young men of this city have been neglected and better church facilities will be provided for them in the future. The Presbyterians have been holding church services in an old opera house. They will build a new churchly building, financing this enterprise from the funds of the New Era Movement. The church is to be called the National Presbyterian church on account of the fact that the membership is drawn from all of the different states of the union.

President of the United States a C. E. Alumnus

Dr. F. E. Clark and some other prominent workers in the Christian Endeavor movement recently made President Harding an honorary alumnus of the Christian Endeavor Society. The ceremony was held at the White House on Sunday afternoon, April 24. Surrounding Dr. Clark were fifty representative pastors and Christian Endeavor leaders from the nation's capital, representing the various religious denominations. An amusing incident of the formal ceremony was the stubbornness of the pin that was presented. Neither Dr. Clark nor Mr. Percy Foster could open the pin. Dr. E. B. Bagby, a Disciple minister, was heard to suggest, "Perhaps Mrs. Harding can

California School Calls Dean Stauffer

THE southern branch of the University of California is located in Los Angeles. This school provides courses for students during the first two years of their university work, after which they must go up to Berkeley to complete their studies. The University of California is greatly crowded, being now the largest university of the country, with over ten thousand students. Hence there is need of further educational opportunities in the city of Los Angeles.

Last year the Disciples of Christ raised over $800,000 for the opening of what they call the California School of Christianity. The trustees of this organization immediately called to the financial headship of the organization Rev. F. M. Rogers, then the state secretary of southern California. Prof. C. F. Cheverton of Eureka College was called to the faculty along with Dr. D. A. Russell, Rev. C. R. Hudson and Prof. C. A. Cole. Recently an educational head for the enterprise has been secured in the person of Dr. Vernon Stauffer of Hiram College. Dr. Stauffer was trained at Union Theological Seminary and at Columbia University, where he received the degrees of A. M. and Ph.

D. He has served as a minister as well as a college administrator. His title will be dean.

Two dormitories are being erected for the use of the school this spring, a dormitory for girls and a dormitory for boys. At present the classes of the new school are being held in the Wilshire Boulevard Disciples church. The California School of Christianity will give religious courses to state university students during the first two years of their work in the university, and will offer the courses of a standard college for the last two years of the collegiate course to students who do not wish to go north to Berkeley. The authorities of the University of California are already embarrassed by the magnitude of their educational problem and they have welcomed the coming of the Disciples educational enterprise as it relieves the state of a part of its heavy responsibility. There is no other Disciples educational institution in the state of California, and the Disciples are relatively strong in that state. It is believed, therefore, that the new school, which fills a rather unique place in the educational world, is destined to have a very prosperous future.

open it with a hair-pin." President Harding in accepting the pin said: "I think I may say, however, in this connection, that, tolerant though I have been and am, and hope I ever shall be, in the matter of the religious thought and belief of the peoples of every land, I may confidently assert it to be my strong belief that what this world needs today, in its distress and want, is more Christianity, and a more pronounced religious tolerance as between denominations, both of which ideals are strongly represented by the Christian Endeavor movement."

Chicago Churches Took Wounded Soldiers to Church

There are ten hospitals in Chicago in which wounded soldiers are slowly regaining their health. The Chicago Church Federation sent out a communication to the churches about the needs of these young men. On May 8 the churches sent automobiles and hauled to church the invalids that were able to go. Those unable to leave the buildings were presented with flowers. The occasion was Mothers' Day and in the various churches visited sermons were preached appropriate to the day.

Movie Film Sets Forth Presbyterian Work

At the annual meeting of the Presbyterian General Board of Education in New York recently, there was an advance exhibition of a film setting forth the problems of the Presbyterian colleges. The film has been prepared for use at the General Assembly at Winona Lake and after its use there it will be exhibited in Presbyterian churches all over the land. The film is called "Men of Tomorrow." The New Era Movement has been using some of its money as "challenge funds," and as result of the lure of the New Era money, a total of nearly five million dollars has been raised the past year for college buildings and endowment. The Presbyterian General Board of Education has elected Dr. M. Willard Lampe as associate secretary in charge of the university department. Dr. Lampe will have headquarters in Chicago. Most of the leading denominations of America are either locating their main missionary administration in Chicago, as the Methodists have done, or else are establishing branches here as the Congregationalists and Universalists have done.

New Bible House Dedicated in New York

The New York Bible Society has recently finished the new Bible House, which is located at 5 East 48th street. On Monday evening, April 25, the house was formally dedicated by Bishop-Elect Manning, of the Protestant Episcopal church. In connection with the dedicatory services he prayed for the time when we should "all be drawn nearer together

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

in outward and visible, as well as inward and spiritual unity, so that in the sight of all men there may be one fold as well as one shepherd." The building is the gift to the society from the estate of Mr. James Talcott, and is valued at $250,000. It is of unusual beauty and contains sales-rooms, board and committee rooms, kitchens and serving facilities, an assembly room, and a fine gothic study. A roof garden is a unique feature. The New York Bible Society is known for its conservative business policy. It never makes any debts, always measuring the work which it does by the resources which are at hand.

WANTED

Local representatives, men and women, to take orders for books of all kinds in their community; generous commissions Box Z, care The Christian Century.

BOOK OF PRAYERS

Complete Manual of several hundred terse, pointed, appropriate Prayers for use in Church, Prayer Meetings, Young People's Society, Sunday Schools, Missionary, Grace and Sentimental Prayers. Question of How and What to Pray in Public fully covered by model, suggestive and devout Prayers. Vest Pocket size, 128 pages. Cloth 25c, Morocco 35c, postpaid, stamps taken. Agents Wanted. GEO. W. NOBLE, Menon Building, Chicago, Ill.

WHEN YOU GO TO THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

You are invited to attend the
VERMONT AVENUE
CHRISTIAN CHURCH

Earle Wilfley, Pastor.

Earl Taggart, Assistant.

"Now here is a book for that Pastor of yours"

"Of course he doesn't need it; if he did you wouldn't dare to show it to him. It is called 'Wanted—A Congregation,' and its author is Lloyd C. Douglas. It is part fiction and part pastoral theology, but it is all wonderfully good. Not even the night watchman could go to sleep over it; and while your pastor, as I said, doesn't need it, he knows some pastor who does, and will know just how to get it to him without hurting his feelings. One big thing about this book is that it makes a distinction between a congregation and an audience. Any one of a dozen recipes can be written for getting an audience; it is a matter of tricks or of special aptitudes. But every preacher, no matter what his limitations as a performer, must get a congregation or get out of the ministry."

This is what The Epworth Herald says of Dr. Douglas' remarkable book, "Wanted—A Congregation." Buy a copy for your pastor—or for yourself.

Price, $1.75 plus 10 cents postage

The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

Peake's Commentary on the Bible

An Entirely New Commentary in One Volume

Just published and received with extraordinary enthusiasm as an epoch-making work of marvellous value and indispensable to all intelligent lovers of the Bible, whether lay or clerical.

Edited by ARTHUR S. PEAKE, M.A., D.D.

Rylands Professor of Biblical Exegesis in the University of Manchester.

With the assistance for the New Testament of
A. J. GRIEVE, M.A., D.D.

Principal of Congregational Hall, Edinburgh.

Introduction by

MELANCTHON WOOLSEY STRYKER, D.D., LL.D.

Formerly President of Hamilton College, author of
"English Bible Versions and Origins," etc.

A STAFF OF SIXTY-ONE CONTRIBUTORS

Numerous Special Supplemental Articles.

The Latest Scholarship. Over 1,000 Double-column Pages with Maps, Full Index, Bibliographies, Etc.

"The best work of its kind."—PROFESSOR SANDAY.

"Such a book as this has long been wanted."—Times Literary Supplement

"The very best handy Commentary published."—Methodist Times.

Price $4.00, plus 20 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

FAITH-BUILDING BOOKS

Belief and Life

By Principal W. R. Selbie

Price $1.25

Modern Belief in Immortality

By Newman Smyth

Price 75 Cents

Through Science to Faith

By Newman Smyth

Price $1.75

Belief in God

By Jacob Gould Schurman

Price $1.50

The Christian Hope

By William Adams Brown

Price $1.75

The Religion of a Layman

By Charles R. Brown

Price $1.25

Add 10 cents per book for postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Suggestions for Commencement Gifts

The Daily Altar.

By Willett and Morrison. Full leather, $2.50; purple cloth, $1.50. Add 8 cents postage.

Touchstones of Success.

By Francis E. Clark, Bishop Quayle, Cyrus H. K. Curtis and a hundred other leading Americans. An excellent book for young men. $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

Nelson Bible, American Revised.

Genuine leather, morocco grain, divinity circuit, silk sewed, round corners, red under gold edges, title stamped on back in pure gold, India paper, only one inch thick. $6.00 plus 12 cents postage.

The Outline of History.

By H. G. Wells. The ideal gift for thoughtful young people. In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

Princess Salome

A Tale of the Days of Camel-Bells

By DR. BURRIS JENKINS

As a writer of fiction, Dr. Burris Jenkins, of Kansas City, is as yet scarcely known, but as a minister of the Disciples of Christ, as a publisher, as author of "THE PROTESTANT," and as a man of many and varied activities, his name is familiar to thousands. To his many achievements he has now added "PRINCESS SALOME," a powerful novel of the days of Christ. A masterpiece of descriptive fiction and a message of tremendous significance that seems almost inspired in its broad and human conception of Christianity. It searches the very inner recesses of the soul and turns the eye of the reader inward upon himself. George A. Miller, President of the International Convention of Disciples of Christ, says of "PRINCESS SALOME": "It will produce faith and love in many cold and indifferent hearts and lives."

This is but one of many messages of praise received from various sources. $2.00 plus 12c postage.

FOR SALE AT ALL BOOK STORES or

The Christian Century Press

508 South Dearborn Street

Chicago, Ill.

Published by J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it, we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage. (Pocket ed., $1.35 plus 8 cts.

The Shorter New Testament (Kent), $1.00 plus 10 cents postage.

The 20th Century New Testament, $2.00 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, $1.50 plus 8 cents postage).

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

If Not a United Church—What?

By Peter Ainslie

THE first of a series of Handbooks presenting the proposals of a United Christendom. Dr. Ainslie, who has been a pioneer in the cause of unity, has given much thought and labor to attempting a solution of the difficulties which bar the progress of the movement. This volume deals with the necessity, growth and outlook of Christian unity, to which is added a copious appendix. The argument adduced is that if unity be not attained, the church inevitably faces an era of gradually weakening power. Dr. Ainslie writes vigorously, yet without heat or partisanship, and presents a cogent and lucid plea for the cause that must be answered.

Price $1.25 plus 10 cents postage
THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

THE EXPOSITOR'S Dictionary of Texts

Outlines, Expositions and Illustrations of Every Major Text and Dominant Passage of the Bible

Editors: Sir W. R. Nicoll, Lane T. Stoddart
James Moffatt, D.D.

Its Methods

Each exposition is a sermon compact and complete in itself. Each text suggests a theme by which it is headed; for instance, the exposition on "Like as a father pitieth his children," is entitled "THE GOD OF THE FRAIL"; to the exposition eight minds contribute.

Plan and Purpose

The Editors' purpose in planning THE EXPOSITORS DICTIONARY OF TEXTS was to compile a compendium of Scriptural insight and comment. They did so by glean- ing from the master theologians and preach- ers of the past half century the best exposi- tion on every major text and dominant pas- sage of the Bible.

Great Sermon Makers Approve It

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical usefulness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard- worked pastor will find much gold here for his mint- ing days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The ministry of souls is never out of sight. A more quickening and useful companion to the preacher of the Word does not exist."—REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

In Two Great Quarto Volumes, $15.00

SPECIAL TO CHRISTIAN CENTURY READERS:
Send $5.00 and the books will be shipped at once, on condition that another remittance of $5.00 be made in 30 days, and the final installment (including carriage) in 60 days.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Four Great Books for Thinking People

Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City, on being asked what are the outstanding books of the day for alert churchmen and churchwomen, submits four titles. He considers these essential books:

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken

Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1860. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 So. Dearborn St., Chicago

The Daily Altar

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

The most beautiful book of personal devotion and family worship published in many years.

Published in Two Editions:

In full leather, with gilt edges, at $2.50 per copy; five copies for $11.00; eight for $17.00.

In beautiful purple cloth, at $1.50 per copy; five copies for $7.00; eight for $10.00.

This book makes an ideal gift, and its use in a congregation will grow the devotional spirit.

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St.,

-:-

Chicago

The Meaning of Service

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

ANYONE who thinks at all in our day about humanity's condition must think about service, its meanings, motives and aims. This book conceives of service as the indispensable expression of discipleship, the practical overflow of the Christian life. A life that rightly conceives of prayer, and that is dominated by faith, must be serviceable, and so there is now the trilogy of Dr. Fosdick's interpretations of Christian character. His other books, "The Meaning of Prayer" and
"The Meaning of Faith," have been more widely read than any other books on religion published in many years. These are all intensely suggestive to makers of sermons and addresses.

Price $1.25, plus 6 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

God's Faith in Man

By Frederick F. Shannon

ONE of the outstanding religious prophets of today is Dr. Shannon, until recently of Brooklyn, now successor to Dr. F. W.
Gunsaulus at Central Church, Chicago.

The Biblical World says of him: "Seldom can the much abused word 'brilliant' be correctly applied to a living preacher; but in the case of Dr. Shannon no other term is appropriate. He is radiant and glittering and surprising and illuminating."

This is Dr. Shannon's Latest Book of Sermons

Price of the book, $1.25, plus 12 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

Everyday Life Books

Inspirational, Devotional Books by Writers of Spiritual Vision

Over a half million "Everyday Life" books have been sold. The little volumes are put up in a compact, handy, pocket edition, printed on thin paper, bound in art leather.

THE MANHOOD OF THE MASTER

By H. E. Fosdick

THE MEANING OF PRAYER

By H. E. Fosdick

PSALMS OF THE SOCIAL LIFE

By Cleland B. McAfee

This book shows how the Psalms grew out of the actual lives of men who were vividly conscious both of God and the social group.

THE MANY SIDED DAVID

By Philip E. Howard

A new and sympathetic interpretation of the character of David, which brings the real man vividly before the reader. The treatment is full of challenge to truly Christian living.

A LIVING BOOK IN A LIVING AGE

By Lynn Harold Hough

The theme is built around the living power of the Bible. The book carries the conviction that this living power is as strong now as ever and as sure in its revitalizing influence.

PAUL IN EVERYDAY LIFE

By John Douglas Adam

A stimulating use of Paul's intense experiences and forceful teaching to make possible a closer application of Christian standards to personal problems.

UNDER THE HIGHEST LEADERSHIP

By John Douglas Adam

A book that deals with realities, in presenting what living under the leadership of Christ may mean.

BUILDING ON ROCK

By Henry Kingman

A book meeting the demand for reality in religion by indicating what Jesus showed to be essential to a life built on eternal foundations.

CHRIST IN EVERYDAY LIFE

By E. I. Bosworth

The words of the Master made luminous by comment and helpful quotations in prose and poetry.

THE CHRISTIAN ACCORDING TO PAUL

By John T. Faris

A virile study of the elements, from Paul's viewpoint, which enter into the complete Christian life, with an extraordinary amount of rich illustrative material.

MEETING THE MASTER

By Ozora S. Davis

Our Lord's conversations with individuals studied to bring out the essential traits of His character, and the effect upon the lives of those who talked with Him.

HOW GOD MADE MEN

By Frederick Harris

The careers of outstanding Bible characters are studied, to obtain light upon the supremely important question of individual life work. Of special interest to young people.

Each $1.15, plus 6 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

reviewing Kirby Page's new book, just published by the Christian Century Press,

The SWORD or The CROSS

says:

"Six years ago," writes Kirby Page, the author of the book, "it was generally believed that the church was opposed to war. It was—in theory. It remained so until crowned heads and other rulers made declarations and mobilized their fighting men. Then the church did what it has consistently done for a thousand years—it flung itself unreservedly into the struggle. Can it be that the church has been wrong in holding this attitude toward war?" The author is almost inclined to answer in the negative. But although war, at the moment of its inception, may be said to be favored by the majority, the still more searching question arises whether the majority is infallible. Majorities, including the church and the government, have opposed and persecuted many of the world's greatest benefactors—men who brought new light to bear on science, men eminent in religion, in the great movements for human freedom, as well as in needed reforms and in many other lines of world progress. Every student of history knows it; surely the majority is not infallible!

"What might have been the history of the last twenty centuries if the church had consistently opposed war? The writer of this book reminds us again of the teachings of Jesus, many of them still but dimly comprehended or even wholly misunderstood. The "sword," of which he spoke in Matt. 10:34 and Luke 22:36, was to mark the line of division between right and wrong, to make a cleavage, not in the bodies of men, but in the ancient philosophies and age-old customs, and especially in the interpretation of religion. His teachings to his followers, his rejection of the tempter's lure of worldly greatness and power, his new standard of love and kindness, of forgiveness, of brotherhood, were all against war and bloodshed. His kingdom was not one of power and possessions and mighty armies and wars. It is, as clearly as his words could express it, a kingdom in the hearts of men who place love and faith and kindness and mercy above all the prizes of the world, with its fightings and conquests. This was the meaning accepted in the early church. Has the modern church wholly forgotten the glorious vision?

"We commend this little volume. It is timely and inspirational."

Price of the book, $1.20, plus 8c postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The Outline of History

By H. G. WELLS

A SURVEY OF THE 41 CHAPTERS

The World's Dawn.

The world was old long before the coming of man, those immeasurable ages of life's first faint stirrings of which most of us know so little and are unable to learn much from professorial monographs. The "Outline" gives this marvellously interesting story in language which brings before the mind's eye a thoroughly understandable realization of those ages through which mass and matter passed, up to the crude beginnings of living creation, and thence to the giant reptiles and animals—a brilliantly told story, covering millions of years and culminating in the advent of man.

Man's Advent.

The dim mystery of man's origin is wisely dealt with. Sources are examined—the Bible, Evolution, and so on, in the light of actual discoveries of the Neanderthalic and other ages, and so is composed a picture of earliest human life and origins, which is full of enlightenment on the question. After that picture, the reader is shown mankind's victories and failures in the struggle for life against mammoths and monsters, his gradual rise from the primitive, the instinct of love and hate, the family idea, the earliest methods of protection and reasoning, the growth of intelligence. And so he emerges from savagery, he takes his first step along the path which leads to today.

Civilization's Cradle.

It is curious to picture an inarticulate world, yet it was so until man began to think; then came speech, which for long was the only means of record, a time of mythology and superstition out of which religion grew. The next steps in communication were signs, picture-language and writing, then art and culture. How, gradually over many centuries, all this came about in different parts of the world is told in the "Outline" and a marvellously fascinating story it is, of a world in civilization's cradle, still in the swaddling clothes of development.

History's Beginnings.

When mankind woke up to a realization of cause and effect, history began; sanguinary wars, brutal enslavings of nations, wholesale magnificent though crude conceptions. Thrilling pages these make in "Outline," wherein graphic portrayal is given of how these early races, some vanished, others surviving, made history, and in doing so wove the fabric of the world's polity, out of which evolved both the freedoms and oppressions of today.

In Anno Domini.

A right understanding of these years is necessary to the student of social and political questions, particularly in early Anno Domini when the world consciousness was keen and its conscience impressionable. It was the age of mind over matter, of noble chivalries struggling amid selfishness and greed, of Crusades and Magna Charta, the dawn of light and freedom. These two thousand years of progress are vividly outlined by Mr. Wells in words which get at the truth through the glamour and glitter and leave the reader in good view of the facts in accurate perspective.

What of Tomorrow?

After coming down to recent years, traversing the nineteenth century and revealing much about the Great War, the author takes the reader to the top of the high tower of his farsightedly practical imagination and shows him the world as it is to be if right and freedom are to sway and mankind is to gain good from the trials which have lately been tearing civilization. Without doubt such a coherent and common-sense plan of world co-operation as here depicted is an ideal worth the sacrifice of the War years, and if it is to come it will only be by united and unselfish action. Such a plan to study and work for is alone worth many times the cost of these volumes—invaluable as they are in other respects.

Send for Descriptive Circular

In two volumes: $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

Special terms to Christian Century readers, $5.00 down, balance 30 days.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

CAPITALISM AND THE
MIND OF JESUS

By Scott Nearing

Next Week:

Competition and the
Mind of Jesus

By Roger W. Babson

The Sword or the Cross

By KIRBY PAGE

A P P R O V E D

Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Pittsburgh:

"The book is nobly conceived and finely written and is in itself a high spiritual achievement."

Professor Rufus M. Jones, Haverford College:

"I have read your book, 'The Sword or the Cross,' with deep appreciation. I feel sure it should have a very helpful mission, and I hope it will have a large circulation. It is very convincing and is written in just the right style to accomplish its purpose. I have no criticism whatever to make of it."

Norman Thomas, Editor The World Tomorrow:

"My immediate reaction is one of unqualified approval."

F. Ernest Johnson, of the Federal Council of Churches:

"Here is a concise putting of Christianity's case against war. The author has done a valuable piece of work."

Price of the book, $1.20 plus 8 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

Best Books on Premillennialism

The Millennial Hope

By Shirley J. Case. $1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

The Coming of the Lord

By Jas. H. Snowden. $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

The Second Coming of Christ

By James M. Campbell.
75 cents, plus 10 cents postage.

Modern Premillennialism

By Harris F. Rall. $1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

For Sale by The Christian Century Press

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, MAY 19, 1921

Number 20

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly

By the Disciples Publication Society

508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

The New Age and Its Tokens

DURING the war there was a profound conviction on the part of Christian leaders that we were living at the end of an age and at the beginning of a new era. H. G. Wells recently expressed this idea very well when he said: "This is the end and the beginning of an age. This is something far greater than the French Revolution, and we live in it." The disciples of Jesus were also convinced that they lived at the end of an age and at the beginning of a new epoch. As time went on and nothing in particular seemed to happen, the mood of expectancy passed into one of skepticism. This skepticism arose from the fact that those who were looking for a new age had certain materialistic signs in mind and could not discern the signs of the times. Just now there is a similar period of skepticism in the Christian church which affects to doubt whether the war has changed anything at all. It looks to many as if the world were settling down to the same old occupations and interests and beliefs. But the more thoughtful student of current events sees overwhelming evidence of the presence of new and revolutionary forces. The enfranchisement of women is one of these forces. Women have always been a conservative force in human society and the net influence of their entrance into political life may be of a different sort than certain reformers expect. But no one can doubt that the new place of women in the world life will work a revolution. Prohibition has come. It rocks the economic boat all over the world. Right or wrong, however one may view it, no one thinks that it is not important. It is adding enormously to the efficiency of the United States. This fact taken with the fact that we were already the richest nation in the world would seem to prove that America is bound to dominate the entire world economically. What resentments will result from this, no one can foresee. The world-wide opposition to war is a new thing. While the pacifist dates the beginnings of his movement to earlier times than those of Isaiah, never before has the common heart of humanity felt the need of religious sanctions for an anti-war program as today. Russia with its evolving soviet government is a revolution in the world of government more radical than the revolution in the United States a century before. All these manifestations of a new age are just beneath the surface, yet there are some people who think that the world is going on just as it used to do.

Hell or Purgatory?

IN recent years there has been a revival of the spirit of vindictiveness in operating the legal machinery of punishment. The old-time idea has been revived which assumes that if the punishment of the criminal in hand is severe enough, others would be inhibited from venturing an infraction of the law. When such an idea dominates the state, the church will show a tendency toward a revival of its hell-fire doctrine. The punishment of sinners in the world to come was thought to be eternal and as terrible as possible in an age in which nearly two hundred offences against the English law were punishable with death. Both the state and the church agreed in the idea that the purpose of punishment was to vindicate the majesty of the outraged law. Turning to Christian standards, however, the motive of punishment is found to be reformation. Paul has a mysterious formula of excommunication which he proposes for the incestuous man of the Corinthian church, but there is a provision that this punishment may result in the reformation and final salvation of even this unclean man. An age that believes in capital punishment, which is the longest sentence that can be given by an earthly court, will be hospitable to the idea of an endless hell-fire for the unsaved. But an age which insists that the motive of all punishment is reformation will want to find in it a redemptive element. Just now there is a willingness on the part of many Protestant thinkers to re-examine the medieval doctrine of purgatory. It was a more Christian conception than the hell of Milton or Dante. It came into bad repute by the unspeakable abuses arising from the practice of masses for the dead and the payment of money for the shortening of the punishment. But apart from its abuse, the idea of purgatory is not essentially absurd. Ever since Canon Farrar shocked the Christian world with his book, "The Eternal Hope," there has been a growing conviction that God would not easily confess himself defeated with any soul. Even his punishments should be looked upon as the efforts of a loving Father to save the souls of men from the errors of their way.

Fallacies of Interpretation

IN the discussions at the Disciples Congress at Springfield, Ill., last week, there were set forth by different speakers from the floor at one of the sessions, a number of the logical fallacies that have characterized the theology of the past. One is the assumption that literary documents make the same impression on every mind. It is assumed that once people are divested of prejudice they will all read the documents of the New Testament alike and reach identical conclusions. But minds equally fair often get opposite views of a passage of scripture. The legalistic minded theologian also makes appeal to an authority which he never is willing to subject to examination. Although the canon of the New Testament was settled by a council of the Roman Catholic church, the tradition-bound Protestant continues to accept uncritically the work of this council. Thus his authority in the end is really Catholic rather than Protestant. For him the New Testament is a legal document, and the end of discussion. This is the uncritical assumption of a major premise, the fatal defect of deductive reasoning throughout the history of the world. The method of trying to arrive at religious truth without appealing to any external norms involves infinitely more labor. Some minds tire in the presence of such a process. They find a resting place in some form of authority, Protestant or Catholic. The live Christian is willing to pay the price for a faith that is real, even though it must be—and it must be—experimental.

The Five Points of Prohibition

VARIOUS national temperance organizations have agreed on the following five points for a law enforcement measure and will push for its enactment by congress. (1) Absolute prohibition of all importation of liquor. (2) Court jurisdiction extended to the enforcement of prohibition in the Philippines and all other islands under our flag. (3) Concentration of all lawful liquor in bonded warehouses. (4) Wherever practicable the denaturing of all liquors, thus rendering them unfit for drinking, and the exclusion of the use of any intoxicant from the making of patent or proprietary medicines except where no other base is possible. (5) The prohibition of beer as a medicine and the revocation of all permits. The press carried a news item a few days ago to the effect that a new anti-prohibition organization was receiving applications for membership by thousands daily and that its membership had grown from one to one hundred thousand in a few weeks. This is the seventh such organization started since the eighteenth amendment was enacted. It will be as short lived as the others; it cannot produce the drinks, and greed and appetite do not consolidate great numbers of men for long unless there is profit forthcoming. The present congress is overwhelmingly dry and will probably see that another nail is driven deep into John Barleycorn's big coffin lid. Meanwhile it is interesting to note that with the overwhelming majority given bone-dry prohibition enforcement in Ontario, the British brewers are pushing vigorously for a home-made temperance measure that will "improve the bar" and that the English public is both inquiring for and listening to "facts in regard to prohibition" which American speakers, both from Canada and the United States, are ready to give them.

Sensationalism In the Pulpit

AT a time when sensationalism in the American pulpit tends to decline, it is reported that it is increasing in London. Church attendance in Great Britain is in a period of sag just now, and that may be one of the reasons. Even clergymen of the established church are giving long series of sermons which review current drama. A flavor of the religious is given by little homilies mixed in with the dramatic criticism. The kind of preacher who was willing to marry a couple on roller skates for the sake of the two column head that could be gotten on the newspaper account of it is happily disappearing. New discriminations are emerging with regard to the challenge of public attention. If the alternative of sensationalism is dullness, then the cure is almost as bad as the disease. A dull newspaper wastes good paper and ink. Dullness is journalistic sin. The dull sermon wastes the resources of the parish life. The machinery of the parish is built up to a considerable extent around a pulpit. If that pulpit lacks in light and leading, the whole institution languishes. The kind of sensationalism which seeks to thrust a preacher into the limelight and make him talked about for his own sake is thoroughly bad. There is another kind which makes people talk of a great message which is legitimate. Isaiah went about in a captive's garb through the streets of Jerusalem. It was shocking and sensational, but it directed the minds of the people to one of the great points in the message of the prophet. This was quite a different procedure from that of a modern minister who throws his collar, coat and vest around the stage in a frantic endeavor to prove that he is a great pulpit orator. Force in preaching does not necessarily preclude elegance. The greatest expounders of the Chris-tion gospel have been those who have discovered that the religion of Christ was a religion of beauty as well as a religion of power.

Have the Farmers Signed a Magna Charta?

WHILE all other classes have been organizing, the farmer has remained strongly undivulgaristic. He has relied on the laws of supply and demand while others have taken control of the laws. But the farm paper and the agricultural extension service have been reading a few lessons to him and the sudden fall of prices on what he sells without a corresponding fall on what he buys brings him to consider them in a wide-awake manner. What he sells is down almost to pre-war prices but the farm machine with which he produces it is still up to war prices. The Farm Bureau now has 1,500,000 members in forty-three states. Some months ago they called their sister organizations in and appointed a committee of seventeen; this committee has reported, and if the organized farmers carry through their program it may prove to be the economic magna charta of agriculture. This report covered grain only, but the same program is being carried out in regard to other major products. An iron clad agreement to sell a commodity through their own selling cooperation only will be signed. They will erect their own elevators and own their own terminals. It will be hard on the excess middleman but it will be fine for consumer and producer, and it will reduce the middleman business to its logical basis and help him as a consumer. When capital, labor and the professions organize, the farmer must organize also. But economic peace will come only if among the organizations there is cooperation, not a selfish class war.

Unemployment Growing Worse

UNEMPLOYMENT in the United States is rapidly becoming our leading national problem. The government figures and those of the labor union officials are practically alike. At the present time the number of workers out of employment is close to four million. Some of these are women who during the war took steady jobs and do not need to work unless there is need. But in far the larger percentage of cases, the unemployed are men and heads of homes. That unemployment is growing is the particularly alarming aspect of the industrial situation. At this time of year industry should be in full swing. It is not. While automobile factories have taken on a little more life, the buildings trades in many cities are tied up with strikes. While the men of the community walk the streets for work, great public projects are held up for lower prices. In Illinois $60,000,000 worth of road work awaits the change that business men think is about to come. The result of long periods of unemployment shows in a great increase in mendicancy. The American tramp almost disappeared during the war. There was plenty of work for everybody. This fact should discount the cynical judgment that tramping was generally a voluntary profession.

Tramps, as a rule, will work when there is opportunity. But the back door mendicant is with us once more, and his tribe will rapidly increase unless something is done. The statesman will find in the solution of this problem one of his most urgent and grateful tasks. There is even in prosperous times much unemployment because of the seasonal nature of much of our work. We need some method of coordinating the work of winter ice cutters and summer harvest hands. A mobile labor force which, under the direction of a government employment bureau, would meet the labor demands of different sections of the country would go far toward relieving the situation that the nation faces. Meanwhile our national and state officials continue to muddle along. The voice of the expert economist and of the humanitarian ought to be heard in the counsels of the politicians and office-holders.

A Nation Turning To God

FOR a century France has been thought of as a nation of skeptics. Great churches in Paris had but a handful of worshippers. France was the home of Voltaire and Rousseau. Comte and his religion of humanity had arisen there. Protestantism was scarcely more healthy in its life than Catholicism in face of the all-devouring skepticism. During the war there was some evidence of a new spirit at work. The young manhood stood day by day in the presence of death. These men were defending their homes against the invader. Their commander, General Foch, was a devout Catholic. Other leaders were equally devout Protestants. Even the proud old Clemenceau deigned to enter a church. Since the war is over the number of theological students in the great Catholic seminary of Paris has increased until there are now 360, the largest number in the history of the institution. A considerable number of candidates of other than French nationality have been rejected. There are now 150 students registered in Protestant theological institutions throughout France, which is more than the figures for 1914. Not only is there an abundance of ministerial candidates, the students not going in for the ministry are in many cases writing and distributing tracts upon religion. While France has historically been Catholic, the difficulties in the way of strong religious belief cast in medieval molds is very great. There was never in all the history of France such an opportunity for the evangelical faith. If this faith learns to fit the new mood of the national life, it might make great progress among those who have not heretofore felt the need of a religion. The war has brought contacts with Protestants which have done much to break down ancient prejudices. The land of John Calvin may yet be the home of a mighty movement inspired by evangelical insight into the gospel of Christ. In France such a movement would perhaps not be characterized by the crudity and lack of aesthetic feeling which have characterized it in other sections of the world. France may yet teach us something about the religion which is at once free and beautiful.

The Sense of Sin in Modern Life

SOME years ago Gladstone remarked that the most striking fact in the religious life of his time was a decay of the sense of sin. Dean Inge, of St. Paul's, has said much the same thing of late, despite the appalling apocalypse of evil in the great war, adding that this change has come about mainly in the last fifty years. To which we may add the words of Sir Oliver Lodge, that "the higher man of today is not worrying about his sins at all, still less about their punishment. His mission, if he is good for anything, is to be up and doing. As for original sin, no one but a monk could have invented it." These words not only state the fact of the decay of the sense of sin, about which all agree, but also the prevailing feeling with regard to it—a feeling of relief, as if we had passed from under a cloud into a more natural, wholesome, and sunny conception of life.

The tendency to ignore sin and fear, which is the shadow of sin, is everywhere apparent in the religious literature of our day, not to mention a significant philosophy which declares both sin and fear to be wholly a delusion. Denunciation of sin, threats of punishment have almost disappeared from the pulpit, and are left to the masters of the drama, like Ibsen, who makes us look with uncovered head upon the uncovered horror of sin, and the ghosts which haunt it. Nor will it hardly be said that this change of emphasis is because we have attained to the perfect love which casteth out fear. No; but in revolt against the disproportionate punishments predicted in former times—unworthy of man, much less of God—we have ceased to fear punishment because we do not think we deserve it. No doubt the pendulum has swung too far toward the opposite extreme, with some loss not only of solemnity but of moral seriousness, but on the whole, as even Dean Inge admits, it makes for spiritual sanity and health.

There is danger of unreality for those who today make use of ancient forms as the expression of their religious life. In the letters of Oliver Cromwell occur expressions—full of reality on his lips three hundred years ago—which would surely strike us as unreal, if not hypocritical, from the lips of modern men. Many of our most popular hymns also incur this danger, putting into our mouths very emotional statements of doctrine which too frequently can have no reality in our own experience. The attempt of each age to express its sense of sin, to be genuine, must be the outcome of its own experiences of mind and heart. Enforced conformity to the theory and expression of an earlier age is fictitious and enervates character. The past is for instruction, not for imitation. We must breathe the religious life of our own age. That of the carboniferous age was, doubtless, favorable to the formation of those monstrous vegetable growths which were the source of the great coal beds, but ours is a more sunny air and there are more birds in it.

Today, if our young people read Bunyan—let alone the awful, paralyzing fear which broods over the pages of Newman—they do not understand the strange struggle which tormented his spirit. Even those who are older find it difficult to believe that he was as vile and wicked a wretch as he thought himself to be. His "lies," one would go bail, were wild fictions told more for fun than for injury, and his "fancy swearing" was surely a form of literary expression—an imaginative exaggeration due to his vivid temperament, and impossible to a mind of different type. One reads the Confessions of Tolstoi assured that if he had been actually guilty of half the sins which he confesses, he would have been a physical, mental and spiritual wreck passed praying for. It reminds one of the pawky Scotchman who, after listening to the late Dr. Whyte, who portrayed sin with a like terrible intensity of insight, remarked: "If I had to do business with the Doctor, and believed half the things he says about himself, the terms would have to be strictly cash on delivery." He felt that the preacher, quite unconsciously, was describing an unreality, at the behest of a dogma, and not in accord with the facts of life.

If there has been a decline of the sense of sin, as all admit, it has been due, not to moral degeneration, but to an advance in the direction of reality and right perspective and proportion; and the reasons for it, albeit many and complex, are not far to seek. For one thing, we have revolted against the intense moral dualism which divides mankind into the lost and saved, and assigns to the two classes a difference far surpassing the wildest freaks of inequality in which fortune indulges. Today men are neither white nor black, but gray, the bottle of our knowledge having been shaken until it is all nearly of one color. There is so much good in the bad man, and so much bad in the good man, that if one is too good for banning the other is too bad for blessing. The line between good and evil is clear enough, but it is a line crossed and recrossed by all of us many times. Human nature is seldom or never wholly good and seldom or never entirely saintly or heroic. Then, too, our views of sin have changed from a time when all the natural impulses of humanity were held to be evil. We are less subjective than our fathers, less introspective, with the result that we escape their morbid self-inspection. Instead, we emphasize the positive side of life—doing good rather than merely avoiding evil—and are more aroused and governed by hope than by fear, by reward than by retribution.

Best of all, our vision of God has been deepened and ennobled, and not an arbitrary sovereign, but a divine fatherhood is seen to be truest and most essential for the moral guidance and redemption of humanity. What Christ was seen by his disciples to be; what he was to their experience, that we dare believe God is eternally. In the parable of the prodigal son we have the true—because Christlike—conception both of sin and its healing. "Against heaven and before thee"—there is a divine order of the world, a law of righteousness in nature and in the life of man. This the sun and moon obey; the stars also with their steadfast shining, and also

The moving waters, with their priest-like task,
Of pure ablution round earth's human shores.

Only man, in his tiny province, disobeys; but our unique glory is that we are persons, and it is with a person that we have to do. We can by our action or inaction be grit in the wheels of the universal order, and we can also wrong a divine Father, as one breaks the trust of a friend. "The Lord turned and looked upon Peter, and Peter remembered"—the vaunting promise and the pitiful result! But in Christ we have to do not with a metaphysical abstraction, but with a God revealed in the only terms we can comprehend, whose love—far from sentimentalism, and as awful as gracious—has in it the secret of unknown redemptions. In him we learn the truth that our moral struggle is a real struggle, just because God is in it, and beyond it too; and that is the guarantee that the perpetual contest of the spiritual against the material in human nature will issue in final victory.

Indeed, when we turn to the teachings of Jesus we find a much less gloomy attitude toward sin than is the habit of Christian theology. Jesus saw sin with "other and larger eyes" than ours, but he hardly mentions it except in connection with repentance and forgiveness. He never encourages either brooding over past sins or self-imposed expiatory suffering, and we hear nothing of the sense of alienation from God in his words. His teaching is very severe and exacting—extending sin beyond the act to the motive, beyond the word to the thought—but it is fundamentally happy and joyous, because he saw beyond sin to the sources of its cleansing. To notorious evil liver he showed himself tender and merciful beyond any teacher that ever walked among men, deeming sins of the flesh far less terrible than sins of the spirit, such as hypocrisy and unmercifulness to our fellow men. To the religious misleaders of his day he was ruthlessly stern, as if he actually limited the area of sin on one side while he extended it on the other. His principle that only that which cometh out of the mouth defileth a man swept away a vast mass of ceremonial, pseudo-sin which had become a burden.

Thus, in our vision of sin, as in other things, slowly we are arriving nearer to the Mind of Jesus, who, despite the passing of ages, is the most modern of all teachers. The sense of sin may seem weak in the modern man, but that is only seeming. As a theological term, let us confess that it no longer makes its old appeal, but as a social fact and experience it looms large in our thought. Ruskin, in a passage which brings a lump into the throat, tells us that luxury will be possible in the future—luxury for all and by the help of all—but that luxury at present can be enjoyed only by the ignorant or the callous. For, he adds, "the cruelist man living could not sit down to his feast, unless he sat blindfolded"—not realizing what the things served him cost in the labor, and often the sorrow, of his fellows. Such was the vision of Maurice when he confessed the sins of his age as his own, identifying himself with humanity—as a pantheist thinks of God—in its struggles, its sorrows, and even its sins. It is this sense of personal guilt for social sin, injustice, cruelty, and hardness, that is the unique mark of our time, whereby huge and horrible evils, accepted fatalistically by our fathers as part of the order of things, rise up to haunt and torment us. For, actually, we are partakers of the common guilt, as we are involved in the community of calamity, as much by our indifference as by any overt act.

Yes, the bitter fact remains—as our greatest literature testifies—of a discord in what should have been harmony.

Our life is a false nature; 'tis not in
The harmony of things.

Evermore, as an undertone in these giddy-paced times, we hear that old haunting sob which echoes in Vedic hymns, in penitential psalms from yonder side of the pyramids, no less than in the literature that has been influenced by Hebrew thought—a mysterious restlessness and sense of wrongness, a cry of pain and a quest of peace. As buried civilizations yield up their treasures, that cry is heard without need of sound or language. Kipling represents the noble Lama of Tibet as a pilgrim seeking "the river that washes away sins," and another tells us of a poor Korean woman who came out of the country district to one of the towns, asking all she met to guide her to "the place where they heal the broken heart"—which things are parables of the moral agony of humanity today, as in all the past, of which each of us finds interpretation, if he is honest with himself, in his own heart.

The Troublesome Tooth

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I had a tooth that gave me much trouble. For the Dentist filled it, and filled it yet again; and when the nerve within it died, then did he treat the Root and filled it once more. And there were certain years wherein it gave me good service, and I depended upon it when I wanted to come down hard upon the Steak.

But there came a day when the Dentist said, There is no more that I can do. And so far as I see, it doeth no harm; but the day is not far distant when thou wilt lose it.

Now it soon came to pass that the Tooth gave me trouble; but I went not again unto the Dentist, for I said, There is but one thing that he can do for it; and that can never be undone; now, therefore, if I can make it last a little longer, whatever service I now get is Velvet.

But the feeling of it was not like unto Velvet; for it gave me pain in mine Eye, and pain in mine Ear. And there was a Sabbath Day when it hurt me all the time I stood in the House of God.

And on the next morning I woke early, and I was on the step of the office of the Dentist when he came from Breakfast.

And what he did to it was a plenty.

But when I came away, I spake unto Keturah, saying, Thine husband is a man less wise than men think him; for had I shown half the good sense with which men credit me, then had I done this thing Two Months ago.

And I thought of the way men hold onto Bad Habits, that give them discomfort and help them not at all to deal righteously with God or Man; yet how they Linger Shivering on the Brink, and dread the feeling of the Cold Iron.

And unto all such men, I say, Fool not with the matter, nor delay; see that thou have the bad habit removed, and cast it far from thee. And though thou feel some sense of Ache and Vacuity, yet shall this also be for thy comfort and Good Health.

Capitalism and the Ideals of Jesus

By Scott Nearing

CAPITALISM is an economic system under which the machinery of production is owned by one group or class and used by another group or class. The using (producing) group pays a rent to the owning class for the use of its machinery. The owning group is thus enabled to live, without working, upon the labor performed by the producing group.

Capitalism got its start in Great Britain after the middle of the eighteenth century. During the past hundred years it has spanned the world with its methods and in its search after new markets and new opportunities for investment and exploitation. Capitalism has usually booked passage into new lands under the names "western civilization" or "Christian civilization," but the essential nature of the system has been the same wherever it has gone.

The great nations of the world, in 1914, were all capitalist nations. Indeed, in the ordinary language of the west, "capitalism" and "civilization" had become practically synonymous terms, and were used interchangeably.

Nor was this surprising.

Capitalism had spread over the world in a night. It was big, strong and fine. It had kindled the imaginations of prince, knight, squire, artisan and peasant by offering unheard of opportunities for immediate and easy wealth getting, at the same time that it held the liberal or radical mind with its promise of a democracy built upon a wholly new design.

MAGIC GROWTH OF CAPITALISM

Capitalism grew with a magic swiftness, and until the world war it seemed to be in the full vigor of youth. The war, which was both a logical outcome of the capitalist system, and a negation of that very productivity in which capitalists took their greatest pride, shook capitalism to its foundations. The result of the struggle in terms of lost man-power, disorganized production and bankrupt finance were more shocking to the structure of capitalist society than even its most bitter antagonists had predicted. Compared with the wars of the past, this one was of very brief duration, and yet, in those four short years, the most extensive damage was done to the capitalist mechanism.

The advocates of the capitalist system were eager in their anticipations of the good years that were to succeed the war, with their dangerous Teutonic rival out of the way. More than two years have passed since the armistice. During those two years, the debts of Europe have nearly doubled; the taxes have mounted; millions of men have been and still are under arms; petty wars have come and gone, in Europe, Asia and Africa, but European capitalism has not been reconstructed. On the contrary, ever since the Russian revolution of 1917, it has been growing clearer and clearer that European capitalism has been so completely shattered that it never could be revived in its old forms.

Why was this? Why should a new, immensely successful, and apparently vigorous social system go to pieces in less than a decade? There is only one answer to that question: capitalism was so inethical in its aims and so unsocial in its workings that it had neither stamina nor endurance to withstand the shock of the war. Compare the ethics of capitalism with the ethics of any of the great teachers of the world—they are at odds from beginning to end. Compare the ethics of capitalism with the ethics of Jesus—they contradict, word for word and line for line.

CHARACTERISTICS OF CAPITALISM

Walter Rauschenbusch did as much as any man in the United States to contrast the principles of capitalism with the ethics of Jesus. His "Christianity and the Social Crisis" and his "Christianizing the Social Order" are two of the books to which the student of the question may turn for a never-failing source of inspiration, and an admirable example of logical thinking. In these books Dr. Rauschenbusch covers the whole subject much more learnedly and adequately than it can be covered in a brief paper.

The capitalist system of economics can best be compared with the ethics of Jesus by taking certain of the outstanding characteristics of capitalism and measuring them side by side with the sayings of Jesus, such characteristics as:

1. Its emphasis on the importance of material possessions;
2. Its reliance on competition as a beneficial social force;
3. Its exploitation of the weak and the defenseless, and
4. Its coercion, through the capitalist state, of its citizens.

Capitalism is based on the assumption that a man's happiness and well-being depend upon the extent of his material possessions. To be rich, in the capitalist world, is to be successful. Consequently men and women strive madly for wealth—giving body and soul alike in exchange for its possession. Yet, "what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

THE SUCCESSFUL FEW

The struggle for the possession of wealth has at last centered great funds in the hands of the successful few who, in the mad scramble, have survived, and emerged with everything upon which they could lay their hands. Perhaps never before in the history of the world has there been such a difference between the economic position of the rich and the poor as there is today in the great capitalist centers of the world. According to the income tax returns in the United States, there were in 1918 sixty-seven persons who reported an income of at least $20,000 a week. One income ran to nearly a million dollars a week. In all, there were 159,606 persons in a population of one hundred millions, who reported an income of as much as $200 a week. Among the very rich, more than nineteen-twentieths of the income was derived from rent, interest, dividends and profits. In other words, they were not actively engaged in rendering any service to their fellows, but merely because they held titles to property, they were able to receive fabulous sums, which poured into their coffers in a never-ending stream.

Meanwhile, the masses of the wage-earners were being paid less than $50 a week. The wage statistics published by Massachusetts, New Jersey, and New York, for this same year 1918, showed that there was practically no such thing as a wage-earner making a regular income of $100 a week; that on the contrary, in a year when the experts reported that $55 per week was the minimum necessary to maintain the physical health and social decency of a family, the great majority of male wage-earners were receiving less than this amount.

The recipient of $10,000 per week is looked upon as successful because he has succeeded in amassing an amount of property which enables him to live without working. The mechanic earning $50 per week is looked upon relatively as a failure, because he must earn his bread in the sweat of his face. Under the capitalist regime, a man's life consists in the abundance of his possessions. It is hardly necessary to point out how completely this contravenes the Christian precept: "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth."

PRIVILEGES OF WEALTH

Neither is it necessary to go farther and point out that in capitalist society the rich have all the world at their disposal. They enjoy the first fruits of everything because they are rich. The destruction of the poor is their poverty, under capitalist society as under every other form of social organization. "The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost." Capitalist society heaps its rewards at the feet of those who are already replete with this world's goods.

Capitalism is built on the competitive theory of life. The doctrine of the English common law was caveat emptor—let the buyer beware. It was the business of him who purchased to see that he was not cheated in the commodity that he secured. Every transaction was an opportunity for the seller to defraud the buyer. The same thing has been true of the whole structure of capitalism. Every man has been for himself. He has not been in business for his health. On the contrary, his purpose has been to acquire the largest possible amount of wealth. Profit was his goal, and if in the pursuit of this objective, it was necessary to wreck a competitive enterprise, or to destroy a competitive organization, he did this as a matter of course and was regarded by his business associates as a hero in proportion as he was able to carry at his girdle the scalps of his business opponents.

"Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you" can have no part in a competitive order of society. "Love one another" falls on deaf ears in a system of social organization which raises every man's hand against his neighbor. Capitalist society is built on competitive lines. Christian ethics pre-supposes co-operative activity. The two concepts are quite at odds the one with the other.

THE OWNER AND THE WORKER

Under the capitalist system of society each business man competes with his fellow business man. There is however under capitalism an even more fundamental form of struggle, that is, the conflict between the owner of the machine and the worker. James Madison noted that one of the most frequent sources of strife had always been the various and unequal distribution of property. Under the capitalist system, a few own the means of production, with which the many must work in order to live. A few, because of their ownership, take a part of the wealth created by the workers and live on it without themselves performing any useful service in society. This exploiting class is therefore a parasite class accepting the service of others, but refusing to render a like service in return. The parasite class is rich, and powerful because it is rich. The workers are poor—poor because they are workers. Because they are poor they are weak, and because they are weak the capitalists oppress them, using all of the machinery of organized society to keep them in subjection. Thus, one of the leading spokesmen of capitalism in the United States, Roger W. Babson, writes in April, 1920:

"The war taught the employing class the secret and power of widespread propaganda. Now, when we have anything to sell to the American people, we know how to sell it. We have learned. We have the schools; we have the pulpit. The employing class owns the press."

The machinery of society is on the side of those who own the material possessions upon which capitalism lays so much store. Blessed is he that is rich under capitalism, and cursed is he that is poor. The beatitudes of this system find no parallel in the fifth chapter of Matthew.

CAPITALISM AND PATRIOTISM

Capitalism is organized in national units—Great Britain, Japan, the United States. Within each of these national units, a consistent propaganda is maintained to make the citizens "patriotic," that is, they must believe that their country is the greatest country on earth, and they must be prepared to prove their greatness by destroying the life and property of any other country which challenges them. Hatred and fear are two of the weapons upon which capitalism chiefly relies to maintain its civic standards. Poisonous gases are manufactured, tanks are fabricated, warships are built on these two primitive human emotions.

"Love your enemies." "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirsts, give him drink," are the behests of Christian ethics. Yet those who attempted to live up to these standards during the years between 1914 and 1918 were jailed and tortured and shot for their pains.

"Thou shalt do no murder" was the essential part of the teaching of Jesus. Between 1914 and 1918, every great capitalist nation in the world conscripted its citizens and punished those who refused to shoulder a gun and go out to slaughter their fellows. The United States today has upon its statute books a conscription law which goes automatically into effect, the moment a war is declared.

During the war, an event of momentous importance occurred. The Russian people threw off the yoke of czarism and attempted to free themselves not only from political tyranny, but from economic slavery. Here was a people which had been suffering under the most bitter forms of oppression for generations. What was capitalism's answer to their efforts for liberation?

First, there was war at Archangel and at Vladivostok. Second, there was a "sanitary cordon" of specially made states, created for the purpose of preventing the Russians from reaching the outside world. Third, there was the blockade, under which even such fundamental necessities as medicines were refused to the Russian people. Fourth, there was the public financing of insurrection and counter-revolution under Yudenitch, Denikin, Kolchak and Wrangel. Fifth, Poland and other states were financed and their armies were officered by money and by representatives of the great capitalist nations.

"Whosoever offendeth one of these little ones that believeth in me, it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were cast unto the depths of the sea," compares strangely with the iniquities of the Russian blockade.

END OF A CENTURY

The world has had a century and more of capitalism with its pursuit of material wealth, its competition, its exploitation, and the coercive power of its nationalistic organizations. At the end of this period, it terminated in the world war. Millions died on the battlefield, other millions at home were destroyed by famine and pestilence. Poverty stalks in the centers of capitalist civilization. Mountains of debt are heaped up. The ruling classes in the various capitalist countries continue their course of army organization and navy building, of competition for trade, for markets, and for investment opportunities. Even the stupendous cost of the world war has not taught them, could not teach them, because they are committed to the system that logically produces these things.

"All ye are brethren," has no place in a world divided between competing nationalities. The capitalist state sets up a flag which is the boundary of fraternity; beyond the reach of that flag men are enemies, not brothers. "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not," can find no acceptance in a civilization where the goal is material possession and the means is profit secured without labor through the exploitation of fellow human beings.

BUILDING A NEW SOCIETY

Men cannot serve God and mammon. Either they believe that life consists in the abundance of material possessions, or else they believe that life consists in the richness of service and in the outpouring of sympathy and understanding. For those who are ready to serve mammon, and who have even a moderate measure of ability, the present order of society offers handsome incomes and choice investment opportunities. Men can get richer today than ever they could in the past. This rule holds good for the few. For the masses, the machinery of present-day society presents a form of mechanical slavery that has rarely if ever been paralleled in its intensity. The ethics of Jesus not only have no place in such a society, but anyone who professes them or undertakes to live up to them will be made the object of ridicule and attack.

No man who holds to the teachings of Jesus can support the present order of society for a day. The sooner this fact is made clear in the minds of the rising generation, the sooner will their youth and enthusiasm be enlisted on the side of a new society, built along kindlier lines, with a greater regard for the humanities than has ever been dreamed of under the present order.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE Lion was just saying—but I am forgetting that you do not know the Lion. He went to the college of liberal arts of a certain great university as John Melton Harper. His career as an athlete every college man knows. His brilliant work in his classes is remembered a bit wistfully by many a quiet professor who is giving his life to the tasks of technical scholarship. His social charm swept everything before it. And it was about the beginning of his junior year that he received the name by which all his friends know him. From that time he was "the Lion." And so it has been ever since. The one football game of his senior year which marks the climax of his athletic achievement is still the subject of yarns which old grads tell, and no freshman with a body as well as a mind is allowed to forget it. He used to slip away in the summer with great bundles of books and so in vigorous out door life and in wide reading his long vacations were passed.

After his graduation he was at Oxford for a year. Then he matriculated in the graduate school of the American Institution which does most notable work in research and in duetime received his doctor's degree, majoring in history. A month after that the accident occurred. And in a few weeks his friends knew that all his life he would be an invalid with no hope of recovery. The time might come when he could sit occasionally in an easy chair. But he would never walk again and he would never be capable of work which taxed the little remnant of vitality which was left to him. The first months were full of rebellion and terrible struggle. He said no hard or bitter word. But you could see that the fight was raging as you looked into his eyes. Then came the first indications that he had won his biggest battle. The old light gradually came back to his eyes. The old shrewd whimsical mirth played about his speech. And the day came when this helpless invalid gave you the impression of being more virile than most of the men you met upon the street. The vigor and masterful energy of his mind seemed to grow rather than to decrease.

More and more he was able to read the books for which he cared, and that meant a range as wide as human interest goes. And gradually it became possible for him to write a little and to talk with some of his friends every day. Every few years a book has come from his pen. And the world of scholarship has recognized their technical adequacy and their ripe human charm. But his talk has not been recorded. And it is here that he is really revealed. He sits as it were a little apart from life with the perspective of struggle, the insight of suffering and the outlook which moral and spiritual victory give. But he keeps all his hearty zest for every gripping vigorous activity. He admits that he still plays football. Only now he plays football with his mind. He lives at the heart of the world. Yet he has a poise and a spiritual serenity of which this tense and overwrought age knows all too little.

Well, as I began, the Lion was saying:

"I'd like to take H. G. Wells and Paul Shorey and rub them together until I made one man out of the two."

"They would both resist the process," I laughed.

"That's just the point," chuckled the Lion, "Of course they would both resist it. And yet it's precisely what each one of them needs. If Wells had the high humanistic spirit of fifth century Athens it would make a new man of him. He misses every defining thing in the treatment of the fifth century in his Outline. And if Professor Shorey could look out on the world with eyes which have glowed with the dreams of Wells it would be like Athens and New York joining in a promising and noble wedlock."

"That's just the trouble with you, Old Man, "I broke in, "You are all the while trying to join things which cannot be united. I believe if you had been Noah you would have tried to bring each beast into the ark in the particular company of its most deadly antipathy."

The Lion was suddenly serious:

"Don't take the wrong train out of the big station," he said, "You are heading for the wrong destination. If you stop to think for a moment you will see that as a rule every man's interpretation of life needs to be supplemented by some element in the view which he dislikes the most. It is only when we learn from our foes that we become really good fighters."

"There's a difference between learning from our foes and becoming our foes," I object, "I don't want to be rubbed into the man who is my favorite aversion until I become a part of him."

"You are forgetting that in the meantime he will become a part of you," replied my friend.

"And perhaps each of us will surrender the best instead of the worst of ourselves. Then how will you like the combination?"

"I hope you won't do that," said the Lion, "but if you do, the result will be a man who has at least ceased to be plausible. As it is each of you capitalize your insights in getting a hearing for your mistakes. If only the worst of both survive it will stand out for exactly what it is. And there is always the possibility that the best will unite and neutralize the worst and in that case you have done something for your country. You had better go and look up your favorite antipathy. He can do more for you than your best friend."

"But about Wells—" I interjected.

"Wells," said my friend oracularly, "Wells is mind divorced from moral struggle. He would be the greatest possible teacher for a world of clear and easy intellectual levels. There are no heights of awful aspiration. There are no terrible depths down which you gaze with shuddering awe. If you try to read Wells after reading Dante or even after reading Carlyle you know what I mean. He is crisp and nimble and he has the cool audacity of a mathematical mind. He has his own fine eloquence. But his Utopia would be the urbane home of depleted personalities. The Greek tragedies gave you abysmal gloom. But they gave you life infinitely rich in the experience which bends the personality to great issues. There is a mathematical modern Heaven where you have to pay for happiness by being eternally commonplace."

"But surely you don't mean to accuse Wells of that sort of thing?" I enquired.

"Of just that," said the Lion, "His bright originality has all its quality of agile energy because you see it against the background of a richer world which he assumes but which he could not keep alive. If you think your way into a world dominated only by the principles and the relationships which belong to his mind in the messianic period of his writing you will see that such a world would be unthinkably dull. His dream of brotherhood is a great dream. But it must be realized along the path of a personal life whose moral and spiritual richness he does not even understand. Now the fifth century Greek tragedies could teach him—"

"Why not the first century Prophet?" I broke in.

"As for that," said my friend, "Wells is too busy with one or two principles of the first century Prophet ever to have seen his life or his teachings as a whole. He is so busy with a couple of leaves that he has never seen the tree. And the two or three leaves he knows are not enough for the healing of the nations."

Then I had to go. And the Lion lay back quietly in bed. I wondered if I had allowed him to talk too much. You never can remember that he is ill.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

To the Corsican

(Died May, 1821)

NAPOLEON, the glory of your name
In olden days was as the noonday sun,
But now, that proud autocracy is done,
The world casts scorn upon your storied fame.
Your words were steel, your presence made men cower—
And yet your soldiers loved you, stanchly true;
But when your realm into an empire grew,
Pride hurled you headlong from your seat of power.
In ancient times there was a lowly Man
Who with sublime affection loved His kind,
But to His dream the lords of earth were blind,
And Him they slew, with fierce and fiendish plan.
That Man still lives, and millions follow Him,
While you walk lonely, in the shadows dim.

Blind

O FALSELY pious, bound with somber vows,
You rail at joy, you hold it sin to smile;
'Tis all in vain the Maytime wreathes its boughs
With rose and snow—you hold your eyes the while
To musty books. How can you reconcile
Your dull, gray faith with these gold-sprinkled ways,
With this gay orchard beauty, mile on mile?
Your God is not the God of these ambrosial days,
When every bush and tree is filled with joy and praise.

The Dream

DREAMS are the stuff of which the worlds are made.
Before the sun and stars hung out in night,
There was a dream, the Dreamer of it God,
Who in the darkness brooded—and 'twas light.

The Layman's Professional Mind

By Morris H. Turk

THOUGHTFUL churchmen, both lay and clerical, have been distressed at the smug complacency that prevails in many ecclesiastical quarters in all denominations. The tendency to substitute religious professionalism for spiritual reality has become definite enough to be disturbing. One essential aspect of the situation has been well set forth in the recent article by Mr. Joseph E. McAfee in The Christian Century entitled "The Minister's Professional Mind." With interesting accuracy the clerical spirit has been assayed and found to be spiritually wanting. The professionalism of the ministry is seen to be the direct path to hopeless reaction in religion. Unless something can be done to bring a renewed and vital experience of reality in the functioning of the clerical office the church will continue to lag in the moral leadership of the world. Men of religious discernment in all faiths are gripped with the conviction that the ideals and principles of Jesus are alone competent to form a basis for the reconstruction of the world order. They are equally certain that the church must follow these ideals and obey these principles if it is to have any worthy share in building "the new heaven and the new earth." It follows inevitably that the church must depend upon its clerical leaders for guidance and inspiration in so momentous a task. And the professionalizing of the minister's mind is a deplorable fact that must be faced.

But Mr. McAfee's analysis, excellent and correct as to existing conditions, does not touch the deeper problem of the causes which have professionalized the mind of the minister. He reports the fact with merited exactness and interprets them with judicial fairness. But he makes no examination of the environment which has given rise to the conditions. Rather he seems to take for granted that the responsibility for the minister's professional mind rests with the minister himself; that his autocratic ecclesiastical attitude is due to his own self-satisfied assumption of religious authority.

THE LAY ATTITUDE

That the minister is chiefly if not solely responsible for the condition of the church is indicated in Mr. McAfee's assertion that "our law courts are not more absolutely dominated by the professional men of the law than are the institutions of religion controlled by the clergy. In neither is the lay voice or attitude more than a passing incident, to be noted and benevolently commented upon on occasions, but to be treated with the unaffected and unruffled complacency of superior and unimpeachable professional authority." As a report of the regime obtaining in the Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox churches this statement might be regarded as approximately correct. But with the possible exception of the episcopally governed churches the statement is only partly accurate.

This inaccuracy, however, is due to the fact that Mr. McAfee's article explored but one hemisphere of the ecclesiastical world. Into the undiscovered fastnesses of the layman's professional mind he did not make any considerable excursion. But even a hasty survey reveals the subordinate place which the clergyman holds when compared with the men of other professions. Every attorney or judge who is a member of a Protestant church knows that his pastor has hardly a vestige of the authority, either official or professional, that is accorded to men of the law. Every physician and surgeon knows that his advice to his patients has immeasurably greater authority than the advice of his minister to his parishoners. No attorney would continue to represent a client who disobeyed his instructions. No physician would retain as a patient anyone who refused to follow his treatment. The final authority of both lawyer and doctor is recognized, respected and obeyed. But when we turn to inspect the authority of the minister the situation seems to suggest mirth.

REVERSING THE ORACLE

An oracle of a forgotten day once declared "as with the people, so with the priest." This explanation of an ancient religious slump may not be without some suggestion for our current ecclesiastical difficulty. A priori it would seem that as now democratically organized the Protestant churches might well share with the ministers the responsibility for the present condition. With our traditional attitude of mind and uncritical habit of thought it is easy enough to jump at the conclusion that the clergy, assumed to be the authoritative leaders, are alone to blame for our religious inefficiency. But this hasty notion is little more than an instance of the irrational and immoral habit of making the minister the scape-goat for all sorts of ecclesiastical failures. And this, of course, is neither decent nor just. The laymen ought at least to share with the clergy the responsibility for the shortcomings as well as the triumphs of the institution of which both are organic parts.

For the essential democracy of the Protestant churches, in spirit and in practice, gears the clerical function closely into the very life of the church. The ministry is not some dictatorial authority imposed upon the church from without or from above. Protestant ministers are distinctly of the church, by the church and for the church. While the official conduct of the ecclesiastical machinery is vested largely in clerical hands, the sovereign authority rests after all with the churches which create the offices and bestow the responsibility.

PASTOR OR SERVANT

The pastor of a church is understood by the laymen who compose it to be the servant of the church. In all of the congregationally governed churches (like the Baptists, Disciples, Congregationalists and similar bodies) the minister has only such standing, authority and leadership as the church may wish or be willing to give him. There is not one prerogative which he can demand or claim as an intrinsic right. He has, it is true, certain functions sacramental and otherwise which the church has delegated to him. But the gamut of his ministry is derived from the church which creates him and controls his service. Even in churches which are presbyterially or episcopally administered the minister has still only an assigned authority. And every student of recent church history knows quite well that there has been a wide-spread and positive movement to subordinate the minister, increasingly to the decisions and desires of the churches.

Even more evident is the practical working out of this tendency. To such extremes has this concept of clerical functioning gone that in the minds of many laymen and in the practice of many churches the minister is regarded as an employee to be "hired and fired" at the pleasure or displeasure of a majority of the members "present and voting." A leading metropolitan daily some time ago editorialized the abrupt dismissal of a local minister on the thesis that every church had an absolute right to demand that its pastor should preach only such sermons as pleased its members. The basis of the argument was that inasmuch as the church was paying for the preaching it had a right to the kind of preaching it wanted. "Bought and paid for" settled the matter. And this opinion is not by any means a solitary one. It is not even unusual. It is a pathetic commonplace in the thought and practice of many laymen and churches.

CHURCHES AND MINISTERS

The clear and undeniable fact is that the ministers who are now serving the churches are the kind of ministers that the churches want and demand. The minister's professional mind is the inevitable concomitant and inerrant result of the layman's professional mind. Of course the layman will be disposed to deny the soft impeachment. There is indeed an outward, and to a degree sincere, acknowledgment of the technical authority of the minister's ecclesiastical functioning, and a certain instinctive respect for the clerical office as divinely ordained. But there are few laymen who will hesitate to pass judgment upon their ministers' orthodoxy, whether in the realm of theology or the equally important field of Christian social ethics. Unconsciously the layman grows up with certain doctrinal concepts, the more or less inchoate deposits of Sunday school teachings and pulpit utterances during his academic years. These doctrines he easily identifies with absolute truth; and when the busy years of money-making fall upon him and dragoon his every interest and effort, he continues to hold without revision the doctrinal formulas of his youth.

Not all laymen have this experience, but many of them do; at least those who have not consciously continued to think a reverent way through the advancing problems of religious progress. The average layman is not much given to self-imposed religious thinking and almost not at all to theological reconstruction. He is commonly content with "the faith once delivered to the saints." Then when another minister arrives with enlarged and progressive ideals of Christian faith and practice he is quite certain to be judged in accordance with the static beliefs of the conservative member and counted a heretic with dangerous tendencies. This is nothing less than the expression of the layman's professional mind. He makes no claim to professional standing, it is true; but he does consider himself entirely competent to decide upon the minister's orthodoxy.

With the steady, and in recent years rapid, development of democracy in the church, laymen have assumed an increasing share of real ecclesiastical authority. This is as it should be. But in many instances this authority, untrained and inexperienced, is unhelpfully used and sometimes it is abused. A considerable amount of lay floundering should, however, be charged off to lack of knowledge and practice. But after all legitimate deductions have been made, there remains a fairly serious indictment that many of the lay members of the church have not risen to the opportunities for service as might be expected.

IDEALS OF SUCCESS

The spiritual ideals of the church have not always been cherished as of primary and supreme importance. With his improved business administration of the church the layman has often brought also the worldly shrewdness of the office and the exchange, the outward measures of prosperity and the material standards of success. "All bills paid" and "large additions to the membership" have often supplanted concepts of real religious service and the larger enthronement of Christ in personal and social living. The lay ideal of ministerial success not infrequently descends to the approval of vulgar popularity, with a minimum of regard for intellectual honesty, spiritual reality or the Christianizing of the community. Devotion to outworn creeds, allegiance to irrational customs and emphasis of trifling issues have kept many laymen from sharing largely in the great and heroic tasks of the Kingdom. So far as the forward work of the church is concerned, so far as the leadership of the pastor is involved, it is a safe estimate that at least fifty per cent of the book membership of our Protestant churches is a liability and not in any sense an asset.

Under these conditions it would not be expected that the church would always desire and seek the men who could best serve the challenging ideals of the living Christ. The standards of ecclesiastical prosperity that dominate in the minds of the laity are the standards to which the minister is expected to conform. A large and well known city church of featured conservatism had occasion to call a new minister to its pastorate. The lay leaders who dominated the life of that church deliberately selected a young man whom they could manage. They did not want a progressive leader; they wanted an obedient servant who would eat out of their theological hands. Another church specified that the new minister must be a conservative in theology and not interested in social questions. Every minister knows how common are these two specifications on the part of pastorless churches.

ECCLESIASTICAL FIDDLING

Another large church, heedless of the great work that beseechingly faced it, called to its pulpit an inexperienced youth just because he had a pleasing way about him, although he had little ability and no adequate preparation for a heroic task. That church is still engaged in ecclesiastical fiddling while its great work remains undone. Many churches require first of all that a prospective minister should be "safe"; which being interpreted means that he must be a stand-patter in theology, a side-stepper in Christian social ethics, a sentimentalist in the pulpit and a soft-handed coddler in his parish administration. The fact is that most churches call the sort of ministers they wish. Wisely or not, the individual church largely determines the character of the ministry of its chosen leader.

All of which is not to be construed as a blanket indictment of the whole church of Christ. No such intimation is even shadowed. The criticisms suggested refer to tendencies in the church at large, to individual churches and to personal members. There are hosts of churches which are unreservedly devoted to the compelling ideals and redemptive dynamics of the world's only Saviour. Multitudes of loyal laymen, consecrated men and women, are striving with utter sincerity and tireless zeal to obey all the teachings of Jesus. Pew-holders of humble but heroic spirituality are daring to adventure far and fearlessly with the conquering Christ. Unnumbered disciples of every faith and creed are making glorious sacrifices, even unto the uttermost, for the sake of the love-crowned Cross. There are many churches superbly like unto the shining standard, "a glorious church, holy and without blemish." But there are also unworthy churches and un-Christian members; and these defective and delinquent elements in the total life of the church are a menace to the very life of the church itself.

The churches can have virile, progressive, heroic and sacrificial leaders in the pastoral office just as soon as they demonstrate a genuine desire for such men. Whenever the laymen demand preachers of large intellectual calibre, social vision and spiritual ideals, all shot through with a veritable passion for the religious authority of Christ, there will be no lack of able and devoted men eager to serve the churches. It is not the slender wage alone that keeps the best men from the pastorate. The real barriers are the fossilized customs, the piffling sectarian limitations, the cheap and unheroic ideals which the church holds as the norm of ministerial activity.

STRAGGLING FOLLOWERS

There are hundreds of the noblest and largest men in our colleges and universities who would gladly devote themselves to the high service of the church if they dared. But they are unwilling to subordinate their allegiance to the truth that makes men free to the reactionary opinions of the straggling followers of the gleam. They can not trust their finest gifts into the hands of men who are more concerned for an outward show of ecclesiastical prosperity than they are for the establishment of the kingdom of heaven among all men. So these brave knights-errant of the chivalrous cross give their glorious lives to holy service in distant lands. "I have no difficulty," said a noted seminary president, "in getting recruits for the foreign field; but I find it almost impossible to enlist our best men for the home churches."

The greatest spiritual tragedy of our day is the apparent incapacity of so many of our churchmen to comprehend the superb challenge which Christ is striving to bring to vision in the soul of his church. Only by daring loyalties can the church be made so strong that neither the gates of hell nor the threatening tides of an infamous materialism shall prevail against it. The church must have ministers who are unfettered and unafraid; men who in thought and work will be found wherever the living Christ is making holy adventure for the redemption of the race. If the church is to continue to function as the body of Christ it must forsake its ease, its selfishness and its backward look, and call to its exalted service men who in personal calibre and valiant consecration are fitted to be the spiritual path-finders and moral pioneers of our struggling day. In the tremendous tasks of our changing world, in the august spiritual issues of the most crucial hour since Calvary, the Christian ministry ought to be the supreme place of outstanding leadership. Young men of spiritual discernment and religious passion are eager to devote themselves to the moral rebuilding of our broken world. But they are reluctant to subject their sacred gifts to the hazard of the layman's professional mind.

The Crucifixion

"AWAY with him! Away!"
We hear the rabble say.

Let him and all who are allied
With him in thought be crucified!
Away with him! Away!

Away with him! Away!
What are the charges, pray?
Why, he would have God's will be done
On earth and all his peoples one.
Away with him! Away!

Away with him! Away!
Can naught their vengeance stay?
Oh, no! The money-mad and those Who make short shrift of others' woes
Have staged their final play.

Away with him! Away!
Will Justice speak some day?
Oh, yes! God is not wholly dead,
His thunders mutter overhead,
His vivid, livid lightnings red
Will make us pay—we'll pay!

CHARLES R. WAKELEY.

Contributors to this Issue

SCOTT NEARING, Ph.D., Lecturer Rand School of Social Science, New York City; author "Woman and Social Progress," "Social Religion," "Poverty and Riches," etc., etc.

LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, D.D., minister Central Methodist Church, Detroit, Mich. Author "Productive Beliefs."

MORRIS H. TURK, D.D., Congregational minister Natick, Mass.

The Community Church

THE community church is the subject of much discussion. It is not yet a clearly defined issue, but that does not prevent hot criticism of it nor deter some from shouting its virtues from the house tops. The backward looking are sure it is something bad or it would not be; it is new and that is enough. The cynical grouch at it with ill concealed satisfaction just because they are cynical. The cautious are waiting, in rather clamorous silence, for it to define and prove itself. The radical minded know it is just the thing simply because it is new. Critics of all that is, just because it is, see in it a sign and hope and a promise. Sober minded men who know that few things are as good as they may become and who believe that even the good can always be made better welcome the enterprise, study it with open and helpful minded care, and advocate all they find of promise in it.

It is that there are thousands of communities where religion is largely in the discard because of over churching. The zeitgeist today is for democracy and cooperation. True, there is a resurgence of all that is narrow and autocratic as a temporary result of the war, but this is only reaction from an over plus of idealism and sacrifice stimulated by artificial conditions. The gratifying thing is that men go to the cross for ideals today without flinching, and that the submerged democracy is doing heroic battle for its right to recognition. Truth's scaffold is like Haman's in such times: tomorrow the men and things that pass sentence upon it will be hanged on their own gibbets.

The fundamental unit of democracy is the local community. A nation of a hundred million people can live by democratic principles only when ten thousand communities within it live in democratic simplicity. The New England town meeting was the cradle of our democratic government. It was the spontaneous response to democracy. There the spirit of democracy blossomed, and yielded to other forms of expression only for administrative ends. There is today, throughout the length and breadth of the land, a revision of community life in terms of economic, educational and religious things, and the community church enters the field as the forerunner of a new and better era for Christianity.

* * *

What Is the Community?

The community church idea is in a state of experimentation. The academicians are attempting to define it before it is really in existence. It is an ideal more than a realization as yet—an ideal in the process of realization. It must define itself, and time and the trying will do much better at that than will theory. A meeting of community organizations held recently in Washington took both time and experiment by the forelock and decided that the term "community" should be used to cover only those things which, like the New England town meeting, took in everyone who dwelt within the community. Therefore, we surmise it should also include every interest of everyone in the community. Then we are more appalled than perturbed over what it is, for all the interests of all the people in any community are as multifarious as the stars in the heavens. The writer once approached a university professor with a proposition to make a rather comprehensive series of community surveys. Our academic friend refused to cooperate unless it could be made a complete technical survey. But where could we stop? There seemed no place to stop for there was no human interest that could be left out in "a complete technical survey." "An academic nut," said the professor of educational psychology.

One says the community church must therefore include every person living in the community; unless it does it may be a church but not a community church. But where are the boundary lines of the community? Then if it did include everyone, where would be the church? It might be a community organization but unless there was a definite commitment of each and every one in a genuinely religious and moral manner it would not be a church. The fact seems to be that the few organizations, or centers rather (for there can really be no organization unless everyone enters voluntarily) are anything in the world but all inclusive of the community population; they are rather lone prophets in the wilderness of popular incomprehension. Yet they might lay claim to being a community church in that they take every one into their program, even though he refuses to come; in other words, they are community wide in function. The community is an elusive thing but it is very real; it defies exact definition but it clamors for recognition as a definite entity. We all know where it is but none of us can tell where it begins or ends.

* * *

What Is a Community Church.

The community church is an ideal in process; it will define itself in due time. For the present it is a protest and a promise and it is very real. It is a protest against sectarianism made vocal in a manner more terrible than words and much more constructive. It is a promise of a more adequate and effective expression of Christianity in its institutional forms. It is so real that more than four hundred communities in the United States have effected the innovation of organizing it with all the protest of tradition and the dominant ecclesiastical powers and all the inertia of provincialism against it. It is not a question of what academically or theoretically it should be but of what it actually is. To paraphrase the saw about modern philosophy—we don't know where we're going but we know we're on the way. It is an evolution we are describing, not a finished creation, and in that lies the hope of success.

The question then is, what are these four hundred churches? Some are denominational churches that have thrown down the limiting line of sect and creed and welcome to their fellowship any Christian who is willing to come on the simple Gospel basis of acceptance of Jesus as Christ and Savior. That much is necessary to make them evangelical. Some are federations of churches that are willing to live and let live in all matters of opinion and of conviction on things less essential than the acceptance of Jesus as Christ and Savior; thus they organize on the basis of things common and essential in their faith, each respecting the others, divergences in both faith and practice, and each keeps his overhead denominational connection. Others are straight out organic unions, cutting all local and overhead denominational ties. Then there is also the utterly latitudinarian experiment of setting up a pulpit and a program that asks no bond of membership, but invites all the community to come in, or more properly counts them all in whether they will or not. This, we protest, is self contradictory; it may be useful and even prophetic but it is not a church because it is not an organization; it is less a community church than a voice in the community.

* * *

Functional Definition of Community Church

The community church then is defined by function rather than by geographical lines or by creed or any fixed formula; it is a church that opens its doors to all Christians in the community who will unite for the sake of the agreed upon ends of Christian living. Its bond of union is one of minimums—the minimums of the fundamental essentials to a Christian fellowship, viz., a common acceptance of Christ as Lord and Leader. There can never be a union on maximums simply because there is no place to limit maximums. Christ's Gospel is too rich and multifarious to permit that. Jesus laid down his own minimum in Peter's confession, but the avenues to the more abundant life are as infinite as the life of God. The community church lays down a definite platform—one as wide and strong as our Lord's life and word; but it builds no enclosures around it in terms of creed or tradition. Its common ground today is that of functioning in its community to draw all Christians together in a common fellowship for the sake of building up their own lives and to make the community a more Christian place to live in; it serves the community and all who dwell there in all things good instead of building up a sectarian enterprise out of the community. What the turn of its development will be none can do more than speculate or prophesy, but it is here to stay because it is a genuinely religious and social expression of the new community consciousness of our time. It gives over-churched communities a real church; it moves on the lines of least resistance and in a constructive manner, and it answers in organized force the yearning of men's souls for a working Christian unity in place of a divisive sectarianism.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

CORRESPONDENCE

"Seven Thousand Progressives"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In "The Threat of Millennialism" Dr. Obadiah Holmes reminds one of the old prophet Elijah in his imaginary, not to say grotesque, fears that truth and righteousness were about to be stamped out by the enemies of God and true religion. In the despair of his soul at reactionism the old prophet complains: "I have been very jealous for Jehovah, the God of hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life to take it away." When Elijah had finished his little speech to God, God made a great speech to him. In substance, it ran "Go back to your enemies. Continue your work. Get ready for the triumph of a more progressive, a more modern and a more vital religion than stand pat conservatives ever heard of. There are seven thousand progressives in Israel who have not bowed the knee to the god of reactionism." After this heartening message from the great head of the progressive movement in religion. Elijah went back with more faith and hope.

The story illustrates for us the difficulties of every progressive movement in religion. Progressive religion has always had its difficulties, and we need not be discouraged at the same today. Dr. Holmes begins his article: "Heresy-hunting has been revived." Of course it has; it has had many revivals. There have been as many revivals of heresy hunting as there have been advance steps in religion. Abraham, a progressive, sought religious liberty out west. Moses, a progressive, had heresy hunters on his trail. It is even possible that he was burned at the stake. At least his body was never found, which might mean that the heresy hunters took this means of covering up their hideous crime. Amos, Hosea and Micah were all progressives, and were as unpopular with the orthodox leaders as they were progressive in their message. In his summary of true religion Micah, in stinging phrase for the orthodox of all ages, asks: "Wherewith shall I come before Jehovah, and bow down myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings (in the orthodox way), with calves a year old? Will Jehovah (a progressive God of righteousness) be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God." Imagine how these words would brand Micah in the minds of the "fundamentalists" of his day as a "heretic." It is a significant fact that his summary of religion never gets into the creeds. Little things like Micah's "fundamentals" never form the creeds on which orthodox theology is built up!

Progressives have always been unpopular with heresy hunters. They have a way, in their clearer perception of God and religion, of destroying the "stock in trade" of creed makers. The creed maker is more interested in dogmatic theology; the progressive in religion and life. It was the orthodoxy of the "fundamentalists" of his day that brought about the crucifixion of Jesus Christ, and the imprisonment of Paul. Jesus hated orthodoxy as the Jews hated the Samaritans, as the French hate the Germans. And in their religion the orthodox of Jesus' day were as autocratic and unprincipled as were the Germans under the kaiser. It is a trait which orthodoxy has too often shown.

We might as well admit that each school hates the opposing school, because each conceives that it is right and its opponent is wrong. The real problem of the situation for us today, as it has always been, is the problem of maintaining, in our differences of opinion, the Christian spirit toward each other. If I hate the system of orthodoxy which the "fundamentalists" contend for, I must not also hate my brother who holds that system. I must not by wire pulling, by political jugglery, by unbrotherly conduct, by any un-Christian act injure his character and his opportunity to serve in the kingdom of God. And if my orthodox brother would still be Christian, he must not defame my good name; he must not seek to harry me out of the kingdom, nor prescribe the way I may remain in it; he must not persecute me in my religious affiliation; he must not seek to bridle my tongue, nor in any way to deprive me of my religious liberty.

In an enlightened age of democracy there is room for both the progressive and the orthodox. Most denominations and churches have both. Present indications would seem to say that we shall have both for a long time to come. So long as one part of our population is more or less illiterate and without the scientific spirit, so long we shall have "dogmatic" religion, "plans" of salvation, "fixed systems" of theology, millennialists of the "post" and "pre" varieties, and other vermiform appendices. On the other hand, so long as learning abounds, so long as science is with us, so long as men think and free institutions endure, we shall have the progressive with us. The scientific spirit and method, already in our schools, higher and secondary, is here to stay. And it will as surely continue to permeate the very life and thinking of all classes. It is beyond the control of ecclesiastical bodies, and is free, with the teaching and spirit of Jesus, to work out the salvation of a new day in learning and religion.

Our orthodox brethren might as well recognize the facts in the case. No attempt to throttle it and no attempt to put into ecclesiastical position in any denomination those who oppose the new spirit will stay the movement. Nor would the progressives materially help their cause by seeking to put into like positions those of their own number.

In closing, a word of admonition may not be out of place. If we cannot live together as brothers while each is free to interpret religion for himself and teach it as he understands it, then we have ceased to be Christian and God will cast us both out and raise up another priesthood better than ourselves.

O. T. ANDERSON.

First Congregational Church,
Kane, Pa.

British Table Talk

An Appeal for Leadership

London, April 28, 1921.

IN these troublous times it is reassuring to remember that there is plenty of good stuff in people, and all that is needed is to make the right appeal to it. Experience shows that the severer the demand in a good cause, the finer the response. Through the press, the vicar of St. Martin's has been lamenting the lack of an adequate spiritual lead. "There has been no fervent summons to live nobly in any way to be compared to the passionate appeal to die nobly that the war produced." He is confident that the country is waiting for such a summons if someone whom it trusted would come forward and confirm its deep yet inarticulate consciousness that things could be righted at home, in Europe, everywhere, if the Christian ethic for each were discovered and ruthlessly applied. Mr. Sheppard wistfully imagines a member of Parliament rising and making such a speech that next day the newspapers would have to write: "The house listened with amazement while the right honorable gentleman based his speech on the Spirit of Christ, which he passionately maintained was the only remedy for the world's sickness." He singles out Lord Robert Cecil among our public statesmen as most consistently striking the note of spiritual idealism: some think Mr. Sheppard himself could meet the need to a considerable extent. "We ask that he shall be a 'non-compromise' man. He must be ready to apply the touchstone of Christian principles ruthlessly to every legislative and administrative act, to every detail of our foreign policy, and to every incident in the conduct of home affairs." Quite independently, other speakers have been making the same appeal. Rev. F. W. Norwood, minister of the City Temple, declares that the supreme need of the hour is a true priest and prophet: "Oh that there were a voice, any voice, that would make clear that the things of God and the things of man are one and the same!" The dean of St. Paul's pleads that the principles of Christianity be given a fair chance in our daily lives, our social affairs, our international relations. After experience of "the new expedients and societies of the last twenty years," Rev. Thomas Phillips, Bloomsbury, cries: "Give the simple methods of Jesus Christ a chance!" and Rev. F. C. Spurr warns us that if a grim fight between capital and labor is to be avoided, a serious attempt must be made on the grand scale to set forth the sound principles which govern humane industry, and that these principles will be found to be Christian principles. Dr. Orchard thinks that humanity is as near to being lost as it can be, and Canon Burroughs recalls Mr. Lansing's remark at the Mayflower celebrations at Washington last November: "I think the nations already have repentance; what they now need is faith—in ideals, in man, above all in God." Rev. Thomas Nightingale, secretary of the National Free Church Council, is firmly convinced that the churches are ready for leadership "in a new adventure of faith."

* * *

Deeds, Not Words

Thus many voices are sounding the same note. What is now urgently needed is the actual application in daily life, in all relations, of Christian principles by all who believe in them. A resolute move in this direction would arrest attention and have far reaching consequences. There is danger of recognizing the need, even voicing it, but doing little to meet it. Deeds, rather than words, are now imperatively called for. Bishops and popular preachers vehemently denounce the injustice of modern social and industrial conditions—but does such denunciation greatly help the victims? The situation demands individual and combined action on definitely Christian lines. The least that organized Christian forces can do is not merely to demand a living wage for all conscientious workers, but to see that they get it, and not to rest content with anything short of the Christianization of industry. With the view of starting a national movement towards a Christian order of industry and commerce, an effort was made about a year ago to rally men of good will engaged in the administration of industry, commerce, and the professions for the application of Christian principles to industrial, commercial, and professional life, and a conference of business men in sympathy with the effort was held in London recently. The preliminary proceedings were of a promising character, and another conference will shortly meet. Four or five years ago Dr. Orchard produced a scheme for a new religious order, consisting of "men and women banded together to live an austere, communal, simplified life, with the motive of recovering simplicity of soul, communion with God, and the service of mankind," and help towards solving our social problem by increasing production, reducing material needs to the simplest necessities, and abolishing the master and servant relationship altogether. So far no attempt has been made to carry out the idea. It would not be possible, perhaps not desirable to get large numbers of people to live under the conditions indicated, and we cannot look for a complete solution of industrial problems along that line; but a movement of the kind described, sanely conducted, would undoubtedly do good. Meanwhile, certain choice spirits, led by Mrs. Stephen Hobhouse, are living under the simplest conditions among the East End poor, and invite the rich and well to do to prove the worth of Christianity by voluntarily adopting a life of poverty. In asking people to go and live in personal touch with the poor, Mrs. Hobhouse explains that "the central motive is to prove from the experience of an increasing number of individuals that voluntary poverty promotes the sense of our unity with the oppressed in a way that nothing else can be expected to do. We know that this unity has wonderful possibilities of joy—that there is an element of the experience of St. Francis which can be revived in an entirely new experience such as we suggest." Such brave attempts are not only of value in themselves but also an object lesson.

* * *

Westminster Abbey's New Departure

One of the numerous signs of the increasing vitality of the church of England is a strong movement for improving its congregational singing. Mr. Martin Shaw has been a bold pioneer at St. Martin's and Kensington Town Hall, where every Sunday he conducts a practice of the whole congregation for half an hour before the service and during the service directs the singing with his baton. The dean of Manchester recently adopted a similar plan at the Cathedral, where the congregation numbers between 2000 and 2500. "Once granted that congregations should sing," says Dean McCormick, "why should they be content with making 'a joyful noise?' Preachers are expected to prepare their sermons, choirs their anthems, why not congregations their psalms and hymns?" The dean points out that, the psalms being poetry, and often dramatic poetry, the meaning of the words can be brought out by the simple plan of allotting verses or parts of verses to choir, to congregation, to a solo voice. Thus in Psalm xxiv the choir might ask the question, "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord?" A solo voice would answer, "He that hath clean hands and a pure heart." The congregation endorses it, "He shall receive the blessing from the Lord," and every voice in the church proclaims the spiritual conclusion, "This is the generation of them that seek him." "Icy coldness characterizes the services in most of our cathedrals," said a vicar recently, "but there are signs of a thaw." The thaw has set in at the Abbey, where the congregations are now invited to practice hymns, with the view of restoring the people's part in the service. On an April Sunday evening Mr. S. H. Nicholson, the organist, mounted the chancel steps half an hour before the service and asked the congregation to remain seated whilst he played the hymns that had been chosen for the service. He explained that sometimes certain verses would be sung by the choir alone, and others by the congregation alone, or the women would be asked to sing by themselves and afterwards let the men sing alone; and the congregation were to rise with the choir. He then took the congregation through several hymns, stopping them from time to time to point out faults and how they might be corrected. In the course of the practice he gave the following hints: Start each line firmly; don't drag at the end; if you want a breath, don't take it in the middle of a line; don't invent harmonies—if you know the proper harmony, sing it, otherwise sing in unison; it is fatal to rely on the choir and the organ. The example set at Westminster Abbey is being followed throughout the country. In this connection a story told by the late Dean Hole is recalled. Soon after "The strain upraise of joy and praise" appeared in Hymns Ancient and Modern, the dean asked his choirmaster to include it in the service. "Well, sir," was the answer, "we have had to go at it, and if I could only get Butcher Hodgson to cut his Alleluias a bit shorter, we could sing it almost any Sunday. But William, when he gets hold o' them Alleluias, he seems as if he never knew when to let go of 'em."

* * *

"Neo-Evangelicism"

Another sign that the Church of England is "thrilling with new life" is a pronouncement by a Birmingham vicar, Rev. F. Wellows, made after conferring with many people in various places, including clergymen, army chaplains, theological students, who "often feel choked when they get into certain evangelical atmosphere but want neither to form a new party or to go over to the modernists or ritualists." The movement is described by the ugly word "neo-evangelicalism," but its representatives prefer to be known as Modern Evangelical or Liberal Evangelical or simply Evangelical. Whilst he claims to represent faithfully all that the old Evangelical school really stands for, he rejoices to have been delivered from out-of-date phraseology, opinions, and practices. "He breathes a freer atmosphere, uses a larger vocabulary, and lives a fuller life." Mr. Wellows indicates some of the characteristics of the modern evangelical. As to services and ritual, he wants the church to be beautiful and furnished only with the best articles. He prefers to have a cross and flowers on or over the communion table, and has no objection to candlesticks, or even to lighted candles at the 8 a. m. service if the congregation wants them. He usually turns to the east in the creeds and does not mind taking the eastward position at the communion. He is willing to wear colored stoles, preferring white at weddings and the great festivals. As to language and message, he will not be tied down to the shibboleths of any party. Claiming to be truly catholic, he uses the word frequently. He readily speaks of "altar" and "eucharist," but feels that "mass" is un-Anglican. He accepts the conclusions of balanced and reverent Bible criticism. His message being addressed to the whole man, is not directed incessantly to the salvation of the soul. He preaches a social as well as an individual gospel. The evils of bad housing, inadequate wages, commercial tyranny, profiteering, ca' canny, etc., are attacked as readily and frequently as the personal sins of drunkenness, immorality, selfishness, hypocrisy, lust. He does not preach much about the glories of Heaven, but he does picture with vividness the glories of the Kingdom of God on earth. He is out for "Justice, brotherhood, and the infinite and equal value of every human personality." The church to him is for "service" rather than for "safety." He is ready to acknowledge that God has spoken and does speak through the devout men of every nation, color and creed, though the complete revelation is in and through Jesus Christ and through Jesus Christ and His Holy Spirit. As to methods of work, the modern evangelical is willing to cooperate with all who are endeavoring to preach and live the Christian faith. Gladly does he cooperate with nonconformists and heartily supports the efforts now being made towards reunion.

ALBERT DAWSON.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

My Neighborhood*

EVIDENTLY those who planned this course of studies had in mind the concentric circles of influence which ought to radiate out from a virile Christian personality. At the center stands a powerful, inspired, broad-minded Christian; he influences his family, then his community, then his nation, then the world. Is it too much to say that one man may project his influence to the outmost rim of the world? No, for your prayer and your dollar may be at work in Chu Chow today.

We have briefly considered the family, now let us turn to the Christian and his neighborhood.

Some years ago the churches in my community made a careful survey of the territory surrounding our institutions. In our immediate section of the city we found 57 churches and 57 saloons, a library, several schools, and to our surprise a number of destructive agencies. The Episcopal church arranged a map about 15 feet square on which all the various institutions were indicated by suitable signs. Upon the presentation of this map in the various churches, reform waves were started which eventuated in much good. Prior to this we had not known the neighborhood in which we lived and worked.

"Get the facts"—this is the contention, repeated over and over in Bishop McConnell's new book, "Public Opinion and Theology." There has been too much generalizing on too few facts. "What are the facts?" must be the first inquiry of every thinker. We are cursed by loose and soft thinking or near-thinking. Even statistics and surveys have to be balanced before they are used as the basis of action. The old "Pittsburgh Survey"—many thought it presented far more dark than bright spots. If I go into a rose garden surveying worm-eaten leaves and petals I shall find a book full, but the book would not show the whole truth—only a one-sided truth. In this country I can survey rattlesnakes or oranges or both!! It is our Christian duty to know our community—its churches and blind tigers, its schools and pool-rooms, its homes and clubs, its libraries and houses of prostitution, its policemen, its sanitation, its races and its taxation. Know your facts—know them, exactly; know them on both sides and then, if the cogs in your brain fit, you can reach some logical lines of action. Weak wishing and loose thinking curse our time. Vigorous action should follow strong mental effort based upon all the facts. Don't discuss theology until you know your facts. Don't plan reforms until you know your facts. Don't praise or blame a man or a church until you know your facts. Men and institutions suffer because lies have been told about them—know your facts. Never permit yourself to voice a judgment, particularly concerning a person, until you are positive that you have a well-balanced set of facts. It is a crime to do less.

When you have your facts about your neighborhood you must regard your community in the spirit possessed by the Good Samaritan, when he met the needy man by the road. Shaftesbury will always be a glorious example of the love of fellow-men.

No single church can save a large community—all the churches must band together for evangelism, for temperance, for education, for missions, for recreation, and for all the many types of service which federated churches may give to their sections of the city or country.

The formula reads something like this: Facts plus love plus action equal a saved neighborhood. JOHN R. EWERS.

*Uniform Lesson for May 29, "Making the Neighborhood." Scripture, Luke 10:25-37.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Dr. Foster Says State Universities Are Full of Materialism

Dr. Foster in his address before the Disciples Congress in Springfield, Ill., indicated that the state universities of the middle west are full of materialism and adverse religious influences. He asserted that the departments of liberal arts were increasingly unpopular with the students. The dances and recreations of state universities came in for vigorous treatment. In the discussion that followed this address there was a series of rebuttals on the part of different people acquainted with the religious situation in state universities. Dr. A. M. Haggard, of Des Moines, who has been for many years connected with Drake University, a Disciples institution, asserted that the University of Iowa was not to be counted as in any sense an institution unfriendly to Christianity. Of the 4,400 students enrolled this year, over 96 per cent have a definite religious preference. Over 75 per cent of the students are church members, a much larger percentage than in the general population. In the discussion of Dr. Foster's address, Dean G. B. Edwards reported the efforts of the Missouri Bible College, adjacent to the University of Missouri to broaden out into an interdenominational school of religion.

Book Concern Vacancies Arouse Controversy

The annual session of the book committee of the Methodist Episcopal church was held in Cincinnati April 23. The sessions were enlivened by the fact that an important ecclesiastical post had been made vacant by the death of Dr. E. R. Graham. Rev. W. F. Conner, chairman of the committee, presided throughout the sessions. The chairman held that the discipline book of the church provided for an election in case the agent of the committee died between the sessions of General Conference. An appeal was taken from the ruling of the chair on this point and the appeal was sustained. As a result the committee transferred to Dr. Race the supervision of the New York house. Mr. Hughes was assigned to the supervision of the depositories. The Book Concern declared a dividend of $275,000 for use as pension money among the aged ministers of the Methodist church.

One of the Oldest of the Parish Papers

Most up to date churches have a house organ these days, a parish paper which sets forth the news and the announcements of the local church. Many of these papers are mailed to the entire membership once a week and form an invaluable means by which widely scattered members are kept in touch with their church. This parish paper has greatly reduced the amount of parish visitation which is necessary on the part of the minister. One of the oldest of these journals is the Christian Worker of Des Moines, published by Central Christian Church. It recently celebrated thirty-five years of history. It is a four column journal of sixteen pages and contains some national news as well as news of the local field. It was founded by Dr. H. O. Breeden, and is now edited by the present pastor, Rev. W. A. Shullenberger. Unlike many parish papers, it has a definite subscription list which provides a large part of the funds necessary for publication.

Buddhists Under the Stars and Stripes

More people of the non-Christian religions live under the stars and stripes than is commonly understood. Recently Rev. U. G. Murphy, who is a special representative of the American Bible Society, completed a tour among the Japanese of the Hawaiian Islands. He found 115,000 Japanese in these islands, of whom at least ninety thousand are Buddhists. At least eighty per cent of these Japanese have never heard an address on Christianity. The report of the Bible Society worker has aroused such interest that a man will be sent to the islands at once to continue the work so well begun by Mr. Murphy.

Church Federation Opposes Certain Immigrants

The views of church people on the subject of immigration represent quite a wide variety. The following excerpt from a letter sent out by the Sacramento Church Federation in California indicates the attitude of certain Californians: "The pestiferous English sparrow, with high birth rate, is rapidly replacing our native birds who destroy for us native weed seeds and insects. In the same manner, similarly rapidly reproducing immigrants from southeastern Europe threaten with extinction the type which founded America." This statement on the part of the Sacramento Federation has been sharply criticized by the Christian Work and other religious journals.

Sunday School Leaders See a World Opportunity

The first annual meeting of the executive committee of the World's Sunday School Association since the Tokyo convention was held recently in Philadelphia. Hon. John Wanamaker presided at the meeting and spoke forcefully concerning the future possibilities of the Sunday School. Dr. William T. Ellis of Philadelphia spoke on the opportunity of the Sunday school, seeing in it a world force that would in the long run be able to overcome the racial hatred which is spread over the world at the present time like a plague. The committee considered cooperation with the evangelical movements in some of the new nations of Europe. A significant change in personnel is the election of Mr. W. C. Pearce as the associate general secretary of the World's Sunday School Association. Mr. Pearce is a Disciples layman of Chicago and he has met with rapid promotion in recent years because of his capacity for organization. He won his spurs as secretary of the adult department of the International Sunday School Association. He is now in the line of promotion for the greatest office in the gift of the Sunday school world. A fine platform speaker, he supplements his office work with effective interpretations of the ideals of the Sunday school movement among the churches.

Presbyterians Make Great Record in Benevolence

The auditors are at work on the books of the various benevolent societies of the Presbyterian church and their report will be given out at the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church at Winona Lake, Indiana. The audit takes some time as money is received directly by all the boards and in addition the central receiving agency accepts contributions. The department of publicity of the Presbyterian church authorizes the statement in advance of the report of the auditors that the money for benevolences this year will make a grand total of very nearly ten million dollars. About one third of this goes through the central receiving agency. The increase in the amount of money received by the central receiving agency over that received last year, including the money received for interchurch underwritings of $443,850.74 was $1,009,063.13.

Kiwanis Club Entertains Disciple Orphans

The largest orphanage maintained by the Disciples of Christ is that at St. Louis. Recently the Kiwanis Club of the city entertained the children. The business men became so interested in the hundreds of little ones that they voted to supply the orphanage with up to date recreational equipment. The children now have a lot of things to remind them of this happy contact with the St. Louis Club.

Preacher Defends "Yellow" Journalism

During the sessions of the Disciples' Congress at Springfield, Rev. Burris A. Jenkins addressed the Mid-Day Luncheon Club of Springfield. Dr. Jenkins spoke on the relation of the church and journalism. He is himself at once an editor, a preacher and a novelist. He defended his "double barreled gun" not as being a serving of two masters, but the serving of one master in two different ways. He referred to the fact that his journal had been called "yellow and blatant." Discussing yellow journalism he asserted that it was not crime and scandal stories that made a paper yellow, but the soul of the paper. The publishing of crime and divorce stories is one of the means of deterring people from wrong, asserted the minister.

How Mothers' Day Was Observed

The observance of Mothers' Day has grown very quickly from a humble beginning to a nation wide practice. Seven years ago an act of Congress inaugurated the practice. It may have been based on an old English practice of "Mothering Sunday." Many churches secured photographs of the venerable mothers of the congregation and printed half tones for public distribution. In some cases automobiles gathered up the mothers who could not get to church any other way. The ministers used the day as one in which to exalt the virtues of the Christian home and to protest against the low standards of family life which are working the divorce courts over time at the present time.

Presbyterian Boards Will Hold Preliminary Meeting

The Presbyterian General Assembly opens at Winona Lake, Ind., May 19, and the day previous the personnel of the various Presbyterian boards will meet in the big new Billy Sunday Tabernacle. Mr. Homer Rodeheaver, the singer, who accompanies Billy Sunday on his travels, has been released to lead the singing the day the Presbyterian missionary leaders hold their meeting. In the evening of that day there will be a stereopticon lecture showing pictures of the various Presbyterian missionary ventures. Following this is the 133rd meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in America.

Chicago Continues to Fight Vice

Though not directly representing the church, the Committee of Fifteen in Chicago commands the unanimous support of church people. The epoch-making report of this committee, published in book form a few years ago, resulted in closing up all the segregated vice of the city. The committee held its annual meeting in the Hotel LaSalle on May 9. At this meeting, Dr. John Timothy Stone, pastor of Fourth Presbyterian church, spoke on "The Chicago of Tomorrow." The fight against the vicious element is by no means won in the city, but there is great gain in running the dives to cover.

Chicago Church Makes Big Gains in Membership

The reports on the church activities of the Easter season of the Chicago churches are now in hand. These show that a total of 16,619 new members were received in 540 churches reporting to the Chicago Church Federation. In 180 Methodist churches 6,500 new members were received; in 52 Presbyterian churches making reports, the new members totaled 2,923. There are only half the Presbyterian churches in this report, while practically the whole of the Methodist strength is set forth. Other denominations receiving over a thousand new members were: Baptist, 1,710; Episcopal 1,686; Congregational, 1,407, and United Lutheran, 1,253. There are 900 Protestant churches in the Chicago area and it is estimated by Dr. Howard Agnew Johnson, president of the Federation, that in these churches there was a total of 25,000 new members. This is the most significant increase that has ever come to Chicago churches since the records have been kept.

Soldier Preacher Enters on Civil Duties

The war produced profound changes in many preachers that went to France. Some of them resigned their charges on their return home and took some time off to think it over. Some felt they could never preach some of the old doctrines again. Gradually these men are becoming settled in the churches and to a large extent they are a leavening force with their new ideas. Rev. Byron Hester, former chaplain, was recently installed as pastor of the Disciples church in Electra,

Tex. In his inaugural sermon he said: "The church that spends its time and energy fighting other churches, other divisions of the Christian army, in turning its guns on its allies, is guilty of treason. And I believe that the time will come when many churches will have to answer this charge before the great white throne, and will be pronounced 'guilty.' Christianizing the entire community of Electra is far more important than in building

Dr. Meyer's American Successor

MUCH meaning attaches to the appointment of Rev. William Charles Poole as successor of Rev. F. B. Meyer in Christ's Church, of London. This event has attracted wide attention on both sides of the big water. Christ's Church is said to be the most ecclesiastical building ever erected in London by nonconformists. Lincoln Tower is one of the significant features of the beautiful Gothic structure. On a highway that connects South London with Westminster, the crowds of men go by every day and look upon Lincoln Tower, which was erected in honor of the great emancipator of American history.

The ministers of this church have all been men of international fame. Rev. Rowland Hill lies buried beneath the pavement of this church. He was internationally minded, far visioned, beloved and honored at home and abroad. Then came F. B. Meyer, who has gone to the ends of the earth with a message that was mystical and loyal to the gospel of Jesus Christ. Some months ago Dr. Meyer resigned, for the weight of years was upon him. A younger man was sought who would be fitted to enter into the traditions of this great church.

The choice fell upon Rev. William Charles Poole, who entered upon his new labors on Easter Sunday. The life story of this man is a lesson in internationalism. He was born on the continent of Australia and later became an American citizen. He has the privileges of world travel and brings to his new task the international mind which is so much needed these days in the formation of public opinion in America and in Great Britain. He will be one more voice added to the many who are now counsellors of a friendly understanding between Great Britain and America. Christian statesmanship has fastened upon such pulpit arrangements as one of the sure means by which the jingoists in both nations may be defeated in their unholy campaign of hate and suspicion.

The London press has greeted the new preacher with the most cordial welcome as some of these extracts from press notices will indicate:

"It is seldom easy to seize upon the dominant note of a preacher's personality at the first contact. In the case of Dr. Poole, it is almost impossible to miss it. He radiates optimism; it speaks in every line of his alert, business like presence, shines in his observant eye, rings unmistakably in every syllable of his crisp utterance. It would be difficult to convey an impression of his infectious buoyancy and enthusiasm. He positively radiated good health, good humor, and spirits. He sang more heartily, perhaps, than anyone in the church. He preached with extraordinary vigor, looking like some happy guest at a wedding feast. 'Let not your heart be troubled.' The preacher's theme was, 'The Way of the Untroubled Heart.' His first words showed that he was conscious of the incongruity between his text and a world full of trouble. But he reminded us that these words, spoken in the upper room, which has been called the spiritual cathedral of humanity, were addressed to a group of dejected, and desperately dismayed men, the light of whose life seemed to have gone out, and whose national hope was extinguished."

Any book now in print can be secured through The Christian Century Press. Give publisher if possible.

The Bethany Graded Lessons

126 Texts Covering 17 Years of Study

Send for returnable samples

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

MAKE YOUR CHURCH DEVOTIONAL

by putting into your homes the most beautiful book of personal devotion and family worship ever published—

"The Daily Altar"

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

FOR each day of the year a theme, meditation, Scripture, poem and prayer. 400 pages. In two editions: Gift edition, full leather, $2.50. Popular edition, purple cloth, $1.50 (Add 8 cents postage). The beautiful purple cloth edition may be had at $1 per copy in lots of 50. Write for full list of discounts.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

up any one church here. It is far more important than building up all of the churches here. St. John in picturing for us the New Jerusalem says of it that there was no temple there. There was no longer need for one. The entire community was Christian. The raison d'être of an army is not to swell its own numbers and perfect its organization but to conquer territory. Our interests should center in the community. We should be more concerned in making the entire community Christian. The various churches are but squads and the various ministers but corporals in the one company under the captain of our salvation. As corporals we should be interested in equipping and training our squads but we should be more interested in the whole company and more interested still in conquering the common enemy."

Quakers Want More Missionaries, Fewer Soldiers

On April 10, the Quakers held a meeting in New York's new town hall. This meeting was largely attended and Dr. Rufus Jones presided. He said with regard to world conditions: "Ten thousand missionaries, teachers, editors, sanitary engineers and statesmen sent to Mexico twenty-five years ago, when it became evident that Diaz's policy was robbing the peons and unfitting the Mexicans for self-government—sent to help Mexico, not to exploit her, as the Americans who got the concessions from Diaz often did—would have done vastly more to make the border secure and to protect American interests than 100,000 soldiers on the border in 1916 or warships on the coast today."

Church Federation Stimulates Debates

In the view of the Church Federation of Wichita, Kans., the most important of our questions is the international one. This federation has prepared and mailed to different discussion groups in the churches ten questions in which the matter of war or peace is brought strongly to the front. Rev. Ross W. Sanderson is the secretary of this very aggressive federation.

Lay Churchman Receives the Congratulations of His City

Few lay churchmen have ever been honored as Mr. John Wanamaker was recently honored in a great banquet in Philadelphia. Over eight hundred representative citizens gathered together, and in their ranks were numbered the professional and business leaders of the city. The mayor of Philadelphia was accompanied by the mayor of New York. The supreme court of the state adjourned so the justices might be present. Cardinal Dougherty was present and sat by the side of Bishop Joseph F. Berry of the Methodist Episcopal church. The President and the Vice President of the United States sent greetings. For twenty years Mr. Wanamaker has been superintendent of the Sunday school of Bethany Presbyterian Church. Even when he was postmaster general he used to journey back to his home city every Sunday to direct the Sunday school which was so dear to him. He has established personal relationships of the most endearing sort in the parish of his church, visiting the sick and in many other ways expressing his sympathy with the young life about him. It is not only because he is Philadelphia's leading merchant, but much more because of his Christian service in the community that he has been honored in this outstanding way.

Noted Church Leader Will Itinerate

Rev. Peter Ainslie is one of the most familiar figures in the councils of those who would draw Christ's followers together. As pastor of the Christian Temple of Baltimore, president of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, as editor and author and lecturer, he has created for himself a great public. He will round out thirty years of service with Christian Temple in the fall and the official board of this church have given him a year's leave of absence. He will spend this year itinerating among the American churches. He will hold evangelistic meetings, conduct devotional retreats and deliver special addresses of various kinds. In all of these addresses his enthusiasm for Christian union and world peace will find a voice.

Home Mission Work in America on the Increase

The Home Missions Council has recently gathered the statistics of home mission work in America done by the various denominational boards. Though it is recognized that very important home mission work is being done by the Sunday School organizations, the Christian Associations and many other agencies, it is impossible to bring the statistics of these organizations together at the present time. The figures that have been published recently for the home mission work

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea —1 cupful.....	1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)
Green tea —1 glassful.....	2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)
Coca-Cola —1 drink, 8 fl. oz.....	.61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

of the nation are largely those of the various evangelical denominations. A big jump in appropriations the past year is indicated by the figures. The 1919 appropriations were $14,649,828.36, while in 1920 these mounted to $23,135,601.14. In the same period the workers fully supported by the boards have grown from 3,369 to 4,473. The native workers have increased from 544 to 1,226. A year book of the Home Missions Council has been issued which contains 270 pages of very valuable information for the student of home missions.

Disciples Missionary Becomes Locum Tenens Professor

Rev. William Remfry Hunt, a Disciples missionary who has spent twenty years in China, is this year the locum tenens professor of Chinese literature and philosophy at the College of Missions in Indianapolis. In this school many of the native languages of the mission field are being taught with success. This coming autumn the school will graduate 43 students who will immediately accept assignments in the various mission fields of the world.

Lutherans Continue Conferences with Federal Council

The United Lutheran church has not closed the door to further conference with the officials of the Federal Council. Though feeling strongly that the Federal Council is deficient in the matter of dogmatic pronouncement, and that it has been unwise in the pronouncements of the social service commission, the Lutherans have not given up the idea that some mode of cooperation may be established. The committee on the Federal Council has been continued and enlarged, and it is hoped that cheering news may yet come from the deliberations of the Council.

Disciples' Campaign on Underwritings Goes Forward

The field workers who are helping to raise the Disciples' share of the Underwritings of the Interchurch World Movement held a conference in St. Louis recently and brought together their figures. The denomination must raise a total of $600,000. Last autumn the offerings to this fund were $71,952.22. Since then the official pledge card has been signed by church boards until a total of $133,809.77 is to be added to the above figures. Many churches have written saying that they have voted the money, but have not signed the official card. These total about $110,000. Such churches are sending in the cards every day. The field workers are having their difficulty in getting the support of the smaller churches where in many cases the matter has not yet been recognized as an obligation. A validating committee has been appointed composed of Mr. E. M. Bowman of New York, Mr. M. Y. Cooper of Cincinnati, Mr. Frank R. Henry of St. Louis, and Mrs. Maud D. Ferris of Taylorville, Ill. When this committee reports that the underwritings are all pledged the churches will be notified to send in their money. In many cases churches have waived the conditional feature of the pledges taken and have sent in their money "to stop interest." While the campaign has moved forward without enthusiasm, there is everywhere a stolid determination that Disciples honor shall not be tarnished by any default with the banks.

Great Temperance Leader Recovering from Illness

The life of Rev. Edwin C. Dinwiddie has been despaired of in recent weeks, but he is now reported out of danger.

Persistent over work and the neglect of a "cold" finally resulted in a severe case of erysipelas. When the Volstead act was passed he resigned from the Anti-Saloon League, but was persuaded to go on for a season. He has been working in state legislatures for stronger enforcement laws and has in a number of cases been able to secure them. He hopes to be well enough to participate in the hearings on the supplemental amendments to the Volstead act.

Disciples Congress at Springfield

THE twenty-first annual Congress of the Disciples of Christ was held at Springfield, Ill., May 9-12. The congress is an open forum in which the problems of the movement are discussed, without attempting any legislative action. This institution came into being a quarter of a century ago largely through the efforts of Dr. J. H. Garrison, then the editor of the Christian Evangelist. It has never been a large body as it makes its appeal to the mind with intellectual interests rather than to the practical mind.

In the opening session on Monday evening Rev. Abram E. Cory discussed the various cooperative movements of recent years and asked "What Next?" In a very free and easy way he described the various enthusiasms which have possessed the evangelical bodies in recent years, culminating with the Interchurch World Movement. This was interesting, for Mr. Cory is the father of these movements. He originated the Men and Millions Movement of the Disciples of Christ, the success of which led other communions into similar enterprises. Mr. Cory's present mood about these campaigns may be tersely described as "Never again!"

Dr. Herbert L. Willett, western representative of the Federal Council of Churches and for years professor in the University of Chicago, writer and lecturer, brought to the discussion of the various union movements of recent years the ripe experience and balanced judgment that have resulted from his varied contacts. Dr. Willett looks hopefully to the work of the Federal Council as the next step in the practice of Christian unity. The address was marked with characteristic elegance and incisiveness.

The discussion of "The Apostolic Church: Its Organization and Its Relationships," was introduced by Dr. J. B. Briney of Crestwood, Ky., and Rev. Orvis F. Jordan, of The Christian Century staff. Dr. Briney is one of the veteran debaters of the Disciples. Though in the eighties, his mind is clear and he speaks with force. His sense of humor and his gift of repartee have made him more than respected by all of his polemical antagonists. He presented in a very satisfactory way the traditional view of the church held by Disciples. He defined the church as "a group of baptized, penitent believers who meet on stated occasions for worship." Dr. Briney holds that only immersed believers are Christians, but his critics pointed out in the discussion that followed that he was not altogether consistent with the logic of this position. Mr. Jordan presented a modern view of the church. His organizing concept was evolutionary. Holding that we cannot go back to any apostolic church since there was no particular apostolic church that could be used as a norm, he held that it was the duty of the modern church to adjust itself to its modern environment and save its life, though confessing that all men are conservatives in desiring to retain as much as possible of the ancient customs and beliefs. In his address, he discussed the apostolic succession, the relationship of baptism to fellowship and a number of the other problems that separate Christian people, for he confessed that the bias of his paper was in behalf of the idea of Christian union.

Officials of the missionary and benevolent organizations of the denomination were at the congress to discuss their leading problems. The big word with these men these days is unification. The Disciples have already outdistanced all other Christian communions in the degree of centralization which they have accomplished in the matter of missionary and benevolent work. One society does all this work for the denominations now. Rev. Frederick W. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary Society, advocated the idea of bringing all the state missionary organizations of the Disciples, as well as the city missionary organizations, into organic relations with the United Christian Missionary Society. His position was opposed by Rev. Perry J. Rice, secretary of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, who thinks that this is pushing centralization too far. Rev. George A. Miller of Washington, D. C., president of the coming international convention of the Disciples of Christ,

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

HYMNS FOR TODAY

A complete hymnal for both Sunday School and Church. New, beautiful hymns on all the vital subjects that leading religious thinkers are advocating today, with Orders of Services for S. S. departments and church, and Services for Anniversaries.

The use of Hymns for Today will educate both youth and adult in the essentials of the Kingdom of God. Price, $75 per 100. Returnable sample sent. Orchestrated.

FILLMORE MUSIC HOUSE,
516 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

was willing to go much farther still. He dreamed of buying up all the denominational newspapers and thus producing unity in opinion. The reply of Dr. Briney to this suggestion was characteristic of the great body of Disciple temper. He asserted that if the United Christian Missionary Society bought up the newspapers today he would start another one tomorrow. It was also suggested that the colleges of the Disciples should be owned and controlled by a central organization which would assign to each institution its function and providing only two colleges to give theological instruction.

The discussion of the educational problem of the church by Dr. H. O. Pritchard, secretary of the Board of Education, brought out much protest from the floor. Dr. Pritchard painted a picture of the church college over against the state university which was very unfavorable to the latter institution. A number of state university men in the audience resented the implications of this speech and asserted that the case of the small college was not to be made by such arguments. Dr. Pritchard startled his hearers with the information that at least six Disciples colleges are now facing a crisis in their finances, such as might eventuate in ruin.

The discussion of "The Contribution of the Disciples of Christ to Christianity" made a session full of interest. The two leading addresses were by Prof. Frederick D. Kershner, of Drake University, and Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century. Both speakers felt that the contribution of the Disciples had been in some ways considerably over-estimated. Some claims are completely fallacious. Dr. Kershner astonished his auditors by asserting that the Disciples had made no distinctive contribution either to the progress of Christian union or to the deeper spiritual life of the Christian world. He made an analysis of the personalities of President Garfield, Champ Clark and Mr. Lloyd George, whom he regarded as typical products of the Disciples spirit. Mr. Morrison discounted the popular view that the Disciples have made their contribution to Christianity in terms of immersion-baptism or distinctive fidelity to the Bible or peculiar loyalty to the authority of Christ. He pointed out that the immersion dogma was not originated by the Disciples, but by the Baptists, and he insisted further that the historic position of both Baptists and Disciples on immersion has not only made no gain in the past 100 years, but has positively lost ground. It is an issue that is becoming increasingly uninteresting to Christian minded man and women. Mr. Morrison set forth five positive contributions the Disciples had made.

The social service session was lively. Prof. Alva W. Taylor, the newly elected secretary of the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare, was in fine fettle. While stating the case of the workingman progressively and sympathetically, he asserted that the church must be a mediator rather than a partisan in the industrial dispute. He pilloried those churchmen, lay and clerical, who had hindered the cause of social progress and had actually lobbied for anti-social measures. Mr. Arthur Nash, the well known layman of Cincinnati, was a man of peculiar interest to the congress since at one period of his life he was a Disciple minister. He is now a member of the Universalist church. His address on the application of the golden rule to industry, though much too long, was one of the focal points of congress interest.

In discussing the problem of ministerial shortage, President I. N. McCash made a statistical presentation. Dr. Clarence Reidenbach, a young minister of Indianapolis, insisted that there was a valid reason for a small supply of ministers. He suggested the nagging tactics of theological conservatism as one of the influences that hindered young men from entering the ministry. Prof. A. W. Fortune and Rev. George B. Townsend of Angola, Ind., presented different angles of the topic, "The Letter and the Spirit of the Restoration Movement as Revealed in the Writings of the Campbells."

Two ministers from outside the Disciples fellowship enriched the Congress. Dr. Frederick F. Shannon, pastor of Central Church, Chicago, gave a series of sermons at the noon hour of the three days, which were marked with mystical feeling and literary finish. Disciples are not frequently mystics, and this brought into the Congress a new and wholesome note. Dr. William E. Barton, well known Congregational minister and writer, was in Springfield as chaplain of the Illinois senate, and he accepted an invitation to speak to the Congress at the tomb of Lincoln.

The sessions of the Congress were the more pleasant by reason of the beautiful church building in which they were held, the music of the great organ and the chimes, the hospitality of Springfield Disciples, which has its own unique quality. The discussions had more light and less heat than in former years. The ministers went home happy in the thought that they had been able to differ on so many important issues without any sign of tension in the good fellowship of the gathering.

Bible Readers and Christian Workers Self-Help Hand Book

Short and plain articles by nearly 100 experienced Christian writers. Just the Help over hard places you have been looking for. How to lead, teach, testify, pray and grow. Young Christians helper, experienced workers' guide. Pkt. size, 128 pgs., Red Cloth, 25c, Mor. 35c, postpd. Agts. wald. GEO. W. NOBLE, Monon Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Beware of Contagious Diseases

THOMAS INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE

SAVES 1/4 COST OF OTHER SERVICES

Clean and sanitary. Used by over 40,000 churches. Send for catalog and free trial offer. Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 495 Lima, O.

JOWN DEWEY

says of

MAN'S SUPREME INHERITANCE

By F. Matthias Alexander

"The discussions of Mr. Alexander breathe reverence for this wonderful instrument of our life, life mental and moral as well as that life which somewhat meaninglessly we call bodily. When such a religious attitude toward the body becomes more general, we shall have an atmosphere favorable to securing the conscious control which is urged."

The single chapter on "Race Culture and the Training of Children" is well worth the price of the book.

$2.00 plus 12 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St. Chicago

ATTENTION!

Clubs, churches, libraries, individual book-buyers:—Save money on all books. Special discounts. Catalogue free.

THE FINE ARTS GUILD, Inc.
489 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. City

A Good Business without capital, honorable, true and straight; worthy of investigation. Turn it over and under, inside out, upside down, a clean high class business. I am giving up because of old age. Full instruction $1.

George Welles Moseley, Newburgh, N. Y.

Quiet Talks About Life After Death

By S. D. GORDON.

A new volume of "Quiet Talks" on a subject of more than usual interest to every one today. S. D. Gordon has something to say, well worth thoughtful consideration. One cannot describe these "quiet talks," they must be read to be thoroughly appreciated.

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Have You Ordered Children's Day Supplies?

It Is Not Too Late

HEAR THE JOY BELLS RINGING and the mighty chorus of Happy Children in the Bible Schools of Christian America singing glad tidings to all the world on

CHILDREN'S DAY

They are singing of light and life through the Gospel of Christ to the Children who sit in darkness.

THE BELLS OF HEAVEN

Ring for joy over the glad news of thousands of Children Saved from sin, sorrow and suffering in Heathen Lands through the gifts of gratitude of our own Christian Land.

RING IN THOUSANDS OF BIBLE SCHOOLS that have already ordered the beautiful program,

"Church Bells Around the World,"
and are preparing for a great Festival of Joy on JUNE 5TH.

NOTE:

1. It is different and has something for every Department.
2. Its music is of high grade and easy.
3. Its teaching is of the best.

Supplies consist of:

1. Church Bells Around the World.
2. Teacher's Leaflet.
3. Coin Envelopes.

All Furnished free. State average attendance.

Order Today, Prepare Tomorrow.

*United Christian
Missionary Society*

1501 LOCUST STREET
ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI

"The Daily Altar" and the Devotional Life

WITH current developments in church history and life it becomes increasingly evident that the real need of the churches is the deepening of the devotional life of their membership, the attainment of true spiritual poise. The church cannot bring the world to Christ unless it reveals evidence of having the spirit of Christ in its own heart-life. Organizations of churches, however vast and efficient, cannot of themselves put the spirit of true religion into the heart of a single man.

"The Daily Altar"

By Herbert L. Willett and
Charles Clayton Morrison

has come into being for just such a time as this. Rev. Walter M. White, of Memphis, Tenn., reports that he is growing a new religious spirit in his great congregation through the ministry of this book in the homes of his people. Rev. B. S. Ferrall, of Buffalo, N. Y., is equally enthusiastic. And there are scores of other church leaders who are strong in their praise of The Daily Altar as the ideal manual of daily devotion needed for these strenuous and stressful times.

*Have You Considered "The Daily
Altar" for Your Congregation?
Note Our Special Prices in Lot
Purchases.*

Full Leather (Gift) Edition: 5 copies for $11.00; 8 for $17.00; 18 for $35.00; 50 or more at $1.75 per copy, net.

Popular Edition: 5 copies for $7.00; 8 for $10.00; 18 for $20.00; 50 or more at $1.00 per copy, net.

Special Note: Add from two to 5 cents per copy for postage when ordering in lots, or instruct us to send express collect.

Price of Single Copies

De luxe full leather, gold stamp and gilt edges, $2.50 net. Popular edition, purple cloth, $1.50 net.

(Add 6 to 10 cents for postage.)

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St.

Chicago, Illinois

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

THE COMPETITIVE SYSTEM AND THE MIND OF JESUS

By Roger W. Babson

Edward L. Powell

By Joseph Fort Newton

THE PRINCESS SALOME

By BURRIS JENKINS

TO be able to reach into the dim past and touching it with the power of the written word, recreate it into living reality, is a gift that is bestowed only upon the chosen few. Dr. Jenkins in his new novel, "Princess Salome: A Tale of the Days of Camel-Bells," proves himself worthy of that distinction. Dead cities, resurrected, live again in all the mad, barbaric splendor of the past. Like a purple veil of witchery the languorous atmosphere of the East descends. The years between have rushed away behind, the present fading into unreality and unreality becoming real. One does not read, but rather lives and moves amid the scenes of long ago. This book by Dr. Jenkins, Kansas City's most popular minister and editor of The Kansas City Post, is a worthy successor to "Ben Hur" and "Quo Vadis."

The Chicago Daily News says of the book:

"DO you remember your first reading of 'Ben Hur,' and the second, maybe the third? Each time the lapse of a few centuries became an illusion and for a few hours the world under Tiberius was more real to you than the present. Here is a book, 'Princess Salome,' that takes us back with equal realism and ease to similar scenes. The foot race at Antioch may not be as madly thrilling as the thunder of Ben-Hur's chariot wheels, but it is equally vivid and no athlete can read it without a tightening of the muscles as for the start. And how could a tale of the days of the Caesars be complete without an amphitheater, dissolute patricians, and the tramping of legionaries in the background? And the people? They are most splendidly alive. Three pilgrims come to Antioch, the parting of the ways; Gomar, barbarian gladiator, hired out to Pilate; Stephanas, Greek-trained Jewish athlete, and a zealous young Pharisee named Shaoul, whose quest for the king had brought them to Antioch and would drive him on alone, for in Antioch was the Princess Salome and a race to be run for the winning of the great prize.

"In the character of Salome the author has trespassed most daringly on our credulity and been amazingly successful. In the few times that we see her she is by turns the most lovable, implacable and utterly tragic figure that ever toyed with the strings of fate, but when all is done the catch in one's throat makes one feel that she is real.

As the story goes on there are others: old, familiar names revived to fresh intimacy and life, for with scrupulous accuracy and reverent art the author has interwoven the Christ story time and the product of the loom is threaded with crimson thread of the great sacrifice. Even the tragedy of a dancing girl in the court of Herod is lightened by Salome's act of worship when Christ came before Herod. The broken life of Stephanas closes in a victory that will some day bring Shaoul to his king, and Shaoul, when he has said a last farewell to Mary, for the call of a great work is on him, faces the western sun while Gomar follows, driving the pack donkey, serving a 'man who is a man.' It is beautifully done."

OTHER COMMENTS

New York Tribune:

Make room beside "Ben Hur" for a worthy companion. "Princess Salome" is sure to receive a wide reading, for it presents the whole current of the great Christ-story in a simple, graphic and engrossingly interesting narrative.

Philadelphia North American:

Embracing occurrences and characters of "deathless interest," "Princess Salome" makes strong appeal.

New York World:

Mr. Jenkins' story is full of motion, of color and of reminders of the scriptural narratives.

The Boston Herald:

It is a dramatic and realistic story, shot through with threads of barbaric splendor and colored by the glory of the faith that led the followers of the Master to martyrdom.

Price of the book $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS 508 South Dearborn Street
CHICAGO

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, MAY 26, 1921

Number 21

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

Is Christianity Too Difficult?

MANY people are beginning to think so. There is something like dread in certain minds lest the application of the principles of Jesus to modern life should mean the destruction of our civilization. The result is that the Master is regarded as a dreamer of impossible dreams. But first we must know what Jesus taught, and that is what Rev. Richard Roberts, of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, sets out to expound in a lucid and forthright little book, "The Untried Door." The world has run up against a blank wall, or into a blind alley, while all the time an untried door is nearby, offering a way out. The purpose of the book is to inquire what Jesus actually taught—whether he had a coherent and self-consistent philosophy of life—and whether his teaching can be applied to our problems. It is admitted that Christianity is difficult, but not more difficult than the present policy of the world, and surely not more dangerous to the hard-won inheritance of the past. It is in fact an untried civilization, and since no one can say that our present civilization is a success, it is time to consider whether or not Jesus was, after all, right; and if so, whether we can translate his truth into life? It serves no purpose to call him Lord, Lord, if we do not or cannot do the things he commanded. The book is a token of the times, an example of the eager, earnest, clear-sighted thinking of an increasing company of gallant young preachers of all communions, who are beginning to see what Jesus actually meant, and who propose to preach "the gospel of the kingdom." Gently, firmly, and with relentless emphasis they mean to point out the truth as it is in Jesus, and follow in his way at any cost. Yes, Christianity is difficult; it is for that reason a challenge to the insight, heroism, and enterprise of youth—and it were better to attempt the impossible than to rot in the comatose contentment of a mere preservationism.

Infidelity in the Colleges

SOME educational leaders are anxious to stress the amount of infidelity to be found in non-denominational educational institutions in order to make a place for the tight little denominational college. A tract issued by the Christian Education Commission of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, gives the figures that were prepared by Professor Leuba. Taking these biased investigations at their face value, the author of the tract makes out a case that Leuba never thought of, a case for the strictly denominational college. Both Professor Leuba and the tractarian writer seem to think that the number of Christian believers in the colleges is less than formerly. A hundred years ago not a dozen Christian students could be found in Yale College. Infidelity was a rampant and noisy propaganda. Even if Professor Leuba is right, and only 50 per cent of our students leave college with a Christian faith—a condition which we do not concede for a moment—this is still a larger percentage than in any other period in American life. Unbelief used to result from repression. The surest way to make a young man doubt his religion is to resort to other means of defending religion than the open forum. He wants no faith that is not vigorous enough to stand on two legs, and battle for its life in the open arena. Just because of their freedom, many of the state universities have very high percentages of their students Christian. Just because of repression, some denominational colleges have secret clubs and cliques where the cult of unbelief is kept alive.

In the free educational institutions, the new apologetic for Christianity is being worked out. Every age has had its own apologetic and the twentieth century must have its own way of stating Christianity defensively. The cure for the doubter is the marshalling of the kind of evidence for which he will have respect.

"Corporate Expression of the Christ Goodness"

DR. J. C. CARLILE, President of the Baptist Union of England, in his annual address made a plea for "A New Expression of Religion," on the ground that it is futile to go on struggling with worn-out forms and endeavoring to recall faded visions. It was a thoughtful and thrilling address, in which he described the Baptists as "the most conservative people with the most revolutionary principles," having a living witness to a democratic age, but "so wedded to the past that it seems impossible to get into touch with the present"; which might pass for a photograph of most of our churches of all communions. The supreme need of our time, he said, is a new expression of religion. Our spiritual currency has become defaced in the using, and needs re-minting. The vocabulary of the pulpit has stereotyped into a collection of technical terms which the ordinary man does not understand, and does not trouble to understand. "It is not without significance that no sentence concerning the duty of right-living or social relations is found in either of the three creeds of the church." Without denying the creeds, we must go beyond them. Christianity has become an intellectual puzzle which many people have given up in despair. "Nothing short of a fresh expression of religion will save the church." And that expression must be not only intellectual, but practical, social, dynamic. It must be none other than "the corporate expression of the Christ goodness." The church is at once a living fellowship and the moral conscience of the community, and it must be a company of "experts in goodness" if our modern life is to be saved from moral rot and confusion.

"The New Preaching" in England

DR. ALEXANDER MACLAREN was once asked this question: "What is your opinion of contemporary preaching as compared with that of your generation?" His face relaxed and his eye twinkled as he replied: "The sermons of the younger men are like a delicate mutton chop, cooked to a turn; the discourses of the older men resembled huge roast joints of juicy meat from which you could carve all you wanted and then come again." One wonders what Dr. Maclaren would think of "the new preaching," which our English brethren "view with alarm," as illustrated by such a volume as "Food for the Fed-up," by Studdert Kennedy—"Woodbine Willie," as the Tommies called him during the war. It is indeed a new kind of preaching in England, as far removed from the massive eloquence of Dale and Parker as from the polished essay of the more modern type. It was discovered and developed in war-time, taking lurid colors from the battle-field and slang from the trenches; but it is at once human and effective. Kennedy is a truly great preacher, and what he calls "Rough Talks of a Padre" are great sermons. And when to their forthright and vivid style one adds a rich Irish accent and a personality virile and winsome, it is not difficult to divine his power. We shall watch the development of "the new preaching" with interest, the more because the well-nigh incredible egotism, vulgarity, plagiarism and vituperation of a certain type of evangelism in America is impossible in England. But is it a "new" preaching? If we turn to the sermons of Chrysostom, or Hugh Latimer, or Luther, we discover that it is a return to a type of preaching which made the sermon, not an essay, but a religious stump speech.

A Sabbatical Year for Preachers

A DISTINGUISHED and successful minister in an eastern city is planning to take a sabbatical year, "to think things through and find out where I am, theologically and otherwise," as he described his purpose. In universities and seminaries, teachers are given one year in seven, on full salary, to refresh their minds, to pursue special studies, to travel and form new contacts, and in general to prepare for more effective labor—why should not this privilege be extended to the hard-working, sorely-tried, weary minister, whose labors are far more exacting and exhausting than those of a university professor? One recalls the case of Dr. John Tauler, who was visited one day by a strange layman, poorly clad, who asked him if he knew what he had been talking about. Tauler replied that he did. Whereupon the stranger began to ply him with questions, and it was not long before the preacher realized that he knew the truths of faith only from the outside. Deeply stirred, he left the pulpit and went away to meditate, and when he returned he was not the same man that went away, but a mighty preacher whose simplest word—and all his words had become simple—made the souls of men stand still. Our churches do not give their ministers time to be great preachers; they must be organizers, ecclesiastical mechanics, roustabouts. If we are to have great voices, men must know how to listen as well as how to speak; they must have time to brood their thought, and never more so than today when spiritual leadership is so difficult and so much needed. Give the preacher a chance to be a preacher! It is the greatest office on earth, at once an art and an incarnation, and nothing can ever take its place; but it must be preaching. As "Father" Taylor, of Boston, used to say: "When a man takes something hot out of his own heart and shoves it into mine—that is preaching!"

A Significant Missionary Advance

ANNOUNCEMENT has just been made that the Disciples of Christ will send out fifty new missionaries this year. The significance of this event is better appreciated when it is known that this is a force one-fifth as large as the entire number of missionaries representing this denomination on the field at the present time. The first missionary society devoting itself to foreign work was organized in 1875. The force going out next fall is one-seventh of the total number sent since the organization of the Disciples Foreign Missionary Society. In recent years, the missionary administration has given more thought to the selection of the workers. A school of first rank was developed at Indianapolis, called the College of Missions. Since the consolidation of the missionary interests, there has been a department devoted to the recruiting of missionary volunteers. There are now several hundred young people in the colleges and universities of the land who have the foreign field under consideration. Whatever may be the merits of the candidates who have gone out in previous years, the church has never had available a better trained or more competent group of young people. The increased missionary giving of the Disciples makes it possible to send out the young people that have been recruited from the colleges. Twenty-five years ago the missionary secretaries were still delivering addresses in which they argued the right of the churches to form a missionary society for cooperation on the foreign field. Today the Disciples take a cooperative place among the Christian communions which seek to extend the gospel throughout the earth. While the forces of reaction and obscurantism make a lot of noise in the Disciples camp, this great missionary advance is an evidence that the denomination is sound in its heart.

Chicago the Theological Center of America

THERE are more seminaries in New York, Pennsylvania and New England than in all the rest of the nation. Once it was thought necessary to go to an eastern institution to secure a finished training in church leadership. But the situation has entirely changed in the past two decades. It will be a startling fact to many that Chicago is now the theological center of America. This statement leaves entirely to one side the Moody Institute and some other short course institutions of the hot house variety. Great denominational seminaries are to be found in Chicago. Around the University of Chicago the Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples, Universalists and Unitarians are doing work in the training of ministers. Garrett Biblical Institute is a strong Methodist institution operating adjacent to Northwestern University. McCormick Theological Seminary supplies most of the Presbyterian ministers of the middle west. The Episcopalians and Lutherans have in this city seminaries for the training of ministers. When the men of these seminaries are assembled, they form the largest group of theological students to be found in any city of the nation. Not only is the Divinity School of the University of Chicago pre-eminent in the size of its student body, but without invidiousness it also leads in the strength of its faculty. The new faculty at Garrett Biblical Institute has been so strengthened in recent years as to make it the equal of any Methodist school on the continent. Some of these Methodist scholars are productive men, writing significant books. At the University of Chicago are theological writers who are doing the most constructive work now being done in the field of the science of religion. McCormick Theological Seminary also makes a substantial contribution. Chicago has become the theological center of America without ever planning it. It has come to pass through the importance of the Mississippi Valley in the unfolding life of the American church. Great religious organizations are coming to realize that the religious capital of America is now in process of defining for itself a home in Chicago.

The Return of Street Preaching

FROM the days of Wesley and George Fox street preaching has been, until late years, a familiar form of evangelism in England, both for the friends and foes of Christianity. Many sermons are preached in Hyde Park, London, every Sunday afternoon. Unfortunately, in recent years, the extreme reactionary in theology and the militant atheist have monopolized the street corner for propaganda. Now, once more, the church has discovered that forum, and campaigns in the streets are the order of the day. Dr. Herbert Gray, author of that startling book, "As Tommy Sees Us," tells of a recent crusade, and how it was organized and conducted. Play-hours were arranged for children, clubs for boys and girls, and debates with sceptics were carried through, as well as preaching services on street corners all over the city of Hamilton, a great coal mining center in Scotland. The people were extraordinarily willing to listen, and the result was most gratifying. At first the miners said that the preachers were "sent by the capitalists to divert the attention of the miners"; but when they had listened longer they learned that the simple gospel of Jesus cuts both ways, and they became more attentive. All concerned felt that it may be that in this way the new day is dawning, and that by winning for Christ those who might else foment revolution both church and state may be saved, as in the days of Wesley.

The Sacerdotalist and the Literalist

THE modern spirit has no quarrel with religious people quite so sharp as the quarrel over religious narrowness. The man who claims for himself some peculiar standing in the eyes of God and who develops a pharisaic spirit toward his fellow men is an occasion for scoffing and mockery. There is a variety of religion which makes humble. It seeks fellowship and opportunities of service. This was the religion of Jesus. He built up no hierarchy, and arranged no mechanism of excommunication. The exclusive religionists are chiefly of two types. One is the sacerdotalist. For him the spiritual world is made up of cogs and pulleys. God has shut himself up to ritual and ordinances and successions. In this system there is no democracy, for some men hold favored positions with God to the detriment of other men. The priest holds the power of the keys, and may open and shut the gates of heaven. For the lack of a bit of ceremony one man is shut out from brotherhood though of clean and brotherly spirit, while another who is narrow and bigoted may be taken in. Against such perversions of spiritual values, the true instinct of the man of the world protests. He does not know the underlying theories of religion, but he tests sacerdotalism with his heart and rejects it. The literalists hold no fellowship with the sacerdotalist, yet he is twin brother to the priest. He, too, makes distinctions between men on an artificial basis. If he is a Millennial Dawnist, he believes that he belongs to God's elect by joining circles that meet somewhere Sunday afternoons to learn the meaning of Pastor Russell's books. All others belong to a lower spiritual order. The literalist is not satisfied that a man be baptized. His baptism is not valid unless he holds to a correct theory of baptism! It is not enough to read the Bible with spiritual profit every day. One must believe in verbal inspiration, or be numbered with the lost souls. The modern world has tested the sacerdotalist and the literalist and turned away from their offerings with the disgust of indifference. If the future generation is to be religious, it must be fed on the true gospel of Christ, which has room in its plan for all sorts and conditions of men.

The Unifying of Religious Education

THE church is confronted at this moment with some of the most momentous issues which have ever engaged its attention and taxed its wisdom. In this situation lies much of the responsibility and exhortation of Christian leadership. Among these issues are a sane and constructive evangelism, a degree of social solicitude which shall promise a just industrial order, and the recognition of the obligations of American Christian citizenship of a plan for the reduction of armaments and the cultivation of a spirit of good-will among the nations. But to a striking degree the primary task of the American church is the promotion of a policy of Christian education which shall be built upon the assured foundations of ascertained educational theory, and shall devise some plan for the reduction of wasteful duplication among the agencies which are professing concern with the problem, and are undertaking to administer varying portions of the responsibility.

The contemplation of these numerous agencies is both inspiring and depressing. Eliminating all consideration of the Roman Catholic, Jewish and purely secular agencies now at work in this area, there are at least the following organizations claiming recognition from the Protestant churches, and depending upon their support, directly or indirectly, for their maintenance: The Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations, The International Sunday School Association, The International Sunday School Lesson Committee, The American Sunday School Union, The World's Sunday School Association, The Religious Education Association, The Missionary Education Movement, The Council of Church Boards of Education, The International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, The National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association, The Board of Missionary Preparation, The Association of Theological Seminaries, The Association of Biblical Instructors in American Colleges and Secondary Schools, The Conference of Church Workers in Universities, the Educational Departments of the Various Young People's Movements, and The Commission on Christian Education of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America.

In addition, there are the various denominational boards of education, which are represented, however, in three of these organizations, the Sunday School Council, the Council of Church Boards of Education, and the Federal Council of Churches, and whose representation and authority as the most powerful of the forces dealing with Religious Education, would seem to be essential to the permanence and efficiency of any agency attempting to go far in this field. Of this widely varying list of instrumentalities, representative or volunteer, is the apparatus of religious education made up in the domain of American Protestant Christianity.

There is unquestionable value in variety and freedom of operation. Wide experimentation is possible, and is perhaps stimulated, by multiplicity of agencies. Yet it is open to question whether the duplication and waste resulting from such numbers of competing organizations does not far outweigh the possible advantages of variety. And that there is duplication no one who studies the present situation can doubt. For example, there are at least four areas in which effort is put forth. There is the area of general promotion, including popular propaganda on the needs and claims of religious education, popular education on the meaning and method of the subject, and specialized propaganda to secure a supply of trained lay workers, equipment and facilities, employed workers, and coordination with public education. Three other areas, equally important, are those of the applied methods of religious education, that of the scientific background of the subject, and that of the immediate work of religious instruction. Each of these areas has subdivisions as important as those included under the first.

Now the most superficial survey of the agencies already named will disclose the fact that there is not an instance among them in which either the primary or the subordinate purposes of the agency do not overlap and duplicate those of some of the rest. And not infrequently three or four of them are operating in the same field, and effecting all the evil results of duplication and waste. It is this condition which has become increasingly evident and alarming to Christian workers during the past decade. Some efforts at unification are being made, and with promising results. The International Sunday School Association discovered long ago that its volunteer and unrepresentative character made it increasingly ineffective as the agency of the churches, and that the more recently organized Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations was rapidly superseding it in their regard. This led to efforts to unite the two organizations, which are now proceeding with hopes of success. Other attempts either to combine duplicating agencies, or to discriminate more definitely the fields of activity, have not been without value.

And yet the present multiplicity of agencies and the rivalry inseparable from such diversities of effort has aroused the Christian public to some degree of disquiet, and a growing demand that an attempt be made to co-ordinate the existing organizations, and study the possibility of elimination or combination where there is manifest overlapping. During the past two years repeated requests have come to the Federal Council to use its good offices with the various agencies in the field to confer regarding the present situation, and suggest measures of amendment.

Accordingly within a fortnight, at the joint invitation of the Federal Council and the interested organizations already named, there was assembled at Garden City a very representative gathering of educational leaders—denominational, interdenominational, and institutional—to consider the entire problem, and propose plans for its solution. It was surprising to all who were present to what an extent the conviction was held that the time is auspicious for a fresh and careful study of the field and the forces, in the hope that some more favorable and harmonious issue may be provided than is at present in sight. One proposal was greeted with unanimous approval. That was that a special committee, representative of all the agencies at work in this area of religious education, be requested to suggest some tentative plan for the creation of an inclusive and directing body, that might be called an American Council of Religious Education, to include whatever agencies are now operative in this domain, in so far as they wish inclusion. This continuation committee was chosen, and will probably call conferences and conduct correspondence as may be deemed advisable.

It was frequently suggested that such a directing council might well constitute the Commission on Christian Education of the Federal Council of Churches. But it was thought by the officers of the Federal Council and by others most deeply interested in the plan, that while the facilities of the Federal Council might be drawn upon freely in the inception of the enterprise, it would be advisable to leave the Continuation Committee quite free as to methods and personnel in the development of its work. The conference closed with a sentiment of deep gratitude and quiet enthusiasm over the auspicious beginnings of a plan so ardently desired by the army of workers in the province of religious education, and so capable, if rightly and wisely devised, of offering a solution to one of the most serious problems now confronting the church.

The Outdoor Art Gallery

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I PASSED through the part of the city where dwell the people of Ethiopia. And the street had been cut down, so that the houses stood upon a bank about six cubits in height. And the steps were rickety that led to the top. And at the top of the steps in a certain place, I beheld a shack that bare a sign in Red Paint, Washing Done Hear. And I beheld upon the Fence much Broken Crockery hung. And I ascended the steps, and I beheld a Wonderful Sight. For there upon the fence was a space of about five cubits with Plates that were Somewhat Broken, yet showing Pictures of Fish or Fowl or Other Things, and these were hung to the Fence by Nails and Wire. And the earth at the foot of the fence and the top of the Steps was hedged in with other Crockery. And upon it were Twelve Plaster Casts, and some of them were badly broken, as they had been picked out of the City Dump. And I suspected that the Dump had furnished the Whole Outfit.

And a voice spake unto me, saying. Do not go away. And the woman of the house came forth and explained unto me.

And she said, I have a taste for the Artistick. And I have not the money for Expensive Work of Art. Therefore have I gathered such as God sent unto me. And there be those of my neighbors who say that this is the Grave of my Mother; and that is not true, but I have rather come to think it is true, and to like the thought. But this is the expression of my Love of Art.

And she spake of the Statues, and she said, That gentleman at the head is Abraham Lincoln; and he hath the place of Honour. And that one that is broken off, with both heads gone, is a lady and her daughter, and I know not their name, but I think that they were Saints. And canst thou tell me the name of the man with the Curley Hair?

And I said, That was a musician, even Mozart.

And she said, I painted him black, for I thought with his Curley Hair I could make of him a member of mine Own Race. But he did not really look like a Coloured Gentleman, and the paint hath well nigh worn off.

And she said, Some of the neighbors think this is Right Nice, and some there be who say that I am Crazy. But I spend my days at the Wash Tub, and I weary of looking ever down into the Suds, wherefore do I sometimes look up unto my God, and then again do I look out at mine Art Gallery.

And I told her the names of certain of her other Plaster Heroes and Heroines, and what Great Men and Women they were; and I spake concerning certain of the Historical Events which were Emblazoned upon her Crockery, and I said nothing unto her that would make her think less of her Art Gallery. And if it made it more sacred unto her to think of it as her mother's grave, that, too, was all to the good; for I had no idea that her mother would rise up and rebuke her for the Shrieking Discord of her Post-mortem Decoration.

For thought it was as Absurd a manifestation of the Artistick Spirit as I have ever seen outside an Exhibition of Modern High Art wrought by the Impressionists, yet it did no harm unto any human soul, and to its owner it was a comfort.

Wherefore do I say unto all men and women, Look not ever downward into the suds of Business or of Worldly Things. Brighten some little spot of earth, and rest thine eyes by looking at it; yes, now and again, lift them higher.

The Competitive System and the Mind of Jesus

By Roger W. Babson

A STUDY of history leads one to believe that practically the same fundamental conditions existed 2000 years ago in Jerusalem as exist today in New York City. It is true that they then used camels instead of trolley cars, street criers instead of newspapers, and slaves instead of wage workers. The general principles, however, underlying agriculture, industry, and commerce in Rome and Judea, were practically identical with those in existence today throughout America. If anything, conditions were worse at that time and there was more reason for Jesus to "butt in," so to speak, and outline a new industrial organization. But history shows that Jesus did not outline any new system. There certainly was more need in those days for labor unions, socialistic organizations, and even bolshevism than there is at the present time, and yet Jesus made no class appeal nor did he outline a comprehensive system for the organization of society.

My personal opinion is that if Jesus were here today he would pray and hope for a socialistic order, but I do not believe for one minute that he would vote the socialistic ticket. I believe that Jesus would work for that spirit of socialism which naturally develops in a truly Christian community; but that he would not recommend government socialism. Statistics show most clearly that as the spirit of Jesus rules, socialism is not necessary, as the good results of socialism are then brought about in a very much better way. On the other hand, reports show that government socialism, not permeated with the spirit of Jesus, would be a most dangerous form of autocracy.

PRESENT SYSTEM FAILING

The present system is doubtless breaking down, due largely to its being based upon selfish competition. Monarchies are crumbling, while democracies are unable to carry the load. Hence we see the great growth of socialism, bolshevism, I. W. W.ism, and other new forms of government. The arrest, deportation, and persecution of these mistaken people will not remedy the situation. No one should know this better than the students of church history. The persecution which the church suffered and survived should prevent it from inflicting such trouble upon others. The fact is that our present rulers have failed to solve the problems of the day and the masses in their ignorance are turning to the Socialistic cults.

Many of the socialists are honest and conscientious. The need is to convert them rather than to make them more bitter. Men cannot be converted by abuse. Men can be converted only by appealing to their hearts and their intellects. With many people, socialism is a form of religion. Like some other dangerous beliefs, the effect of preaching it is often harmful. There are ten reasons why the preaching of socialism is harmful.

(1) Socialism directs people's minds from the production of wealth toward the division of wealth. The fact that there is only enough already produced to keep civilization going a few months shows that this is a very dangerous doctrine.

(2) Socialism sets class against class to an even greater extent than does the competitive system, although the solution of our industrial problems will come about only through co-operation.

(3) Socialism directs the thought of the people to the symptoms of the disease instead of the cause. It does not go to the heart of the difficulty.

(4) Socialism gives the underworld a dose of morphine to keep it feeling good when it really needs a surgical operation. The competitive system must be reformed rather than asphyxiated.

(5) Socialism tries to set aside the law of supply and demand which always has determined, which does, and which always will determine production and prices.

(6) Socialism gives a wrong reason for government ownership. The government should engage only in such activities and pass such laws as are necessary to give the individual the fullest opportunity for self-determination. To the extent that government ownership can give man more freedom of expression, to that extent government ownership should be encouraged; but when government ownership tends to express individual initiative and development, it loses its effectiveness.

(7) Socialism sets aside the only known method of selecting the fittest. Socialism tends to substitute votes for efficiency. Socialism would operate a horse-race by walking the horses back and forth in front of the grandstand and then would determine the winner by voting instead of by racing the horses.

(8) Socialism discourages thrift. Capital is only stored up wages. The only permanent way that men can create work for themselves is by investing their money rather than by spending it. The world needs more capital instead of less capital.

(9) Socialism stands for the pig-trough philosophy rather than for the work-bench philosophy. It may be Christian in its conception, but it is pagan in its operation.

(10) Socialism talks about the rights of people instead of the duties of people. The great need today is to preach duty and responsibility. The competitive system should not be cast aside until there exists a race with sufficient religion to get on without it.

BEWARE OF FALSE LEGISLATION!

Most new programs aim at approximate equalization of income and the abolition of competition in the struggle for life. Is this desirable, even if attainable? The real producing force is enterprise. This consists of planning, initiating, controlling the process, and assuming responsibility.

bility for the result. Can this factor, "enterprise," be induced to function to the love of workmanship or to devotion to the group, except it has the motive of either private profit or religion?

Socialism is a splendid structure without a power plant. There are but two known sources of human power. There are personal profit and religion. The present system of government and business is based on the personal-profit plan. This system has failed. The great opportunity before us all today is to present and operate a system based on religion. Absolute rights of persons and property are being swept away. Vested interests must be reconciled in terms of service. The teachings of Jesus must become the laws of finance, industry, and commerce. But this result must be brought about through the development of religion rather than through the passing of laws. When a vast majority are desirous of eliminating the competitive system, laws may safely be passed to force a small struggling majority into line; but not until then. There are no signs today that any such majority exists in America. Most of those who advocate doing away with the competitive system are actuated by hate or jealousy; they are too lazy or inefficient to compete.

Yet we must not be guilty of opposing socialism without providing some other solution for the problem. The difficulty with socialism is not in itself, but in that it depends upon religion to make it work. As already stated, without religion socialism would never be successful; and when people are filled with the spirit of religion, socialism will not be necessary.

Surely the competitive system is not a success. The church people of America cannot afford to defend capitalism. Capitalism is distinctly opposed to the teachings of religion and cannot logically be defended by consistent Christians. The competitive system develops those selfish qualities which are anti-religious. Hence, modern industry and commerce are based on selfishness in contrast with the teachings of religion which are based on service.

CONDITIONS ARE IMPROVING

Without doubt both industry and commerce are improving. Manufacturers and merchants are learning that to succeed permanently they must talk service, whatever may be their religious opinions. The dishonest practices which got by a few years ago are no longer successful. Advertising today must be honest in order to succeed; men must be honest in order to secure credit; and the tricks of the trade no longer make profits as in days gone by. But it is still profitable to advertise things which people ought not to buy; and although banks insist on honesty, they primarily ask, how much property have you got? They do not yet ask a man how he got it, whether by manufacturing something which made the world better or which made it worse.

In the last analysis the successful business man today must, under the competitive system, outbuy and outsell his neighbor. The rule of trade is that a man must give as little to the other man and get as much from him as possible. Certainly the rule of trade is contrary to the Golden Rule. Religion teaches that we should ask little for ourselves and give as much as possible to others. As a mother tries to do as much as she can for her children, instead of getting as much as she can out of them, so the religious business man should act toward his customers—so the religious wage worker should act toward his employer and those who are to buy what he makes.

EFFICIENCY AND DISCIPLINE

Some go so far as to say that religion should eliminate employer and employe so that cooperation should take the place of competition. This may be practical some day, but I rather hesitate seriously to recommend it today. Men are born industrial leaders just as truly as they are born musical leaders. The health, happiness, and prosperity of the entire nation demand organization, leadership, and discipline. To give the nation the maximum of necessities and comforts requires that same form of organization which enables an orchestra to give good music. Let us analyze these requirements.

1. Each player must play the part for which he is best fitted.
2. Each part must be played by some one who loves to play and who especially enjoys the instrument which he uses.
3. The players cannot all play the same instrument; some must take important and others unimportant parts.
4. This means that there must be discipline under a leader who employs the various players at their respective market rates, charging a fair price for his own services.

Formerly, when making a price for the use of such an orchestra, each one stated what he thought he should have, and these amounts—including the leader's—were totaled. This made the price of the orchestra to the public. There was then no labor problem nor was there the need of any labor union to protect the players. Probably this was due to the fact that music was then used mainly at public functions and in the service of the community.

Gradually, however, orchestras came to be mainly employed in theatres, hotels, and other places operated wholly for profit. The practice was then for the management to hire the players as cheaply as possible, and to take the difference for profit. This was the beginning of labor troubles in the musical industry. It is a fair illustration of the history of most industries. As the competitive profit system is introduced, the religious spirit wanes.

CAPITAL AND CAPITALISM

Capitalism must not be confounded with the accumulation and use of capital. This is a very common mistake made by the masses. Capitalism means operation of industry and commerce for profit; while capital represents the result of thrift and self restraint. While the former is essentially irreligious, the latter is distinctly religious in conception and operation. Not only is capital of great service in making people healthier, happier, and more prosperous, but its growth depends upon developing those religious qualities of self-control and abstinence. As self-gratification is at the bottom of capitalism, so self sacrifice is the basis of capital. Hence, business is justified in backing the accumulation and use of capital, although some question may exist as to the wisdom of allowing it to be passed on from generation to generation without restriction.

This suggests, then, that an immediate problem is to develop efficiency, accumulate capital, and work toward other capitalistic ends; but by using some other force than the competitive incentive for profit. As neither socialism nor individualism is successful, it is up to the religious business men to discover this new force. Not only does the solution of our present troubles await this new force, but its dissemination would greatly increase the efficiency of production and distribution. Then the kingdom of God would truly come on earth, and "all these other things" could be enjoyed by the masses. Statistics clearly indicate that religion is this force which can take the place of both socialism and individualism. Religion awakes in men and women all the worth-while attributes of both socialism and individualism, both of which have their good features.

MISSIONS AND BUSINESS

The attitude of the church toward missionary work may suggest a religious method of approach to industry and commerce. The great missionary enterprises buy and sell, borrow and loan. They are individualistic in conception and operation, but the competitive feature is eliminated. They avoid the pitfalls of communism and socialism, but do not become selfish. They are subject enough to competition to develop efficiency; but they avoid those cut-throat methods which are wasteful and useless.

These facts have resulted in attracting to the missionary movement men and women with great vision and energy. These people are happy working in the mission fields for one-quarter the salary which they could secure in a profit-making business. This means that the elimination of profits enables an organization to secure better workers for much less money than a profit-making concern can obtain them.

The same truth is illustrated in connection with educational work and medical work. Men and women are today working in schools and hospitals who would not be there were they profit-making enterprises, operating under the competitive system. This does not mean that non-profit-making enterprises are justified in paying low salaries. They should pay the market price for wages as for commodities or money. The important point is that the fact that they are not being operated for profit is an asset rather than a handicap, and that for the same wages a non-profit-making enterprise can get very much better workers than can a profit-making enterprise.

The religious spirit makes better employers, better wage workers, and a better public spirit with which to deal. Furthermore, without such a religious spirit, all legislative, co-operative, and other plans are of no avail. Religion is to the world what a spring is to a watch, and the sooner it is generally recognized, the more people will be healthy, happy, and prosperous.

A HEALTHY SIGN

The same religious spirit is not confined to missionary, educational, and medical work. It is already breaking into business. The wealthy manufacturer or merchant, although not yet ready to give his time to making or selling commodities in the community's interest, is willing to serve freely as a trustee of the savings bank, a director of the local library, or an officer of the hospital and certain charitable organizations. To each of these things he gives valuable time for which he would want many thousands of dollars in profits were they profit-making enterprises.

RUNNING BUSINESS AS TRUSTEES

May not the time come when these men may be willing to run their factories and stores—as trustees—with the same unselfish purpose? Certainly those of us who have money are not striving for more profits in order to have more to spend. We already have reached a point where we are losing instead of making friends by our method of living and the amount we spend. We surely are not seeking more profits for our children's sake. Many of us have accumulated for them more than is good for them.

This means that our only legitimate excuse for seeking profits is to secure the power and influence in the extension of our business which these profits give us. Hence, the real problem is to devise a plan which will select the best men, supply these best men with capital, and to induce these men to give their services for a reasonable wage. Perhaps this will be accomplished by the business men paying themselves a good salary, but putting these profits back into the business and distributing certificates of ownership to the full amount of these profits to the people—not necessarily to the employers from whence the profits come. Perhaps the adoption of some such plan as this by religious business men may some time be necessary in order to get the masses to consider religion more seriously.

Jesus certainly never defended the competitive system, and could not do so today. But Jesus never suggested the substitution of some other "system." Jesus saw what great modern captains of industry see today, namely, that although the competitive system is anti-religious in conception and operation, it must be reformed rather than destroyed and that this reformation can take place only as people are born again through the silent workings of religion.

Why?

WHY do we follow, like a flock of sheep,
Tradition with a crook,
Or leave the vastness of the calling deep
To paddle in a brook;
When on the hills of sunrise stands the Lord—
Triumphant with a lifted flaming sword?

Why, when upon our lips the great new name
Waits eager to be said;
When cloven tongues of Pentecostal flame
Burn over every head:
Do we build Babel towers to the sky
From bricks and mortar, who have wings to fly?

ROBERT NORWOOD.

Edward L. Powell

Fourth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

WHEN a sermon is remembered for twenty-five years, and the very tones of the preacher still echo in the heart, it argues an unusual man in the pulpit; and thereby hangs a bit of reminiscence. In 1896, while a theologian in the Baptist Seminary at Louisville, I went with a number of my fellow students to the old Fourth and Walnut Street Church to hear the pastor, whom we greatly admired. It so happened that Dr. Eaton was not in the pulpit that day and, somewhat disappointed, we held conclave as to what we should do. Just opposite stood a plain, square, flat-roofed church without a spire, its wide porch and massive columns looking more like a Greek temple than a Christian shrine. Being in a mood for adventure, we strolled across the street, climbed the great stone steps, and entered the First Christian Church, to see what might transpire.

Of course we were severe critics, as young men are apt to be—especially theologians, who fancy they are wise—and our attitude of mind was biased, no doubt, by sectarian prejudice. Anyway, as there was no time to go to another church of proper faith and order, we took the risk, little knowing what revelations awaited us. What that day may have meant to others of the group I do not know, but it was one of the great days of my life, because it meant the discovery of one of the noblest preachers of our generation; a man as brotherly in private as he was brilliant in the pulpit, whose influence has been not only stimulating but emancipating, at once an inspiration and a benediction. The old Greek temple has vanished, along with the Fourth and Walnut Street Church, both having been removed from the center of the city, where they had stood for so many years bearing witness, each with its own eloquence, to the reality of the Unseen in the midst of time.

A VISION UNFORGETTABLE

The First church was crowded to the doors, but a kindly usher found chairs and tucked us away in a far corner, just as the preacher entered the pulpit. Not one of us had ever seen the preacher before, having for the first time read his name as we entered the church—a fact which gives the measure of our abysmal ignorance. Across the years I can still see Dr. Powell as he stood that day, in the prime and glory of his power—his slight figure, his huge head, his thin, light hair, his keen, searching eyes—not a graceful man, his gestures angular at times, his face aglow with unearthly light, uttering his high message in words vivid, full of grace, and surcharged with living fire. It was a vision unforgettable. He conducted the service less as a leader of worship than as a leading worshipper—it was all so simple, so reverent, so impressive. He read the Bible as one who was himself a listener at the portals of a book where "the sweet voice sounds and the vision dwells." The prayer was direct, tender, and far ranging in its sympathies, as of one who remembered only the sublime object of his office, to lift men out of the mire of sin, materialism, and the bewilderments of life into the higher air of God. It besought the grace of God in that moral self legislation which each man must enact and execute, if he is to verify faith in character.

The sermon began quietly, all eyes fixed upon the preacher, some eager, some tender, all interested. It had to do with the holiness of God, taking as its text the vision of Isaiah in the temple, and surely no one ever forgot the terrifying vision of a universe ruled by an unholy God, where men sit by the poisoned springs of life, looking at polluted flowers, and lifting up hands to abominable hills. Man can endure an indifferent world. He does not lose heart when told that the flowers are heartless, and would as soon adorn a grave as a bridal altar. But a malignant universe is intolerable. Not only the value but the very existence of the soul is in jeopardy, and all our dear human world is cast into shadow, "pent up in the kingdom of pity and death." It made the very soul shudder, and there are times when a shudder is an argument. Then followed, by contrast, a picture of a lucid and wise order where righteousness reigns, where every mountain is an altar, and all the laws of life are God's ten thousand commandments: a picture appropriate to a Greek temple—the vision of a man who sees the holiness of beauty, no less than the beauty of holiness. He had not spoken two paragraphs before the spark caught, and the man, his theme, and his audience were alike transfigured. His slight figure seemed to tower aloft to the proportions of a giant; his voice vibrated with moral electricity; his burning words became a torrent, yet all was held in bound by a firm, directing hand. It was a revelation of "truth through personality," as Phillips Brooks defined preaching; what George MacDonald called "the rare speech of a man to his fellows whereby they know that in his innermost heart he is a believer."

THE POWER OF THE PREACHER

No skill of oratory could have produced that sermon; it came from no such art. It came from something beyond creeds, something far beyond differences of theology and methods of worship. It was that old, haunting, pathetic, subduing, thrilling voice heard in all ages of the church, amidst the splendors of mediæval superstition, as in the fiery appeal of modern revivalism. Older than Christianity itself, it is more vivid than music and more eloquent than architecture, and its spell is as mysterious as the wind in the trees. Such words have stirred the souls of men in every age, winning restless, wayward spirits by their divine passion, and turning bloodshed and rapine into righteous crusades. Whether spoken on bare hillsides beneath a crucifix, or in a plain white country meeting house, such words can never lose their power while human nature is the same. This quality of spirituality, so rare in men of great powers, inspires a kind of awe. Men bow to it, as a field of grain bows at the breath of the wind, feel themselves in the presence of the Unseen, and are touched, if only for a moment, by a sense of wonder and regret.

There is no need to say that I became a regular attendant at the old First Church, much to the scandal of my seminary, where I was reckoned a black sheep in the flock. It seemed to me that the sermon of that day was the achievement of a life time; but so far from being exceptional, I learned that it was typical of a preacher who always invested the facts of Christian faith with commanding certainty and practical urgency. As often as I heard Dr. Powell, he always seemed able instantly to realize that release of personality—what the old time Methodists called "liberty"—without which preaching is the hardest work ever undertaken by mortal man; harder than making brick without straw. Tales are told of his failures—as in Richmond one night when his sermon went from him entirely—but never once have I heard him when he did not transmute his thoughts into fire and light to kindle and illumine, and it was always light without smoke. Less scholarly than Broadus, less rhetorical than Gunsaulus—two of his peers now fallen asleep—he is more virile than Jowett, having none of that flowery emptiness which is the besetting sin of the "poet-preacher." Indeed, he knows nothing of the dainty, prettified, pietistic gospel so dear to the dilettante, and no doubt that is why he appeals so strongly to strong men, uniting a vivid faith with a vital, winsome, and enthusiastic manhood. Besides, judged by any test, Dr. Powell is one of the great orators of his day, though not the equal of his uncle, Dr. Robert C. Cave—the most perfect orator I have ever heard speak, alike in matter and in manner.

QUALITY OF THE SERMON

One has only to turn to a volume of his sermons—all too rare, alas—such as "The Victory of Faith," to know the quality of Dr. Powell and his ministry. They are the words of a man familiar with the most perfect fruits of culture and sensitive in high degree to the charms of literary form. Not merely in palpable allusion, but in the choice phrase, the brilliant epigram, the modulations of his sentences, and a most chaste verbal reserve, is to be discerned the master of speech. As sacred compositions they captivate as much by their beauty as by their forthrightness of insight and appeal. They are logical without any display of argument, and poetical without any sacrifice of directness and sincerity. Reason is appealed to all along, but the language of the appeal comes up all blossoming and fragrant with the heart. No one can fail to recognize their catholicity of spirit, their gracious aim, and their helpfulness to minds that recoil from the formal and arbitrary in religion. Only the commanding vitalities of Christianity and its heroic enterprise engage his heart and inspire his ministry. He cares nothing for hair splitting dogmas, but for those heavenly truths which overarch all creeds, and that life of the spirit, "mystical in its roots and practical in its fruits," which underlies all sects. As we may read, turning the pages swiftly:

"What is the preacher's world? Answer may be made that he is the messenger of religion; as Ralph Connor would say, he is the "sky pilot." But when we begin to think of what religion means—that it has to do with all life and therefore with all things, that it claims all provinces of thought and activity for its territory—we begin to see that the preacher as a messenger of religion must be a many-sided individual, and must touch life in one way or another at almost every point. The religion of Jesus has to do with all men and all things, and with all of a man—body, soul, and spirit. And he who would proclaim that religion must be a man of the world in the best sense. The more he knows of life, the more effectively he can meet the requirements of human need."

"Should a preacher enter politics? Not as a profession, but in the proclamation of righteousness he must necessarily have to do with the politician and with the affairs of state, even as in preaching honesty, purity, love, he is declaring principles that touch every business and avocation in life. The preacher cannot be sidetracked during the week or given to understand that his business belongs to Sunday and the church. Every day is his day of opportunity; every realm is his field of service and duty; all places, if they be entered in the spirit of his Master, furnish him with a pulpit. To the extent that preaching becomes a mere profession—having to do with certain things that can be labeled and classified, the preacher is provincial. In the words of Wesley, the preacher has the world for his parish. I do not know any man who requires a deeper, richer or fuller life for his work than does the preacher."

"The imperialism of Jesus takes the whole life of man for its kingdom. His rule within the heart of man must manifest itself in every part of man's environment. He cannot govern the inner life apart from the outer. The whole frame-work of society is, therefore, involved in the imperial program of Jesus. Poverty, vice and crime are inconsistent with the present social condition of our great cities. The Bible, through and through, insists upon the redemption of the bodies of men, as well as their souls, and of the whole frame-work of human society. And so the regency of Christ contemplates the bringing of our homes, our politics, our trade—all the means, agencies and things with which we are connected—under the sway of Jesus."

"Consider the sweeter, nobler, conceptions of religion which are ours today. As life takes color from Christianity it is ennobled. Today life is happier, stronger, because of the things we have left behind. The church is journeying away from the falsities of medievalism, but carries forward the sweetness and light of Jesus. Gone forever the hideous dogmas that tortured our fathers. Gone the dogmas which confused Satan with God. The church is exchanging the worship of the past for the heritage of the present, the old philosophies for the new living Christ. We know more, and therefore we love more. The certificate of Christianity is something more than proved propositions. It is a helpful life. There has come a new conscience, which makes it impossible for men to be content to have, while their brothers have not. The physical misery of the world's disinherited is becoming the spiritual misery of the world's elect."

Happy is the city which has sent to it an authentic messenger of great truths; one of those elect spirits to whom religious cares and interests are what secular cares and interests are to other men. For thirty years Dr. Powell has labored in Louisville, at the gateway of the South—himself a Virginian gentleman of the old school—taking not only a city but a commonwealth for his parish, with a noble influence only equalled by his indefatigable industry as a pastor. Resisting all temptations to leave Louisville, he added year to year, decade to decade, with a continuity and cumulative momentum of influence, giving him a command of the higher life of a city such as few men have ever attained. Through all the years he has played well his part in practical affairs, but his life is not there. The growth of the kingdom of grace is his prosperity, the application of Christian ideas to life is his supreme concern. Less a reformer than a former of the ideals and conscience of a great community, all through his ministry he has fearlessly dealt with public issues, and always from a Christian point of view. Never a pulpit scold, never falling into a pessimistic or denunciatory tone—like the Queen in "Alice in Wonderland," who said there was jam yesterday, and there will be jam tomorrow, but there is no jam today—by the weight of his character, by the wisdom of his practical suggestion, no less than by the power of his passionate eloquence, he has wrought mightily as a preacher and leader of righteousness.

THE FUNDAMENTAL MORALITIES

There was a time, years ago, when Kentucky was torn by a bitter political feud, becoming almost an armed camp, and the governor-elect was shot dead in the capital city. With triumphant tact, with unfaltering courage, Dr. Powell made it an opportunity for some of the greatest preaching of his life, rebuking iniquity, and pleading for the fundamental moralities of private and public life. Later, when the chief executive of the state was a fugitive in an adjoining state, it was the pulpit of the old First Church that spoke in behalf of forgiveness, making plea equally for Christian common sense and public decency. It was a difficult—nay, a disgraceful—time, but Dr. Powell dealt with it in a manner forever memorable, revealing the political function of religion and the strategy of Christian leadership. Fortunately the sermons, addresses, and articles of that period were gathered into a little book, entitled "Savonarola, and Other Addresses on Civic Righteousness," in which we may read to this day the heartache of a patriot and the testimony of a prophet. His ringing call to "Sleeping Citizenship," his fine appeal to "Public Men and Morals," his thrilling commentary on the Battle Hymn of the Republic—itsself a prose-poem of no mean order—and his noble interpretation of "The Divine Presence in Political History," the last two evoked by the Spanish-American war—show us how a Christian can be a patriot, and a patriot a Christian. In the same way, during the Great War, when his body was frail and his heart wrung with agony, his pulpit was an altar alike of Christian faith and patriotic fire.

For some of us Louisville is a city of many memories, not only of days that come not back, but of great scholars and dear teachers whose influence abides, and of fellowships which time cannot destroy. It is the city of Henry Watterson, last and greatest of the editors of the old days of chivalrous and brilliant journalism; the golden voice of the south and a national character. It is the city of Mary Anderson, and "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch"; of Madison Cawein, a lyric poet whose song was heard and loved in England, even before it won its way at home. It has ever been a city of great preachers, like Broadus, Boyce, Hemphill, Hamilton, Pickard, Dudley, Eaton, and Rabbi Adolph Moses, a stately, grave, and noble teacher. Many have fallen asleep but Powell remains, the peer and comrade of a goodly company, the best beloved and—excepting only Watterson—the most famous citizen of his city.

Religion and Business

By Roger W. Babson

MR. BABSON is known as President of the Babson Statistical Organization, and as an expert in the science of business. But he is also a sturdy believer in the possibilities of the church. Here is the closing paragraph of his book:

"It is not the purpose of this book to suggest details of a plan for redeeming the world, but rather to emphasize the fact that the world can be redeemed socially, industrially only through religion. Governments may succeed in protecting men in freedom of effort and rights of ownership; but only religion can energize men unto a maximum of useful service and make them content with a simple material reward."

Some Chapter Titles

Business Men and the Church.
Rich Men's and Poor Men's Churches.
Religion and the Wage Worker.
Natural Law Underlies Jesus' Teachings.
Training Our Children in Religion.
The Greatest of Undeveloped Resources—Faith.
Religion and Personal Efficiency.
The Religion Which Will Survive.
The Interchurch Movement.
The Great Opportunity for the Church in Industry.
Can Religion Be Subsidized?
Immediate Problems Facing the Church.

* * *

New edition in boards, $1.50
12 cents postage

* * *

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

VERSE

Debtor

SO long as my spirit still
Is glad of breath
And lifts its plumes of pride
In the dark face of death;
While I am curious still
Of love and fame,
Keeping my heart too high
For the years to tame,
How can I quarrel with fate
Since I can see
I am a debtor to life,
Not life to me?

SARA TEASDALE.

The Lilies of the Field

WHEN I went up to Nazareth—
A pilgrim of the spring—
When I went up to Nazareth
The earth was blossoming!
I saw the blue flower of the flax
Beside a shepherd's fold!
Along the hillsides' stony tracks
I found the marigold!
The iris raised a shimmering spire
Of beauty at my feet!
The poppy was a cup of fire
Among the cooling wheat!

When I went up to Nazareth
I marked how time came down
With blighting dust and withering breath
Upon the hallowed town!
The years that buried Babylon
Were drifting to efface
The steps of Mary's Heavenly Son,
His dwelling and his race!
But still I read his permanence
By signs that never dim;
With all their ancient eloquence
The lilies spoke of Him!

DANIEL HENDERSON.

Resurrection

SOME say that when our bodies have been laid
Within the cool, sweet earth, and, purified,
Have mingled with the soil and have become
A part of springtime's grass and flowers, in some
New realm we'll live again, and there abide Forever, knowing the mysteries that swayed
Our acts, the doubts that gave a timid heart,
Seeing the whole of which we were a part.

Perhaps; but this I know: a soul that died
When childhood's God was proved a myth, returned

To the rich loam that mothers the teeming life
Of men; became a part of all their strife,
Felt all mankind its atom multiplied,
And lived again, nor for a Heaven yearned.

CORA CLARK McELROY.

Our Thinking

TO think alone will save our souls, and save
Society, while not to think is sin,
And damns your fellow man as sure as fate.
The most atrocious crimes in history
Were perpetrated by "good" men, cock-sure
That they obeyed divine injunctions, laws
Laid down by fiat, which 't were sacrilege
To question. Bloody Marys, Torquemads,
The whole vile crew Inquisitorial,
Were pious to a turn, were sure they served
A holy God while butchering fellow men.
They stubbornly refused to think, or raise
A question of the right or wrong of deeds
That shook high heaven and made of earth a hell.
A race of thinkers is the only hope
Of progress, justice, peace, security.
A code of laws contrived to stifle thought,
And rob men of their freedom to speak out
What they may think, is wicked, monstrous, rank,
Unutterable crime, the measureless,
Unpardonable sin against mankind.
To think is universal human right,
The indefeasible inheritance
Of every human soul. Nor that alone.
To think is duty, highest, first, and last.

JOSEPH ERNEST McAFEE.

Quatrain

AS though all lovely women who have died
Had magically returned, with lips of rose,
To kiss earth's troubled brow into repose,
Behold the sunset flaming far and wide!

CHARLES G. BLANDEN.

Song

WHEN homeward comes the joyous May
From journeyings afar
In other summer lands of bloom,
She straightway drives away our gloom
And calls us forth to laugh and play
Where golden gardens are.

Can any heart be heavy now
With grief or discontent?
Can any weep for ancient wrong
When life is love and breath is song,
When every blossom-laden bough
Declares the winter spent?

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

The Church and Industrial Maladjustment

THE church's right to speak on problems of industry is hardly challenged. The investigation of the steel strike by the Interchurch Commission brought the whole issue into severe controversy. Those whose methods are adjudged incompatible with the Christian teaching denounce such undertakings with virulence; they could not be expected to approve. The more formal and conservative churchmen, even though they approve of the findings, object that such work does not fall within the church's function; once it is justified as a legitimate function of the church they will defend it as an inalienable right.

The less progressive employers denounce such investigation as inept and gratuitous and charge that ministers and editors and professors have no capacity for such work. The more progressive welcome it as a means of helping them obtain better labor policies. The answer of churchmen to the former is that they make no pretense to adeptness in the technique of machine processes or of business organization, but that they do presume to be expert in human relationships. Their investigations and recommendations have nothing to do with the expert and specialized things of material production but with the ethics and the humanity of labor policies. If church leaders are not expert, then they are unfit for their responsibilities.

Those who resent such interference demand that the ministry stick to its gospel. No forward movement or reform was ever advocated by pulpit or religious convocation that did not receive that advice from those with whom it would interfere. We once read many a sage editorial advising ministers to stick to their gospel and let civic corruption, the saloon and political graft alone. More than once too a militant ministry revealed conditions that brought their advisors into public reprobation.

* * *

Righteousness and Right Relations

Righteousness means right relationship. If it is the church's business to put the leaven of righteousness into society it cannot ignore any set of human relationships; and more millions of human beings are today vitally involved in industrial relationships than in any other. If, therefore, industry involves wrong to human beings—if the poor are oppressed, children denied inborn rights and opportunities, poverty increased, citizenship debilitated, inequities practiced and labor policies used that make the coming of the Kingdom of Heaven impossible in shop and factory, then it is not only the right but the imperative obligation of the church to probe to the heart of the wrong and to prescribe for its reformation.

Make men Christian, say some, and all these things will be added unto civilization. True, we answer, but there may be a wide difference between making men churchmen and making them such Christians as are required to make industry and business and politics and international relations so Christian that they show the marks of the Christ in their way of doing things. Churchmen have been found involved in every evil revealed in civic life, in business and industry and war and every other social wrong. They traded in slaves, owned brewery stock, were on the inside of political rings, directed insurance scandals, were kings of criminal high finance, just as today they are found among the owners and directors of industries in which little children labor, poor wages are paid, factories lack safety equipment, and where the twelve hour day, the seven day week and the long twenty-four hour shift are used.

Most of these men live up to the conventional demands of their church. Mr. Bryan once ironically said that Villa could not be a bad man because he did not drink, beat his wife or cheat his followers. William Lorimer's neighbors defended him as a churchmember, as kind to his family, generous to the poor and as one of the best of neighbors. It is not a question of personal morals or respectability but of social conscience. A man may be personally pious, attend all the church services, contribute generously to every established cause, keep the ten commandments, be square in every deal made under the laws of trade, sit on college and missionary boards and wisely direct their affairs and still have no social conscience. Indeed yesterday he could derive his money from distilleries, rent slum tenements and take dividends from insurance exploitation; and today he may increase his income from child labor, profiteering (even in war contracts) and from the worst labor conditions to be found in industry. It is not a question of personal codes but of social conscience, and even good men need instruction in it.

* * *

The Limits of the Institutional

Established institutions cannot easily undertake new functions. Organizations tend to hold fast to old codes and to doubt the new; they are by nature conservors and therefore conservative. The church's fellowship has been gathered on the basis of certain accepted codes of morality and conscience; they are largely those of personal morals and fitted well the simple relations of the pre-industrial age. But steam and machine invention have changed the conditions under which men mingle and live together. The workman's cottage has given way to the crowded tenement, the simple relationships of master and man to the complex relationships of the great factory with its absentee owners and employed managers, the craftsmanship of hand work to the labor gang and the automatic machine, the village to the industrial city, and with it all comes the unescapable necessity of interpreting the principles of Christianity into these relationships. The old code of personal morality does not go through the new fabric; it leaves its most vital areas unpierced and without the moulding of Christian principles. The church as an institution clings to the formulas under which it has gathered its fellowship and looks upon the projection of its Gospel into this social field as an innovation.

The institution dreads innovations in things fundamental. It eagerly accepts them if applied with promise to accepted methods of activity, such as evangelism, church attendance or the financing of benevolent enterprises. Changes in theological formulas or in ecclesiastical polity have cleft the established church with schism. Lord Shaftesbury wrought as a Christian for the betterment of the conditions of child and woman labor in England but was denied the help of the church; indeed bishop and churchman expostulated that such things were quite outside the church's province. Less than a generation ago churches were closed to temperance reformers and while today most of them apply the temperance test to minister, church officer and even laymen, they were then disturbed by the innovation. After advocating abstinence for generations the church abolished the saloon and by bringing about a great social reform saved a thousand where it had formerly saved ten. It can do the same thing for poverty and industrial strife and for war and every other human wrong implicit in a social order only partially Christianized.

* * *

The Prophetic Functions of the Church

It is the function of religion to pioneer as well as conserve. It must keep prophecy alive as well as conserve the ways and means found good by time and its trying. In less enlightened eras it was not resilient enough to tolerate innovators; it relied on creeds and rules instead of principles. Thus the prophets were stoned and the word reformer despised. Today with universal education and under a democratic regime the church should take its stand on principle and defend those who differ from established ways of doing and thinking; it should bind its fellowship to the fundamentals of freedom to think and to speak and to interpret the teaching of the Master. The local congregation or even the great convention may not be able to agree on methods or even upon those social and political formulas that best embody the Christian teachings but both can defend the right of good men and true to do so. The very test of an institution in a democratic age is its ability to tolerate and even to support investigation, or truth finding, and expression, or truth telling.

In a social age the test of the church is that of its social message, and when the industrial field is the focal center of social problems the church dare not shrink from undertaking the moral readjustments it requires. It is simply a question of whether the institution that bears Christ's name will stand aloof until his principles are projected into this new field or lead in their projection and enlarge its own life through so doing, for either the principles Jesus taught will adjust the problems there existing or the lack of Christianity there will turn to rend the church. Until men can be brothers in business and industry and over the almighty dollar there will never be a brotherhood of man on this earth. The conflicting interests will not even remain in the church together. To project our Gospel there we must know the field; that implies investigation. Many a church leader is like a physician who knows materia medica well but cannot make an adequate diagnosis; he knows his Gospel well but has no knowledge of social problems. Jesus taught the Brotherhood of Man as well as the Fatherhood of God; his minister needs to know sociology as well as theology. If the church as a whole cannot speak it can support investigation and keep free the channels of expression; it can keep free the voice of prophecy and support the reformer and adopt into its future codes those things found good and true.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

CORRESPONDENCE

Community Development and the Rural Church

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Every progressive city has within its confines some definite organized endeavor in the form of an association of commerce or some similar organization in which the objective is primarily the furthering of mutual interest and the development of the community. Modern community effort, however, does not stop with the 'safety first' principle in commerce or industry, it extends to every legitimate need of the entire community and includes besides the industrial also the social, educational, sanitary, æsthetic and religious demands of the public. Community development has entered the advanced stage of sociological ethics and rests upon the broad basis of applied Christianity.

If at any time within recent years the community idea gave the impression of a momentary fad, which would soon pass, it must now be conceded, that the movement is one here to stay, it has found itself and presents a distinct program. It is somewhat of a revelation and looks like a re-discovery of the kingdom of God among men and the realization of Christ's conception of the meaning of that kingdom as a realm of moral forces, a society of good will and benevolent activities, a realm of brotherhood and unselfishness, in which men would count of greater value than machinery and where the fact of God and human society should be held as facts of transcendent worth.

Cooperation between the various groups of society furnishes an opportunity for the merging of forces and ideals in the general social life, embracing saint and sinner, and is a distinct demand of the rural nature today. This type of community endeavor makes the kingdom idea paramount and appears like a new type of revival not merely to save a few nor to revive the church activities in general for the sake of the church, it is rather the salvation of society and this is the logical course in the development of Christian thought. It carries an atmosphere of helpfulness into the social and industrial thought of the time and prepares the way for Christianity to discharge its social and moral mission. Thus the kingdom of God becomes a workable proposition striving constantly to create an ideal world, realizing salvation from selfishness.

But what part, if any, plays the rural church in the community development? The church is still a potential factor to be reckoned with and community development without the church seems well nigh impossible. In discussing the various phases of the rural church, it would be necessary to deal specifically with the church situated in the open country or small town and the church in smaller cities not to exceed three thousand inhabitants. In our analysis of the rural church we shall, however, classify the small city and open country church under the heading of rural church. It is evident that the church has entered a new stage in her development. The individualistic viewpoint in Christian thought is going out of style. The old mischievous assumption of the distinction between sacred and secular does not cover our conditions today. The thought of the constant antagonism between soul and body, of the eternal cleavage between the activities of men where preaching, praying and singing psalms is considered as service to God, while earning an honest living as a mechanic, agriculturist or any other profession is secular, does not attract the public mind any longer. This sort of teaching is in a large measure responsible for the double standards of life, which gives to God about one tenth of time and influence and unblushingly appropriates nine tenths for self.

If the church desires to retain her position of respect and usefulness, she must readjust herself to the broad, big issues of the day, which have no immediate bearing upon soul saving. She must not only promote soul culture, but also physical culture, the necessity of manly sports, music, art and sciences. The church in the open country must consider the sacredness of agriculture, the divinity of hard labor, she must bring the message of needed encouragement and cheer in promoting scientific farming.

The church of the future in the open country will be a community church, in which the entire community will feel a lively interest which will present to the population the true aspect of primitive Christianity, instead of the features and distinctions between Calvinism and Americanism. The community church that makes Christianity paramount over churchianity, will be the only agency that may reasonably expect to overcome the anti-social attitude in denominationalism and society. The rural church which desires to assume this greater responsibility in developing all the religious and social forces upon the broad basis of community need for the achievement of ideal environment, must be strictly non-denominational and non-sectarian. It must be a working organism of human forces, free from fad and keeping in mind the ideal community as paramount, instead of denominational grandeur. Too often the church has put organization, creed or orthodoxy before life and spirit and non-essentials have dwarfed the vital in church life.

That the church of the future in the rural country will be a community church upon non-denominational lines is reinforced by the fact, that leaders in all denominations are eager to exploit and capitalize the community sentiment for denominational ends. Wherever new churches are built or old ones renovated, they are dedicated as community churches. There seems to be an evident attempt to camouflage, for the time being at least, denominational ambitions. These attempts, however, are bound to fail, the public cannot always be deceived and the first essential for continued success in the life of the church must be community honesty, no community church endeavor built on deception can be permanently successful.

Taking the community church as a proper medium to function in our rural country, it is inevitable that some groups, now in the field, must subordinate and readjust themselves so as to make possible the community church. It is unfortunate indeed that the rural country has been abused and used as a breeding place for provincial denominationalism, which is the greatest hindrance to Christian union today and precludes in some sections any possibility for community effort. How to overcome this difficulty is the great problem in all federation and union efforts. The one potential obstacle, which spells defeat and failure, are the people in the rural country themselves, due to the teaching of a narrow religious provincialism, bearing strong on denominational loyalty, fostering a mistaken idea of the superiority of the church over and at the expense of Christianity. The awakened church sees the mistake, but the effects of such a culture for many generations, even centuries, cannot be effaced with one stroke. Before any commensurate results for union or federations may be expected, it will be necessary to inculcate a new spirit in ecclesiastical denominational education, a new appraisal of the value of denominational history, a new spirit of culture in church and Sunday schools. The new generation of church members should be tutored in the pure ideals of Christianity, and denominationalism as such will have to make a new public confession of its sins.

Community cooperation has grown principally on American soil and is a hopeful sign in our American life. It gives us hope to believe that the community church of the future will be strictly American. Practically every creed held in America today is an importation of either Europe or Asia, harking back to their founders, or a bitter contest over the analysis of credal dignity. This has caused isolation and produced self-satisfaction, bigotry and self-complacency, refusing to see big things, which is the cure for littleness even in religion. When America shall have freed herself from all foreign assumption in matters of religion and returned to the simple and sublime teaching of Christianity, when foreign ecclesiastical potentates shall rule the conscience of millions of innocent victims no longer, then may we expect Christianity to become supreme in America, which in turn will bring to us the full realization of a strong community church in every rural city in our land.

Fremont, Mich.

FREDERICK N. MAGDANZ.

Christian Charity

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Will you kindly allow me to say a few words anent the article by Mr. Obadiah Holmes on "The Threat of Millennialism." What I say is said in kindly spirit, for The Christian Century in many ways is big and broad. We must, however, remember that there is a breadth that may tend to narrowness and death—the Sahara Desert, for instance. I believe as does The Christian Century that Christianity is something that can get to the very root of our entire life, socially, economically, and in every other way. It is the great antidote for all of our ills. A practiced Christianity will bring the Kingdom of God within us. But to this end one of the elements most needed is Christian charity. In my opinion the article written by Mr. Holmes was not written in this attitude of mind. Prejudice and spiritual conceit in his own knowledge made his article unbalanced, and unfair. Who among us is so infallible as to know it all, so that we can speak with such authority and sureness that we are right? With all our knowledge what do we know? True knowledge leads to humility rather than to spiritual conceit. Verily the true scholar will walk as treading on holy ground, for, with the gaining of knowledge he comprehends the vastness of his ignorance. Let us be charitable enough to believe that those who may differ from us are at least honest. I desire no man to agree with me at the price of his honesty. "An honest man is the noblest work of God." The light of eternity alone will reveal who is right and who is wrong in some things; and what if we are wrong? The spirit of such articles as that written by Mr. Holmes does not tend to make the church of God triumphant in the eyes of the world; but rather makes us the laughing stock of those who would bear our present civilization upon our heads, which is intensely Christian despite views to the contrary. If I were editor of The Christian Century I would temper my magazine with a broader and more charitable view of things; and you in doing so will rise in the estimation of a vast number of your readers.

JAMES DEANS.

Grafton, Nebr.

"Thoroughly Right and Altogether Wrong"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just read with very great interest, yet with a sense of steadily increasing protest as I passed from paragraph to paragraph, the vigorous and illuminating—and, in my judgment at the same time misleading—article by Dr. Peter Ainslie in your issue of May 12 under the title "The Denominational School." I wonder if you will permit me to say in your paper that Dr. Ainslie is thoroughly right and yet altogether wrong.

I agree with your distinguished contributor in practically everything that he says about the nature and purpose of education, especially do I agree that education "must deal with the wholeness of life" and that "education must be a unitary process or it is defective" but I would like to take very earnest exception to the implication which runs through Dr. Ainslie's article from beginning to end, to wit, that "the denominational school" is not a unitary factor but, the guardian of denominational traditions which are separative in character.

Certainly I would not suggest that so distinguished a leader does not know what he is talking about. Nevertheless, I think it altogether true that Dr. Ainslie does not make plain what he is talking about. It is evident that he is discussing institutions which have been founded and which are maintained for the purpose of conserving and promoting sectarian traditions, even sectarian shibboleths. Certainly there were such institutions once. If Dr. Ainslie says that some of them still exist he must know, or he would not make the statement. Indeed, I am willing to grant that there are schools and colleges which are predominantly sectarian in motive, but I would respectfully call your attention to the fact that the term "denominational school" or "denominational college" is used outside of the brotherhood known as Disciples, if not within, to designate any and all schools and colleges maintained by Christian churches of various denominations; I further respectfully protest that at least those schools and colleges maintained by the Presbyterian church are not supported because of a sectarian motive and are not dominated by any purpose to conserve denominational traditions or to be separative in character.

I feel quite sure that Dr. Ainslie was referring to a certain type of educational institution with which he may be more familiar than I am, though I suppose that institutions of this type do still exist. I am quite frank to say that I would not waste ten minutes of my time in efforts to perpetuate that kind of an educational institution; yet I am an officer of the board of education of one of the larger denominational groups. Why? Principally because of the belief that the church of which I am a minister, and every other organized group of Christian men and women, has resting upon it an obligation to help provide an education which is really complete, an education which is really unitary, an education built upon the faith that "the soul of education is the education of the soul," and which, therefore, must include the religious element. To some of us at least the term "denominational school" or "denominational college" does not mean at all what Dr. Ainslie means when he uses that term. It means rather an educational institution supported by the church for the sake of providing a complete, instead of an incomplete, because materialistic education. It seems to me that this is not a distinction without a difference. The difference between a sectarian school and a denominational school—between a school supported for the sake of maintaining and promoting sectarian views and a school supported for the sake of producing true Christian citizenship—is a difference which is very notable and which ought always to be kept in mind.

JAS. E. CLARKE.

Editorial Offices

The Presbyterian Advance.

"Dementalized Textarians"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: For some months I have been reading The Christian Century with pleasure and profit. I enjoy the freedom of its discussions. The article on "The Other Side" by J. B. Hunley in answer to Mr. Holmes prompts me to write you this letter. I have just read a book of more than 150 pages, double column, and scanned wierd drawings in connection with it. For once I could sympathize with Dr. Little of Garrett Biblical Institute. He used to say after going over our examination papers he needed a mental bath. The one who induced me to read the book believed, not only in the mechanical inspiration of the Bible as presented in the book, but he also believed in the inspiration of the author in his interpretations, and especially in his drawings. If he was inspired he was inspired to turn certain passages of scripture around to make them fit his plans; and not even a destructive critic would be more free in his handling of the scriptures. Context meant nothing unless he could make it by juggling bolster his plan.

I do not understand that Mr. Holmes meant that only a dementalized textarian could be a premillennialist; but that only such could go to the extremes that many are in their interpretation of the scheme. Certainly none of the men mentioned by Mr. Hunley held the extreme and un-Christian views that are being presented today. I have seen attempts by premillennialists to claim almost all of the great outstanding leaders of the past.

I should like very much to see the full and free discussion of both sides in your paper. But I am not sure of the wisdom of it. I am sure that no premillennial paper will allow the other side to present its views to its readers. I have had some experience along that line. After having one of the papers come into my home for three or four years I can't get even an answer by mail to my questions, to correct my supposed erroneous views. The fact is, as I see it, that they are afraid that to keep our hold upon God our faith must be supported by an infallible and unquestioned Bible. Then they must be inconsistent in interpretation to uphold this theory which no great branch of the Christian church has ever made an article of faith. I have many friends who hold, more or less, to this theory of inspiration; but among them he is the exception, even among preachers, who will read anything that presents the other side of the question. If both sides can be presented in your paper I will hail the discussion with joy. If theology will not stand airing I consider it of little value. If we can not differ in our beliefs and still love one another we are poor Christians.

GUY DEWHURST.

Roodhouse, Ill.

Safety Security Satisfaction

GUARANTEED BY INVESTING

IN THE

6% Annuity Bonds

OF THE

United Christian
Missionary Society

THEY ARE BETTER THAN

LANDS—For they must be improved and worked.

INSURANCE—For premiums on policies must be paid.

RAILROAD STOCKS—For they fluctuate in value.

MORTGAGES—For foreclosure is often necessary.

WILLS—For heirs often break them.

MONEY—For it often takes wings and flies away.

*United Christian
Missionary Society*

1501 Locust St.

St. Louis, Missouri

British Table Talk

The City Temple Today

In common with many other institutions, the church made famous by Joseph Parker and R. J. Campbell is feeling the stress of present day conditions. Rev. F. W. Norwood (a Baptist from Australia), who on May 8 celebrated his first anniversary as minister, attracts large congregations and is personally popular, but he is confronted with a formidable financial problem which began to develop after Mr. Campbell's departure. Contrary to the general impression, the City Temple, though until recent years it always paid its way, has never been a rich church: the few wealthy men who at different periods have been associated with it were personal supporters of Parker or Campbell, rather than of the church as such. In the heyday of the latter's ministry 8,000 pounds was put aside, but this had to be drawn upon after he went. There is now a deficit in the church accounts of some 1,700 pounds—which is about the amount spent two years ago on the organ, which is much the worse for wear. It has been decided to buy for 1,200 pounds the organ now at Jesus College, Cambridge, and at a cost of about 2,500 pounds incorporate this with the one erected in the City Temple more than forty years ago—an interesting instance of Anglican and non-conformist fusion! In addition, there is a deficit of about 400 pounds on last year's current account, although the church's working expenses (including minister's stipend) are now lower than they have ever been. People have less money to give, and are apt to economize where it may be easiest. Under the leadership of a brilliant organist, Mr. Allan Brown, aided by the senior member of the choir, Mr. George Tidy, who has been associated with the church for forty-five years, the Choral Society raises 500 pounds a year for the church funds. An effort is being made to increase the church revenue by 800 pounds a year. In view of the national and even international character of the City Temple, the appeal is not limited to people directly connected with the "cathedral of nonconformity." Some time ago there was talk of substantial contributions from the United States, but none has arrived yet. The American and British flags still hang together behind the pulpit. The trustees have now taken power to mortgage the building up to 8,000 pounds, though it is hoped that most, if not all, of the money required will be given or lent privately. The Sunday congregations are excellent, the building being quite full in the evenings. None of his successors has been able to maintain the Thursday midday service at the high level at which Parker kept it for over thirty years. For some years Campbell exceeded Parker's numerical average, but in the latter part of his ministry the attendance dropped to a few hundreds and has never recovered. The hour of the service has recently been altered from 12 to 1 to 1 to 2. Rev. Charles Spurgeon, the surviving twin son of the famous divine, preached at both services in the City Temple on April 24, when collections were taken for the church funds and Stockwell (Spurgeon's) Orphanage.

* * *

A Church for Miss Royden

The long and weary search for a suitable building in which to hold the services conducted by England's leading woman preacher and her ministerial colleague, Dr. Percy Dearmer, and to provide a center during the week for the Fellowship Guild, seems at last to have come to a successful end. Unless there is a slip 'twixt cup and lip, which in this instance is not at all likely, by the time this letter has crossed the Atlantic negotiations that have been proceeding for some months will have reached a satisfactory conclusion. After scouring London and meeting with one disappointment after another, we at length lighted upon the Congregational church in Eccleston Square, near Victoria station, in the city of Westminster. This handsome structure was built about seventy years ago by Mr. Seth Smith and presented to London Congregationalism. The church flourished for many years, notably during the long pastorate of the late Dr. Niles Nitchens, but, like alas! so many once-prosperous free churches, the "cause" gradually declined, until now the membership and congregation are very small indeed. The authorities of the church have shown throughout the negotiations the most fraternal and generous spirit, their one desire being that the building shall be put to the best possible use, and the London Congregational Union, in a disinterested spirit, has done all that it could to facilitate the transfer. The church seats about 1200 people, and there are a large hall below and other rooms. According to present arrangements, the Fellowship Guild will take possession in May and start its services there in June. Miss Royden will continue to conduct the evening service and Dr. Dearmer the afternoon "Five Quarters" (i. e., 3:15 to 4:30 p. m.). What will be done in the morning has not yet been decided. Miss Royden is very anxious to do as much as possible for the children of the locality. The various agencies now in operation—Sunday school, social and literary society, women's meeting, temperance society, etc.—will be taken over by the guild, and in time other activities will be begun. Miss Royden is surrounded by an army of bright young women eager for service. While Miss Royden and Mr. Dearmer are both members of the Church of England, the Fellowship Guild will continue to be an interdenominational body, uniting Anglicans and all types of nonconformists. Its new responsibilities will, of course, involve additional expenditure, and an appeal is made for 1500-2000 pounds to enable the guild to meet the initial outlay and immediate expenses. The Fellowship services, with their unconventionality, their combination of reverence and freedom, their delightful singing, their strong human note, are increasingly appreciated. Last Sunday in Kensington Town Hall people stood throughout the service and others sat on the floor. A collection was taken for the miners' children: "We must act," said Miss Royden, "fight our industrial battles on the stomachs of the children." After a month's rest Miss Royden has recovered her voice. In great demand on all sides, and always wanting to help good causes, Miss Royden is in constant danger of attempting too much. Her health has never been robust, and she is all the time fighting against physical disability.

* * *

"And the Sun Stood Still"

A new and ingenious explanation of Joshua x. 12-14 is put forward by Mr. E. Walter Maunder, F.R.A.S., formerly superintendent of the Solar Department of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich. He says that to the astronomer the words ascribed to Joshua, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon," suggest two rough but definite astronomical observations. The sun to Joshua seemed associated with Gibeon, and the sun can be naturally associated with a place on the earth in either of two positions: it may be directly overhead to the observer, in which case he would consider it as being "upon" the place where he was standing, or he might see the place on the sky line and the sun, either rising or setting, just behind it. The Bible chronicler states that the sun was "in the midst of heaven," that is "overhead," in the "zenith." Next, the moon to be visible must be far from the sun; therefore it must have been low down on the horizon, in the direction of the valley of Ajalon, northwest of Gibeon. Hence the moon was setting and in its third quarter. The Amorites after their defeat fled towards the northwest, through the Beth-horons, then westward to Azekah and southward to Makkedah, where the battle stopped at sundown. It was at the moment, high noon, when the enemy was "discomfited," that Joshua, standing at Gibeon, made his exclamation. The Israelites had already been seventeen hours on foot, and a very long, arduous pursuit lay before them. The sun's heat must have been most distressing, and Joshua desired it to be tempered. A great hailstorm swept up from the sea ("the Lord cast down great stones from heaven"), bringing with it a sudden lowering of temperature, and no doubt hiding the sun with thick clouds. This, Mr. Maunder has no doubt, is the meaning of the word that our version translates "Stand thou still," but which literally means (as is indicated in the margin) "be thou silent." The secondary meaning of the word is "to desist" or "to cease" and therefore in some cases "to stand still." But it is impossible to suppose that Joshua at noon in high summer, in the highland of southern Palestine, one of the hottest countries of the world, wished the sun to be fixed overhead for many hours still to come. He wished it to cease, not from moving but from burning. Seven hours later when he reached Makkedah the sun was setting. From Gibeon to Makkadah by the route indicated is some thirty miles, a full day's march for an army. But the Israelites had not clocks or watches, and the only mode of measuring time available to them was the number of miles they marched. So measured, that afternoon seemed to be double the ordinary length: "the sun hastened not to go down about a whole day."

* * *

The People's Theater

Visitors to London should not fail to make their way to the Royal Victoria Hall, familiarly known as "The Old Vic," opposite Waterloo Railway Station. It is remarkable that dramatic and musical art of high quality has for years flourished in the poorest and most populous parts of London. Here the flame of Shakespeare's genius burns brightly; here may be heard the great operas and oratorios; here at Christmas and in Lent Nativity plays and Moralities may be witnessed; here all the year round educational lectures are eagerly listened to by a very mixed audience. It is impressive when at the close of a Nativity play 2000 people stand up to sing Adeste Fideles. During its hundred years' history great actors, including Edmund Keen, Samuel Phelps, Junius Brutus Booth, and Henry Kemble played on the boards of this spacious Thames-side theatre. Dickens has described it in Sketches by Boz, and John Mollingshead in his Autobiography thus depicts a typical audience in those days: "The gallery of the Victoria was a huge amphitheatre, probably containing about fifteen hundred perspiring creatures; most of the men in shirt sleeves, most of the women bareheaded, with colored handkerchiefs round their shoulders. This audience was always thirsty and not ashamed. It tied handkerchiefs together until they formed a rope, which was used to haul up large stone bottles of beer from the pit and occasionally hats that had been dropped below." Forty years ago Miss Emma Cons, an art student, initiated a movement which in time converted what Charles Kingsley in "Alton Locke" called "a licensed pit of darkness, a trap of temptation" into a People's Theatre and the Home of Shakespeare. When she died, nine years ago, her niece, Miss Lillian Bayliss, who had been working with her, took charge and further developed the enterprise. Workingmen and school teachers come from all parts of London to study and enjoy Shakespeare faithfully presented, and the denizens of the immediate neighborhood are not slow to show their appreciation. At Christmas and Lent Miss Bayliss links up religion and the drama by inviting clergymen to introduce sacred performances with brief addresses. Shakespeare's birthday was celebrated by the presentation of Hamlet in its entirety, and three other of the Bard's plays were given during the festival.

* * *

Dr. Shakespeare Retiring

After guiding the destinies of the Baptist denomination with the vision of a seer and the genius of a statesman, Dr. J. H. Shakespeare announces that he wishes to retire next year when he will be 65 years of age, having been secretary of the union for nearly 25 years. During this period he has done wonders in consolidating and unifying the denomination and has been mainly instrumental in raising about 750,000 pounds for providing the headquarters for ministerial sustentation and other purposes. His dream of a united free church has not been realized, but he has done more than any free churchman to promote reunion.

* * *

Personal

Dr. Randall Thomas Davidson, who was 73 on April 7, has been 30 years a bishop and 18 years Archbishop of Canterbury.—The Bishop of Chester wishes his new home to be called "Bishop's House"; he says "Palace" is apt to be a little misunderstood nowadays.—Mr. D. C. Lathbury, formerly editor of the "Guardian" and the "Pilot," is 90 years old.—Dr. Soderblom, Archbishop of Upsala, who is visiting England, in connection with the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, says we need a new Confession of Faith and proposes the establishment of an Ecumenical Council "of the one holy catholic church throughout the world"—of which the "churches" are branches.—The Archbishop of Canterbury, in response to an appeal to his grace on a certain utterance of the Dean of St. Paul's, having said that Dr. Inge is "occasionally eccentric" and does not "represent the mind of the church of England," the Dean exclaims: "Heaven forbid that I should try to represent it! I have no axe to grind; bootlicking is not to my taste; and I strongly believe in speaking the truth, especially to those who seldom hear it."—At a lunchtime service in St. Paul's, Covent Garden, before a crowded congregation, Canon Adderley "arraigned" his friend and neighbor, Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard, touching certain modern methods employed at St. Martin's. Defendant, who gave a good account of himself and his proceedings, pleaded that he belonged to no school, and, please God, never would; he was a pilgrim in search of light and truth.—In the same church Mr. Ernest Bevin, "the Dockers' K. C.," stated the case of the coal-strikers.—"Do not permit old age to blind you to the movements of the day and hour; always think of yourself as young and go forward as one who is young," said Dr. Clifford at the annual meeting of West-

Suggestions for Commencement Gifts

The Daily Altar.

By Willett and Morrison. Full leather, $2.50; purple cloth, $1.50. Add 8 cents postage.

Touchstones of Success.

By Francis E. Clark, Bishop Quayle, Cyrus H. K. Curtis and a hundred other leading Americans. An excellent book for young men. $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

Nelson Bible, American Revised.

Genuine leather, morocco grain, divinity circuit, silk sewed, round corners, red under gold edges, title stamped on back in pure gold, India paper, only one inch thick. $6.00 plus 12 cents postage.

The Outline of History.

By H. G. Wells. The ideal gift for thoughtful young people. In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

bourne Park Church, where he ministered for nearly 60 years, whose membership is now 603 (38 added during the year) and which raised 6,285 pounds in 1920.—Dr. Jewett's health has improved in the South of France, and he returns to Westminster Chapel in May.—Dr. W. C. Poole, an Australian, under 50, has made a buoyant beginning (in a white waistcoat) as Dr. Meyer's successor at Christ Church, Westminster-bridge-road.—Mr. G. H. Shakespeare, son of the Secretary of the Baptist Union, has been appointed one of Mr. Lloyd George's political secretaries.—Rev. F. Chalmers Rogers, M. A., whose father, grandfather (Dr. Guinness Rogers) and great-grandfather were ministers, has become minister of East Hill Congregational Church, Wardsworth.—Son of Dr. David Thomas, Dr. Arnold Thomas, fifty years ago at his father's request preached in Highbury Church, Bristol, of which he has been minister for 46 years.—Rev. W. Legarton has begun the 50th year of his ministry at Brentwood.—At the age of 88, after 57 years as minister of Ecton Congregational Church, Northants, Rev. John Field has retired.—Dr. R. J. Campbell during July and August will preach in Episcopal and Congregational churches in San Francisco.—Dr. J. A. Hutton, Glasgow, will spend August and early September in America, taking part in the Northfield Conference, attending the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Pittsburgh, and preaching in Philadelphia.—Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke will attend the annual conventions of the Northern and Southern Baptists and afterwards go to Toronto.—Dr. R. F. Horton has arranged a reunion of the sixty members of the International Congregational Council who sailed on the Adriatic to Boston, and will convert his church room into a replica of the deck, the smoke-room, and the tea-room of the ship.—Rev. G. Stanley Russell and Mrs. Russell (a Canadian) revisit Toronto in July.—Dr. Charles Brown takes part in the jubilee celebrations in October of Bloor Street Baptist Church, Toronto.—Prof. Hugh Black is coming from America to England, via Paris.—Rev. S. Hugh Lennox Hodge, formerly of Sewickley, Penn., who supplied the pulpit of St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, London, during the winter, will spend the summer in Scotland; in April he preached in United Free St. George's, Edinburgh.—Among American preachers expected in England this summer are Rev. Albert E. Day, Canton, Ohio; Prof. A. J. W. Myers, Hartford, Conn.; Rev. Ernest C. Wareing, Cincinnati; Rev. Miles Krumbine, Dayton, O.; Dr. Stalker, Ann Arbor, Michigan; Dr. W. H. Matthews, New York; Dr. Frank H. Hosmer, Greenwich, Conn.; Rev. E. M. Wylie, Montclair, N. J.; Dr. C. L. Kloss, Oakland, Cal.; Rev. Avery A. Shaw, Brooklyn; Dr. A. E. Harris, Philadelphia; Dr. C. W. Gilkey, Chicago.—Last year eighty Congregational ministers dropped out of the ranks by death or retirement, and only fifty-one men presented themselves at the colleges as candidates for the ministry.

* * *

A Misstatement

The statement made on this side that the secretaries of the Baptist and Congregational Unions both refused a request to grant five minutes in their May Assembly programs for the advocacy of Anglo-American friendship is entirely inaccurate and is the result of a most unfortunate misunderstanding. After the programs had been completed they received a letter asking them to find room for the question of interchange of preachers between the two countries, and they much regretted that this could not be arranged, the programs being already overcrowded. The international interchange of preachers has been advocated at previous assemblies, and it need hardly be said that everybody is heartily in favor of it.

ALBERT DAWSON.

Contributors to this Issue

ROGER W. BABSON, statistician; author "Business Barometer," "Selected Investments," "Religion and Business," etc., etc.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Our Nation *

FIRST I must see to it that I am genuinely a Christian, then I must see that my family is Christian, then I must reach out to my community, seeing that its customs are Christian. My next circle includes my nation.

Forcibly, during the war, we had it brought home to us that we owed a duty to our country. Uncle Sam had the right to claim our very lives; taxation shows his right to our property. Now, that peace is restored, we owe our country honorable living. Two very important practical matters demand consideration at this point. First, our Christian obligation demands that we honestly pay our taxes and vote. No Christian can juggle with his income taxes. Any man or woman who cuts any corners or who plays any tricks in order to evade the full payment of all taxes, who lies about moneys in bank, or notes or mortgages or earnings may be a worldling, but he or she certainly is not a follower of Him who told his disciples to pay the taxes due. This is not a popular subject. Many who read this would rather have me discuss the "old gospel," but I am saying that a "tax-dodger" is a mean, contemptible, small-bore proposition and a disgrace to any church. I stick in the dagger and turn it around. Make the most of it. Not only must one pay taxes in order to vote, but one is not a good citizen of our noble republic who does not carry his share of responsibility in the choice of the men who represent us in the offices of power. To be a citizen of the United States is not only a privilege to be enjoyed but also a responsibility to be carried. Good tests for Christianity are honest response to taxation and intelligent discharge of the voting obligation. Second, our Christian obligation to our state demands reverent obedience to all laws. In the mind of at least one thinker, the most dangerous element in our modern day is the lightness with which laws are evaded or broken. Sometimes the one who breaks the law is a poor, uneducated fellow whose conscience is blunt, sometimes it is a rich man who hires a keen attorney to discover some loophole in the law. There is a law against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors—but how jokingly it seems to be regarded by many! One of the causes of the wave of crime now sweeping our land is the common verdict that one can commit murder or rob a bank and "get away with it." One can gamble on the chances of evading the police, of escaping the court or of getting out of jail by fraud or by pardon. Criminals cannot be oblivious to these facts. The lightness with which many so-called Christians regard our laws is to blame for many of these appalling conditions.

Reverence for law and authority is a crying need. Fundamentally, this roots back in disrespect for parents. Children are tyrants in too many homes, and parents become only slaves and conveniences for young America. Some way or other, a wholesome regard for laws must be inculcated. Authority must be respected. It is not our province to decide which laws we will obey and which disregard. Roosevelt said the best way to get rid of a bad law is to enforce it—then people will legislate it off the books.

Let us not wander off into space in this discussion, but let us settle these fundamental things: Honest payment of national taxes, intelligent discharge of the franchise, reverent obedience of all laws. Demoralization must eventuate unless our laws are respected and enforced.

JOHN R. EWERS.

*June 5. Making the Nation Christian. Ps. 33:12; Prov. 14:34; Rom. 13:1-7.

BOOKS

Any book in print may be secured from The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago. Give name of publisher, if possible.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Lutherans Interpret Attitude on Cooperation

The failure of the United Lutheran Church to accept membership in the Federal Council up to this time has led to much misunderstanding of their attitude. They regard the question of the cooperation with the Federal Council as still an open one. In the meantime Rev. C. M. Jacobs has set forth in the Church Review a statement of the Lutheran attitude toward church union and cooperation. He says: "There are four things which any church ought to be ready to do. The first is to declare what it believes, always, everywhere and to everyone. The second is to look upon other churches as Christian bodies. We must speak the truth, but we must speak the truth in love. The attitude of hostility, of jealousy and suspicion must give place to one of Christian courtesy and frankness. A church should always be ready to cooperate in works of serving love, so far as this can be done without surrender of its interpretation of the gospel, without denial of conviction, and without suppression of its testimony to what it holds as the truth."

Find Heresy in Princeton University

When heresy breaks out at Princeton, the times of the end must be near at hand, in the language of the premillennialists. This university has long been regarded as the haven of orthodoxy. Now the Presbyterian announces that Prof. Edwin Grant Conklin, teacher of biology in Princeton, utterly rejects the supernatural "as the uncaused, undetermined and unlawful." Other heretics are also mentioned, particularly one in the field of psychology. There is not much left for the orthodox student except the Bible Institutes in our various cities, since the last of the great universities shows signs of going over.

Rev. John Haynes Holmes Barred from School Buildings

Rev. John Haynes Holmes is a socialist, a pacifist and is too radical in religion to be a Unitarian any more. Yet he is to be counted among the leading minds of New York City, and his ideas are at least worthy of respectful attention. He has recently been barred from speaking in the public school buildings of New York because of his alleged heresies. Just when did public school boards begin trying ministers for heresy? We always thought that was one of the special prerogatives of the self-appointed hounds of the Lord in the church.

Devotes Whole Issue to the Movie Problem

The Congregationalist devotes its May 12 issue to the reports of various churches on the use of movies in the churches. Rev. Edward Archibald Thompson, of Quincy, Ill., asserts that in his church a small service of seventy-five people was changed to a congregation of three hundred and fifty, in which are large numbers of people who do not ordinarily go to church. His ideal has been to provide a service in which there was the same devotional quality as in the conventional service. He uses a great deal of music and closes with a short sermon distinct from the pictures. Rev. Robert G. Armstrong, of Spencer, Mass., uses films of great moral novels and dramas, such as "Les Misérables." He thinks the filming of the Bible dramas has been badly done, and prefers not to use these films. The two great difficulties encountered by the churches seem to be the expense and the difficulty in securing suitable films. Some churches prefer to restrict the use of the machine to the week-night recreational meeting, in which case there is very much more latitude in the choice of the films. Rev. Erwin J. Urch, of Philadelphia, reports a Friday evening exhibition which is attended by three hundred people and which finances itself by free-will offerings. Six companies, and perhaps more, are now making special offerings of film for church use. As these develop their lists of films, the question of film supply will be largely solved.

"Gloomy Dean" Coming to America

One of the most challenging writers of the Anglican church is Dean Inge. He is sometimes called the "gloomy dean" because of pessimistic utterances, but he has flashes of humor and is anything but a dull personality. He is coming to America soon for a tour of the country and will probably attract a wider hearing than some English visitors of the past year. Being charged recently with not representing the Church of England, he said, "Heaven forbid that I should try to represent it. I have no axe to grind. Bootlicking is not to my taste. I strongly believe in speaking the truth, especially to those who seldom hear it."

Unique Ministerial Cooperation

Church union is often hindered by the higher-ups of the ecclesiastical order, but in local situations great harmony of purpose is often wrought out by the ministers. The preachers of Morrill, Kans., are evidently good fellows. They have formed a gospel quartette and are touring the surrounding country singing the gospel into the hearts of the people. This device brings a good many to hear preaching who would otherwise not do so.

Cooperative Council Runs into Difficulties

The Cooperative Council of City Missions has for fifteen years been the clearing house for city mission comity in Chicago. Organized by Dr. Shailer Mathews, and for a number of years under his strong directing hand, it has in more recent years been having difficulties. In some cases denominational churches that operate under a congregational polity have refused to accept the recommendations of the council, and there is no ecclesiastical authority to compel them to do so. The United Presbyterian denomination has recently resigned its place in the council and will go it alone henceforth unless won back by the special committee of the Council appointed to arbitrate with them. At the last meeting of the Council new officers were elected and Rev. Perry J. Rice is the new chairman of the organization. Mr. Rice is executive secretary of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, a Disciples organization.

Lawsuit Against Church Leaders

An independent organization among the Disciples of Christ, known as the International Christian Missionary Association, with principal offices at Minneapolis, conducts a training school for Americanization workers in Minneapolis and collects funds for work among immigrants. This organization has brought suit against Rev. C. W. Cauble, state secretary of Indiana; Dr. H. O. Pritchard, secretary of the Board of Education; Rev. Milo J. Smith, secretary of the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare, and Rev. S. Grundy Fisher for libel. The Minnesota concern asserts that it was hindered in gathering $100,000 for its work in Indiana by unfavorable interpretations of its work, and is suing for this amount. The incident is embarrassing, but will in the long run prove useful in defining the spirit and motives of the independent missionary organization.

Church Honors Its Old Men

First Christian church, of Litchfield, Ill., has three elders emeriti. Mr. William Allen is 88 years of age. He has been a lay preacher through the years, having served a number of churches in the vicinity of Litchfield. Mr. James E. Masters is 84 years of age. He has been an ordained minister. In 1916 he came to Litchfield. Mr. Leroy F. Wood is 80 years of age. He united with the Litchfield church in 1857, but for many years lived in Indiana. In 1883 he returned to Litchfield, and since then has been an occasional preacher for churches in the vicinity. These veterans help to put a wonderful spirit into the Litchfield church. The pictures of these men were in a recent issue of the parish paper.

German Lutherans Will Put Million Dollars Into a Seminary

The Synodical Conference is an organization of Lutherans of German descent with somewhat less of conservatism and exclusiveness than is characteristic of Missouri Synod Lutherans. Their work has been largely in the German language in the past but great progress has been made in changing over to English in the years since the war. This group of Lutherans announces that they will shortly build a new building for Concordia Seminary in St. Louis at an expense of a million dollars. This achievement will be made possible by the energetic work of the Lutheran Laymen's League which has wiped out the synodical debt, and provided funds for a number of worthy purposes.

Women May Enter Bishop's Council

The Protestant Episcopal Church faces the insistent demand of its lay people for a modernization in government. The discriminations against women are a constant cause of friction. Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts seems to be leading the church toward a more liberal policy. It has been ruled recently that women may become members of the Bishop's Council in that state. This is the highest lay position in the gift of the church. Other lay positions are withheld from women by reason of the canon law. This law may be amended by succeeding general conventions.

Unitarians and Ministerial Students

President Southworth of Meadville Theological Seminary tells the story of Unitarian enthusiasm for the ministry in these words: "In 1916 our four hundred and forty-eight churches in the year-book were sending to our schools of theology, Harvard, Meadville and Berkeley, to study for the ministry, two and one third students annually. It seemed, therefore, that it required exactly one hundred and eighty three churches to produce a single recruit for the ministry, or to put the matter in another way, it required a single Unitarian church one hundred and eighty three years to produce a prospective minister. There was a slump in candidates for the ministry after 1916. I suppose the situation is worse now." This year there are 15 students at Meadville, and two Unitarians at Harvard. This shows that the Unitarian students for the ministry have declined fifty per cent since 1916.

Christian Leader Studies Reform in Funeral Customs

Dr. Graham Taylor, in his foreword to a new volume just published by the University of Chicago Press under the title of Funeral Management and Costs, written by Rev. Quincy L. Dowd, says that "this unique investigation is a journey of discovery along the border-line between life and death. It traverses a no-man's-land which almost all of us in America must orient for ourselves, as one by one, or family by family, the living carry the dead across it." The book is a popular presentation of a subject which has been scientifically investigated, and deals frankly with funeral extravagances and cemetery profiteering. Case-studies are given of last-sickness costs, the expense of mourning apparel, and of burial among the poor. Undertaking charges and transportation are discussed at length. The Census Bureau, the author says, estimates that 2,000,000 deaths occur annually in the United States. On the basis of an average expense of $150 for individual funeral and burial, exclusive of graves, tombs, monuments, and last-sickness costs, the total undertaking bill yearly for America would be $136,000,000. Among the chapters of special interest are those on cemetery management, the monument and mausoleum trade, burial in other countries, and the advantages of cremation.

Princeton Man Will Represent Bible Society in Levant

The American Bible Society has chosen Rev. J. Oscar Boyd, D.D., to be its representative in the Levant. He is at the present time pastor of the Church of the Redeemer, of Paterson, N. J. In former years he served on the teaching staff of Princeton Theological Seminary, teaching Old Testament in that institution. He shared the editorial responsibility for the Princeton Theological Review for six years. He is a distinguished publicist and will bring to his work among the Arabic peoples a wide knowledge of their problems.

University of Chicago Continues to Use Great Preachers

The University of Chicago brings to its students the inspiration of the very

Fosdick Defends Industrial Creed

THE recent attacks of the Pittsburgh Employers' Association upon the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America for their industrial program drew forth a vigorous rejoinder from Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick in a sermon at the First Presbyterian Church, New York, on May 8. Preaching upon the subject "Progressive Christianity" he said in part:

"One of the most amazing exhibitions of this same spirit (of opposition to new applications of Christian teaching to social conditions) has recently been given us in a letter published and signed by the Employers' Association of Pittsburgh. It was this same group of gentlemen who, a little while ago, attacked the Young Women's Christian Association because that beneficent organization desires, not simply to assure the young women of America a safe entrance into heaven, but to insure them decent conditions of living on earth before they get into heaven. And now this same group has attacked ferociously the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the organization that effects the cooperation of thirty great evangelical denominations in this country. Listen to this attack:

"The radical and bolshevik elements in the churches seem to be cooperating through the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and many of our members are expressing themselves as determined to discontinue financial support of their respective churches unless they withdraw all moral and financial support from the Federal Council."

There is no use wasting time answering a charge like that. You have in your hands today the "Social Creed of the Churches" of the Federal Council, a cautious statement of some areas in our public life that need a fuller application of the principles of Jesus. Moreover, the president of the Federal Council is Dr. Robert E. Speer, and only a hopelessly hysterical mind can picture bolshevik propaganda going on under his superintendence. But as this attack has been so widely published and so widely commented upon, it is necessary that the Christian pulpit should pay attention to it.

"For one thing, the persons who have launched this attack apparently propose to settle the matter of the social application of the principles of Jesus by money.

'Determined to discontinue financial support' is their proposition. 'We will buy you,' they say to the churches and, in particular, to the ministers of the churches. 'If you will do as we say, money: if not, no money.' May I be permitted to suggest that these gentlemen have somewhat seriously misapprehended the temper of the Christian ministry of America? I am speaking for multitudes of my brethren when I say, 'Before high God, not for sale!' Indeed, I suspect that there has been a crop of sermons on the social question preached throughout this country that would not have been preached if it had not been for this public attack, so that those of us who are interested in having such sermons preached might almost thank these gentlemen for their unintentional assistance. There would have been, I suppose, no Luther if there had been no Tetzels, and if there had been no George the Third, there would have been no George Washington. Action and reaction are generally equal and if anyone wants to make sure that the social teachings of Jesus shall be the centrally absorbing subject of the Christian pulpit in the next year or so, the easiest way is to offer to buy our silence for money.

"Far deeper, however, and more important is this serious matter: No thoughtful man can regard without anxiety the disruptive elements that are abroad in our social life today. That phrase 'social revolution' occurs with alarming frequency and carries with it ominous significance. Said one of our leading orators recently in New York City: 'The day of social evolution has passed and the day of social revolution has arrived.' Well, God pity us if that be so! For 'social revolution' now has a very clear and definite significance. It means that a minority group in the commonwealth, through organization controlling the indispensable necessities of human life, can by concerted action force their will on the majority, break down the fundamental principles and institutions of representative government, by violence seize the power of the state and use it as they will. That thing has already been done in Russia and upon the witness of a man like Bertrand Russell, a communist himself, has been attended by such incidental circumstances as loss of all free speech, all free assembly.

(Concluded on next page)

greatest preachers of the land. In an academic year the widest variety in message and personnel is afforded. The University Preacher at the University of Chicago on May 15 and 22 was Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin, of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York City; and on May 29 Rev. Frederic W. Perkins, of the First Church, Lynn, Massachusetts. Dr. John Kelman, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City, will preach on June 5. The Convocation Preacher on June 12 will be President Clarence A. Barbour, of Rochester Theological Seminary, who was president of the Northern Baptist Convention in 1916-17 and is the author of a number of books.

Young People are Interested in Discussion

One of the most successful young people's organizations in the country is the discussion club of East End Christian church, of Pittsburgh, where Rev. John Ray Ewers is pastor. Every Sunday evening a hundred or more of interested young people take tea together and discuss some topic that is significant to them. Some recent topics are "Baseball and Christianity," "Does Christianity Pay Dividends?," "Will the Church of Christ Regain Its Dominant Power Upon World Affairs That It Held Prior to 1914?" Some one leads the discussion and then the young people give expression to their views.

Seminary Modernizes Its Program

The Newton Theological Institute, a Baptist institution of Massachusetts, has recently taken steps to broaden the character of its work. On the recommendation of its president, Dr. George E. Horr, the trustees voted at a recent meeting to allow women to become students in the institution. This decision was taken in the facing out of a practical situation. The work of religious education is creating a new body of experts in the church, and in many cases women are being called to direct the work of religious education. This leaves the men free for the work of the pulpit, and every denomination has a great lack of candidates for the work of preaching. Only women with baccalaureate degrees will be admitted. The women students will be housed in Sanborn House. Our grandfathers would have been horrified at the idea of women in theological institutions but already a number of seminaries have made provision for the reception of women students.

Church Federation Secretary Helps China

The China famine relief becomes the more urgent in view of the recent cablegram stating that in the province of Chi Li the spring crops are a failure on account of drought and that no relief can be hoped for now until the August crops are harvested. Dr. Howard Agnew Johnson, secretary of the Chicago Church Federation, has taken charge of a campaign in Illinois to sell five million China Famine Relief stamps. He has called to his aid the heads of the various women's missionary organizations.

Great Church Issues Its Reports

One of the strong and resourceful churches of the Disciples, with a nationwide reputation, is Independence Boulevard church of Kansas City. To this church Dr. R. H. Miller came eighteen months ago as pastor. A report was issued recently for the eighteen months. In that period there have been 399 accessions to the church membership, 161 by confession of faith. In two years the Sunday school enrolment has increased by fifty per cent. In the past eighteen months the church has raised for all purposes a total of $125,740.64. In addition to the generous contributions to the various missionary funds, a community House is financed in Kansas City which has a large ministry. This is the congregation of which Mr. R. A. Long, the wealthy lumberman and philanthropist, is a member.

Great Publicist Ends His Public Career

Among those who helped bring in the prohibition amendments, Mr. John G. Wooley is to be counted as one of the most brilliant of the publicists. He went up and down the land with public addresses which are now available in book form, and which have been pronounced by Prof. William Cleaver Wilkinson of the University of Chicago as a significant contribution to American literature. Mr. Wooley is now past seventy and is worn with the arduous duties of his long campaign for public righteousness. He will make a public end to his public career in a testimonial meeting which will be held in Calvary Methodist church, of Pittsburgh, June 5. At that time the Wooley Testimonial Committee will present him with a token of their love and esteem.

General Pershing Addresses the "Y" Men

The former Commander-in-Chief of the American Expeditionary Force, General John J. Pershing addressed the thirty-fourth annual meeting of the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York on May 11. He used very plain words in dealing with the criticisms that were directed against the Y. M. C. A. during the war. In the meeting were a number of the most prominent laymen of the country. General Pershing was the principal guest at the meeting, which was arranged by a committee including A. C. Bedford, Cleveland H. Dodge, D. Hunter McAlpin, Herbert L. Pratt, William Jay Schieffelin, James M. Speers, William Sloane and Alfred E. Marling, who acted as toastmaster. "It was in the World War that we came in closest touch with the organization," said General Pershing. "Your representatives were already in the field when our advance troops reached France. They were ready and anxious to be of every possible service. Supported by your patriotic membership here at home and under the leadership of that able administrator, Mr. Carter, the organization began to expand at once to meet our needs. We all had our hands very full in those trying days. The army had to be organized, and a great general staff had to be built up to handle the multitude of details as to plans of operations, supply and transportation. It was in the midst of these preparations that I called up Mr. Carter and asked the Y. M. C. A. to take charge of the army canteens to follow our troops. He responded promptly and entered upon the work as a duty." Referring to the difficult transportation situation and other obstacles met by the organization, General Pershing said: "All these things were a tremendous handicap, and when its work come to be compared with that of other welfare organizations operating with far less responsibility and covering only special areas, there arose some unjust criticism of which other organizations too ofbly, all free publication, all free representation, all free transportation. Again and again, in Britain, with every great strike, the pendulum swings more dangerously near that fateful hour. But here in America we yet have the best chance left on earth to achieve, as the Social Creed of the Federal Council says, 'by orderly and progressive social reconstruction instead of revolution by violence' the ends we seek. Everybody who really cares for the institutions of America must pray for that. Every responsible organization from the Federation of Labor to the Chambers of Commerce really wants that. My friends, social revolution is too costly a way to get progress. For while it sometimes does mean the demolition of old evils it means the demolition of old gains too, that take long generations to build back again.

FOSDICK DEFENDS INDUSTRIAL CREED

(Continued from previous page)

"Just because this is the case, one looks with fear upon an announcement like this from Pittsburgh, for this letter indicates the surest and swiftest way to land this country in violent social revolution. Repress the endeavor to apply the principles of Jesus to the social order; repress the Young Women's Christian Associations in their interest concerning the life and labor of the young women of America; repress agencies that seek the amelioration of human relations in industry; try to keep the economic situation static in a dynamic world; and when you have long enough repressed the possibilities of orderly social progress you will get the inevitable consequence, disorderly social revolution. You cannot keep anything static in a dynamic world and when we forward looking, liberal Christians pray and work for the application of Jesus' ideals to our social, economic, and international life, we are not disruptive; we are salutary. The application in a thoroughgoing fashion of these social ideals of the Federal Council to American life today would be the best insurance we could have against social revolution."

ten took advantage. But as a matter of fact, this feature of the work of the Y. M. C. A. deserves great praise, and I should like to express here in this presence my deep appreciation of the results obtained. Finally, I wish to express the belief that this association will continue to grow in usefulness to humanity, and will clearly become a universally recognized force in our national life, against which the power of evil may not prevail."

General Assembly Faces Some Solemn Facts

On May 19 a very impressive report on moral conditions was brought in by Rev. Hugh B. McCauley, D.D., of Paterson, N. J., at the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church now in session at Winona Lake. Summarizing the results of a questionnaire addressed to stated clerks throughout the country, the committee finds their replies optimistic in spirit, but pessimistic in facts. "Many home ties were broken by the war. Many drifted away from the church. New standards of behavior are set up. Temptations swarm around the young. The crowds throng the corrupting movies. Foreign propaganda is strong, making us suspicious of our Allies. Divorce is easy and increasing. Crimes of violence are multiplied. The church has her troubles. Even the Lord's Supper reaches only 50 per cent of church members. In many quarters the prayer meeting is neglected, the Sunday evening service is failing, and family worship and even religion fading from the home. But on the other hand there is much to encourage. Patriotism is not dead. Brotherhood is not wanting. Charity is unstinted. Prohibition has improved communities, has increased savings, and kept down crime. Public opinion is awakening and men and women in church and state are calling for progressive legislation, for better enforcement of law, for higher type of men for public office, for moral reforms in society. The addition of women's influence in public life is a tremendous help."

Unitarian Minister Takes Mr. Bryan to Task

William Jennings Bryan is touring the country with a special address in which he speaks in behalf of prohibition enforcement and against Darwinism. This makes a difficult situation for his host of friends, for most of them agree with him about prohibition and disagree with him about evolution. In most of the cities where he goes the ministers are taking pains to explain to their public that the church of today is not engaged in a warfare against the evolutionary hypothesis. In Kansas City recently Rev. L. M. Birkhead, pastor of All Souls Unitarian church, replied to Mr. Bryan on the issue of evolution. He said: "Mr. Bryan criticizes Darwinism and evolution. Modern scholarship has discredited the story of Genesis as a reality. It is no longer possible to believe in the creation of the world in seven days 6,000 years ago. Since the old theory has been discredited we must accept the next most plausible theory, that is evolution. The story of the evolution of the world is recorded for the most part in the record of the rocks. It is not a perfectly complete story, but enough of it is there, as anyone will discover by reading a good book on geology to make the story out. The higher critic is not trying to destroy the Bible; he is simply attempting to find out the truth about the date, the authorship, the mode of composition and the character of the books that make up the Bible. Of course, the higher critics have come to see that the old view of the Bible is now untenable. They have discovered contradictions in the Bible. They have discovered that God has been represented as childish and cruel. For instance, the story of creation in the first two chapters of Genesis is contradictory; in fact, there are two stories, one in the first chapter of Genesis and one in the second chapter of Genesis. In the first story the world was created in seven days, in the second story it was created in one day. In the first story, man was the last work of creation, in the second story he was the first work of creation. In the first story, man and woman were created at the same time; in the second story, man was created first and woman was created as an afterthought. The Bible teaches that the world is flat; that it has four walls about it, with a canopy above. The only place in Christendom where the Bible theory of a flat earth is taught is in Zion City, Ill., where Voliva leads."

Business Men Will Recruit the Ministry

The supply of ministers is a problem that is baffling the authorities in more than one denomination. The Congregationalists need 250 ministers this spring and will graduate 38 from their seminaries. Methodists north and south will need 4,000 men if all appointments are to be met. Not half of this number will be available. The northern Presbyterians will need 380 new men this year and 168 will be graduated from the seminaries. The Episcopalians need 380 and at the present time can find only 170. The Baptists of the south have over three thousand pastorless churches. In the country at large the number of churches without ministers is 33,000. Recent conferences over the question of ministerial supply have resulted in the plan of sending out business men to recruit the ministry instead of having this work done by the ministers themselves.

Organize to Help the Prisoners

The American church is developing a new conscience with regard to the prisoners of the nations, who have long been neglected. The ministers of Atlanta, Ga., organized some time since for Christian work in the federal prison there. More recently the Christian forces at Ft. Leavenworth, Kans., have organized the Prisoners' Welfare Association. The usual forms of aid for prisoners and their families are planned, but one feature is unique. The organization will work for legislation by which the prisoners will be allowed to do useful work and thereby give partial support to their families.

Russian Writer Declares Religion Has Become Victorious

When the Bolsheviks first came into power in Russia they did everything possible to alienate the people from religion. "Religion is the opium of the people" was one of the watchwords. This endeavor is not a success, according to Boris Solokov, writing in a radical daily published in Paris. He summarizes the struggle in these words: "In a bloodless struggle the Orthodox church has defeated Bolshevism. But, having been victorious, it has been transformed itself. It has become more of a church, more

Chicago Disciples Lose Down Town Pastor

THE sudden death of Rev. Austin Hunter removes from the circles of Chicago Disciples the pastor of their largest Chicago church. Mr. Hunter was pastor of the Jackson Boulevard church, located near the corner of Western avenue and Jackson boulevard. While many other churches in this neighborhood have been closed up or have moved away for lack of a constituency, Mr. Hunter kept together for a dozen years a congregation of about eight hundred people. The fluid character of the population of the neighborhood will be indicated by the fact that Mr. Hunter received into the membership of the church more than 1,500 people, and yet the present membership is scarcely larger than when he entered upon his work. He recently led in the raising of a fund for an imposing parish house building and had large plans for the use of this building in education and recreation. Mr. Hunter was a graduate of Ohio Normal University, of Hiram College and of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. He held important pastorates in Cleveland, Indianapolis and Chicago. While in Indiana he was president of the Indiana Christian Missionary Society. In Chicago he was a member of the various church boards, and this year served as president of the Disciples ministerial association. He was popular in fraternal circles and was much in demand for special addresses all over the city. This wide acquaintance put heavy demands upon him for extensive pastoral services. His last public service was to deliver the address of welcome to the incoming dean of the Disciples Divinity House at the banquet held on May 16. Mr. Hunter was found dead in his bed on the morning of May 19. His funeral was held at Jackson Boulevard church on May 22 and on the following day interment was made. Mr. Hunter's spirit was genial and cooperative. His sympathies and outlook were thoroughly modern and his companionable nature endeared him to men of every kind of theological persuasion.

Christian, less canonically orthodox." Even the communists soon came to the place where they preferred to be married in the church. Men on approaching death asked for the ministrations of the priest. It was hardly to be expected that the most religious nation of Europe would become an infidel nation in a day. This miracle has not happened, and probably will not happen.

Presbyterians Face Many Overtures at General Assembly

The various presbyteries of America have sent in their demands to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church now in session at Winona Lake, Indiana. Nine large presbyteries unite in asking for a change in the constitution of the General Assembly. At the present time this body is almost entirely different in personnel each year. The overture asks for a two year term for each commissioner, arranged in such way that at each General Assembly half the commissioners will be experienced men. The reorganization of the boards and agencies is one of the big issues at this session. The fate of the New Era Movement will be determined within the next few days.

Salvation Army Head to Study Unemployment

Commander Evangeline Booth who directs the operations of the Salvation Army in the United States is starting a country-wide tour of the nation to study the problem of unemployment. She spoke in First Baptist church in Boston on May 14. She reports that in spite of the widespread unemployment there is but little distress. This is due to prohibition and the savings accounts of the nation. The high wages that were paid during the war have in many cases resulted in some savings for the rainy day.

Disciples of Chicago Welcome Dean Garrison

The largest social gathering of Chicago Disciples in recent years was the banquet of the Disciples Club of Chicago held at the City Club on the evening of May 16. The large dining room was filled to overflowing to welcome to the city Dr. W. E. Garrison as Dean of the Disciples Divinity House of the University of Chicago. A number of speakers from outside the city contributed to the program. Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, president of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, brought greetings. He spoke on the growing sense of Christian unity in the Christian world and referred to Chicago as "the capital city of our Disciples fellowship." Rev. W. F. Rothenburger, pastor of First Christian Church, Springfield, Ill., was introduced as "head of the cathedral church of Illinois Disciplesdom." He brought a number of practical suggestions for the financing of church work in great cities. Dr. Charles T. Paul, president of the College of Missions of Indianapolis, made a very telling speech on the growth of missionary conscience and administration among the Disciples of Christ, presenting statistics and interpretations showing great progress in recent years. Dr. H. O. Pritchard, secretary of the Disciples Board of Education, spoke on the graduate training of ministers. In interpreting the strategic position of Chicago in national and world life, as well as in relation to the Disciples communion, Dr. Pritchard expressed grave doubt as to the wisdom of the recent locating of denominational headquarters at St. Louis. Rev. Austin Hunter, pastor of Jackson Boulevard Church of Chicago, expressed for Chicago Disciples a hearty welcome to the new dean. Dr. Garrison in responding went into the philology of the word "dean" and found it was simply a shortening of the term "deacon," a servant. He proposed to become in a true sense the servant of the churches in their educational interests in Chicago.

Much Effort Needed Yet in Underwritings Campaign

It has been reported frequently of late that the Underwritings Campaign among the Disciples of Christ has practically closed with success. We are assured, however, from the office of Dr. Cory, who has led in this great enterprise, that the work is by no means concluded, and that strenuous efforts will be required to avert difficulties in closing up the agreements with the banks. According to Dr. Cory's report, up to April first about $72,000 had been secured to apply on the total obligation of $600,000. Since that time cash and pledges have come in to the extent of $133,809. In addition, assurances have been received that the sum of $131,545 will be added to this, making in all $337,304. Of this sum it is thought

The Sword or the Cross

By KIRBY PAGE

A P P R O V E D

Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Pittsburgh:

"The book is nobly conceived and finely written and is in itself a high spiritual achievement."

Professor Rufus M. Jones, Haverford College:

"I have read your book, 'The Sword or the Cross,' with deep appreciation. I feel sure it should have a very helpful mission, and I hope it will have a large circulation. It is very convincing and is written in just the right style to accomplish its purpose. I have no criticism whatever to make of it."

Norman Thomas, Editor The World Tomorrow:

"My immediate reaction is one of unqualified approval."

F. Ernest Johnson, of the Federal Council of Churches:

"Here is a concise putting of Christianity's case against war. The author has done a valuable piece of work."

Price of the book, $1.20 plus 8 cents postage

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago

safe to depend upon $320,000. This leaves $280,000 still to be provided, and makes urgent Dr. Cory's entreaty that no effort be spared to complete the total task of meeting the suggested assignment in every church. The report that the sum needed is in hand or in sight is likely to slacken effort, and make more difficult the work of the campaign.

Western Unitarian Association Meets in Chicago

Unitarianism has an eastern and a western organization, since it is not numerically strong enough to have state organizations in very many states. The Western Unitarian Association met in Lincoln Center, Chicago, May 17. Among the outside visitors was Dr. Samuel Eliot, president of the American Unitarian Association. The local welcome was given by Rev. John Evans, pastor of Lincoln Center. Western Unitarians have been more radical in spirit than the eastern kind, many of them being in doubt whether they should acknowledge themselves as Christians instead of as apostles of free religion. There is a growing tendency, however, to hold that a Unitarian church is a Christian church.

No Profiteering in Bibles

While war profits are still being made in many lines, there has been no profiteering in Bibles. The making of the books costs two and a half times what it did before the war, but the prices have not been advanced by the American Bible Society for it was desirable to keep the books within the reach of the poorest person. As a result large losses have been sustained by the society which are being made up by public subscription.

come in time to Europe unless we in the United States make it possible, not a palliative through alms, but through real international friendship. Organized religion can help by giving leadership and voice to the understanding of our countrymen. Without leadership the ideals of one hundred million people in the richest country of the world must be ineffective. It is the great opportunity—the great responsibility, for religion.

"The world has spent much of its substance in war. The time for payment has come. It was easy to spend in war, but the road uphill—the road back to the plateaus of the civilization, peace and universal daily bread of 1913, that had been reached by endless struggle and martyrdoms—is unspeakably hard.

"A thrill runs through us even today as we remember the coming of the news of the armistice. The wild joy of the news that at last the terrible war was over! If we live to be a hundred we shall never forget the delirious scenes of the day the news arrived. Young and old, big and little, reverent and irreverent, restrained and unrestrained, were caught in the mad whirl of happiness at the thought that at last the horrors of war were over and peace and restoration would quickly come. And it was time. There are limits to human endurance, and those limits had almost been reached. Now the danger was over; so we hailed the news with singing and dancing, with spontaneous processions, thanksgivings and prayers. And we girt ourselves with patience, expecting that 1919 would in-

Christian Forces Demand Disarmament

"WAR is the business of some men who live on carnage and grow fat on blood, and disarmament will put them out of business," declared William Jennings Bryan at the Congress on Reduction of Armaments held in Chicago May 17-19. This meeting was also the sixth annual meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches. Five hundred people from eighteen states spent three days together planning for world peace as some men plan for war. The meetings were held in New England Congregational church, except on the last evening when a mass meeting was held in one of the largest of the city auditoriums, the Medinah Temple. The Chicago Church Federation was host to the gathering. Mr. Bryan has for years been an outstanding advocate of world peace. His lecture, "The Prince of Peace," has been given before thousands. As secretary of state he negotiated arbitration treaties with a great many nations, and these treaties still stand as a guarantee that no sudden action shall be taken to plunge the United States into war with the nations. Among the nations with whom we have arbitration treaties is Japan. Mr. Bryan further said at the meeting at Medinah Temple: "The United States is the only nation, it seems, that cannot get out of the war after the war's over. Although we can go into war by a majority vote of the house and the senate, it takes a two-thirds majority vote of the senate to get us out after the war's over.

"No one in the United States read the newspapers more carefully than I did during the peace conference and I was sorely disappointed when I saw that the treaty was going to be written in the spirit of Nietzsche and Darwin rather than in the spirit of Christ. The statesmen of the world seemed to follow the devil's advice and we had to pay the devil's price in the great war.

"I was willing to accept the treaty with the league, with or without reservations, in order that the United States might 'get in' and change things afterwards, for I believed that our counsel, which is sorely needed by the world today, is worth more to the world than an army.

"There are three classes of people today with regard to the question of disarmament; first, the few who would wait and see what other nations will do with regard to the reduction of armaments; secondly, that very large group who would be willing to take a stand for disarmament provided the other nations would join in with us; and thirdly, that vast group who have faith and belief enough to come out boldly for leadership and would be willing to say to the world, 'We will lead the way alone in disarmament,' and let the world follow our lead."

The Wednesday evening meeting was addressed by Mr. Edward A. Filene of Boston, a director of the International Chamber of Commerce. He brought the testimony of the business man to the discussion. Mr. Filene will go to London next month to sit with the delegates of other nations in the study of the international questions arising in the field of economics. Mr. Filene said: "Besides the business and material reasons, it seems to me there are real ethical and spiritual reasons why we have got to go into Europe and help. We pray, 'Give us this day our daily bread.' Would any of us confine this prayer to bread for Americans alone? And daily bread cannot

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

SWORD OF THE SPIRIT

Which is the Word of God
Complete Help to Personal Work. Convincing Scripture Answers to Excuses. Quick Reference Index. Aid in leading others to Salvation and Guide for the Christian Life. Most recent book on these subjects. Practical, Spiritual, Scriptural, vest pkt. size, 128 pgs., Cloth 25c, Morocco 35c, postp'd; stamps taken Agts. wanted. GEO. W. NOBLE, Monon Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

A Good Business without capital, honorable, true and straight; worthy of investigation. Turn it over and under, inside out, upside down, a clean high class business. I am giving up because of old age. Full instruction $1.

George Welles Moseley, Newburgh, N. Y.

The Bethany Graded Lessons

126 Texts Covering
17 Years of Study

Send for returnable samples

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

MAKE YOUR CHURCH DEVOTIONAL

by putting into your homes the most beautiful book of personal devotion and family worship ever published—

"The Daily Altar"

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

FOR each day of the year a theme, meditation, Scripture, poem and prayer. 400 pages. In two editions: Gift edition, full leather, $2.50. Popular edition, purple cloth, $1.50 (Add 8 cents postage). The beautiful purple cloth edition may be had at $1 per copy in lots of 50. Write for full list of discounts.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

deed be a difficult year—a year of healing of war wounds, a year of gradual recuperation—but that 1920 would see a mighty progress toward restoration of normal conditions. Our disappointment has been tragic."

Rev. Edward Cummings, minister of South Congregational church of Boston, and secretary of the World Peace Foundation, spoke eloquently of the horrors of the next war, provided the nations are so foolish as to let it come. Late discoveries in the field of science will make the battlefield indescribably hideous, and there will be no non-combatants. He said:

"The Chemical Warfare Service of the United States government has discovered a liquid approximately three drops of which, when applied to any part of the skin, will cause a man's death. One plane carrying two tons of the liquid could deposit material enough to kill every man in that area by action of his skin. If men were not protected by gas masks, which would be the case if the attack were made on a city, the fatal area would be several times as great. The only limit to the quantity of the liquid which could be made is the amount of available electric power, as nearly every nation has practically an unlimited supply of the necessary raw materials. It would be entirely possible for this country to manufacture several thousand tons a day, provided the necessary plants had been built. During the Argonne offensive during the last war the entire first American army of a million and a quarter men occupied an area of 40 kilometers long by 20 kilometers wide. If Germany had had 4,000 tons of this material and three hundred planes equipped for its distribution, the entire first army would have been annihilated in two to twelve hours. During the past war, gas produced over 30 per cent of our casualties. In the future, the percentage will be far higher. New methods of defense will be devised to meet this particular new development."

The program presented the cause of disarmament from three distinct angles, that of business, labor and religion. It was shown distinctly by the great representatives of these interests that it was for the interest of all that America should at this time lead the world in a great movement for general disarmament. Among the other eminent persons who spoke on the program were Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, Rev. Arthur J. Brown, Mr. Fred B. Smith, Rev. Charles F. Aked, Mr. Amos P. Wilder, Mr. George Gleason, Mr. Earl S. Parker, Miss Jane Adams, Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, Mr. John Spargo, Rev. William Pierson Merrill, Mr. Edward D. Trowbridge, Mr. Francis H. Taylor, Mr. Joseph P. Chamberlain, Dr. George B. Winton, Rev. Ivan Lee Holt, Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, and Mr. Matthew Woll.

The number of societies devoted to the cause of world peace is already a large one and all of these were invited to participate in the congress. This hospitality to other organizations brought to the Chicago meeting the widest diversity of constituency. A great practical issue of the congress was a call on the churches to observe June 5 as peace Sunday. If the churches respond this will be the first time in human history that Christendom has united on a single day in preaching the gospel of world peace.

Any book now in print can be secured through The Christian Century Press. Give publisher if possible.

"The most important contribution made this year to current discussion on the relations of capital and labor."

CERTIFIED STENOGRAPHIC REPORT of the Greatest Debate in a Decade

Prof. EDWIN R. A. SELIGMAN
Head of the Dept. of Economics
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

versus

Prof. SCOTT NEARING

Rand School of Social Science, Author of
"The American Empire"

Introduction by

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Editor of The Nation

SUBJECT

RESOLVED: That Capitalism has more to offer to the workers of the United States than has Socialism.

Paper Cover, 50c; Cloth, $1.00
(10c extra for mailing)

Illustrated by photographs of debaters.

THE FINE ARTS GUILD, Inc.
Dept. 100 489 Fifth Ave., New York City

FAITH-BUILDING BOOKS

Belief and Life

By Principal W. R. Selbie

Price $1.25

Modern Belief in Immortality

By Newman Smyth

Price 75 Cents

Through Science to Faith

By Newman Smyth

Price $1.75

Belief in God

By Jacob Gould Schurman

Price $1.50

The Christian Hope

By William Adams Brown

Price $1.75

The Religion of a Layman

By Charles R. Brown

Price $1.25

Add 10 cents per book for postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Peake's Commentary on the Bible

An Entirely New Commentary in One Volume

Just published and received with extraordinary enthusiasm as an epoch-making work of marvellous value and indispensable to all intelligent lovers of the Bible, whether lay or clerical.

Edited by ARTHUR S. PEAKE, M.A., D.D.

Rylands Professor of Biblical Exegesis in the University of Manchester.

With the assistance for the New Testament of
A. J. GRIEVE, M.A., D.D.

Principal of Congregational Hall, Edinburgh.

Introduction by

MELANCTHON WOOLSEY STRYKER, D.D., LL.D.

Formerly President of Hamilton College, author of
"English Bible Versions and Origins," etc.

A STAFF OF SIXTY-ONE CONTRIBUTORS

Numerous Special Supplemental Articles.

The Latest Scholarship. Over 1,000 Double-column Pages with Maps, Full Index, Bibliographies, Etc.

"The best work of its kind."—PROFESSOR SANDAY.

"Such a book as this has long been wanted."—Times Literary Supplement

"The very best handy Commentary published."—Methodist Times.

Price $4.00, plus 20 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it. we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage. (Pocket ed., $1.35 plus 8 cts.

The Shorter New Testament (Kent), $1.00 plus 10 cents postage.

The 20th Century New Testament, $2.00 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, $1.50 plus 8 cents postage).

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

Public Opinion and Theology

The Earl Lectures of the Pacific School of Religion

By BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL

Bishop McConnell says that the influence of the congregation itself upon preaching has never been adequately expounded. This is perfectly true. Nor has the whole popular spirit in its influence upon theology been expounded anywhere, so far as we know, with such insight and logical setting forth as in these lectures.—The Biblical World.

Price $1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

A COLUMN OF JUNE BARGAINS

Europe Since 1815

By Charles Downer Hazen, Professor of History in Smith College.

No historical library should be without this work, which presents the most illuminating picture available of the background of the present age, which is the most tremendous in significance in the world's history. From Napoleon's downfall to the Hague Peace Conference.

Regular price, $4.00. Price now, $2.75. (Pst. 20c.)

Man's Supreme Inheritance

By F. Matthias Alexander.

This book offers a convincing and original thesis and is concerned with all the problems of life, of evolution, with the shortcomings of civilization as indicated by the crisis of 1914, and the fundamentals of a new and advancing civilization. John Dewey writes an appreciative introductory word.

Regular Price, $2.50. Price now, $1.50. (Pst. 15c.)

Fairhope

By Edgar DeWitt Jones.

Anyone who is interested in the rural church or in interesting characters delightfully pictured should have this book, which is the finest work of real literature yet given to the public by Dr. Jones. There is more wisdom in this story than in many tomes of theory on the real church. Its charm is as pronounced as that of "The Bonnie Brier Bush."

Regular price, $1.50. Price now, $1.00. (Pst. 12c.)

On to Christ

By Edwin A. McAlpin, President of the College Board of the Presbyterian Church.

Dr. Alpin lays emphasis on the great future before the church. The book is a ringing call to Christian forces everywhere to unite in the common bonds of the faith in a concerted march toward that larger sphere of usefulness which surely awaits a united Christendom.

Regular price, $1.25. Price now, 75c. (Pst. 12c.)

History of the Disciples of Christ

By W. T. Moore.

An original and picturesque treatment of the great movement toward Christian unity inaugurated by the Campbells something over a hundred years ago. Dr. Moore is the only man living who could tell this story from first hand acquaintance with the leaders of the past sixty-five years of the movement. This is a volume of unlimited value simply as an original historical document. The portraits and historical illustrations are well worth the price of the book.

Regular price, $4.00. Price now, $2.00. (Pst. 20c.)

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union

By Charles A. Young.

Containing the great documents upon which the modern movement of the Disciples of Christ is based. Includes among other documents the Declaration and Address and the Sermon on the Law.

Regular price, $1.50. Price now, $1.00. (Pst. 12c.)

Only a few copies of each to be sold at reduced price.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn St. Chicago, Ill.

Many Churches are Proving the Value of The Christian Service Flag

This flag is proving its value in many churches and ought to find place in every progressive church, because

1. It stimulates the recruiting spirit in the church.
2. It is a constant reminder to every member that membership is enlistment for service.
3. It emphasizes and dignifies the allegiance which the new member declares when he joins the church.

We have received enthusiastic letters from pastors who are using it. We quote two recently received.

WESTCHESTER CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

WILLIAM DANA GIBSON, Pastor

Office of the Church,
21 Ridgeview Ave., White Plains, N. Y.

Nov. 3, 1920

The Pilgrim Press,
14 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.

GENTLEMEN:

Please send me an all wool bunting Christian Service Flag, 4 x 6. I should appreciate having this by return mail—special delivery.

The flag we have used for the past year and to which we have added over 180 stars in the year, is such a very fine object lesson that we want to keep it and start a new one for this season.

Please also send 50 white stars, of these 25 will be put on at our November Communion. We feel the Service Flag has been of great help in our work of Christian enlistment. (We usually call it our "Christian Enlistment Flag.")

Very truly yours,

(MISS GWEN L. VINING, Sec'y.

THE UNITED CHURCH (Congregational)

REV. WILLIAM HORACE DAY, D. D., Pastor

December 29, 1920.

The Pilgrim Press,
14 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.

We have been using a Christian Service Flag, 4' by 6' in size, and have found it exceedingly valuable as a means of securing attention and stimulating team work for our autumn membership recruiting, and we expect to use it in the same way during the Lenten season, but it is a little too small. What would a similar flag cost, 6' x 8' in size, of a heavier quality bunting?

Yours very sincerely,

WILLIAM HORACE DAY.

Descriptive circular on request

THE PILGRIM PRESS

14 Beacon Street, Boston

19 W. Jackson Street, Chicago

How I Improved My Memory In One Evening

The Amazing Experience of Victor Jones

"Of course I place you! Mr. Addison Sims of Seattle.

"If I remember correctly—and I do remember correctly—Mr. Burroughs, the Lumberman, introduced me to you at the luncheon of the Seattle Rotary Club three years ago in May. This is a pleasure indeed! I haven't laid eyes on you since that day. How is the grain business? And how did that amalgamation work out?"

The assurance of this speaker—in the crowded corridor of the Hotel McAlpin—compelled me to turn and look at him, though I must say it is not my usual habit to "listen in" even in a hotel lobby.

"He is David M. Roth, one of the most famous memory experts in the United States," said my friend Kennedy, answering my question before I could get it out. "He will show you a lot more wonderful things than that before the evening is over.

And he did.

As we went into the banquet room the hostmaster was introducing a long line of the guests to Mr. Roth. I got in line, and when it came my turn Mr. Roth asked, "What are your initials, Mr. Jones, and your business connection and telephone number?" Why he asked this I learned later, when he picked out from the crowd the sixty men he had met two hours before, and called each by name without a mistake. What is more, he named each man's business and telephone number, for good measure.

I won't tell you all the other amazing things the man did, except to tell how he called back, without a minute's hesitation, long lists of numbers, bank clearings, prices, lot numbers, parcel-post rates, and anything else the guests gave him in rapid order.

* * * * *

When I met Mr. Roth again—which you may be sure I did the first chance I got—he rather bowled me over by saying, in his quiet, modest way:

"There is nothing miraculous about my remembering anything I want to remember, whether it be names, faces, figures, facts, or something I have read in a magazine.

"You can do this just as easily as I do. Any one with an average mind can learn quickly to do exactly the same things which seem so miraculous when I do them."

"My own memory," continued Mr. Roth, "was originally very faulty. Yes, it was a really poor memory. On meeting a man I would lose his name in thirty seconds, while now there are thousands of men and women in the United States, many of whom I have met but once, whose names I can call in a meeting them."

"That is all right for you, Mr. Roth," I interrupted, "you have given years to it. But how about me?"

"Mr. Jones," he replied, "I can teach you the secret of a good memory in one evening.

This is not a guess, because I have done it with thousands of pupils. In the first of seven simple lessons which I have prepared for home study I show you the basic principle of my whole system, and you will find it—not hard work as you might fear—but just like playing a fascinating game. I will prove it to you."

"Of Course I Place You! Mr. Addison Sims of Seattle."

He didn't have to prove it. His course did; I got it the very next day from his publishers, the Independent Corporation.

When I tackled the first lesson, I suppose I was the most surprised man in forty-eight states to find that I had learned—in about one hour—how to remember a list of one hundred words so that I could call them off forward and back without a single mistake.

The first lesson stuck. And so did the other six.

Read this letter from Terrence J. McManus, of the firm of Olcott, Bonynge, McManus & Ernst, Attorneys and Counsellors at Law, 170 Broadway, and one of the most famous trial lawyers in New York:

"May I take occasion to state that I regard your service in giving this system to the world as a public benefaction? The wonderful simplicity of the method and the ease with which its principles may be acquired especially appeal to me. I may add that I have already had occasion to test the attractiveness of the first two lessons in the preparation for trial of an important action in which I am about to engage."

Mr. McManus didn't put it a bit too strong. The Roth Course is priceless! I can absolutely count on my memory now. I can call the name of most any man I have met before—and I am getting better all the time. I can remember any figures I wish to remember. Telephone numbers come to my mind instantly, once I have filed them by Mr. Roth's easy method. Street addresses are just as easy.

The old fear of forgetting (you know what that is) has vanished. I used to be "scared stiff" on my feet—because I wasn't sure. I couldn't remember what I wanted to say.

Now I am sure of myself, and confident, and "easy as an old shoe" when I get on my feet at the club, or at a banquet, or in a business meeting, or in any social gathering.

Perhaps the most enjoyable part of it all is that I have become a good conversationalist—and I used to be as silent as a sphinx when I got into a crowd of people who knew things.

Now I can call up nearly any fact I want when I need it most. I used to think a "hair trigger" memory belonged only to the prodigy and genius. Now I see that every man of us has that kind of a memory, if he only knows how to make it work right.

I tell you it is a wonderful thing, after groping around in the dark for so many years, to be able to switch the big searchlight on your mind and see most everything you want to remember.

The Roth Course will do wonders in your office.

Since we took it up you never hear anyone in our office say, "I guess" or "I think it was about so much" or "I forget that right now" or "I can't remember" or "I must look up his name." Now they are right there with the answer.

Have you heard of "Multigraph" Smith? Real name H. Q. Smith, of John E. Price & Co., Seattle, Wash. Here is just a bit from a letter of his that I saw last week:

"Here is the whole thing in a nutshell: Mr. Roth has a most remarkable Memory Course. It is simple and easy. Yet with one hour a day of practice, any one—I don't care who he is—can improve his memory."

My advice to you is, don't wait another minute. Send to Independent Corporation for Mr. Roth's amazing course and see what a wonderful memory you have got. Your dividends in increased power will be enormous.

VICTOR JONES.

SEND NO MONEY

So confident is the Independent Corporation, the publishers of the Roth Memory Course, that you will find the course indispensable that they are willing to send it on free examination.

Don't send any money. Merely mail the coupon or write a letter and the complete course will be sent, all charges prepaid, at once, so that you may take advantage of the special price and save $2. If you are not entirely satisfied, send it back any time within five days after you receive it and you will owe nothing.

On the other hand, if you are as pleased as are the thousands of other men and women who have used the course, send only $3 in full payment. You take no risk and you have everything to gain, so mail this coupon now before this remarkable offer is withdrawn.

INDEPENDENT CORPORATION
Dept. R, 319 Sixth Avenue, New York

FREE EXAMINATION COUPON

Independent Corporation,
Dept. R, 319 Sixth Ave., New York.

Gentlemen:—Please mail me The Roth Memory Course for five days' free trial. If I decide to keep it, I will remit $3, the Special Nation Wide Drive Price. Otherwise I will return it to you. It is understood that the coupon puts me under no obligations whatsoever.

Name

Address

.....Christian Century, 5-26

DURING NATION WIDE DRIVE

SPECIAL PRICE $3

(REGULAR PRICE $5.00)

Realizing the ever-increasing need for such a system as Mr. Roth's Memory Course, for a short time we are making a special drive to get this amazing work in the hands of a still greater number of people. In order to hasten the movement we are reducing the price from $5 to only $3.

You should not miss this splendid opportunity. Our five-day FREE trial offer still holds good,—simply fill in and clip coupon. Then, after you have seen the Course, send only $3 in complete payment.

But you must act quickly—we can only hold this price open for a limited time.

Four Great Books for Thinking People

Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City, on being asked what are the outstanding books of the day for alert churchmen and churchwomen, submits four titles. He considers these essential books:

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1860. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 So. Dearborn St., Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

Can We Keep the Church
Christian?

By William Adams Brown

Is Prohibition Here
to Stay?

By Alva W. Taylor

New Books by Eminent English Preachers

THE PROPHET OF RECONSTRUCTION

(EZEKIEL)

By W. F. LOFTHOUSE, M.A.

Cloth, $2.25. Postage 10 cents.

Today reconstruction is on everybody's lips, and Professor Lofthouse's study of Ezekiel brings home to us how in unexpected and remarkable ways this prophet speaks to our needs today. The Book of Ezekiel, which has seemed obscure, unintelligible, uninteresting to many readers, becomes full of point and vivid interest to those who follow this brilliant exposition and interpretation.

DISCERNING THE TIMES

By JOHN A. HUTTON, D.D.

Cloth, $3.00. Postage 10 cents.

One distinction of Dr. Hutton is that he is never commonplace. In any new book of his there is always something fresh, illuminating, inspiring. Flashes of rare insight into spiritual experience, the opening up of unexpected aspects of some familiar truth, the exploration of hidden pathways of the life of the spirit make the reading of this volume of essays at once a refreshment, a religious tonic and in the best sense a delight.

THE GALILEAN

THE PERMANENT ELEMENT IN RELIGION

By NATHANIEL MICKLEM, M.A.

Cloth, $1.75. Postage 10 cents.

The writer both surprises and delights us by the freshness and unconventionality, and yet at the same time the convincing truth of his interpretation of the spirit and truth of religion as revealed in Jesus Christ.

THE HIDDEN ROMANCE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

By JAMES ALEX. ROBERTSON, M.A.

Cloth, $2.25. Postage 10 cents.

Professor Robertson's former book, "The Spiritual Pilgrimage of Jesus," won him at once widespread recognition as one of our foremost writers on the Christian faith. The imaginative insight that gave so great a charm and value to that book has now found scope in revealing unsuspected romance in the pages of the New Testament. Reading between the lines, his imagination plays upon familiar and often prosaic passages and incidental allusions, and suddenly they become rich in interest and throw a new light on most important matters. Full of challenging suggestions and most illuminating interpretations.

Books Relating to Child Life

The Cradle Roll of the Church School

LUCY STOCK CHAPIN. $1.25.

Object Lessons for the Cradle Roll

FRANCES WELD DANIELSON. $1.50.

Lessons for Teachers of Beginners

FRANCES WELD DANIELSON. $1.00.

Childhood and Character

HUGH HARTSHORNE. $2.00.

Songs for Little People

FRANCES WELD DANIELSON and GRACE WILBUR CONANT. $1.25.

The Use of Motives in Teaching Religious Morals

T. W. GALLOWAY. $1.25.

The Boy Problem in the Home

WILLIAM BYRON FORBUSH. $1.75.

The Boy Problem

WILLIAM BYRON FORBUSH. $1.00.

A Parent's Job

C. N. MILLARD. $1.00.

Mayflower Program Book

JEANETTE ELOISE PERKINS and FRAN-
CES WELD DANIELSON. Cloth. $2.00.

Child Nature and Child Nurture

EDWARD P. ST. JOHN. $.85.

Training the Devotional Life

LUTHER A. WEIGLE and
HENRY H. TWEEDY. Boards, $.75.

14 BEACON ST.
BOSTON

THE PILGRIM PRESS

19 W. JACKSON ST.
CHICAGO

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, JUNE 2, 1921

Number 22

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly

By the Disciples Publication Society

508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

The Price of Peace in the Churches

THE fellowship of a number of evangelical bodies has been greatly disturbed in recent years by the clamor of a reactionary minority. With the threat of division this minority has frightened the leaders, and secured sometimes rather astonishing results. Disciples conventions for ten years past have been subject to periodic assaults. The Baptists, it appears, must face the "fundamentalists" again at Des Moines this month. The denominations with more ecclesiastical machinery have known better what to do with these noisy diverters of progress. The "fundamentalists" went to the Presbyterian General Assembly at Winona Lake like roaring lions. They have gone back home again entirely docile. In the more highly organized bodies there is a much larger lay participation. The General Assembly is made up of ministers and laymen in equal numbers, while a Disciples convention is made up chiefly of preachers and women. The latter usually leave when there is a scrimmage, and there is no lay arbiter for the combat that follows. Business men are not wiser in religious affairs than are ministers. Yet they are more likely to be not only fair but sound in judging a debate. It is this great jury in Methodism and Presbyterianism which swings decisions, and prevents ministerial radicalism from running riot. The churches are not likely to come to doctrinal agreement in many a day. The Presbyterians had their heresy trials in an earlier generation. They know just how expensive a luxury a heresy trial is. The heresy-hunter at General Assembly finds himself a most unpopular individual in recent years. Some of the other denominations will have to pay the price the Presbyterians did before they learn. Our mothers used to tell us, "Experience is a dear school, but fools will have no other."

Peace in the churches must at last rest upon tolerance grounded in love. So long as our religion is all a matter of the head, and not much of a heart at that, we shall hate each other. When we take Jesus at his word we shall all love each other as seekers after truth and righteousness, even though we be mistaken seekers.

The Church Accepts the Challenge

PITTSBURGH employers have not only been able to defeat the Y. W. C. A. financial campaign in Pittsburgh and boast about it, but they are also making considerable inroads into the finances of the Federal Council. It is evident that the church will either have to fight or run. Should it ever come to the ears of the big world that a group of factory barons were able to dictate the utterances of the church official bodies upon the subject of industry and social life, the influence of the church would not be worth a cancelled postage stamp for a generation afterwards. For a long time the working people have believed that the church was a "capitalistic" institution. The present persecution of religious organizations by the belated element in industrial leadership is the answer to this charge. Meanwhile with the business men of Pittsburgh withdrawing their financial support, better informed business men in other cities will need to double up on their pledges to the Federal Council activities. The church is not capitalistic nor bolshevistic. It is trying to preach justice to all and favoritism to no single social class. The broader-minded business men know that this is the only road to industrial peace. Meanwhile the church having begun to pay the penalty of her position should cease to hide her light under the bushel. We have no need for further resolutions. Let the church take her present testimony which has been uttered timidly in committee rooms and ecclesiastical conventions and utter it on the housetops. Behind the social program of the churches should be placed the resources of trained publicists who will make effective a testimony which is needed by the entire Christian world.

Bigger Churches and Better Ones

STATISTICS of the various denominations tell a uniform story. We are to have bigger churches and better ones. While church membership continues to increase in most of the denominations, the number of churches tends to decrease. Many churches are perishing from local competition, and home missionary societies are less ready to come to the rescue of institutions that are not needed than they once were. The formation of hundreds of federated churches over the country also limits the number of worshipping congregations. How big should a church be? On this point there is a wide variety of answers. Some of the ultra modernists would assert that every church should be big enough to employ a staff of leaders for the various departments. Others would assert that we should have as many churches as possible, limited only by the ability of the worshipping groups to maintain a pastor and an organization without undue economic strain. The latter point of view holds that religion must have the variety that comes from small group organization, and that a church needs the greater intimacy of fellowship which the smaller congregation affords. Whatever be the solution of the problem in its academic form, no one is interested in seeing Polo, Ill., continue with eight churches in a population of fifteen hundred people. There is a country cross-roads in Illinois where there is one grocery store and three weather-stained church buildings, none of which ever had a corporal's guard at worship. Here we have denominationalism run mad and becoming at last suicidal. If the number of churches in America were reduced until every one remaining could have a located minister of reasonable ability, we should probably have more religion and better by reason of such a sacrifice of some thousands of churches. The evolution of the church is in that direction. The pastorless congregation will not survive under present conditions in American life.

Shall the Church Educate Her Leaders?

DR. E. P. HILL, speaking before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church at Winona Lake, declared that the Board of Foreign Missions needed every graduate of the Presbyterian institutions this year. That would mean that the work of the church at home would have to be done by men trained elsewhere than in church institutions. So far as that means state university graduates, there is not much to complain of. This kind of man may not know as much of the church as he might, but he is broad-minded enough to learn and does learn. The chief danger is the influx of short course graduates from the hot-house institutions that can make of a high school graduate a minister in one year. The denominations have been so driven for men in recent years that large numbers of these under-trained men have found places in the ministry. The Presbyterians are saved from the worst of this by their traditions as well as their polity. The Disciples have no standards for ministerial equipment. If a congregation calls a man to be its minister, that is sufficient to enter him in the year book. The Methodists have very low standards, only recently insisting that ministers be high school graduates. Standards among the Baptists are notoriously low. The highest standards are those of the Lutherans and the Episcopalians. The coming of the half-trained man into the ministry has meant a resurgence of conservatism in every denomination where he has come. He makes naive assumptions about the nature of revelation. He has memorized a pet system of dogma which is the beginning and the end of the truth for him. The church will have an increasing body of ills until she takes her men from theological institutions that competently train a ministry. These may well be the great union institutions attached to universities, or they may be equally scholarly institutions supported directly by denominations. In any case the educational standard must be raised to meet that of the communities in which religious workers carry on their activities.

Women Consider Women's Dress

THE Catholic women of Quebec, through their Christian Woman's League, have asked Protestant women to join them in action against the extremes of modern feminine dress. Ten thousand women in the province of Quebec have already joined. A like movement has also been inaugurated by Episcopalian women in New York. The Quebec ladies declare for no rigorous standards but for the elimination of the extreme that suggests indecency. They ask for modest garments in the church, not high collars but no low cut gowns, for skirts on the street of at least medium length, the taboo for gauze materials that expose the person, and for the avoidance of all suggestive exaggerations. The Episcopal women, laying the current extreme tendency to post-war morals, deplore the "habits of our women, young and old, as shown in insidious conversation, profane language, indecent dress, excessive drinking, gambling and a general indifference to reasonable safeguards of proper conduct." They declare that they will not shift the blame, for "as women we are all in a measure to blame, either through indifference, ignorance or a silent acquiescence." They see "no virtue in prudery" and believe the way to dispose of insidious evil is to counteract it with "whatsoever is true, honest, just, pure, lovely and of good report." They call on Christian women everywhere to join them in the formation of committees in every community to arrange (a) plans to arouse parents to the necessity for strengthening and safeguarding the ideals of American homes by maintaining Christian standards of life and training for the children of this generation. (b) For meetings with mothers and other thinking women for the consideration of the things which are tolerated today in society, with a view to eliminating the obnoxious features, such as indecent dress, the painting of faces, excessive drinking, improper dancing, joy-riding, vulgar conversation, swearing, etc. (c) For meetings with girls where the influence and conduct of women may be discussed in a sympathetic and intelligent manner. (d) For presentation of the evils of vulgar and suggestive moving pictures, promiscuous dance halls, immoral plays and literature, either in book or magazine form—for the purpose of forming sufficient public opinion to guard against these things, and to provide wholesome and attractive recreation and amusement. (e) For the formation of influential groups of women and girls in every community who refuse to sanction those things, which, according to Christian teaching, lower the standards of life and thought. Finally, we recommend that wherever there are organizations already considering this matter, the above committees act as far as possible in cooperation with them."

The New Volstead Bill

THE new Volstead bill for the tightening of law enforcement under the eighteenth amendment is working its way through committee and up toward a vote in the house of representatives. Wayne B. Wheeler, attorney for the Anti-Saloon League, presented the essential arguments for the bill. He cited the declarations of physicians against beer as a medicine and of the dietitians against it as a food, declaring the brewers themselves were advertising that their near-beer possessed all of beer's food values and other so-called virtues. He asked for the suspension of the importation of liquor and of its manufacture until the forty million gallons of whisky on hand is exhausted, citing the fact that there was more whisky in the bonded warehouses today than one year ago. He advocated the removal of all privileges to use brandies or any other intoxicant except alcohol for the making of patent or proprietary medicines. The amendment applies to the Philippine Islands, but there is no court jurisdiction to enforce it there. He argued that it was inconsistent to allow the Filipinos to live under a non-enforcible fundamental law and asked for proper means of applying prohibition there. Ex-Attorney General Palmer ruled that an application for a permit, if made legally, must be granted. There have been 75,000 permits issued and 11,000 revoked or refused renewal. Many localities have more than is needed and that, with the continued manufacture, makes law enforcement difficult. He argued that the Department of Justice should be given concurrent power to revoke permits as a means of reducing their number. He believes the new bill will make the Volstead law a strong prohibitory measure and he expresses his confident conviction that congress would pass it.

Georgia's Brave Governor

THE Christian world hardly knows what it owes to the brave governor of the state of Georgia. He has made investigation of the treatment of Negroes in his state, and found the story abominable. Without waiting for any outside interference, he has set to work to clean house. He is able for his task. As a preacher of civic righteousness he has declared "we stand indicted as a people before the world." He says that unless conditions change "God and man would justly condemn Georgia more severely than Belgium and Leopold were condemned for the Congo atrocities." Making a study of 135 cases of lawlessness practiced against Negroes, he found that in only two of these cases was the traditional offense of the Negro against the white race even alleged. In all other cases it was purely a matter of race prejudice working its evil will. Four characteristic offenses are to be charged against that section of the white race in Georgia which practices lawlessness against the Negro. These are lynching, peonage, driving Negroes out by organized lawlessness and individual acts of cruelty. The governor has made an appeal to the Christian pulpit within the state to rebuke this unrighteousness. He rightly feels that the law unsupported by the public conscience is powerless to remedy the evils that have fouled the fair name of Georgia. He also advocates compulsory education for both races. Ignorance among the Negroes gives oppression its opportunity. Among the whites ignorance makes cruelty possible. Certain legal reforms are likely to come quickly as a result of the charge that peonage is being practiced. Peonage can be stopped by changing the laws relating to debt. The governor shrewdly proposes that a county which permits a lynching shall pay a money penalty. When the taxpayers have to support a fatherless family, they will perhaps pause in the joyous lynching bee to think things over.

Community Education in Religion

IN a number of cities over the country the religious forces of the community have organized week-day instruction in religion. This has been done because of an overmastering conviction that the work of planting Christian morality in the hearts of the young is not now adequately accomplished by the meager instruction given in the Protestant Sunday schools. The week-day instruction has been given by teachers of approved pedagogical standing. This at once sets up unfavorable comparisons with the Sunday school. In the latter the teaching is done by anyone who happens to be interested. If the children get all of their training in a community school of religion, will they grow up in sympathy with the church? Must we not educate them in church loyalty in some sense, if religion is to be propagated in the future? But as soon as one talks of church loyalty, it begins to narrow down to denominational loyalty. The week-day instruction is opposed by the sectarian preacher because it does not "teach all of the truth." Though a broad foundation is laid in interpreting the idea of God, in inculcating the ideals of Christian morality and in giving some literary appreciation of the Bible, the sectarian is never satisfied until his little "ism" is given emphasis in the instruction. Those who have had experience testify that there are some positive gains resulting from the effort of a whole community to teach religion. Some of them were hardly anticipated when the work was begun. There are parents who never send their children to Sunday school who will send them to the community school of religion. These parents want religion for their children without the sectarian brand. They want teaching that is pedagogically adequate. They want to escape from the fear-thoughts that used to be implanted by the older orthodoxy, such as hell-fire and the idea of a personal devil. A community program of education on broad lines wins them. The task is still in its experimental stages. The successes and the failures must be impartially observed with scientific spirit. Some day we will have an adequate program of religious education, for the nation cannot live without it.

Greenville, S. C.

This letter represents a weak, struggling band of loyal Disciples who have great hopes of erecting a house of worship in Greenville, and by the grace of God, with the help of the other churches in the brotherhood and the aid of individuals, we are going to do it. A short time ago seven of us met at the local Y. M. C. A. to effect an organization. Since that time our membership has grown to twenty-seven and, thank God, they are live ones. None of them possesses an abundance of this world's goods, but they are immensely rich in faith and enthusiasm, willing workers and true to the cause of Jesus Christ. We are now worshipping in rented quarters. . . . One of our members has donated a building lot and we are anxious to erect thereon a building that will be in keeping with the other churches here. It is our desire to secure a liberal contribution from every church and individual and you may rest assured that not one penny of any donation will be used for any other purpose.

Greenville is located in the northwestern part of South Carolina, at the foothills of the Blue Ridge mountains. While its population is only 48,127, still it is the recognized religious and educational center of this great commonwealth.

Besides the five colleges here, there are fifty-two churches, including practically all denominations, but there is not a Christian church among them, yet we have a population of 80 per cent white and less than 1 per cent foreign. . . .

Extracts from a form letter received by the editor.

ACCOMPANIED by a blank check ready to be filled in and signed, the above letter was recently received at the office of The Christian Century with the request that the appeal contained in it might be given publicity in our columns. The unquestionable sincerity of the authors of the communication make it difficult to reply as, according to our conviction, it is our duty to do. In all gentleness, however, we are impelled to state three reasons why we can neither sign the blank check nor favorably commend the well-disposed project to our readers.

In the first place, it has long since become a conviction with informed churchmen that appeals of this sort should be made through the denominational home missionary society organized for the purpose, and not directly to the remote public which is in no position to get at the merits of the enterprise. Whether the church asking help deserves such help or not is a question for the settlement of which each denomination has provided a board or society with officers in whose judgment the churches have confidence. The fact that the present appeal bears no sign of approval by such a missionary organization arouses doubt as to its validity. But if it did carry an authentic seal of approval, and we were moved to contribute to it, we would prefer to send our gift to the appropriate missionary society instead of to the local group with whose personnel we have no acquaintance.

In the second place we are compelled to ask whether the little group of twenty-seven "live ones" made anything corresponding to a survey or analysis of the religious situation in Greenville, S. C., before launching their own denominational undertaking. The letter says there are fifty-two churches already in the city, which has a population of 48,127. Have these churches confessed their need of reinforcements in the form of additional churches? Is there a federal organization of these congregations, or even a ministers' alliance, which, having made a study of the religious needs of the town, now calls upon the group of twenty-seven "live ones" to create the fifty-third church and help their inadequate forces to "take the town for Christ"? There is no hint in the above letter that any such study of the actual needs of the community has been made. If it had been made and the present church building project were based upon it, some statement of the facts developed by the study would surely have crept into the letter, because such facts would be more appealing and decisive than any other consideration that might be mentioned.

The probability is very strong that the entire body of Christian judgment in Greenville, S. C., is unfavorable to the establishment of the church now asking aid. This judgment no doubt derives from mixed motives. There is an element of sectarian prejudice in it perhaps, an antagonism toward the particular denomination which the twenty-seven "live ones" represent. But there is also, and predominantly, a certain awareness—partly conscious and partly subconscious—of weakness and waste and scandal involved in the fact that Greenville's Christianity is already divided up into fifty-two churches, representing—shall we hazard a guess?—twenty-five, if not more, denominations. Is there a single field in Greenville which is not already overchurched? If there is such a field, is it the purpose of the twenty-seven to establish their new church in that field? Is the lot which one of their number has already given located in the unchurched area?

The time has come when a considerable body of Christian people in all communions believe that in the matter of establishing a new church organization in any community there is only one consideration that is basic and valid, namely, the consideration of the community's actual religious needs. The Christian Century shares this belief. We hold that it is now a violation of the will of Christ to establish a denominational church in any community where denominational churches are already overlapping and sapping the vitality of one another. The denominational impulse for self-extension has come to be not only an impertinent but a sinister force in modern Christianity. How blind and ruthless that denominational impulse is, how lacking in sensitiveness to the finer things of the Christian spirit, is indicated by the earnest and self-sacrificing purpose of these twenty-seven good men and women—no doubt the best people in the world—to further complicate and weaken the Christian forces of Greenville, S. C., by establishing another competitive church organization in the community. On the other hand, we are disposed to interpret the absence in the letter of any word of approval by any of the denominational boards as an indication that a community of 48,127 people and fifty-two churches is not considered a proper place for such a board to invest the funds entrusted to it. If this inference is correct there is ground for encouragement.

The third reason why we cannot regard the present appeal favorably, even though it might have the approval of a denominational board, and even though a survey might show that there existed an area in Greenville, S. C., which was not adequately churched by its fifty-two organizations, is that we strongly suspect that the proposed church will stand for a type of Christianity which seems to us unfraternal, bigoted and essentially un-Christian. The mere fact that the twenty-seven are unable to find in the now existing fifty-two churches of the town a satisfying and inspiring fellowship and are therefore impelled to form a church of their own is in itself an indication that they are possessed by such intense denominational convictions that their church will be narrowly sectarian, uncooperative, intolerant and tending to set denominational dogmas and customs ahead of the weightier matters of the kingdom of God. In all candor, we have not the slightest interest in aiding in the establishment of another church of this sort. We are emboldened to speak the more confidently on this point even though we are totally unacquainted with the personnel or circumstances of the Greenville, S. C., situation, because of a statement contained in the last paragraph of the letter quoted above. It is as revealing as it is shocking. "— there are fifty-two churches, including practically all denominations, but there is not a Christian church among them."

Here is a well-written letter, dated in the twenty-first year of the twentieth century, originating not in a backwoods village but in a city containing five colleges, fifty-two churches and 48,127 inhabitants. It is evidently not conceived in mere ignorance or intellectual provincialism. Yet it asks money with which to establish a church which, when established, will be the only Christian church in the city! We have not a single dollar nor a single word of approving publicity to give to such a belated and un-Christian project. Are not the Presbyterian churches of Greenville, S. C., Christian churches, just as truly Christian churches as this proposed "First Christian church" will be? Are not the Methodist churches and the Baptist churches and the Episcopalian churches and the churches of many other names just as truly Christian churches as this projected only Christian church in that city will be? The Christian Century joyously holds that they are. There is so much Christianity in the most sectarian of them, and so much sectarianism in the most Christian of them, that it ill becomes any of them to claim superiority over the rest of them.

There is one type of home mission work in Greenville, S. C., and in ten thousand other cities of our land, to which we would enthusiastically give our support. If there were so many as twenty-seven "live ones" in that city who clearly discerned that the religious life of Greenville, S. C., was already cursed with too many churches, all of them responsible not to the community nor even to one another, but to irrelevant overhead organizations called denominations existing outside of the community and having no particular interest in the community save as the community lends itself to their exploitation—if there were twenty-seven Christian spirits who would band together to set up a pulpit or platform from which a prophet of God could tell the Christian people of Greenville, S. C., what ailed them and persuade them to shake off the impertinent control of their religious life by unmeaning sectarian organizations, reducing the number of their local churches from fifty-two to perhaps fifteen, we would gladly give such support as we could to their heroic pioneering efforts.

The Kid Finger

A Parable of Safed the Sage

MY little Grandson pinched his finger in the door, so that the Nail was Bruised, and came off. And there came a time when it was Hanging at one end but loose at the other. And his mother called me upon the telephone, and said, I desire to slip the Finger of a Glove upon it that it may be protected, but he feareth that it will hurt him, and he saith, Nay, but let Grandpa do it.

And I said, Bring him hither.

And I took him upon my knee, and said, First we will clip a part of the old Nail away.

And he said, Nay, for it will hurt.

And I said, Let us watch and see how far the pieces of Nail do fly.

And we watched, and it did not hurt.

But it was not easy to slip the Finger of the Kid Glove upon the Finger of the hand, for the Nail still hung and was tender. And his mother slipped it on by littles, while I sang unto him. And this is the song that I sang:

Oh, a little Kid Finger on the Finger of the Kid,
Will protect the little Finger and will keep the Finger hid;
It will heal the little Finger just the best was ever did;
Oh, the little Kid Finger on the Finger of the Kid!

Now if it be objected that this is not Great Poetry, I answer that it falleth into the category of Occasional Verse, like Coronation Odes, and it is, as I judge, quite as good Poetry as Alfred, Lord Tennyson, wrote for the Jubilee of Queen Victoria, and somewhat better suited to the occasion that produced it. For the little lad sang with me about the Little Kid Finger on the Finger of the Kid, and before he knew it the Kid Finger was on tight.

And if any one would know what Tune this poetry was sung to, it was the Classick melody of the Turkey in the Straw.

For that is Great Poetry which serveth poetickally in a great Need; and that is Great Musick which in the sphere of Musick functioneth greatly.

And if thou desirest to know my sentiments on the controversy of Art for Art's sake, thou mayest be able to infer it from these Few Remarks. For Musick and Art and all else is Good in proportion as it is Good for Something. And I have very little use for goodness which is good for nothing.

Can We Keep the Church Christian?

By William Adams Brown

WHETHER Christianity is a practicable religion for society resolves itself in the last analysis into the question whether it is possible to have a church which shall be really Christian. And this is not so easy a question to answer as it might appear.

It is understood, of course, that when I speak of the church in this connection I use the word in its conventional sense to denote the sum total of organized Christianity—the church that operates through sessions and presbyteries and general assemblies, parishes and dioceses and general conventions, conferences and councils, classes and congregations, the church that owns property, supports ministers, elects moderators and bishops and ruling elders, adopts constitutions, passes laws, and through the other recognized methods of institutional procedure has acquired personality in the sense in which alone that term is known to the law. There is indeed another sense in which we may use the term church which would render our question superfluous. If we mean by it what Paul means, the company of believers who are spiritually united with Christ, it is clear that the church cannot but be Christian, for it is only another way of describing all those who are Christian in fact. But no organized church—not even the church of Rome—has ever professed that all its members were genuine Christians, nor has it claimed to contain all who were. “Where there is a church,” said a wise scholar once, “there is always a little bit of the world,” which confirms the truth of what we were saying at the outset about the central place which the church holds in our attempt to demonstrate the practicability of the Christian religion. For to prove that Christianity is practicable for society as distinct from the individuals who compose it we must prove that it is possible to Christianize the world, and if there is a bit of the world in the church, this would seem to be the place of all places to begin.

THE INSTITUTION

But we are interested here not in showing that the church is not as yet wholly Christian, but in understanding why this is so, and, above all, why, when we see that it is so, it should be so difficult to change it. This brings us face to face with one of the most baffling of all the questions of social philosophy—the question of the place of the institution in society, its relation to spiritual ideals and social progress. What is an institution? It is a social ideal which has succeeded in getting itself accepted by a number of different people and which now faces the most difficult of all tests, the test of success. The church is Christianity so far as it has won its place in the world, become part of the structure of human society, uses the methods that men use in other organizations—law, tradition, social custom, a professional ministry, buildings, real estate, property in the largest sense of the word, in a word the whole paraphernalia of institutional life.

When I say that in the church Christianity faces the hardest of all tests, namely, the test of success, I do not refer simply to the obvious fact that the success of the church attracts to it people who care nothing for its original purpose but use it simply as a means of assisting them in their quest for social prestige and power. I mean that for those whose motives are essentially Christian and who are trying according to their lights to live the Christian life church membership presents difficulties and damages of its own, the danger of complacency, for example, which makes us satisfied with what we have already done, the danger of inertia which blinds us to the new duties and opportunities which the future presents.

All organization brings responsibility and responsibility makes men conservative. The better one loves the church the more one realizes what it means for human welfare that there should be an institution standing for the thing for which the church stands—preaching, religious instruction, philanthropy, missions in the widest sense of that term—the weekly reminder that there is more in life than that which we can see and touch and handle, the more one tends to identify the present form of the church with its ultimate purpose and to deprecate change as unnecessary and not dangerous.

THINGS AS THEY ARE

And this satisfaction with things as they are leads us naturally to shut our eyes to the things that may be. We have grown so accustomed to thinking of Christianity as a part of the established order of things that it is easy for us to forget how our religion began. There was a time when the church, as we now know it with its elaborate institutions, had not yet come into being and Christianity was only a little group of men and women inspired by the Master with a passionate conviction that the world was wrong and needed to be made right, and that in the gospel of Jesus Christ they had the power which made that re-generation possible. We need to remember that the same spirit which inspired the revolution that we call Christianity is still active in the world and that it is even now at work in men and women outside the church as well as within, kindling their hopes with a vision of the better world even as it did in the days of the first beginnings. We must be on our guard lest our very loyalty to what the Spirit has said and done in the past blind us to the new possibilities of the future and deprive us of the new allies in whose fresh vision and undaunted courage we might find reinforcement in our struggle for a better world.

In all this there is nothing strange or unusual. It is only the working in this particular case of the law of institutional life, that the longer an institution lives and the stronger it grows, the more it tends to be content with its own achievement and to make its past the measure of its future. But this is to create for Christianity an impossible situation, for the one thing that the Christian cannot do is to be content with the past. Christianity is by its very nature a forward looking religion, conceiving its task in terms of an ever expanding life and setting for its goal nothing less than a completely Christianized world.

How, then, can we overcome in the church the inertia which seems to be inevitable in the case of every institution? How can we keep the church Christian? There are some who tell us that we do not need to overcome it. While they recognize that the description which we have just given of the way institutions operate is applicable in every other relation of human experience, they deny that this is so in the case of the church. Here we have an exception to the ordinary operation of social law, a new, divine creation, supernatural in the strictest sense and hence needing no change in its structure or method of operation. The relation of the church to Christ, writes a leading representative of highchurch Episcopalianism (and by the church he means all baptised persons who accept the sacramental system in its episcopal and trinitarian form) is "organic, vital, structural and fundamentally static." All that needs to be done, therefore, is to use these predetermined relations as a criterion for repudiating all illegitimate claimants to the name and in due time the desired spiritual and moral results will follow.

The same uncompromising attitude meets us in Christians whose theology stands at the opposite pole from that of the highchurchman. I mean the extreme premillenarians. To them the church in its existing institutional form has so far surrendered the essence of Christianity as to become a kind of anti-Christ. For what is anti-Christ but the spirit of compromise which in a hundred ways and under a hundred names has abandoned the stern literalism of early Christianity and come to terms with the world? Between Christianity and the world, so they contend, there is now and must always be an internecine conflict. Not here in this world of imperfection and sin, but in the heavenly country still to be revealed, Christianity is to come to its own. For the Christian here God's word is still the old word that came to Christian in the City of Destruction: "Flee from the wrath to come," and to leave the world which is the object of God's wrath one must begin by turning one's back upon the existing church.

A PRACTICAL RELIGION

But for those who are neither highchurch sacramentarians nor premillenarians, the matter is not so simple. We believe, at least we profess to believe, that Christianity is a practicable religion for this world as well as for that which is to come, and this means that institutions as well as the individuals who use them must be Christianized. And first of all, and most of all, the church.

How then can we overcome in the church the inertia which seems to be inevitable in every institution? I answer in the same way in which we must overcome inertia wherever we find it, by a process of continual change in which the principles for which the institution exists are continually redefined and its methods of realizing its purposes continually revised in the light of the new demands of the changing situation.

This does not mean that we must surrender our conviction that the church holds in trust a divine revelation of permanent validity. Permanence and change may exclude one another in logic, but in life they go together. The only way in which a man can remain consistent is to vary his action from time to time to meet the new conditions which arise, and the same is true of an institution. The true continuity of the church is a continuity of spirit, and the test by which its outward forms are to be judged is the extent to which they respond to the new conditions set by the changing environment.

The need of change appears, in the first place, in the fact that the persons who make up the membership of the church are constantly changing. One generation succeeds another, and each new generation grows up into a new environment, physical, intellectual and social. They face new situations; they are confronted with new tasks. They talk a new vocabulary. To the fathers who have worked out their own philosophy of life, or, what comes to the same thing, have abandoned the hope of doing so, the young folks seem revolutionary, destructive. They will not be satisfied with the old forms. They want new forms of their own. It is the familiar situation which our Lord described in his parable of the new wine and the old wineskins. The question whether the church can be Christian is the question whether we can devise a wineskin flexible enough and capacious enough to contain an indefinite supply of new wine without wasting the old.

IDEALS AND MACHINERY

The readjustment needed is in part a matter of the redefinition of ideals, in fact a matter of the remodelling of machinery. We see both taking place in the church of today.

It is in part a matter of the redefinition of ideals. Face to face with the new situation we perceive implications of the Christian gospel which in the nature of the case our fathers could not see. Old terms, like brotherhood or service, take on a new and revolutionary meaning when one is dealing with Japanese or negroes. To forgive one's enemy is one thing when that enemy is an individual whom you can see; quite another when it is a nation, or a class—Germany, for example, or the Soviet Republic.

So we see all about us today a mighty stirring of life—the effort to make earnest with the ideals of the gospel in relations of life to which in the past they had not been thought to be relevant. Foreign missions is a familiar illustration of such a readjustment. What we call the social gospel in its broader aspect another. The ideal of world peace, whether taking dogmatic form as pacifism, or more opportunistic expression in the plan of a league of nations, is a third. More radical social movements, like socialism and philosophical anarchism, however, dangerous and misguided they may seem to some of us—are symptoms of the same desire.

What is to be the outcome of this movement? Can we make place for it within the church? Can we relate it positively and constructively to those older ideals of brotherhood and service which find expression in the Bible and the creeds? This is the question which the new theology is trying to answer, and upon its success or failure will depend in part the decision whether we can have a church which shall be really Christian.

But a theoretical adjustment alone is not enough. We must find ways and means in which the new ideals can find practical expression in conduct. And this is a matter of ecclesiastical as distinct from theological inventiveness. Such experiments are going on all about us with greater or less success. The interdenominational movement, in all its baffling and confusing forms, is a series of such experiments. Federal Council and local Federations of Churches, Young Men's Christian Association and Young Women's Christian Association, Salvation Army, and Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor, Home Missions Council, and Foreign Missionary Conferences, Edinburgh Conference and Lambeth Conference, Social Service Commission and Continuation Committees—these are but a few of the many ways in which Christian people are trying to work out such changes in the machinery of the church as shall make it a fit vehicle for the expression of the Christian spirit.

A NEW AND BETTER CHURCH

What is going on on a large scale in the church as a whole is going on on a smaller scale in individual churches and in the denominations. We agree that the old organization is not adequate to meet our needs today. We are feeling our way—blindly, clumsily, wastefully—incredibly wastefully, it often seems—but yet surely toward a new and better church.

But here we meet a new and serious obstacle, and that is in the men and women who have grown so accustomed to the old that they do not see the need of change—some of them church members who have grown used to the old ways and do not like to have their habits disturbed—bourgeois minds, in Victor Hugo's sense of the word bourgeois, when he says that the bourgeoisie is "interest which has reached the point of satisfaction. The bourgeoisie is simply the contented portion of the population. The bourgeois is the man who now has time to sit down. A chair is now a caste." How many good people there are to whom the church is what Victor Hugo describes, a convenient place to sit down while the preacher says things they already know and approve.

Even more important and more difficult to deal with are the officials of the church, the ministry as we call them—those who earn their living by running the institution. A change in the organization of the church may imperil their jobs. And one need not be a selfish or irreligious man to feel that it would take powerful arguments to convince him that such a change was for the better. If the new church is to grow out of the old without a break, we must convince the ministry that the change is necessary, and this is a matter of education.

So we come to the fundamental problem of all social philosophy, that of education. It is not enough that a few should see what needs to be done, whether in the field of theory or practice. They must persuade the rank and file of the people with whom, in our democratic society, the power rests, that they are right. The question whether we can have a Christian church is in the last analysis the question whether we can have an effective system of Christian education.

That is the significance of such attempts as have been made in England by the Archbishop's Commissions and in this country of our own Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook. They are attempts to secure such agreement among the leaders of the churches as to the ideal to be sought as will set the standard for a system of Christian education which shall unite Christians in general in support of a program which shall be truly Christian.

This then is the test by which we are to judge the church. Is it Christian in its ideals? Is it so organized as to make their realization practicable? Is its membership kept alive to the necessity of continually refining its ideals and readjusting its machinery by a system of education which is at once loyal to the values and attainments of the past, and open-minded to the new lessons and opportunities of the present and the future?

It is the test by which every institution must, in the last analysis, be judged, the state, the university, commerce, industry, the family itself. It is not a special or peculiar problem which we face in the church, we repeat—only the world-old problem with which mankind has been wrestling in every age—of the place of the institution in society. How can we conserve the gains of the past and transmit them unimpaired to the future, without losing the new insights and opportunities which the present brings? Christianity does not alter the problem, but only intensifies it, by bringing us a new vision of the greatness of the issues at stake—on the one hand, the magnitude of the gains already won; on the other, the boundless possibilities of the uncharted future.

CONSERVATISM AND PROGRESS

I say Christianity does not alter the problem. But it brings something new to the solution, and that is an abiding faith in the power of God through his transforming and recreating Spirit to win the world to himself, and make society over after the likeness of Jesus Christ. This is the gospel we are preaching every Sunday, and men look to the church, which is the visible outcome of our work, for the test of our preaching. The church is the one institution of all the institutions of society which professes to believe what Christ says, and to make earnest with his gospel. That is why it is so essential to have a church which shall be Christian in fact.

I come back to the question with which I began. Can the church be kept Christian? I answer, Yes. And the proof is that we see it becoming more Christian every day. But if you ask me when the work will be finished and the completed product ready for delivery, I must ask you another question, to which our Lord himself declared that he could give no answer—when God's plan for his world will be finished and his kingdom come. That Christ is coming to his own, in the church as in the world, we may confidently believe. "But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels of heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only."

Contributors to this Issue

WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN, Professor Systematic Theology, Union Theological Seminary, New York City; author "Is Christianity Practicable?" etc., etc.

HAROLD E. LUCCOCK, in charge of publicity for Council of Methodist Boards of Benevolence.

Dead Languages

By Halford E. Luccock

THE question whether theological students should devote much time to the study of "dead languages" used to be a rather combustible one. On the one hand we were assured hotly that there were no dead languages, that Hebrew and Greek studied under a real master were tremendously alive, tingling with vitality. In spite of that, however, "dead languages" as educational necessities have fallen on evil days with few so poor to do them reverence. Perhaps the most unkindest cut of all is the recent thrust of so eminent a Greek scholar as Principal James Denney, in one of his letters to Robertson Nicholl: "We could teach a great deal more than would fit men to be ministers if we did not indulge the pretense of teaching through Greek and Hebrew instead of teaching in the mother tongue. . . I think it no better than a superstition to believe that every man who is to preach the gospel and do pastoral work must affect to be a student of Greek; as for finding the word of God in Holy Scripture and presenting it for the edifying of the church, the men who cannot do that with the English Bible, which is all that the church itself has to depend upon, cannot do it at all."

The truth of the matter is that there is only one dead language that any one need to worry about—dead English! And the goblins will get us if we don't watch out! A young student may be most carefully inoculated with Hebrew and Greek, without having them "take" at all. But there is a deal of dead English floating around the unsterilized nooks and crannies of the theological classroom and library and infection by it is perilously liable to become chronic. A theological education sometimes has an effect like that of Jacob's wrestling with the angel—it leaves a man to go halting all his days, so far as his speech is concerned. His listening flock, patiently trying to translate a strange, alien jargon into words of one syllable, shares the sentiment of Festus—"Much learning hath made thee mad!" All the preacher's little homiletical fishes (sometimes, they are hardly minnows) talk like whales! Among the many handicaps under which the church of Christ works, is the elementary, obvious one that between the technical dialect of the pulpit and the world of the street corner there is a great gulf fixed, across which must be flung a suspension arch of simple Saxon speech, before there can be any real communion of saints. Language has a very subtle influence on the thought it expresses, and when a preacher's words are complex, involved and cloudy, his message itself cannot long retain clearness and simplicity.

DEAD FROM OVERWORK

The writer has a vivid memory of Julius Caesar's exploits in indirect discourse, wherein the scoundrel Vercingetorix, instead of talking face to face like a man, mumbled out his story through a maddening maze of subjunctives and uncertain participles. Only two memories of the writer's school days are more painful—simultaneous quadratics and the dentist. Many ministers share at least one trait with imperial Caesar. They frequently speak in "indirect discourse" which does not fly straight to the mark like a bullet but rambles around amid thickets and bogs, "down dark lanes that lead nowhere." Trying to follow the tangled threads of the argument is like wandering around the dark caverns of the mammoth cave without the friendly help of a guide and rope.

Much pulpit language has died from an honorable cause—overwork. It has been used and used again until it is a thing of shreds and tatters, all out at the elbows, hardly fit clothing for a Royal Proclamation. A stethoscope should not be required to show that life has long since passed from it. We are all interested in pensions for worn out preachers. They are richly deserved. But ought we not also to provide pensions for worn out ministerial phrases, as well, so that they could be relieved from active service? These worthy phrases have wrought righteousness, from weakness were made strong, waxed mighty in war and put to flight armies of aliens. They ought to be buried with all the honors of war instead of being rudely disturbed every Sunday morning. On this roll of honor we would give a high place to such overworked language as "over the top;" to the omnipresent "challenge" and "crisis;" to all "new eras;" new "ages" and new "days;" to "one hundred per cent Americanism;" to such pseudo-scientific lingo as "function" (who shall deliver us from that particular abomination?) "objective" and "reaction." Bishop Homer C. Stuntz cried out the other day in a healthy impatience, "no one thinks any more; they 'react.' Let's all quit 'functioning and go to work!" One whole communion, the Methodist Episcopal, was told with incessant reiteration from pamphlet and platform during a recent campaign that "Prayer releases Power." That is unquestionably true. But it is just as unquestionably true that saying so a thousand times in the same threadbare words releases nothing but a sigh of despair. Language dead from overwork never achieves any divine miracles of surprise. The hearers go away thinking the preacher has "said what he ought to have said" and that is the end of it. Instead of the bread of life, the flock has been given spiritual food that is more like a pretzel, "dry as the remainder biscuit after a voyage."

DEAD FROM STRANGLING

Frequently language has met a violent death—from strangling. Promising arguments and telling points get all tied up in complicated sentences and are hung by the neck until dead. Rebecca West, in comparing the early and later styles of Henry James, says that in his earliest works Henry James' sentences were lithe and athletic; they could run free and unhampered; but in later years they were swathed in bandages of relative clauses like an old lady invalid wrapped in shawls. James Russell Lowell, in a letter from Dresden where he was struggling with German, gives a vivid description of strangled language—"What a language it is, to be sure; with nominatives sending out as many roots as that witch grass which is the pest of all child gardens, and sentences in which one sets sail like an admiral with sealed orders, not knowing where the devil he is going till he is in mid-ocean." The first time we meet the Apostles, Peter and James and John, in the New Testament record we find them engaged in an occupation very profitable for any apostle—mending their nets. The fisher of men continually casts a net woven of words and tangled nets take few fish.

When a man strives to attain the simplicity which is in Christ, his effort should extend to language as well as character. What a marvelous teacher of composition Jesus would have been! Or rather, what a marvelous teacher he is! His eye is single and the whole body of his discourse is full of light. He is come to seek and to save that which is lost and his words, having only that one great purpose of service, and none of self display, are as clear and strong as the rays of the sun through a burning glass. The single purpose of service is the preserver of sympathy for every speaker. Sometimes a sword is so heavy with ornament that it cannot be readily swung against an enemy. And frequently a man's style is so loaded down with rhetorical decorations that it cannot be effective for the direct and convincing persuasion which marks all true preaching. Wherefore, laying aside every weight, and the (rhetorical) sin that doth so easily beset us, let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus. For Jesus is not only the salvation of a man's soul but of a man's style as well.

ANEMIA

Pernicious anemia is the reason for much dead language. The words are not lively, full-blooded creatures with rosy cheeks. You can chop them up into pieces without running any risk of causing a hemorrhage. The language of the pulpit is often deficient in red corpuscles, that is, in words with color and fire and music in them, words that catch and suggest the rich pageantry of life. It is very easy to be too harshly critical of the pulpit for this. One reason for it is greatly to the preacher's credit. If he is at all mentally awake, he must read, mark and inwardly digest, if possible, many books which are essentially text books, written in severe style, technical, philosophical and theological books. So his language becomes subdued to what his mind works in. A long shelf of novels and poetry is needed to counteract the pernicious effects of one's vocabulary of a ten volume Dictionary of Religion and ethics. The wife of Principal James Denney shrewdly noted that he was preaching much better since he had taken to reading French novels. But alas, the preacher is often so crowded that he makes the mistake of skipping the novels instead of the Dictionary!

What wreckage stereotyped language can make out of the most sublime thought has perhaps never been demonstrated so convincingly as in the paraphrase of Hamlet's soliloquy into modern "jargon" in Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch's "The Art of Writing." The immortal

To be, or not to be,
That is the question, emerges thus as many a speaker might render it in the omnipresent rhetorical jargon of today:

To be, or the contrary? Whether the former or the latter be preferable would seem to admit of some difference of opinion; the answer in the present case being of an affirmative or of a negative character according as to whether one elects on the one hand to mentally suffer the disfavor of fortune, albeit in an extreme degree, or on the other to boldly envisage adverse conditions in the prospect of eventually bringing them to a conclusion. The condition of sleep is similar to, if not indistinguishable from that of death; and with the addition of finality the former might be considered identical with the latter; so that in this connection it might be argued with regard to sleep that, could the addition be effected, a termination would be put to the endurance of a multiplicity of inconveniences, not to mention a number of downright evils incidental to our fallen humanity, and thus a consummation achieved of a most gratifying nature.

Quiller-Couch's whole chapter on "jargon" ought to be bound up between the old and new testaments in all Bibles presented to young preachers.

Conventional, stereotyped language is the real tomb of our Lord. When his truth is laid away in threadbare, mechanical speech, we look in vain for an Easter blooming. The preacher, above all others, should ponder well Emerson's saying, "We die of words. We are hung, drawn and quartered by dictionaries."

SENILITY

But the most frequent cause of dead language is senility. Words, phrases and expressions which have passed into decrepit old age. This does not refer to those timeless words which embody the realities of God and the soul, which are the same, yesterday, today and forever. Senility descends rather upon the period costumes with which the body of truth has been clothed in other centuries and generations, costumes which are no more an integral part of the truth of Christianity than were the Roman toga or the suit of armor of the middle ages inseparable parts of the human anatomy. The tragedy of it is that the ageless message of Christ to the living present is made, by obsolete language, as remote from the thought and life of the day as though it were expressed in the Old English of Chaucer or Piers Plowman Doctrines.

Ideas and watch words which were impregnable defenses of the faith in days when such expressions spoke directly to the mind of the age become present obstacles. During the war it was a frequent experience for a regiment of soldiers in the trenches to discover that the barbed wire entanglements which proved so great a defense when a hostile drive was being withstood, became a distressing obstacle when an advance movement over the same territory was launched. The same experience has befallen the church again and again. For instance, such an ancient defense of religion as the doctrine of the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures is today a vicious snarl of barbed wire lying athwart the path of a united church advancing to world service. What obstacles lie in its meshes! It brings forth a resurgent premillenarianism, which, with gaze upturned to the clouds, passes by, like priest and levite, a bruised and wounded world. It sustains an intensified denominationalism. In thoughtless optimism we are tempted to believe that the modern understanding of the Bible has penetrated far more deeply into the mind of the church than is the case. The recent agitated squall produced in England by the sermon on evolution preached by Canon Barnes to the British Science Association demonstrated that clearly. The sermon contained nothing which has not been an accepted commonplace among educated Christians for a generation. Yet its frank acceptance of the results of evolution for Christian thinking brought about the head of the preacher a veritable hurricane of protest from all directions. The church has not been honestly teaching the foundations for a modern Christian faith to the extent it should be doing. Too often it has been content with repeating the language of a literal interpretation of Genesis, language which is both meaningless and powerless as a present apologetic of faith. Thus "the inspiration of one age becomes the damnation of the next." Such discussions as the one just cited on the verbal inspiration of Genesis, are as fitting, in view of the task of the church to-day, as it would have been fitting if, when the call to arms came to the United States in the world war, its young men had been so immersed in discussions of the Dred Scott decision and the Missouri Compromise that they failed to respond. So much of our theological speech is reminiscent of Old unhappy far-off things

And battles long ago.

The principle trouble with "the old time religion," which we are vociferously told was "good enough for mother" etc., etc., is that it is not old enough. Its partisans make the mistake of stopping in the sixteenth century instead of going clear back to the beginning. The "old time religion" really worth talking about and living by is the religion of Abraham, a religion of intellectual and spiritual daring; the religion of Moses, a religion of social revolution; the religion of Jesus, a religion of love.

OLD TIME RELIGION

It was said of Hugh Price Hughes that "he took the ancient passion for the souls of men and set it in the stream of modern life." That is the task of every herald of the gospel, to take the ancient truths and ancient passion of the good news of God in Christ and set them in the very midst of the thought life of the day, shorn of all accidental and obsolete accumulations.

"My sheep know my voice." The human heart answers, not to the mechanical repetition of a foghorn, or the ceaseless reiterations of a doctrinal phonograph, but to the voice of Him whose words are spirit and life. "Oh man, speak things!", cries Emerson to the preacher, in a passage that might well be carried in the memory:

At church today I felt how unequal is this match of words against things. Cease, O thou unauthorized talker, to prate of consolation, resignation and spiritual joys in neat and balanced sentences. For I know these men who sit below. Hush quickly, for care and calamity are things to them. There is the shoemaker whose daughter has gone mad and he is looking up through his spectacles to see what you have for him. Here is my friend whose scholars are all leaving him and he knows not where to turn his hand next. Here is the stage driver who has jaundice and cannot get well. Here is B who failed last year and he is looking up anxiously. Speak things or hold thy peace!

Jesus found the language of religion all bound up in the grave clothes of tradition and laid away in the sepulchre of ceremonialism. And he spoke with a loud voice, "Come forth!" and the ancient words, God, Father, Son, sin, love, life, came forth alive, glowing with freshness and power. That enlivening of words is a prime necessity of every age. The prophet must take the religious language of his time and say to it, "In the name of Jesus of Nazareth, 'rise up and walk!'"

VERSE

The Prophet

WHERE lightnings set aflame the sky,
Where stoops the live oak to the wind,
He stands as stands a storm-cleft peak,
A cliff of cloud above the plain.

They will not hear His living voice;
"Away," they cry, "to Golgotha!"
And crown Him there with martyrdom.
His living voice now stilled, His word
Is caught up by the echoing hills
And flung afar to every age,
While children strew wild flowers for Him
Their fathers flayed and cursed and killed.

No sweeter sadness than is His
Whose ear hath caught the sounds afar,
Whose eye hath seen the distant day,
Whose soul hath sensed the wider law.
He hath no country, but two worlds,
One that is now, one yet to be;
He goes, a solitary soul,
Along His way unto the end,
A liberator to His chains!

Ere good hath ever conquered ill,
Ere ever night hath turned to day,
Or waters sweet were ever struck
From rigid stones, or barren sands
Have borne the blossom of a rose,
A Prophet's tears have there been shed.

HUGH ROBERT ORR.

To Walt Whitman

(Born May 31, 1819)

YOU had no zest for lilting roundelays
Of perfumed love and highly spiced romance;
Your thought was anchored in the wide expanse
Of universal being. Let the praise
For slender songs and sonnets be to those Who know not high adventure, smug, content
To be within life's study-windows pent,
Past which no wind of great emotion blows.
Your thoughts were tidal, and your dreams were drenched
With seas tempestuous and thunder-rocked.
Your arm with Neptune's arm was interlocked
As you strode—then as now—with youth unquenched.
No idle singer of an empty day,
You hold, with sun and stars, your cosmic way.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

Is Prohibition Here to Stay?

A NEW YORK CITY hero to the common appetite is engaged in the sacrificial task of organizing a great Independence Day parade on behalf of an emancipated personal privilege to drink. His ardor is worthy some such cause as a denial of the right of little city children to good milk or the eradication of a great moral evil. He says his mail is making the carriers groan and that within a single week he has enrolled 30,000 men and boys for his panoramic protest against the denial of a sovereign American right to booze up at will and in the easiest and most expeditious fashion. Note that he has boys in line. That is prophetic. Without appetite in the boys today it will be hard sledding for such partisans of Gambrinus tomorrow. A shrewd and persuasive Faustus could not rally a corporal's guard in rural Kansas for such a parade; that is a generation that knows not John Barleycorn. In a great city where uneducated alien opinion still lingers over old world habits and respect for law and order is lowest this gentleman may become a genuine Garibaldi in the Devil's army, leading a host with ragged conscience in which the red flag will be a better symbol than the red shirt.

We noted in The Christian Century recently the organization of the seventh successive anti-prohibition association and the news of its files being swamped with applicants for membership. Like mushrooms in the night such organizations spring up in the fertile beds of our social offal and are nourished in the excrementa of sensuousness, but they do not endure exposure to the warm sun of public opinion, and so die the day after. The majority of our fellow countrymen enjoy their common bereavement in the passing of John Barleycorn and they will also enjoy with a good-natured smile the passing show of sham such as our Knickerbocker patriot hopes to celebrate on Independence Day.

* * *

The Day After Victory

The day after victory is the trying time. The reaction from its exaltation is liable to be a feeling of lassitude and a wonder in the hearts of many as to whether such voluntary assumption of duty is required of us poor mortals; why not let the wicked world wag its own foolish way—we can take care of number one. Victory won is not victory secured and eternal vigilance is less exciting and by so much less interesting than the big fight. Then there are many of emotional temperament who assume that a victory won is a victory secured and turn to other things; if they cannot go shouting to battle they will not go. The Anti-Saloon League is not looking for new fields to conquer but it is looking for new sources of revenue, and its needs were never greater. There is all too much inclination in the churches to retire as armies of occupation and leave that dull task to police powers alone.

And right there rests the future. Unless prohibition prohibits it falls into disregard among even its partisans of yesterday. If it is made effective the rest of the world will come to our Jerusalem to learn the way of the law and its justice and all nations will flow into the Zion of sobriety. If the voluntary moral forces of the nation leave enforcement wholly to police powers they will have put their reliance in a body of men without temperance conviction as a group and among whom a large percentage would vote against it on a referendum. The annual banquet of the New York City police last winter glittered with the sparkling goblets and foamed with lager; it was a spectacle to behold Bacchus presiding at the great festive board of the servants of the law which had forbidden the sale and transportation of liquor. In such public way they wig-wagged the signal "off duty" to every prohibition law breaker on their beats. No wonder the metropolis lends doubt to those sceptical of prohibition. Either every one appointed to enforce the law must be a known partisan of it or the moral forces of society must follow them to duty with the unsleeping eye of an eternal vigilance.

Charting the Course for Tomorrow

The major question today is being settled down in the navigator's room; it is a question of direction to the pilot as to what course the ship of state shall take in this voyage. Shall it sail straight to the dry land of absolute prohibition or skirt the wet shores in a devious attempt merely to keep in sight of safe dry land? The liquor forces have no hope of securing a repeal of the eighteenth amendment; sorties in that direction are mere feints to draw the dry forces away from the more vulnerable defense against light wines and beer. The Supreme Court has destroyed the last hope of technical attack in denying that the six year time limit in the enacting resolution invalidated it, and the bone dry laws put through states like New York and Illinois leave no hope in state legislation until there is a fundamental enactment of some kind in favor of light wines and beer. The late attorney general did the best he could for them in his near post-mortem ruling, but Congress will remedy the defect.

The issue is up and it will have to be settled on its merits; no subterfuges in regard to medicinal beer will suffice either side. The fundamental issue is that of bone dry prohibition or merely prohibition of distilled liquors and the stronger fermentations. Doctors and druggists protest being put in the position as barkeepers and beer has long been scientifically banned as a medicine.

There is a real issue involved in the light wine and beer contention. No moral reform can be made to work unless there is a dominant moral opinion to back it up. There are many on the broad neutral grounds between absolute prohibition and the older notion of temperance as self-control in indulgence, and there are many good men still unconverted to the newer ideals of social control for the common good. No one defends the American saloon of yesterday; many still believe it is a question of personal liberty. This is leaving out of account the victims of appetite and the money grubbing looters of the common good; their pleas undo them unless camouflaged well under plausible contentions for fundamental rights or better ways for securing real temperance.

The theoretical issue is between the old idea, still pregnant in French democracy, that society's right to interfere with the individual's freedom of desire and action must be kept to the minimum of public safety and the newer idea of American democracy that the individual's desire and action shall not interfere with the welfare of his fellow citizens. The practical issue is between "bone dry" prohibition laws with such illicit sale and consumption as cannot be prevented or the open sale of light intoxicants as a measure of prohibition. Temperance sentiment in the continental countries favors the latter. America is the battle ground of the former. To admit light wines and beer is to open the flood gates of abuse; admit them and stronger liquors will be sold ad libitum. Besides both are socially and morally injurious and around their sale will gather the worst influences in politics. The prohibition of strong drink

The Church and Industrial Reconstruction

Prepared under the direction of "The Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook."

A remarkably constructive contribution to a troubled theme in a pregnant time. Better than anything else published in many years the book indicates the faith of social-minded Christians in the churches' capacity to lay out a feasible road to industrial peace—and to lead along the road. Cloth, $2.00.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn Street Chicago

will never be absolute nor will that of gambling and the sex evil, to say nothing of the adulteration of goods and many other things prohibited this side of stealing, burning and killing, but it is already effective to reduce marvelously crime, poverty and the other greater social evils. Its great benefits will come when a generation has grown up under conditions that drive its purveying out of sight and from the path of daily temptation. We must drive it farther and farther from the pathway of youth by the most drastic enforcement possible.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

Dr. Soderblom and a New Creed

London, May 3, 1921.

DURING the war, the name of the primate of Sweden became familiar to all who tried to keep alive the hope of a restored fellowship among the churches in the lands at war. He was the only mediator on the horizon. The attempt which he planned, to hold in Sweden a meeting of representatives from the churches on each side did not succeed. But through his generous mediation it was possible for Christians in Europe not to lose entirely their points of contact with each other. Dr. Soderblom has been in England and has said many wise words. One thing in particular he desired, a "creed of supra-national brotherhood." We do not need, he said, any alteration of the church's historic confessions but a clear expression of the teaching of Christ and our Christian duty with regard to the brotherhood of the nations and the fundamental moral laws for the shaping of society. "Just as, in the past, the enunciation of dogmas was preceded by eager discussion and profound investigation, so, in our time, too, the enunciation of the definite doctrines that we need to move us on and guide us is being prepared, not least in Great Britain, by the investigations and reflections of individual Christians and the joint efforts of larger and smaller groups. And just as certain parts of the historic creeds are paradoxical expressions of ideas that Christianity must proclaim, even if human thought cannot quite penetrate and systematize them, so, perhaps, Christianity's new creed of supra-national brotherhood and Christian principles for social and economic life must stop at clearly conceived propositions and sacred tasks, without being able to combine them into a logical unity."

It is quite clear that the churches cannot leave these economic and international questions outside their range; that would be the way to neglect and to death. But it has not been suggested before within my knowledge that there should be an expression in a credal form of the new consciousness of the Christian people. Dr. Orchard would contend that all that is necessary is already supplied in the Nicene creed. What more definite social creed could there be than that which sets a Galilean carpenter on the throne of the universe? Yet there may be needed for ears too familiar with the ancient words a declaration of Christian duty in terms of the present social order. . . . On this same matter it is not out of order to refer to "The Acquisitive Society," a great book by Mr. R. H. Tawney. It must be read and weighed; it cannot be ignored by students of the modern economic situation, especially as it concerns the duty of the church of Christ.

* * *

Dr. Shakespeare and His Sabbatic Rest

At the spring assembly of the Baptist Union, the Archbishop of York presented the Lambeth proposals for reunion with the generosity and largeness of vision which marks all his dealings with this problem. But in the answering speeches, once more the real stumbling was laid bare. When re-ordination is reacted, then at once there is a deadlock. None the less, such visits as that of the archbishop do much to change the atmosphere in which the problem is debated and the ecclesiastical atmosphere today is sensibly warmer than it was yesterday. The same assembly heard with dismay the announcement that Dr. Shakespeare plans to retire next year from the office of secretary. In any case, he seeks a Sabbatic has administrative ability and courage and no one who looks markable position both among his own people and in the general life of the church of Christ. The Baptist Union is as near to a democracy as any church can be, and for this reason it always has a place of authority waiting for a strong leader, whom it has learned to trust. Dr. Shakespeare is without doubt a leader who does not wait to be pushed, but leads. He has administrative ability and courage and no one who looks at the Baptist Union today can doubt the devotion and foresight which he has brought to its service. It is a union of churches widely differing in theological matters. Like all other churches it has its broad and its low sections. And yet these have been held together and led to share in large enterprises under the generalship of Dr. Shakespeare.

It is not to be supposed that a man of such decision and force carries all his people with him all the way. Among his friends there are many of us who go with him on one journey but decline to join him on others. He has been at once a faithful secretary of his own church and a foremost advocate of the reunion of the free churches. He has been a believer not only in a reunited free church but also in the one catholic church of the future. For him a strong Baptist alone is worthy to bring its gifts into the one free church and the one free church alone is ready to offer all its own gifts to the holy catholic church. But some who believe in the one free church are cold to the larger hope. And many who are with Dr. Shakespeare in his churchmanship do not share his political sympathies. During the war and after, the prime minister has had no more steadfast friend than the Baptist secretary. But here he cannot be said to carry with him all his own people or the judgment of all free churchmen. They are sharply divided on this matter. Yet even those who differ from Dr. Shakespeare in politics cannot fail to admire his loyalty and his courage, and behind all his public life, those who know him are well assured that there is a heart which has never lost its first love. A refreshing rest we wish for him and then some more adventures in the service which is his delight!

* * *

No "Exeter Hall"
Today

There used to be one building in London, sacred to the spring and other assemblies of philanthropic and religious societies. But Exeter Hall is no more, and with it there has passed some of the contempt which used to be shown to the sentiments of its enthusiasts and perhaps also some of the power some of those enthusiasts had in the life of the nation. It might amuse certain wits to sneer at Exeter Hall sentiment, but careful students of political life in the nineteenth century do not neglect the force of that sentiment. Statesmen had to keep their ears open to the thunders of Exeter Hall. At its best it could put the fear of God into administrators and diplomatists; and if its platform was narrow it was powerful in its concentration of interest and in its passionate belief in its mission. . . . The anniversaries of religious societies are no longer held in one building, and though there is more fellowship between them than at any previous time, they have no such decisive programme as the old evangelicals had. The audiences of today are troubled by problems which did not trouble their fathers in the faith. Their interests are more diffused. Their solutions of the race problem and the dilemmas of the monastical order are more tentative. And yet when all that can be said in criticism of these gatherings of enthusiasts has been said, it remains true that they stand for the very thing which the nation needs most—the disinterested devotion of men and women to causes from which they have nothing to gain for themselves. The May meeting is a perpetual reminder to the nation that within its borders there are many left who have found a cause for which they are prepared to sacrifice wealth and time, and in the service of which they find the chief glory of their earthly life. . . . When these notes are published, we shall be in the thick of these anniversaries. The Baptists have had their diet. . . . Today as I passed the Central Hall, Westminster, there were signs that the Wesleyan Methodist clans were gathered. The Methodist church in spite of its vastness has always a family air about it. Next week the Congregationalists will meet. Mr. Viner will take the chair. Along with these meetings the London Missionary Society will hold its annual rally and its friends will hear a sermon from Dr. Schlater of Edinburgh. These and many other feasts of inspiration will be celebrated before the last of the chestnut blossoms falls.

* * *

The New Chairman of the Congregationalists

Of Mr. Viner, the new chairman of the Congregational Union, it may be claimed that no man has served his church with more singleness of mind. He came to Lancashire from the South more than twenty-three years ago, but Lancashire has forgotten that he was ever anywhere else. In fact by disposition as well as by adoption he has an affinity for the Lancashire mind. Both as secretary of the Lancashire Union and as moderator of the northwestern province, he has great weight, and what is more, he has the affection and the trust of his people. A stoic by nature (he never wears an overcoat), a hard worker, a ready speaker, who seldom, if ever, attends a committee without taking part in lucid and forcible language, an enthusiastic educationalist, a steadfast friend of the missionary cause in the interests of which he has visited the Pacific, an enthusiast who does not deceive anyone by his assumption of the part of a hard-headed man of business—such a man is not likely to let his year of office pass without something carried through for the churches of the Congregational order, and already under his leadership they are planning the raising of a big sum of money to prepare for the more exacting service which will be demanded of a church in the coming days.

* * *

Does Persecution Help the Persecuted?

From the life of Cardinal Manning, recently issued, it is quite clear how unpopular the Roman church was in this country two generations ago. Today when Cardinal Bowine completes his silver jubilee in the episcopate, he is congratulated by the prime minister and crowds wait to receive his blessing. So far as this means for the Roman church that it has a kindly feeling from others, it must be welcome. But sometimes the suspicion may come to the leaders that days of persecution are not the least fruitful seasons. There was a time when the free churches were liable to contempt and a mild form of ostracism. There is a town in Lancashire which not a hundred years ago had on its by-laws a regulation touching the erection of "slaughter houses, dissenting meeting houses, and other nuisances." Now all is changed, and the free churches are treated with respect and few of their members have to suffer any loss worth mentioning for their free churchmanship. It is all to the good. Would it be a purifying experience for these churches, and indeed for all Christendom, to endure reproach for the sacred name? Browning put the question in the mouth of the Pope in "The Ring and the Book":

"No wild beast now prowls round the infant camp;
We have built wall and sleep in city safe.
But if some earthquake try the towers that laugh
To think they once saw lions rule outside,
And man stand out again, pale, resolute,
Prepared to die—which means alive at last?"

* * *

A Papuan Jubilee

It is fifty years ago in June since under the guidance of two British missionaries, brave teachers from the South Seas set out for Papua to carry the gospel which their own fathers had but lately received. Papua was then an island, little cared for except by adventurous traders. It has now become a place of unusual interest, towards which statesmen as well as traders are turning their eyes. For the student of Chinese history, the records of the London Missionary Society in Papua are of immense interest. Sometimes in such scenes the reader feels that he turns back the pages of history and sees the old powers at work upon the same human conditions. Missionary study is for such students a time machine whereby the ancient world is made living and present. Whatever achievements await the mission in this island, it has added its toll to the story of the martyrs. There Chalmers ended his fearless life of adventure for Christ and there, in an alien land are the graves of scores of teachers from the Southsea Islands. Their names will not be known except to curious readers of reports, but though they had known Christ but a day, they were ready to die for him, and the noble army of martyrs did no more than that.

EDWARD SHILLITO.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

A Christian World*

JOHN WESLEY called the world his parish and no true follower of Our Master can do less. "Go into all the world" should convert any reasonable person to a worldwide interest. I received today a letter from my friend, Dr. Luther Freeman, minister of the community church in Shanghai, China, in which he spoke of the famine and his deep interest in the peoples there; for we must remember the sailors in those far-away ports and the white people dwelling there as well as the natives. Sometimes I wonder how much we love our fellow-men. Do we really want them to enjoy the genuine Christian religion (to be saved) or do we merely love our own reputations when we seek to add men to the church? Such a searching question, which goes to the roots of our motives, cannot be dismissed with a superficial glance at our inner natures. If we find that, because Christ means so much to us, we desire to have others enter into the same experience, then it cannot matter greatly what the color of the other's skin may be, nor where he is located. In other words, worldwide evangelistic zeal must follow the triumph of unselfishness. If a mother passionately desires the salvation of her own sweet daughter, but cares nothing for the girls of India or of Bolenge, she is a very selfish mother. If a pastor is greatly interested in getting a man baptized into his own local church, but cares little or nothing about the men of Japan and their relation to a Saviour who gives life abundantly, he is a miserably selfish pastor.

When I love men for their own good I will watch every opportunity to speak to them of Christ, on the trains, on the steamers, as men work for me and in every relation everywhere. Let me make a confession for the good of my soul. For years I have been bending every energy to lead men to Christ and here on my vacation I am maturing plans for our Easter ingathering. Now, in a small house, at the gate of the noble mansion where I am staying, live three young men. For three weeks we have lived in the same yard and I have not said a word to them about Christ and the church. Now I know that if they lived in my city I would at once have invited them to our men's classes. Does this not prove me to be a very selfish man? Is not my interest in building up my own church greater than my love of men for their own good? They say all motives are mixed—but have I any right to have mine so badly mixed as this? It gives us pause. A day of prayer and fasting would do us all good. We become so complacent in our snug, comfortable and narrow little worlds. Is the world my parish—or only a few choice city squares? Am I my brother's keeper or my brother's exploiter? How much do I care for the man who can do nothing for me? Do I know disinterested love? Meantime the whole hungering, suffering, Christless world awaits our honest answer—God, be merciful to us!

June 12, "Making the World Christian. Isa. 11:1-10; Acts 1:6-9.

JOHN R. EWERS.

CORRESPONDENCE

Tammany's Clerical Guest

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: That was an interesting editorial which appeared in The Christian Century some weeks ago—the one on "Religion in the Open." Among other things, it was said in that editorial:

"Ever since the rise of scientific method in scholarship, religion has deemed itself exempt from those processes of investigation which were utilized freely in all other departments of human life. Her defenders shrank from the cold procedures of science and kept her under the protection of dogmas and traditions. Theological seminaries were kept apart from universities like hot house conservatories maintained for the protection of plants against the irregularities of the outdoor climate. As a result, the Christian ministry is the last of the learned professions to adopt the attitude of freedom, of experimentation and of tolerance. As a further result the church has been kept behind other social agencies in its adjustment to the spirit of the new age."

The editor further said that until the appearance of Professor Fitch's little book, "Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order"—

"There was scarcely any bit of literature extant, representing the church, which dealt with those unconventional ideas that have such vitality in our time. It may be said that all such unconventional people should be ignored by the church, that we need not be bothered by 'unbelievers' and what they think. The church hasn't bothered much about them, but it is worth while to remember that while Christian scholars have allowed themselves to be hemmed in by orthodoxies of creed, convention, and authority, even the most liberal accepting formal restrictions, 'free' teachers of the type of Bakunin and Nietzsche, not to mention many others, have been shaping the religion, or the irreligion, of a great part of thinking Europe. Revolutionary thinkers and leaders, whose very names so-called Christian leaders have hardly thought it worth while to know, are discovered now to have been influential in ways and depths quite unforeseen. If Christian teaching never had even a semblance of chance of struggling with atheistic influences for possession of the soul of young Europe, it was due largely to the limitations of the atmosphere and environment of so-called 'Christian thought.'"

Few will deny that these serious sentences contain much truth, though many will not accept all that is said. All will agree with the editor that religion ought to come out in the open and give and take with the other interests of life. A thing which asks for dominance and claims to be all-important, as does religion, must not shrink from the white light of examination, refuse the thrusts of criticism or ask for any exemption.

But it should be borne in mind, on the other hand, that religion in its essence is intangible. It can not be measured or weighed. The scalpel does not reveal what is sought as it generally does when the surgeon goes probing into the human body. Proof can not always be furnished because religion has to do with the emotions.

Here is a fundamental principle in religion which is at times alluring to the religious worker and at other times utterly discouraging. It is true that conduct is visible and measurable, in a way, though much conduct is known only to a comparatively few. Besides, conduct in most of us is frequently such an admixture of good and bad that it is difficult to decide whether good or bad is dominant. But what I had in mind to say was that while we view with pleasure and hope the disposition of the modern church to claim no exemptions in the hurly-burly of life, the disposition to consider the attitude and thought of the most radical and antagonistic, this disposition on the part of some church leaders at least is not altogether new. And in corroboration of this statement I would bring to the reader's mind a very interesting event in the life of Alexander Campbell.

One hundred years ago Campbell was the outstanding leader in a reformatory movement whose chief tenets were Christian union and the restoration of apostolic doctrine and practice to the church of today. Out of this movement has grown the body of Christians known as the Disciples of Christ, a body numerous and influential in the states about the geographical and population center of the United States. Campbell's talents and work have never received due recognition from the religious world, I feel, but that is merely an aside.

About 1834 Campbell visited New York City. Robert Richardson, his biographer, relates some of the events which characterized that visit as follows:

"While here, he (Campbell) addressed numerous skeptics of the city at Tammany Hall and Concert Hall on several occasions, obtaining a very respectful hearing and making a profound impression. At the close, Mr. Offen, in behalf of one of their societies, presented him with the following thank-offering:

'Sir: The trustees and members of the society of Moral Philanthropists (of which I am also a member) have deputed me to present to you their thanks for your friendly visit to Tammany Hall, being highly pleased with the splendid talents they have witnessed, connected with erudition the most profound, which has both delighted their ears and conferred dignity on their hall. The friendly sentiments you have also expressed toward skeptics, appealing to them as men—as honest men—instead of treating them with contumely, as do the Christian priesthood of New York, are especially noted. These kind feelings, sir, they duly appreciate, and to them they heartily respond. As it respects some of the evidences of the Christian religion, you have candidly and ably stated them. Should a change take place in our views on that subject, be assured it will be honestly and publicly avowed.

'In the event you should again visit New York, you will be to us always a welcome guest. Permit me, sir, to tender to you their best wishes for your health and prosperity, and be pleased to accept the full assurance of their high esteem.'

There are some things about this interesting event in Campbell's life which I do not know; and my facilities are such that I can not learn all I should like to know about the incident.

Tammany Hall, or the Tammany Society, is thought of today as exclusively political. It seems, however, that in the beginning some philanthropies were practiced. But with the reorganization of the Society under the leadership of Thomas Mooney it became largely political. When this re-organization was effected, in the early days of the Nineteenth Century, another society called the Society of Cincinnati was flourishing. This society was aristocratic. Alexander Hamilton was active in it. The Tammany Society was democratic, gathering into its fold the adherents of Thomas Jefferson. And I can see, in view of the above, how skeptics might have been attracted to Tammany.

Many of the ideas current in the French Revolution were widely accepted in the United States in the early days. Doubtless, therefore, in addition to their strictly political work, some if not all of the skeptical adherents of Tammany would gather in some of the rooms of the Hall for mutual edification and for the propagation of some of these ideas which had come from the French Revolutionary days. And I suspect it was in some such room to these skeptical auditors that Campbell spoke on the occasion described by Richardson.

How or why the meeting was arranged Campbell's biographer does not tell. It would be interesting to know these details. But the main point is that Campbell did so speak to such a group in Tammany Hall. That he approached his auditors as honest men; that he did not assume superiority in any way; that he came out in the open and gave and took—all this is self-evident; and it was notable, especially for the day and age.

That this was not an attitude assumed for the occasion; that this was not an isolated event in Campbell's life, is brought to mind by his debate with Robert Owen, the kindly and benevolent disbeliever who founded New Harmony, Indiana, in demonstration of his communistic ideas. Owen had been lecturing in different parts of the United States and was outspoken in his opposition to Christianity. He became bold in his antagonism and from New Orleans issued a challenge to the whole Christian world for a discussion on the fundamental tenets of Christianity. No David was found to meet the defiant Goliath. It seemed that the challenge would not be accepted until Mr. Campbell offered himself as a defender of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

Preparatory to the debate which followed, Mr. Owen visited Campbell at Bethany, W. Va., the latter's home, for the arrangement of details. Abundant evidence is to be had that these two gentlemen wandered about the country estate of Campbell for two or three days, absolutely frank with each other and enjoying each other's company immensely.

Following the debate which was held in Cincinnati about 1830 and which proved a veritable rout for Owen, a warm and abiding friendship between the two men existed. Fifteen years later, when Campbell was preparing for a trip abroad, he went to New York. While there Owen called on him to the joy of both. And when Mr. Owen departed, Mr. Campbell remarked, as he had done frequently before, that "of all my opponents in debate the infidel Robert Owen was the most candid, fair and gentlemanly disputant I have ever met." Some later churchmen might profit by the generous spirit here revealed.

Somewhere I've heard the story of Lincoln and Stanton, his somewhat irascible Secretary of War; that Lincoln had made a suggestion concerning the conduct of the War or maybe given an order, upon hearing which Stanton vouchsafed the information that Lincoln was a fool. When Stanton's delicate pronouncement reached Lincoln, instead of anger and offended dignity he replied: "And Stanton said I was a fool? Well, Stanton's a sensible man. I'll have to investigate his statement. Maybe he's right."

All of us live in the same world. All right thinking people want to know the truth and to do the right. All may not agree as to what is best and right; but the other fellow is entitled to his viewpoint. Let him have it. Discuss with him his position if occasion arise. Differ from him if you must, but do it in all kindness.

This spirit in religion and in the other relationships of life would do much to allay the suspicions and dissipate the differences which mar so largely the fellowship of the world today.

E. B. BOURLAND.

Lancaster, Ky.

BOOKS

THE SHEPHERD OF THE SEA. By W. L. Watkinson. With an introductory note by S. Parkes Cadman, who calls Dr. Watkinson "the greatest of the surviving preachers of the Victorian period." The volume contains eighteen sermons which Dr. Cadman says are characterized by "zeal, courage and discretion." (Revell. $1.75)

THE HIDDEN ROMANCE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By J. A. Robertson. The declared purpose of this book is "to discover the homelier personal background out of which the New Testament sprang." Contains chapters on such themes as "The Man of Arimathea," "The House of the Upper Room," "A Page of Names," etc. (Pilgrim Press.)

THE DAY OF THE CROSS. By W. M. Clow. The author of "The Cross in Christian Experience" here contributes to the religious thinking of the age twenty-six sermons, twelve of them being on Bible personalities, Mary Magdalene, Pilate's wife, Caiaphas the ecclesiastic, Pilate the agnostic, etc. (Doran. $1.75.)

CHRIST IN ITS MODERN EXPRESSION. By the late George Burman Foster. Professor Douglas Clyde Macintosh, of Yale University, edits this work and assumes responsibility for its publication. The volume embodies Professor Foster's lectures on the dogmatics and ethics of the Christian religion in the form in which these were delivered to his classes in theology. The main body of the book is made up of the dictated portions of the lectures. (Macmillan. $3.75.)

THE PULPIT AND AMERICAN LIFE. By Arthur S. Hoyt. Containing chapters on Jonathan Edwards, Lyman and Henry Ward Beecher, Channing, Bushnell and Brooks and on such themes as "The Puritan Preacher," "The Old and New Evangelism," "The Pulpit and the Nation," "The Pulpit and Social Welfare," "The Present American Pulpit." (Macmillan.)

HINTS TO PILGRIMS. By Charles S. Brooks. Those who have read "Chimney-Pot Papers" and "There's Pippins and Cheese to Come," will know what to expect in this latest collection of the Charles Lamb of modern American literature. Seventeen essays of great charm are included. Among the titles are: "I Plan a Vacation," "Circus Days," "In Praise of a Lawn-Mower," "A Chapter for Children," and "On Dropping Off to Sleep." (Yale. $2.50.)

MYSTIC ISLES OF THE SOUTH SEAS. By Frederick O'Brien. There seems now more than ever before to be a hankering on the part of temperate zone denizens for the South Seas, and Mr. O'Brien, who became at once a best-seller upon the publication of his "White Shadows of the South Seas," seems to know how to minister to that longing. He has the ability to reproduce the hazy atmosphere of the islands, and he makes every page of his book interesting, which is something some writing travelers have not been able to do. The book is almost perfect from the artistic and mechanical viewpoint. (Century. $5.)

THE TEMPEST. This is the first volume of the new "Cambridge Shakespeare," edited by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch and John Dover Wilson. All in all, this edition seems the most attractive and helpful of small editions that have been published. A characteristic of this edition is that an attempt is here made to bring the language of the plays up to date, the editors having studied thoroughly the work of Shakespearean scholars of the last score of years. (Macmillan. $1.40.)

THREE NEW NOVELS. "The Brimming Cup," by Dorothy Canfield, is said by the critics to be this writer's "most striking book." It deals sympathetically with certain problems that are persistent ones in many homes. (Harcourt. $2.00.) "The Tryst," by Grace Livingston Hill, is an inspiring story of American youth. (Lippincott. $2.) "Green Apple Harvest," by Sheila Kaye-Smith, is the latest work of this English author, who won many thousands of readers by her "Tamarisk Town." (Dutton. $2.)

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Episcopal Rector for Fifty Years

"The Little Church Around the Corner" in New York parlance is in reality the Church of the Transfiguration. Recently the rector of this church, the Rev. George Clarke Houghton, D.D., celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination. He has been twenty-four years the rector of the parish. This church was one of the first in New York to show tolerance to actors and actresses. The people of this profession were invited into the church and the minister frequently conducted their funerals and weddings. Since that time a more tolerant attitude to the men and women of this calling has been noted throughout the country and other than Episcopal churches have received them into membership. A great many weddings are held in the Church of the Transfiguration, couples sometimes coming from very long distances to speak their vows in this attractive building in the heart of New York.

Reformed Church Establishes Pension Fund

The Reformed Church in America is that group of Reformed churchmen whose ancestors were of Dutch descent. This communion will hold its national gathering at Asbury Park, N. J., next month. It has 750 ministers and plans to inaugurate a pension plan which will organize a fund of a million dollars for the benefit of its leaders. It is thought that Asbury Park may be selected as the permanent headquarters of the denomination. The Reformed Church in the United States is another body made up of those Reformed churchmen whose ancestors were of German birth.

Anglicans Seek to Improve Congregational Singing

Singing has been regarded in the past as the peculiar glory of evangelical worship. Church of England leaders are realizing just now what an important place it has played in the church life of the past and are seeking to improve the singing in their churches. Congregational hymn practice is now held a half hour preceding the worship. Some of the great hymns have certain parts assigned to a soloist and other parts to the congregation, with a very dramatic effect. The Dean of Manchester has led in the improvement of the congregational singing in his cathedral.

Family Altar League Will Advertise

It takes a press agent to make any good cause go these days and one reads with interest that the Family Altar League has decided to advertise for families that will hold morning prayers. The organization is a very virile one and is headed by Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, the well-known evangelist. Meetings will be held in many centers this coming year to present the cause of the organization both to ministers and laymen. The Family Altar League has a perfectly sane and helpful program of increasing the religious interest in the home. Once the present tide of home chaos passes we may look for some strong counter-movements to arise, and this may be one of them.

Unitarian League Does Things

The Unitarian Laymen's League sets an example to similar organizations throughout the country in the vigor of its program. During the past two months it has put out a new statement of the essentials of Unitarian belief. The speakers of the League have addressed audiences totaling 150,000 in 202 cities. Last summer 101 ministers were enabled to attend the summer school of Harvard University. Many university centers have been entered and here Unitarian beliefs have been disseminated. The League stresses in the local church the attendance of men at the services.

Churchmen Attack Ku Klux Klan

Bishop Reese, of the Episcopal diocese of Georgia, addressed his recent annual convention most forcibly on mob lawlessness and other forms of injustice. He asked the convention to express and publish its condemnation of these acts, and to declare the Ku Klux Klan organization "more than a mistake, a wicked and dangerous folly." This the convention did, recommending at the same time that this section of the bishop's address be read in every Episcopal church in the diocese. It seems likely that this action, and the brave speech of many ministers throughout the southland, will utterly defeat the revival of racial antagonism which is symbolized by the revival of the Ku Klux Klan.

Disciples Want a New Constitution for Missouri

It is not often that a religious denomination takes as much interest in a political measure as the Disciples are doing this year in a movement in Missouri for a new state constitution. Headquarters were established in St. Louis, when it was discovered that under the present state laws it is impossible to incorporate the United Christian Missionary Society in that state. The officials say that they "are doing business in Missouri only by sufferance." It is of doubtful legality for them to continue there. In the meanwhile there is a proposal for a new constitution which would make more generous provision for the incorporation of religious bodies. In the old days it was boasted in the "show-me" state that "Jesus Christ would never cross the Missouri river." This spirit on the part of the pioneers is reflected in the legal institutions of the state.

Congregational Year Book Shows Gains

Proof sheets from the new Congregational Year Book indicate the progress in that denomination. There has been a net gain in membership the past year of 10,959 in spite of a loss of churches of 35. The number admitted on confession of faith is greater than the previous year by 6,070. The Sunday schools report a gain of 15,013 and the young people's societies a gain of 3,134. The gain in contributions under apportionment has been remarkable. The total benevolent con-

Ambitious Church Buildings for Washington, D. C.

Every denomination is anxious to present a good front at the national capital. Great buildings will be erected in the near future which will be financed by the various denominational organizations of the country. The Roman Catholics have the most ambitious plan of all, the building of a five million dollar cathedral which will be dedicated to "Our Lady Mary, Patroness of America." The Christian Scientists have already erected a building which is one of the finest in the city. The Unitarians will take three hundred thousand dollars from their national promotional fund to finance a worthy building enterprise in Washington. The Luther Memorial church of the Lutheran denomination is among the fine ecclesiastical edifices of the city. Northern Methodism has not given largely to a building enterprise, but has endowed its Metropolitan Church. The southern Methodists have a structure which cost $400,000. The Baptists are now engaged in building and will shortly complete a temple which is to cost $350,000. The Episcopalian cathedral will be one of the finest in the country and is to cost two and a half million dollars. The Disciples of Christ have authorized their church extension board to spend money in the erection of a building which will worthily house the congregation to which President Garfield once belonged.

Many of the smaller denominations, particularly of the popular cults, have seen in the national capital a great field for the proper advertising of their peculiarities, and ecclesiastical architecture is the method employed. In most of these cases buildings are conceived quite as much from the standpoint of their publicity value as from that of the work that is to be done in them. Undoubtedly, fine buildings do have publicity value, but it is just this which leads to the wasteful competition of much of the church building of the present time. National societies placing new buildings in Washington will be more impressed with commanding locations than with service programs. On this account another generation may recount sorrowfully the follies of this generation of church-builders.

tributions for 1919 were $3,756,986, while in 1920 the figures were $6,188,728. While the net gain in membership is not large the balance is on the right side of the ledger and shows that this denomination is still a virile religious force.

Chicago a Hard Place for Boys

The Chicago Council of Social Agencies has recently shown that Chicago has a total of 325,000 boys between the ages of 10 and 20 years. The centers where something is done for the right development of boys are 261. These influence at the most only about 52,000 boys. Meanwhile the 387 picture shows, the 432 pool rooms, the 445 public dance halls and various so-called athletic clubs contribute the rest to the ethical development of the boy. In view of this the churches are taking a new interest in boys' organizations. The University of Chicago recently gave to laymen a course in scouting as the basis for work among boys.

Where Is the Biggest Sunday School?

The palm for having the biggest Sunday school in the world is now being claimed by First Baptist church of Ft. Worth, Texas. This honor once belonged to a Methodist church in the little city of Brazil, Ind., and later to First Christian church of Canton, Ohio. The Baptist school of Ft. Worth meets in three different buildings. The men's class studies in a theatre. The young people from 16 to 20 will soon have for their special use a three story building equipped like a Y. M. C. A. The attendance in this school on May first was 3347.

Does Not Approve Action of Methodist Church

The Methodist church of Normal, Ill., which has put in a baptistry in order to meet the conditions of the discipline providing for each new member a free choice as to mode of baptism, has fallen under criticism by a leading organ of the Methodist Church South. This journal, published in Nashville, says of the innovation: "The converts may live in a town called Normal, but they are not normal Methodists."

Southern Baptists Are Getting the Money

The difficulty with all of the great national financial campaigns has been the collection on the pledges after the campaign was completed. Only a little over half has ever been collected on the Disciples' Men and Millions Movement which took the lead among the denominations in the "drive" kind of thing. At last public report only a small part of the million dollar pledge that inaugurated the movement had been paid. The Southern Baptists are a very vigorous folk and they seem to be doing the thing that has puzzled the leaders of the various other denominations. Having recently secured pledges for $75,000,000 they announced in their national convention in Chattanooga last week that a total of $25,086,324 had been collected, about half of this during the past twelve months.

This is a little behind the schedule but not very much. Five millions due on this amount are not yet paid in.

Chicago Minister Cited as Hygienic Model

Most ministers can be set up as ethical and religious models in their communities, but not all of them will do as hygienic leaders. It is an exceptional thing for Bishop Fallows to be written up by Dr. W. A. Evans in the Chicago Tribune as a good example of how to grow old. The bishop is now 85 years of age. Dr. Evans mentions the strenuous public life which the bishop has followed for a number of years and how he has kept himself fit by walking two miles every day along with calisthenic exercises and a diet suited to the man who is growing old. It is interesting to note that Bishop Fallows is the son and the grandson of men with very long lives. Dr. Evans says of him: "Whoever you are, I hope you will be as straight in body, as square shouldered and as firmly muscled at fifty as Bishop Fallows is at 85. I could wish you nothing better than at 60 your mind will be as clear, your judgment as straight, and your capacity for sustained attention and emotional flights as good as that of Bishop Fallows at 85. Few men at 60 work as hard, take fewer vacations, or stand up as well as does this clean-living man of 85." Bishop Fallows is to be found at most of the public functions of the city, and is yet doing far more work than most of the ministers who are in their forties. It is the triumph of a good physique supported by a proper regimen.

Mennonites Go to Mexico

Moving to Mexico in the search of religious liberty is the dramatic quest of fifteen thousand Mennonites of Canada. They claim they have been persecuted by the Canadian government. They had no difficulties there until the war, but the Plan of Religious Education Modified

AFTER two years' experimentation in the field of week-day religious instruction, Evanston, Ill., is making great modifications in the original plans. While some fine results have been achieved, the original plans were thought to be impractical at many points and an entirely new system will be put into vogue beginning with next fall. One of the first difficulties sensed by the pastors has been the expensiveness of the undertaking. The budget this year is around $10,000 with 600 children enrolled for day-time instruction and 200 prospective teachers enrolled in a training school on Monday night. First Methodist church, which has contributed $2,500 to the movement this year, has only 29 children from its parish enrolled in the day-time schools of religion. In the interest of a greater economy of operation, a number of changes have been inaugurated in the plans. These were first worked out by the ministers, and at a meeting on May 23 they were submitted to the representatives of the churches. The Monday training school will be discontinued, or if continued it must be on a basis not to materially affect the budget. It is generally agreed that this school has done a fine work, but the need of economy has resulted in lopping off this activity. Just one enterprise will be carried on next year and that will be the week-day instruction of the children.

The representatives of the churches insist that the plan of the week-day instruction must be changed. The present system of having a child go to school forty-five minutes early each morning will be abandoned. This is felt to be a fatal defect in the present plans. An insistent demand will be made upon the board of religious education for time in the regular school period. The school board would have to provide alternative courses to children not electing religion. The religious courses would then have to be given in adjacent buildings provided by the churches, for there is no space in the crowded schools to provide room for the regrouping. The plan of teaching will also be changed. At the present time most of the teaching is being done by the grade teachers of the public school, for which they receive extra salary from the board of religious education. The new plan provides for a corps of teachers, perhaps five in number, who will devote all of their time to the work of religious education, teaching every day, and as much of the day as possible. Rev. Frank McKibben has for two years been the Director of Religious Education in Evanston. He has been a hard worker and has done much in the way of working out curriculum. He has resigned to give all of his time to Oak Park religious schools, where the churches have already secured time out of the school day and carry on religious instruction in adjacent buildings. It is not yet determined just who will succeed Mr. McKibben in Evanston, but perhaps one of the new teachers of religious education will combine teaching and administration.

Henceforth the organization directing the work will be distinctly a church affair. The original plan included labor unions and lodges and other civic bodies in the list of directing agencies. The scope of the organization will be religious education entirely, eliminating such suggested plans as pageants and music festivals. The work of religious education done during the past year has incurred a deficit of three thousand dollars. The churches will be asked to make this up to provide a clean slate for the new board. In the next few weeks an answer will be sought from the school boards of the town concerning time out of the school day. If this should be denied, the pastors feel that for the present work-day religious instruction will have to cease. Important though the instruction is, the extended school-day for the purpose of including the religious interest has proven a failure in Evanston. However, the church people are more impressed than ever with the need of getting the religious teaching in.

craft and the war passion has made life intolerable for them. Passing up the United States, they will move all the way to Mexico. They have chartered freight cars and passenger trains and it is said that they are paying the railroads a million dollars for transportation. The Menonites are Baptists with feet-washing customs, and certain other peculiarities of belief. Their religion involves a certain amount of economic cooperation.

Congregationalists Discuss Smoking in the Church

Shall we dance and smoke in the church? This was the question that agitated the Congregationalists at the 112th session of the New Hampshire Conference. The discussion revealed that there was very strong opposition to both practices. The Episcopal and Unitarian customs in this regard have created a demand in evangelical church circles which is very embarrassing. The ministers in opposing these practices sometimes object to the thing itself, but quite as often their objection is to the introduction of a practice which would be divisive in the parish.

Minister's Wife Will Be Made Church Visitor

The goodness of heart in Jackson Boulevard Christian church of Chicago is made manifest in the provision the church has made for the widow of Rev. Austin Hunter, recently deceased. The salary of the pastor will be continued in the family until autumn. After that time Mrs. Hunter will be invited to take up the duties of church visitor on a suitable salary basis. She has been an unusually competent church worker and the congregation believes this new step will be good both for the church and the bereaved family of the pastor. The very high regard in which Mr. Hunter was held was indicated by the large attendance at the funeral service, which was held on Sunday afternoon, May 22. The large auditorium was completely filled, with many persons standing, and a parallel service was held in the Sunday school auditorium. Several hundred persons could not find entrance at either service.

People Find Strange Ministers in Their Pulpits

The churches of Macomb, Ill., recently had a "Go-to-Church Sunday" which brought large audiences to the churches. One feature of the day was a surprise on the church people which was perpetrated by the ministers. Each minister spoke in a church not his own. The Presbyterian pulpit was filled by a Universalist minister and the Universalist pulpit by the Disciple minister, Rev. A. L. Cole. All over the city the denominational wires were crossed in this fashion, with the result that religion is now a topic of conversation in Macomb.

More Work for the Preachers

Rev. Jesse M. Bader, the secretary of evangelism of the Disciples of Christ, has issued a call to the preachers of that communion asking them to perform some additional service in the ministry this year besides that for which they are paid their salaries. A number of men are wanted who will hold a series of evangelistic meetings without salary. Other ministers are being asked to preach for churches which have no regular ministry either on Sunday afternoon or on week nights. One suggestion made by the secretary is of doubtful utility. It is suggested that each minister organize a new Disciples church this year. Were this done, it would without any doubt result in a lot of foundlings that would have to perish. The establishment of new churches is better done by the state and district officials who are skilled in judging the fields that really need additional churches.

Noted Disciple Worker Called to St. Louis

Mrs. Louise Kelly is known throughout Disciplesdom as one of the most ardent missionary workers in the denomination. In recent years she has been working in the British northwest, but has recently been called to the national headquarters in St. Louis. The death of two leading workers and the resignation of others has greatly reduced the forces in St. Louis.

Overlapping of Methodist Denominations

The overlapping of territory of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is one of the great sources of irritation between these two bodies. Bishop J. C. Hartzell reports in the Western Christian Advocate of a recent issue a total of 463,641 white members in the southland. The leading journal of southern Methodism, the Christian Advocate of Nashville, insists that there are not 250,000 white Methodists in the south connected with the northern church. The southern denomination has a membership of two mil-

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful.....1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)

Green tea—1 glassful.....2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz......61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

lien. Heavy losses have been suffered in the past two years by the northern denomination in Arkansas, Central Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri and West Virginia, according to the Nashville Journal.

The Presbyterian General Assembly

NEVER in the history of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America have there been so many overtures presented from the presbyteries as at the session at Winona Lake, Ind., May 19-27. This is obviously interpreted as the stirrings of a new sense of democracy in the church. Even those powerful brethren who in years past had been accused of "running the steam roller" were themselves flattened out on numerous occasions. The layman has asserted himself in new ways in the church. In some matters this has meant reaction for the time, as notably in the matter of church union, but when seen in proper perspective this seeming reaction is only the waiting time in which the rank and file are catching up with their leadership, which in recent years has perhaps moved more rapidly than the church was ready to go.

The General Assembly is a representative democracy with ultimate authority vested in the presbyteries. Presbyterians often call attention to the similarity between the Presbyterian system and the American government with its states and its federal authority. The federal government has no power except that given by the states, and the General Assembly has no power except that which it derives from the presbyteries. At the same time, this is far more power than is possessed by any of the national organizations of the denominations with the congregational polity.

The session at Winona Lake was not disturbed by theological reaction as was feared previous to the meeting. The "fundamentalists" who are breathing out threatening and slaughter sent in overtures on the matter of the Chinese missionaries in all denominational bodies who have been represented as being heretics. These overtures were safely buried in committee throughout the sessions.

The question of the consolidation of the church boards was to have been an issue of this Assembly but the committee has been continued and it is agreed that next year the plan will be voted "up or down." Dr. John Timothy Stone of Chicago is known as one of the outstanding advocates of this plan. Some of the boards oppose the plan as it would doubtless mean a considerable change in personnel.

The plan of organic union proposed by the General Assembly of 1918 has been rejected by the vote of the presbyteries. On account of the death of Dr. W. H. Roberts, stated clerk, some confusion seems to have arisen in the assembly minutes in this matter and many presbyteries voted on misapprehensions. Some thought their action was final, and others felt that the plan would open the door to union both with rationalists and Catholics. The United Presbyterians rejected the plan and the Presbyterian church South deferred action. The most hopeful union project now before the presbyterians is that of uniting the Presbyterian and Reformed bodies which are governed by the presbyterian system of church government. However, the essentials of the 1918 plan are being worked over into a new statement.

The action of the Assembly on the matter of evangelism was significant. The permanent committee states: "That the committee in the past twenty years having tested the high pressure method and also the quiet pastoral and presbyterial or community method of evangelism, stands today more firmly than ever for a work which will insure the normal growth of the church as a result of her inward spiritual life and testimony, rather than for methods which may bring about abnormal accretions to her membership through temporary and external pressure." The Assembly voted an invitation to Rev. William A. Sunday to come and address the Assembly, but rejected an amendment to this motion approving the methods of evangelism employed by Mr. Sunday and others.

The conduct of the missionary monthly called "The New Era Magazine" has aroused much difference of opinion among Presbyterians. A year ago there was a deficit of $28,000 in the treasury of the journal. This deficit has been overcome through the year and there is now a surplus. During the coming year the various boards of the church will conduct the magazine while the publicity department carries on its activities in another way. The publicity department will be directed by the executive commission of the church and will be allowed a fund of $20,000 for its work this coming year. It was objected by some that this amount was much less than the sums granted by Methodist and Episcopal governing bodies for publicity.

The action of the Assembly on problems of large public interest was decisive and evangelical. Dr. Bowlby of the Lord's Day Alliance addressed the Assembly, and insisted that "go-to-church Sundays" while helpful would be unnecessary if the nation had the right attitude to the Christian Lord's Day. The Assembly continues the staunch Presbyterian position with regard to the "Christian Sabbath."

Action was taken on the proposal providing for women elders and deacons. This proposal was decisively beaten in the presbyteries, according to reports. This is thought to be an effective disposition of the question of the status of women in the church for at least ten years, though it will hardly silence those who agitate for a change in the church law.

The Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare brought in a report censuring Presbyterian pastors for violating the law of the church in marrying those who were not entitled to Christian marriage. There is to be stiffening up of the law.

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11

PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

An undenominational training school for
The Ministry Religious Education
Foreign Missions Social Service
Curricula high grade and modern. Graduate degrees. University of California privileges. Opportunities for the study of Oriental peoples. Open to men and women of all Christian denominations. For catalogue address
WILLIAM FREDERIC BADE, Dean,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA

HYMNS FOR TODAY

A complete hymnal for both Sunday School and Church. New, beautiful hymns on all the vital subjects that leading religious thinkers are advocating today, with Orders of Service for S. S. departments and church, and Services for Anniversaries.

The use of Hymns for Today will educate both youth and adult in the essentials of the Kingdom of God. Price, $75 per 100. Returnable sample sent. Orchestrated.

FILLMORE MUSIC HOUSE,
516 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

Home for Girls at University of Illinois

Bethany House, the Residence Hall for girls maintained by the Illinois Disciples' Foundation at the University of Illinois, will remain open for the summer session, June 20th-Aug. 13th. Rates for double rooms will range from $8 to $15 per month, without board. Applications are now coming in. Reservations should be made as soon as possible. Board may be had from $6 up at near by eating house. Address all communications to Mrs. Mabel Carlock, 1306 W. Springfield Ave., Urbana, Ill.

Beware of Contagious Diseases

THOMAS  COMMUNION SERVICE
INDIVIDUAL

SAVES 1/4 COST OF OTHER SERVICES
Clean and sanitary. Used by over 40,000 churches. Send for catalog and free trial offer.
Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 495 Lima, O.

MAKE YOUR CHURCH DEVOTIONAL

by putting into your homes the most beautiful book of personal devotion and family worship ever published—

"The Daily Altar"

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

FOR each day of the year a theme, meditation, Scripture, poem and prayer. 400 pages. In two editions: Gift edition, full leather, $2.50. Popular edition, purple cloth, $1.50 (Add 8 cents postage). The beautiful purple cloth edition may be had at $1 per copy in lots of 50. Write for full list of discounts.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

A Good Business without capital, honest able, true and straight; worthy of investment. Turn it over and under, inside out, upside down, a clean high class business. I am giving up because of old age. Full instruction $1.

George Welles Moseley, Newburgh, N. Y.

henceforth in this matter. The church is on record as favoring a five days' notice before a license to marry is granted. It also favors a uniform marriage law enforced by the federal government, and the constitutional changes that this involves.

The movie came in for vigorous treatment. It was indicated that many producers used the film for setting forth crime and immorality and for breaking down the sanctities of the marriage relation. The story was told on the floor of an actor who never smokes cigarettes but who always rolls cigarettes in his pictures and receives from certain tobacco interests an extra stipend for this service. The church favors a federal censorship for movies.

It was asserted by the Assembly that "prohibition should follow the flag." A resolution extending the operation of the eighteenth amendment to the Philippines was carried without opposition.

The plan for meeting Interchurch and New Era debts is interesting and may be of some help to other denominations who are still delinquent. Certificates of indebtedness will be issued by the General Assembly for the $600,000 still owing on the Interchurch and for the $365,000 that is owing in connection with the New Era movement. These certificates will bear six per cent interest and may be redeemed at any semi-annual interest bearing date. Provision is made for meeting this obligation from General Assembly receipts over a period of years.

The elections in General Assembly are always interesting, and this year doubly so, for a stated clerk was to be elected to succeed the late Dr. W. H. Roberts, the first election of this sort in a generation. A number of men had carried on active campaigns, but the Presbyterian church is very impatient with any electioneering these days. A committee was appointed to bring in a nominee. A number of nominations were made from the floor in addition. The committee nominee, Rev. L. C. Mudge, of Harrisburg, Pa., did not know he was to be considered while the Assembly met, but he was elected by a big majority over all candidates. He is a Princeton graduate and is 53 years of age. He is selected for five years with the privilege of reelection, at a salary of $8,000. A committee was appointed to confer with him and to endeavor to secure his consent to accept the office. It is reported that there is no salary inducement in the offer as his church in Harrisburg is very generous. It is confidently believed, however, that he will accept the place.

Dr. Henry Swearingen, pastor of a large Presbyterian church in St. Paul, was elected moderator. He is said to have had the backing of William Jennings Bryan. He was formerly a member of the United Presbyterian church. He has the distinction of having been William Jennings Bryan's pastor in Lincoln, Neb., in previous years.

The choice of the next meeting place was an event full of fireworks. Rev. Curtis O. Bosserman, of Cape May, N. J., presented the plea for Atlantic City. "Hell has its playground in Atlantic City. The gates of hell shall not prevail against the church. Come up to Atlantic City for your next Assembly." Dr. McKane, pastor of Central Presbyterian church of Des Moines, presented the plea of his home city. "I am not asking you to bring your Assembly to hell, but to a nice clean city of homes." He won.

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

*By Charles Clayton Morrison
and Herbert L. Willett*

Send for returnable copy.

The Christian Century Press
1408 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

The Bethany Graded Lessons

126 Texts Covering
17 Years of Study

Send for returnable samples

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Best Books on Premillennialism

The Millennial Hope

By Shirley J. Case.

$1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

The Coming of the Lord

By Jas. H. Snowden.

$1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

The Second Coming of Christ

By James M. Campbell.

75 cents, plus 10 cents postage.

Modern Premillennialism

By Harris F. Rall.

$1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

For Sale by The Christian Century Press

SUNDAY, JUNE 5 CHILDREN'S DAY

For Foreign Missions

Your Offering will Help to Support Two Hundred Eighty-Two Missionaries now on the Field.

It will Help to Send Out Fifty-One New Missionaries now under appointment who should sail in August and September. They are Ready to go to Ten of the Great Mission Fields of the World. They are Giving their Lives. You should match their Lives with your Money.

The total Foreign Missionary Budget of the United Society for the year is $932,000.00. Of this amount the Sunday Schools are being asked to raise $200,000.00 on Children's Day. If every School would Average One Dollar per Member the $200,000.00 would be more than raised.

The Books Close This Year June 30

Not September 30. . All Children's Day Offerings, to be credited in the next Year Book, must be in by JUNE 30. Take the biggest Children's Day offering in your entire history! Then have your treasurer SEND IT IN AT ONCE. Don't let him forget to send it.

REMEMBER

All Offerings from All Sources Must be in by JUNE 30. Offerings from Budget Churches; Offerings for Home Missions, Foreign Missions, Church Election, Benevolence, Ministerial Relief; from Sunday Schools, Christian Endeavor Societies, Women's Auxiliaries, Individual Offerings, etc. All must be in by June 30 to be credited on this year's receipts.

Make Checks Payable and Send to the

*United Christian
Missionary Society*

1501 Locust St.

St. Louis, Missouri

The Outline of History

A Plain History of Life
and Mankind

By H. G. WELLS

Written with the advice and editorial help of Ernest Baker, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir E. Ray Lankester and Prof. Gilbert Murray. Illustrated by J. F. Horrabin.

HERE is history from the beginning of life on our earth so far as we can trace it by paleolithic records, through the civilizing and decivilizing ages down to yesterday. And much of it is history from the standpoint of common sense. We would hold this view even after you pointed out that Mr. Wells does irreparable damage to many an ancient convention and orthodox tradition. He trains his guns fearlessly on superstition, on corrupting tradition, on historical malpractice.

The author's conclusions stimulate thought. He is an optimist. He sees a new sanity emerging from the hatreds of the war. He looks for a revision of ideas and institutions and the development of a citizenship of the world, with the breakdown of nationalism. Religion to his mind has been obscured by creeds—"the old political and social assumptions, the old religious formulas have lost their conviction." But he expects the future to bring a brotherhood of men rather than of nations, wider education and a religion apart from forms and creeds. Man is to become happier and more contented on earth. He does not seem to fear that, judging by the rate we are going, the old ball may become cold before we achieve that ideal.

This is the big book of the season. Every thinking citizen of these pregnant times should have it.

In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.
Special terms: $5.00 down, balance 30 days.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

Harry F. Ward

on The Competitive System and the Mind of Jesus

Joseph Fort Newton

on George A. Gordon

THE change in the fiscal year of the boards and agencies of the Disciples of Christ, by the vote of the last International Convention, has occasioned some confusion and misunderstanding. Remember that the date for the closing of the present missionary year is midnight June 30. Every church should send in before that time its entire budget or offerings for education, for the three quarters since October first, because the annual report and year book will be made up from that date. Send all education monies for any of the twenty-eight colleges which hold membership on the board, to the Treasurer of the Board of Education, at 222 Downey Avenue Indianapolis, Indiana.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, JUNE 9, 1921

Number 23

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

Divine Providence and Human Providence

IN these days of depression, when the burnished surface of civilization is cracked and our vision is blurred, it is significant that the men who do not lose hope are the men of science. They look before and after, interpreting the posture of events against the long background of the ages and the incredible possibilities of the future. Two notable books by men of science challenge the attention of Christian thinkers, as showing the optimism of science, which is very different from the sloppy, oozy optimism so common among us. One is "The Direction of Human Evolution," by Prof. E. G. Conklin of Princeton, about whom one hears whispers of heresy. The thesis of his book is that man, individually, as represented in the highest minds of the race, has reached the limit of physical and intellectual development. Henceforth his advance must be moral, spiritual, social, and he must now consciously and intentionally direct his development, adding to divine Providence a sagacious, forward-looking, intelligent human providence. A study of the biological bases of democracy shows that "the world is not only safe for democracy, but that it is unsafe for anything else." Can we develop social organization in spite of individual liberty, democratic equality in spite of hereditary inequality, universal fraternity in spite of national and class antagonisms? Yes, by linking religious faith with the facts of life, and it is significant that a third of the volume is devoted to a study of the growth and power of religion. The other book is entitled "Human Behavior," by Prof. Stewart Paton, which takes up the separate individual and studies him in his relation to the problems of the race, and investigates the possibility of his direction of his individual destiny with regard to the progress of civilization. It is a monumental book, and another plea for an intelligent and spiritual-minded human providence. On the whole, though severely critical of much in modern life, especially our educational methods, the book is confidently hopeful: "The hope for the progress of civilization today has probably a more substantial basis to rest upon than at any other period in the history of the human race."

"We Shall Not Forget"

STANDING on the pier of Hoboken on May 23, in the presence of the remains of five thousand boys brought back from France—each casket draped with a flag, until the whole scene looked like one vast Flag of the Dead—President Harding said: "It must not be again. We shall not forget." If those words, so apt and fitly spoken, express anything more than a vague wish—pious, sentimental, negative—what are we going to do about it? If such devout prayers are to be answered, it is the law of human providence that we must organize to answer them. God does not do for us what it is our duty to do. In the house of commons on May 31 Mr. Lloyd George was asked if he had received any suggestion from the American government looking toward a conference in behalf of disarmament, and his reply was that he had not heard a whisper but was waiting to hear it. Until some concerted action is taken toward disarmament, all talk of peace is idle and futile. Major General Maurice of the British army—grandson of a great preacher—makes this confession: "As a soldier who has spent a quarter of his life in the study of the science of arms, let me tell you I went into the British army believing that if you want peace you must prepare for war. I believe now that if you prepare thoroughly and efficiently for war, you get war." To which General Pershing adds: "The world does not seem to learn from experience." Today, as matters stand, in spite of the death of nine millions of young men, and the loss of incalculable wealth, there is no assurance that a like disaster will not befall the next generation. And if it does, as the prime minister said, it will leave the civilization of the white man in ashes.

The Methodist Reading Courses

THE bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church have recently made some changes in the required reading course for Methodist ministers. Some of these young men go into the ministry from the high school, but must satisfy their superiors that they have a knowledge of the required books. Three thousand men are affected by the new course. Henceforth the Methodist minister will have to know something about the social applications of religion. Once churchmen were inclined to dub the preaching of the social gospel as "politics." That day is over in the Methodist church. Social righteousness is clearly recognized as part of the Christian gospel. Another significant change in the course is to be noted in the introduction of the book on premillenarianism by Prof. H. Franklin Rall. This book is pronounced by many scholars as the best counterblast to the premillennialists that has appeared in this generation. The bishops do not intend that the divisive "fundamentalists" shall ever work the havoc in the Methodist church that they have wrought in some other communions. Another feature of the Methodist reading list is that it has in it many authors not of the Methodist persuasion. Among the non-Methodist authors one notes the names of Drs. R. H. Pattison, W. N. Clarke, Washington Glad-den, Williston Walker, J. M. P. Smith, A. V. G. Allen and A. C. McGiffert. In many communions there has been a vicious intellectual inbreeding. The reading of the ministers of lesser training has been confined to the writings of the denominational leaders. The Methodists have in their bishops' plan of a required reading course a device which will go a long way in breaking down the narrowness and insularity of the village minister of limited education.

Roman Catholics and Foreign Missions

PROBABLY no feature of Protestant activity has been more disturbing to Roman Catholic complacency in recent years than foreign missions. Catholicism has in it a geographical element, and unless the oriental nations become Christian in the Roman way, much of Rome's claim to be the world church becomes ridiculous in the eyes of mankind. Thirteen years ago St. Mary's Mission House at Techny, Ill., near Chicago, was founded with five students. At the present time there are 160 students. It was only a few months ago that the first Roman Catholic foreign missionary society was founded in the United States. Under the direction of the proper ecclesiastical authorities, the missionaries will be sent out from this country and their salaries provided by American money. Recently three American trained men educated at the St. Mary's Mission House were ordained as deacons and sent out into the field. These men will not serve as priests, but will undertake to duplicate some of the educational and philanthropic work which has characterized the Protestant mission program. It is the lack of flexibility in the Roman system which has made difficulties for them. The medical missionary, for instance, was also a priest. The use of laymen in missionary propaganda is not an art with which the Roman ecclesiastic is well acquainted. The Roman Catholics have a large foreign mission work supported by European money. In the past the method has been to go into a foreign field and make compromises with the native religions on the best terms possible. In this way there has come about a superficial obedience to the church but often there has been no corresponding spiritual change. The new movement in Roman Catholic mission work means that there will be a higher grade of activity, and that the modern and helpful forms of service will be engaged in. Such a consummation will be hailed with joy by the Protestant missionaries abroad, who have long felt that Christianity in every form should be true to the best spiritual traditions.

The Summer Resorts and the Law

VACATION is not a luxury any more. Most people take one, and even people in quite moderate circumstances go away to a watering place. Stenographers, school teachers, clerks and even factory workmen join the annual summer migration to the woods and to the lakes. In some instances these summer places are under Christian auspices. The Moody church of Chicago has secured the real estate on one side of Cedar Lake, Ind., and changed a place of evil repute into one of religious significance. In most cases, however, the summer resorts are still conducted for revenue only. Everything goes, provided only the vacationist pays for everything. No one interferes with a card game for money. Intoxicated people bear testimony to the fact that the Volstead Act is regarded as only a scrap of paper. All too often the summer hotel shelters immorality and shame. In these centers where the people go for their summers there is often an entire lack of religious opportunity. Summer tourists do not want to keep up a church, and the local people are not interested, or are busy with other concerns. It often happens that there is a little church, with a ministry that is not competent to meet the needs of a summer constituency. If the church were as forward-looking as should be, the names of ministers going to water places would be secured, and these men would be drafted to preach a sermon or two during the vacation time. The real solution of the summer problem is for the church to set up her own recreational centers. Where one person takes a vacation now five might go, if the costs were reduced through cooperation and scientific management. Commercialization tends to degrade the summer vacation, but religion can make it an occasion for the spirit.

The Greatest Question in the World

ACCORDING to the editor of the literary supplement of the London Times, the two greatest questions before the world are not the establishment of democracy or the settlement of the controversy between capital and labor. They are, first, one of faith: What think ye of Christ? and second, one of conduct: How is the fullness of life to be lived in the narrow way; how is a sincere acceptance of Christianity to be reconciled with a free and generous view of civilization? Neither of these problems, he goes on to say, will be solved in one generation or even in a century. But they are the two greatest questions before the world; and, old as they are, their urgency is new. The fathers were great men and solved many problems, but these are questions which each age must answer anew, and its answer gives the measure of its religious thought. The Christian faith is capable of infinite new applications, as well as of a continual deliverance from old trammels and limitations; but its essence is vital. And that essence, as the editor of the Times sees it, is not only that Christ must be interpreted as something which other sons of God are not, but that his religion must be related to art, science, business, love of nature, education, public service, and many other matters in which the historical Jesus offers no definite guidance. At the same time, Christianity is not and cannot be merely the same thing as civilization. That is the issue, not to be discussed in a paragraph, but which asks for the best thought of those who hold the vision of Jesus to be valid. What, exactly, do we mean by the kingdom of heaven upon earth? When we try to answer that question we discover that our thought is as vague as—well, as our idea of Christian union!

Where will the College Graduate Go?

COMMENCEMENT time is upon us, and most of us are invited to our alma mater to see the new crop of graduates march out with honors. There are larger classes than ever. Though the war hindered education, the swing of the pendulum in the other direction has been amazing. The colleges are asking for endowments and equipment now rather than students. Where will this year's graduates go? If one may judge by the questionnaires, more of them will go into business than ever before. Each generation has its own enthusiasms. Once college graduates talked about teaching as an outlet to their energies. There was a period when nearly every one wanted to go into medicine or to become a great surgeon. At certain times the law was the thing, with the possibility of becoming a congressman or President of the United States. The college statistics now show the tremendous popularity of the schools of commerce. Most of these recently organized departments of universities now have to restrict the enrollment. Engineering is also popular. Down underneath these choices is the idea that the big fortunes of America have been built up by manufacturing and by business. Youth today feels that the big thing is to make money. Its enthusiasms are now devoted to this task.

There can be no doubt that the educated man will in the long run become a successful money-getter. Meanwhile college students may well be advised that these waves of student interest always tend to excess. It is possible to have too many engineers and business men, just as it is possible to have too many doctors and lawyers. The two professions most needing recruiting today are the teaching profession and the ministry, and against both of these there stands an economic barrier which only the most heroic souls will venture to overleap.

The Disciples and the Trend Toward Unity

OF all the Christian bodies that are manifesting interest in the effort for closer relations, the Disciples of Christ have invested most heavily in time and activity, and have most at stake. As a movement within the church advocating a bold and aggressive effort to realize unity among the followers of Christ, they have been from the beginnings of their history committed to protest against division, and the conviction that the fellowship of believers is for this period of the church's life the most essential objective.

A hundred years ago and more the pioneers of the movement were led to take the courageous step of severing their relations with the sectarian order, and championing the unity of the church. They believed that the advocacy of this principle would be sufficient. They could not doubt that those who were loyal to our Lord would give heed to his expressed desire for the oneness of his followers when once it was brought to their attention. They were possessed of the naive and confident faith of all reformers that the need of which they were so conscious must appeal with equal urgency to all believers.

Disappointed in this fact, and discovering that unity made no such appeal to their religious neighbors as it did to them, they took a fresh start, and like most of the reformatory movements that had taken form in the past, they placed the emphasis of their preaching upon the need of restoring the ancient church, in which it was assumed complete unity existed. Two mistakes were made in this interpretation of conditions. One was the mistake of assuming that it was either possible or desirable to restore the primitive church. That is an error into which most of the efforts looking to church reformation have at one time or another been betrayed. The other was the mistake of supposing that the primitive church enjoyed even a fair degree of unity. Both are errors due to a faulty or superficial reading of church history. But neither mistake was fatal to the central passion and effort of the movement, though both contributed to hinder its progress.

When the first period of enthusiastic advocacy of immediate and incorporating union gave way to the recognition of the strength and persistence of the denominational spirit, the Disciples settled themselves, almost unconsciously, to a struggle for existence. They ceased to hope for an early realization of their historic dream, but were confidant that in some manner which was not wholly clear, they would in the future be enabled to achieve their purpose. The more zealous had hopes of absorbing the other Christian bodies, and for a time their success in evangelism gave some color to this confidence. Others saw the futility of this expectation, but were perplexed to find an adequate statement of their program.

At the present time there are at least three attitudes of mind in the fellowship of the Disciples, regarding the purpose and possibilities of the organized effort of which they are a part. First there is the group of conservatives who are committed, or profess to be, to the program of Christian union as first interpreted by the pioneers. Unity they imagine is to be achieved by an effort to restore the apostolic church. That effort, when reduced to its lowest terms, is the advocacy of immersion as the only form of baptism. They still believe or affect the belief, that on this platform they are going to make their approach to the remainder of evangelical Protestantism, and accomplish by persuasion, and perhaps by absorption, their historic aim.

There is a second group, of moderate progressives, who see with clear eyes the futility of this effort to convert the Christian world to the immersion dogma as a basis of unity. They preach the union of believers with conviction and urgency, and hope that in some future time it may be realized. They are Disciples both by relationship and faith. But they have little hope that their dreams will be realized in any proximate time. They wish to be true to the historic purpose of the Disciples, but they have little heart in the effort to put the naive program of "restoration" into expression, even if it were possible. They have the cooperative spirit, and would like to see the realization of closer friendship among Christians, but they do not see just how it is to be accomplished on the basis of the program to which they have been taught to commit themselves, and are fearful of denominational disloyalty if they should break through the barriers that seem set across the thoroughfare of a practicable cooperation.

A third group there is who have discerned that the achievement of the ideals of the fathers is not to come through any fantastic attempt to restore the primitive church, nor to bind the people of God to the hard literalism of a set formula of faith, repentance and baptism by immersion. With the hopes and ideals of the fathers they have a firm and confident sympathy, because they realize that these hopes and ideals are capable of becoming realities, though not in the precise manner anticipated in the beginning of the movement. Emancipating themselves from the small conformities of the past, and from the fear of disturbing some of the carefully drawn diagrams of the second generation of Disciples, they find the present an auspicious and inspiring moment for the realization of those very purposes which the fathers cherished without comprehending the precise way in which they were to emerge to efficiency. This growing company of Disciples are completely loyal to the ideals of the movement, but they are not content to camp beside the graves of the pioneers. They feel assured that on what may be called the congregational or community side of the problem of Christian unity, as contrasted with the parliamentary or diplomatic side, the Disciples have a distinctive contribution to make, which they insist must be made. Yet they are committed to the conviction that in each generation a great movement must be interpreted in the new terms which growing knowledge and discernment of the purposes of God suggest. Some things that were at first deemed essential will be discarded. But with deeper conviction, and unimpaired fidelity to the great principles which inspired the enterprise in its beginnings, they demand the privilege of helping in some true and timely way the majestic work of bringing their first hopes to fruition.

The Ministry or Business?

However, I am having many disquieting thoughts, and I mention them to you because, if I had an opportunity, I should want to talk them all over with you, if you would be kind enough to let me. It is beginning to wear in on me that the profession of minister is as often a handicap as it is a help in real, constructive work for the advancement of the kingdom of God. I am feeling the handicap, or limitations which the conservative church polity has placed around the minister, very keenly. I am coming to the conclusion more or less reluctantly that the ministry is discredited among men of affairs, themselves churchmen, who feel that the personnel of the profession is not of high grade, and that they cannot, or do not, make as close an application of religious principles to everyday affairs as they should, or as somebody should, if the work of Jesus in the world is to advance.

Neither does the public at large pay close attention to the thinking of a clergyman when he expresses himself, even after exhaustive study upon the various phases of the social question, because he is supposed to be "out of touch" with his world. However, if a man who is known as a successful business man says identically the same things that the clergyman says, constructive action is at once taken under his leadership.

I have been thinking prayerfully and planning carefully for the future. There is no immediate hurry. I must do this well and when I leave the ministry, if I do, I want to take all of myself along. That is, I must satisfy myself before God in every particular that my motives are absolutely pure.

ABOVE are excerpts from a personal letter written by a young minister seeking the counsel of a highly esteemed and successful Christian layman and passed on with the author's consent to The Christian Century for such comment as we might be disposed to make. The author's name is not known to us. But the mutual friend who received the letter assures us that the minister is a man of deep sincerity, purposefulness and ability, characteristics which the letters themselves plainly disclose. It is impossible for any one to speak for another on the subject of a life calling. After all, one's work must be chosen by each man for himself. Yet there are certain conditions which this young minister is facing which should lend themselves to helpful discussion and counsel.

Our first prompting is to record this observation: that we have yet to see the first minister who has left the ministry for a business career about whom there did not cling an evident sadness, the pathos of disappointment, if not of defeat. There is, apparently, something so deep-going about one's self-commitment to the ministry of Christ that one cannot turn from it into another calling and quite "take all of oneself along," as our correspondent declares he wished to do in case he makes the change. It does not therefore follow that under no circumstances must a minister go into business; but before doing so he will do well to anticipate the unescapable fact that no matter to what degree of success he may attain in business there will always remain with him a wistful, haunting sense of inner tragedy. No man whose soul has sensitively responded to the wooing of the ministry can ever shake himself free of the feeling that in his espousal of the preaching of the gospel, life has joined him to something from which he will never be able wholly to put himself asunder.

Yet unquestionably there are circumstances in which it is better to pay this price of inner distress and pain rather than to go on in the hopeless path of continuous failure. Particularly at this time when the function of the ministry has lost its standardization, as to speak, and is undergoing far more radical modification than churchmen realize, it is to be expected that men will be thrown out of adjustment to their tasks and will come to feel the impossibility of continuing in them. The denominational order with which the church is handicapped and burdened, whose effect is to multiply ministers far beyond the power of the church decently to sustain them, is chargeable with much of the failure of ministers to make fruitful adjustment to their tasks. When communities are divided by sectarian rivalries into mutually inhibitive groups the economic problem of the minister becomes acute. But the economic problem, sharp and distressing as it is, is not so humiliating to the modern-minded minister as the fact that in such a sectarian situation he is shut out from the exercise of what he feels is the most essential and imperial function of his calling—the moral leadership of a whole community as such. He can hope to lead only a select group gathered out of the community, and their relation to the community is in the nature of the case secondary to their relation to certain organized interests of their denomination. The great democratic ideal of brotherhood which is at once the heart of Christianity and the inspiration of all modern moral leaders, is eclipsed and defeated by the irrelevancies, not to say the impertinences, of denominationalism. The church's life, and consequently the life of the church's leader, the minister, tends to be taken up with small and often unworthy interests which bring disillusion to the soul of the minister. It is no wonder that he often turns away sick at heart from his high calling.

It is very easy, however, for a minister both to undervalue his influence and to overvalue the power of the man of business. This we think our correspondent does when he speaks of the ministry as "discredited" by men of affairs, and of the prompt response which a "successful business man" receives when he says "identically the same thing that the clergyman says." Any business man who has taken his Christian responsibilities earnestly and has striven to exercise moral leadership commensurate with his resources, knows that our correspondent's judgment on this point is a case of sheer illusion. And any minister or professional Christian leader who has kept close association with laymen of great resources and power will testify that his most difficult problem is to keep these laymen from utter discouragement at the discovery that their words and deeds meet with so scant and so slow a response from the public. The truth is that whenever business men like the junior Mr. Rockefeller or the late Mr. George W. Perkins, to take two conspicuous examples, commit themselves to causes to which Christian motives prompt them, they at once feel their business as a positive handicap and often an embarrassment. It is the business man who is taking his Christian responsibility seriously who leans heaviest upon his untrammelled minister counsellor, and holds him in even higher esteem than the minister is likely to hold his own profession. If the Christian ministry is today confused, the Christian laity is even more confused. The minister who hopes to find the path of Christian service more accessible and simple in a business career than in the ministry is under the spell of that very common illusion which magnifies the inconveniences of one's own lot and undervalues its advantages, while it distorts the realities of a distant scene in a manner precisely the reverse.

This all goes on the assumption that our correspondent's problem is essentially a problem in idealism, in the ethics of self-investment. But of course anybody with eyes can see that this particular minister is facing the common, sordid struggle which all ministers of today are undergoing, the struggle with an economic situation which is almost, and in a great percentage of cases, altogether intolerable. It is needless to repeat here the statistics concerning ministers' salaries. Ministers as a rule would be willing, gloriously willing, to pay the price of poverty and self-denial for the cause of Christ. But it is difficult to convince them that they have the right to impose upon wife and children the conditions they would themselves willingly undergo if their lives were detached from domestic responsibility. A minister father feels about the education of his children just like any other father feels—and perhaps more so! He looks forward to a college career for them, and for the life of him he cannot see how he can send them to college on a salary of $1,200 or $2,000 or $3,000 under living conditions which make the laying up of any money mathematically impossible. This perfectly legitimate economic consideration is compelling thousands of ministers either to leave their pulpits or to divide and weaken their ministry by taking on certain business interests on the side. This is utterly ruinous to spiritual leadership, as the very minister who engages in it would be the first to testify.

Three things should be said on this situation, leaving with our present correspondent and with all ministers in like circumstances the individual right of deciding their own course. First, it must be emphasized afresh that spiritual leadership always has and always will involve sacrifice. Moral influence, and inherent moral power also, dwell congenially beside self-denial and economic uncertainty. With all that may be truthfully said about the changed conditions of modern life as compared to the ancient conditions under which moral leadership and prophecy were joined to mendicancy and asceticism, the fact remains that only a ministry which sets its eyes upon the immaterial goods of life and refuses to be dismayed by the lack of worldly possessions, will have passion equal to the stupendous moral enterprise for which Christ has commissioned it.

And secondly, ministers need to be reminded of certain inestimable benefits that accrue to their children in sharing the minister's home life, benefits which may outweigh in terms of character and personal efficiency anything that a bringing up amid easier circumstances could have gained for them. The sons and daughters of the manse will rise up in a great host to confirm this observation. As they look back on the self-denial practiced in their father's home they thank God for the stern necessities of their youth. And a multitude of them, too, thank God for the necessity which opened a college career to them only on condition that they earn and pay their own way. The manse was unable to pay their way, but in the manse the vision and the will which found the way were formed in them. The economic constriction of the minister's life is not all liability. Part of it is moral asset.

But the last word on this subject must in all justice be spoken to the church, not to the minister. The problem is not the minister's alone; it is the common responsibility of the Christian fellowship. After all has been said that must be said to the minister about sacrifice being of the very essence of a life devoted to professional spiritual leadership, it remains to be said that a church that fails to provide its spiritual leaders with a reasonable living is lacking in the most elementary principle of the faith it professes. Because it is the duty of the minister to be willing to make sacrifices beyond what others are called upon to make, it does not follow that it is the duty of the church to see to it that he has ample opportunity to make such sacrifices. Whether an adequate provision for the ministry is to be brought about by more generous giving on the part of church members, or by a reorganization of the church in such fashion as to save the enormous waste now going into our overlapping denominational overhead expenses, the truth is that by some means or other the ministry must be decently sustained or the church will lose its soul.

Seeking a Sign

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE is a certain city and its name is Smithville. And the men of that town got busy, and they said, We will put this town upon the map. And they raised Fifteen hundred shekels. And they set up a Great Sign where the Railroad Tracks crossed, that he who ran might read. And the sign said:

WATCH SMITHVILLE GROW
GREATEST RAILWAY CENTER ON EARTH FOR INFORMATION ABOUT FACTORY SITES AND HOME SITES WRITE TO THE SECRETARY OF THE SMITHVILLE BOARD OF TRADE

And they sat down to Watch Smithville Grow. And they greatly admired their sign and bowed down before it and worshipped it. And the Electrck Light Company fitted it up with lights, and furnished the juice free, for they thought that Sleeping Car Passengers would wake up in the night in order that they might Watch Smithville Grow.

And they hired a damsel whose name was Marguerite, but whom everybody knew as Maggie Perkins, who was the daughter of the Druggist, that she should answer Letters of Inquiry, for she could punish a typewriter. And they fitted up an office on the Second Floor of the Smithville First National Bank. And they had letters of gold upon the window, saying, Smithville Board of Trade. And they expected Maggie to have writer's cramp answering the letters of inquiry.

And Maggie had nothing to do but to chew her gum and powder her nose and make dates over the telephone for the movies. For none of the thousands of passengers who rode through Smithville on the two railroads cared a Hoot whether Smithville grew or not.

Now about this time I visited Smithville, and they desired me to deliver an Address. And I said unto them,

It doth pay to advertise provided thou hast the Goods. But I do not watch Smithville grow. This is the evil and adulterous generation that doth seek for a Sign, and the only Sign that shall be given it is the Sign of the prophet Jonah, preaching and saying, If indeed ye desire that Smithville shall grow, then do something to make people want to come hither. Improve your schools. Pave your streets. Paint up your houses and clean up your vacant lots. Destroy the weeds that grow everywhere, and plant flowers or green grass. Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread and your labor for an Electrck Sign that is Nothing to Write Home About. Ye do worship an Electrck Sign, behold it is left unto you desolate. You have proclaimed with great boasting the glories of your town, and have never done a Blooming Thing to make any one want to live in your town.

And a few weeks thereafter they sent me a marked copy of their Local Paper. And they were having a Clean Up and Paint Up Week. And they were discussing the Paving of the Streets. And they were redecorating the House of God, and adding an hundred shekels to the stipend of the Minister, and their School Committee was considering how to improve the School. And I sighed when I thought of Maggie; for if this thing keepeth on, Maggie may have to get busy. For Smithville is really beginning to grow.

Providence

THE skies know nothing of our sorrows. Earth,
Who gave us form and breath, alone can feel
The anguish of the years that hold us fast;
Our sighs reach not unto the peaceful blue:
Thus do our sore hearts cry, when loved ones pass
And leave us overborne by loneliness.

The skies know nothing of our woes! And yet—
How can we tell the limits of His care?
May it not be that skies are bright and blue
To ease our burdened hearts? It may be God,
In tenderness, would keep one zone of life
Untouched by sorrow's bitterness—for us.

As high as heaven is above our eyes,
So high His thoughts above our fondest dreams!

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

The Competitive System and the Mind of Jesus

By Harry F. Ward

A DISTINCTION must be made between the competitive principle and the competitive system. A good many people who have found this a tolerable world and dislike the discomfort of criticizing or interfering with things as they are, imagine they have justified the competitive system when all they have done is to establish the ethical validity of the competitive principle. To these people the competitive system is a bloodless rivalry, a peaceful friendly contest in which the best man or the best team wins, the losers cheer the winners with hearty good will, and the community is benefited by the accelerated efforts of all. This is the competitive principle working at its best, as it does mostly work in professional circles whose code is one of service, not of gain. But this is not the competitive system as it works in our economic arrangements. It is not what is meant by the phrase beloved by socialist soap-boxers; by the competitive system they mean our economic organization.

"That, too," says my scientific friend, "is only another abstract generalization, just like the vague competition whose benefits are lauded by those who think they are thereby justifying the present order. There is no such generality as a competitive system. Examine our economic life and you find everywhere and at the same time the two principles working, competition and cooperation. They are not mutually exclusive." This is obviously the fact; but nevertheless we are living under a competitive system. The two principles—cooperation and competition—are never in balance in the economic life; at any given period one or the other prevails, and by that dominance the prevailing mode of economic organization of any period must be described as either competitive or cooperative.

THE LAW OF TRADE

At present our economic life is organized on the basis of competition, it is carried forward in its separate parts as a competitive struggle. When this period of our economic history began, it was inscribed over its portals that competition was the law of trade, and more than this, that competition was the law of life. The law thus recognized as the regulative principle of the modern economic world has never been abrogated, though it has been seriously limited by the encroachment of the cooperative principle, under the pressure of both the lust for profits and social necessity. But whatever cooperation exists as yet is almost entirely subordinated to the main principle of competition. Aside from the cooperative societies, it is mostly combinations of individuals or groups to enable them more successfully to compete for gain against other groups, and even the cooperative societies, living in a competitive world, find themselves perforce in the same situation. They, too, become a competing force, not simply for economic efficiency but for gain. It is therefore correct to say that we are operating a competitive system, that our pursuit of the means of life, of profit and power—as individuals, as organized economic groups and as nations—is carried on as a competitive struggle.

That both the facts and the meaning of this competitive struggle should be hidden from the minds of so many people in the United States is an instance of the vitality of the idea, an example of the power of a concept to perpetuate itself after the conditions that created it have changed. An unreal concept of competition is held by so many of our people because in the early days of this country the competitive system was largely the kind of thing that now fills their minds. As long as free land awaited enterprise and the means of life and culture were open to and sufficient for all there was practically free competition between individuals, with but few serious casualties. In a situation where a sparse population of different stocks was living with vast unappropriated natural resources within its reach, the competitive system was in general the only practical way of getting the work of the community done and its life advanced. When the natural resources are appropriated, and the means of life controlled, the competitive principle in the economic world takes on a very different form. That this totally different world should still be interpreted in terms of a past economic period, is mainly because the pioneer spirit still haunts the field of its victories, and feeling its presence, men are loath to admit that the pioneer age has gone forever.

COMPETITION AS IT ACTUALLY IS

Before ethical judgment can fairly be passed upon the competitive system, it must be analyzed on the basis of fact as it now exists. It must be weighed concretely—not as a rhetorical phrase or a philosophic abstraction—and its social consequences estimated. A mere glance at the main features will suffice to reveal a situation of grave ethical challenge.

For instance, the boasted beneficence of the competitive system fades into the region of mist when in a time of unemployment like the past winter it was seen close-up as a struggle for bread among the wage-workers. In a similar period of economic depression, I have known men anxious for a day's work to stand in line before daylight in the zero temperature of a winter morning in the Chicago stockyards. I have known them to rip the coats off each others' backs in the struggle to get to the little gate where the "straw boss" was picking out the few men who would that day get a chance to earn bread for their children. Those who cannot now go to the gate of some industrial plant to see what the competitive struggle for bread does to men, should read Whiting Williams and learn how he felt time and time again as he faced the labor boss at the gate of some steel mill, hoping that he and not his neighbor in the crowd would be picked for the job. note how the fear of hunger began to enter his bones, and then remember that his wife and children were well provided for in a comfortable home. Such competition is not like a game of checkers or even football, it is like the rush for the boat on a suddenly sinking ship.

I heard a labor leader trying to make an audience of well-to-do church people understand what the competitive system meant to the wage worker. He said, "You make us fight the boss even when he is a decent fellow and we don't want to; but he has got to look out for his profits and we have got to look out for our wages, for it means our children's lives, and so here we are fighting each other when neither of us really wants to. That is bad enough, but that isn't the worst you do to us. Oftentimes there aren't enough jobs to go around, and you could make enough if you wanted to; but when there aren't enough jobs to go around, sometimes, if I am going to feed my children, I've got to take the bread out of the mouths of some other working man's children. That's the worst thing you do to us. You make us fight each other."

THE BITTER FACT

The bitter fact is that the age of science and machinery which might have brought security in the means of existence to all the people of the earth, has not brought it to even the people in the most advanced industrial nations. On the contrary, it has turned what was in simpler days a struggle against nature which men were winning by gradual cooperation into a still more bitter struggle for bread between themselves. Mass production with the tools of production out of the control of the workers, with a labor market supposedly under the law of supply and demand, means continually recurrent cycles of unemployment for most of the workers and a constant fringe of unemployment in every industry. For millions of producers it makes bread-getting—the primary interest of existence in this world—at best a gamble, at worst a war. It throws the workers into constant competition not for efficiency in production but for jobs and a livelihood.

This struggle now becomes international in its scope. What it has done to the wage-workers of this country since their fellows in Europe were drawn hither by the better lot that was possible in a land of undeveloped resources, is written first of all in the columns of figures that tell how standards of living, real wages and the wage workers' share of the national product have been constantly falling since 1890 and is written still deeper in the homes and children of the working class. What the workers of the orient will do to those of the western world if life must continue as a competitive struggle is a fearful and ominous cloud upon the horizon. To carry on the process of production as a struggle for bread is even more deadly to the spirits of men than to their bodies for if they must hunger and starve, it ought to be possible for them to realize their capacity to do it gloriously, in a fellowship of suffering.

When we pass from the enterprise of production to that of the exchange of goods, the workings of the competitive system are sufficiently well known. Competition has always animated and dominated trade; by it both producer and consumer are supposed to be advantaged.

As the economic life becomes more complicated, however among those engaged in the warfare of trade the casualty list mounts higher and the mortality increases. The small business man has little more security than the wage worker. His enterprise is a desperate gamble in which his chances of winning grow increasingly smaller. He is, however, slightly more fortunate than the industrial wage worker, for the development of merchandizing into combinations of chain stores still offers him a job with a larger measure of security than comes to the man in the steel mill or the coal mine. Competition in trade increasingly tends to become competition between highly organized concerns carrying on a tremendous business over wide areas. This lessens somewhat the well-known economic waste in the excessive duplication of middle-men but it still leaves us too many milk wagons and too many grocery stores on the same street, and increases rather than reduces the waste of advertising. Yet the very fact that in this field we are on the way to a new order emphasizes the truth that the necessary social function of the exchange of goods and services is carried forward in this modern world either as the anarchy of those who have not yet acquired sufficient intelligence to develop an orderly government for their economic life, or as the organized warfare of groups whose members prefer the chances and the risks of predatory plunder to the reward that comes to those men of good will whose life is an organized service to the community.

BUYER AND SELLER

Into the function of exchange, however, the present mode of economic organization has carried the principle of competition still deeper. The buyer and seller now face each other in a different form of contest than that which makes bargaining in the orient a harmless struggle of wit and endurance for the participants, and a diversion for the bystanders. The economic development of the western world has made the bargain oftentimes a fight between buyer and seller, a war between consumer and producer, the one trying to charge what the market will bear, the other oftentimes really fighting for life itself, until all the passions of war are developed. This winter in the liquidation of wartime markets, merchants have been struggling to avoid loss and some to escape ruin, while the buyers have been withholding their purchasing power. Idealists with a fixed income find themselves glad at a reduction in price because of what it means to their children though they know it means loss and suffering to traders and wage-workers. The farmer is now fighting the city whose markets and middlemen have long been fighting him, threatening he will raise what he wants to eat and let us take care of ourselves. Thus has the competitive principle developed into economic warfare, dividing the various members of our economic body against themselves, breeding suspicion and hate until the morale of production is shattered—nor can it be restored by exhortation; without coordination our economic organism cannot adequately function, still less when it is torn to pieces by internecine fighting.

The fundamental reason for this situation lies in the nature of our competitive system; it is a competition for bread and for trade instead of a competition in service because it is a competition for profit and for power. It has finally brought consumers and producers face to face with each other, not to exchange services and goods for mutual benefit but to secure profit, to derive some net gain from the transaction, to secure some advantage whose equivalent has not been given. It is the competition of the trader, not of the producer that has dominated us. We are operating under his rule to make all that can be made regardless of value given. It is his spirit that has finally dominated exchange and then production until they have both become subordinate to organized finance, pawns in the deadly struggle between competing groups of financiers, fighting for the power that comes from the control of economic processes that has finally developed economic imperialism—that struggle of competing nations for the control of the undeveloped natural resources of the earth which necessitates armaments and breeds wars.

STRUGGLE OF INDIVIDUALS AND SYSTEMS

This is the competitive system as it actually operates. It runs all the way from a struggle for bread between individuals to a fight for profit and power between organized groups, between capital and labor, producer and consumer, between warring groups within the world of both capital and labor and between wage workers and financiers of different nations. It is in part an anarchic gamble due to ignorance and in part an organized warfare for plunder due to greed. Is this the last word in economic efficiency? To believe that science will finally leave mankind gambling not with nature but with itself for the means of subsistence, is an insult to human intelligence. To believe that religion will finally leave the human race, with all its capacity for fellowship, fighting between itself to secure the means of culture for children is to desecrate the human spirit. To leave the competitive principle at the center of our economic organization, to make the function of getting and apportioning the necessities of life a competitive struggle in a civilization which is increasingly urban and industrial, is to perpetuate the law of the jungle in a worse form than the jungle ever knew—for the lion kills only to eat and does not decimate the weaker species, while the appetite of humanity for the power that profit brings is insatiable, and the suffering entailed by it is cumulative and endless.

When such a system is brought for judgment under the principles that Jesus taught should govern life and conduct, but one verdict can be rendered. The competitive system may be justified by the ethics of Caesar, Napoleon, Nietzsche, but not by the ethics of Jesus. This teaching has been grossly obscured and strangely distorted by the influence upon theology of competitive individualism in economic life. The doctrine of the survival of the fittest, and the devil take the hindmost has not lacked a counterpart in the world of religion. The enlarged possessive instinct developed by a competitive economic system has even reached out and made the hereafter a field of personal exploitation—"Oh, that will be glory for me!" But not all the lurid emotionalism and dark obscurantism of a possessive religion can obscure the fact that the central principle of Jesus' teaching concerning conduct is the law of neighbor-love and service, that his concept of God necessitates a life of brotherhood, that his ideal of society is a fraternal community in which God dwells. From such teaching there develops a cooperative, not a competitive world. Under its influence, men cease striving against each other for bread, culture and power and instead ask and discover how they may share these things. How many times have those who have heard the words of Jesus sought to organize a cooperative economic life only to be defeated by a world which had organized itself as a struggle for power and so would not let them get their bread in brotherhood?

CONDEMNED BY JESUS

The competitive system stands condemned by the ethics of Jesus not because there is no good will under it, not because it does not give room for any cooperation—there is sufficient of both to guarantee the natural capacity of humanity to work out the teaching of Jesus—but because of the place it gives the competitive principle, because it leaves the business of bread getting a struggle for existence and then enlarges economic activity into a conflict for power; whereas the application of the principles of Jesus would develop it into a cooperative undertaking for the advancement of the common life. The competitive system says: "the strong shall rule"; Jesus says: "the strong must serve." The competitive system says: "there is not enough bread to go around and only a little cake—let's fight for it." Jesus—and here the historic teaching of Christian ethics is a consistent, unwavering line—says: "none has a right to cake until all have bread and as long as any lack bread, it must be shared." This is the old, old ethics of family life kept alive by Hebrew prophets and law against all the pressure of ancient predatory imperialism; it is the only code that will finally unite mankind in one great family.

If humanity continues to organize its economic life as a competitive undertaking, the struggle of the nations to possess the economic resources of the earth will finally destroy civilization. If, however, the nations will accept the teaching of Jesus, they will consider the earth as the common heritage of the one family of mankind, will seek to coordinate their economic activities so as to derive from them nourishment for the bodies, minds and spirits of all the people, and will be welded together in the undertaking.

SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST

The application of the ethics of Jesus to economic organization would reverse the order in which the principles of cooperation and competition now stand and would change the sphere of their operation. It would encourage competition in service instead of competition for gain and so would develop the spiritual society in place of the acquisitive society. The competitive system subordinates the cooperative principle to the struggle for gain and so hinders its development; the ethics of Jesus would use the competitive principle as a means to strengthen cooperative service for the advancement of the common life, it would develop a rivalry in well-doing, beneficial to all.

But such a way of life is not practical, we are told by the successful men of the competitive struggle, who largely control our churches. The survival of the fittest is nature's way of securing efficiency. Has not American Protestantism recorded the famous analogy of a certain rich young man, between the process of producing American Beauty roses by pinching off buds and the process of producing captains of industry and finance. But the rosarians know that there are better roses than American Beauties, and they can be grown out doors for the millions instead of in the greenhouse for the millionaire, without the price that is now paid for the inferior variety; to say nothing of the quality of a religion that values rosebuds and human lives on the same plane. The argument that the struggle for power promotes efficiency is peculiarly seductive to strong men in pulpit or pew, but when they hear it, they had better remember one of the temptations that Jesus resisted, before it was clear that he came not to be ministered unto but to minister. They should know, also, that here as usual Satan is deluding the strong with a lie.

WHAT SOCIAL SCIENCE REVEALS

That the survival of the fittest is not the law of development in nature, that the fight for power is still less the law of development in human society, is made clear by recent works of social scientists. That the competitive system has not produced a management of industry that is efficient even in profit making, that from the standpoint of social possibility and social need the management of great financial organizations operating on a competitive basis is still more wasteful than the waste of anarchic individual competition in the period when social needs were fewer and resources greater is being made clear by the studies of industrial engineers. These scientists are demonstrating that the only way in which society can sustain itself, let alone get the means for the development of its mind and spirit is to coordinate harmoniously and intelligently all the parts and functions of its economic process toward the common end of social wellbeing.

Thus does science support the message of Jesus that if mankind would organize its life as a brotherhood it would get "these things" in abundance and also find God and life everlasting. In this undertaking Jesus also guaranteed some persecutions, and there are undoubtedly some waiting for those engineers and economists who seek to provide mankind with the knowledge, and for those preachers who seek to generate the good will, necessary for the cooperative organization of its economic life. But the scientists and the preachers had better join hands and stand to their duty with courage, and that quickly, for the clouds of doom hang heavy on the horizon. The signs of the times all indicate that the Carpenter was right and the captains and kings were wrong, that, insofar as the economic means of existence and development is concerned, cooperation is the law of life and competition is the law of death.

George A. Gordon

Fifth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

IT IS with Dr. Gordon as a master of the pulpit that I am here concerned, and as one of a host of students who used to throng the galleries of the Old South church, I confess that it is not easy for me to write about him calmly. Under God I owe more to that gracious and wise preacher than to any living man, and but for his influence upon me—alike by the nobility of his character, the integrity of his intellect, and the richness of his insight—at a time when nothing was certain but uncertainty, I should not be in the pulpit today. God be thanked for the leadership of authentic and winsome teachers of faith in the critical, formative years of youth—next to good mothers they are the best gifts of God! It was a joy, as well as an honor, to stand in the pulpit of Old South church and bear such testimony, both for myself and on behalf of a vast company of young men whom his ministry had blessed, on the evening before I set sail to take up my labors at the City Temple.

Others have written of Dr. Gordon as a theologian, ranking him in the dynasty of Edwards and Bushnell, as the third truly great constructive theologian that America has known. With this estimate I am in full agreement, and with the further verdict that in the scope and quality of his labor as a Christian thinker, no less than in the originality and fruitfulness of his total accomplishment—bringing to the service of faith not only exact thinking and ample learning, but a high and tender humanity, an ennobling imagination, and the transfiguring insight of a poet—he out-tops his peers and stands alone. The House of Doctrine, needed for the comfort and habitation of the intellect, and as a shelter for the holy things of faith, is a temple ever "building and built upon." As between the easy-going agnosticism, so widespread in the modern world—often only a labor-saving device to escape the toil of high thinking—and the artificial "block universe" of the old dogmatic theology, Dr. Gordon has been a wise master-builder in an era of theological break-up, building once more a House of Faith in the midst of the years.

A REBUKE TO SUPERFICIALITY

It has been the fashion of late years to make light of theology—forgetting that it is not theology that is wrong, but wrong theology that needs to be reinterpreted—and to all such glib and superficial judgments the ministry of Dr.

Gordon has been a standing rebuke. Like Plato, "the father of theology," he holds that "an unexamined life is unlivable," and that religion must be not simply a life of the spirit—much less a series of chance thoughts and vagrant insights—but an order of ideas, controlling the issues of the heart through the authority of its teaching over the mind. Else it will be an empty emotion or a mere superstition. Hence his task and his toil, pursued with single hearted devotion, making his labor a fulfilment of his own description of the older New England divines, "the teacher of the people, the former of their minds in Christian belief, the thinker who covered their existence with the power of a consistent thought of the universe." At once critical and creative, his study of the old New England theology is a piece of analytic and synthetic criticism which it would be difficult to match in the entire literature of theology, showing how life acts upon abstractions as fresh air acts upon mummies—how they crumble to dust and blow away. But in its place he has helped to erect upon surer foundations a more spacious Home of the Soul, and we behold "the sweet heavens built in unity and dominion and power, and under them the obedient, awestruck, and yet hopeful world of men." Nor must we forget that Dr. Gordon, like the apostolic succession of great thinkers in which he stands, has toiled not as a technical theologian, but as a preacher in the active service of the church, living not in the half lights of a few arid and well-domesticated abstractions, but in the vision of truth as it stands in the service of our piteous, passionate, and pathetic human life.

TYPES OF PREACHERS

No one questions that Dr. Gordon is a great preacher, but we learn very little from that fact, because great preachers are of many kinds; chiefly of two kinds, as he himself once pointed out in an exquisite tribute to Dr. Munger. There is the type represented in America by Beecher and Brooks, and in England by Parker and Spurgeon—"the fiery orator, the master of assemblies, the cyclonic commander of the assent and homage of the multitude." Such a preacher is properly placed in a great center of population, where he may make his audience by a process of gradual selection from among the mass of those to whom his individual quality appears; but it is delusion fatal to the ministry to imagine that there is no other type of great preacher. There is the type represented by Bushnell and Munger, by Martineau and Tipple—who preached such sermons as Emerson might have preached had he remained in the pulpit, and whom Ruskin called "the greatest master of pulpit prose." This preacher is no striking orator. He can never be popular except with a few select minds. He prevails mightily, but it is by the depth and vitality of his ideas, by the intensity and clarity of his vision of God, and by the form and beauty which he presses into the service of his vocation. He is the scholar, the thinker, the seer, and his power lies wholly in his message and in his high concern to utter it. He influences men deeply, especially young men who are caught up into the radiance of his vision, and he remains a fertilizing power long after he passes away. No one will deny that Bushnell is more than a peer of Beecher or Parker; at least our admiration for the orator must not blind us to the right of Munger and Martineau to an equal honor in the ministry.

BOTH PROPHET AND MAN OF LETTERS

More nearly than any man in our generation—more nearly than any preacher I can recall—Dr. Gordon has united these two types of preaching; the thinker and the orator, the scholar and the artist; the prophet and the man of letters; the theologian whose sermons are lyrics and whose theology is an epic. If he is not widely known as an orator, it is because his devotion to the high task has kept him too much from the great assemblies of the church, and he has not been at the beck and call of patriotic, social, and academic fraternities with the result that there is no body of secular oratory by him as there was in the case of Beecher. But at his best, in his great hours of vision and conquest—especially when he drops manuscript and lets himself go—Dr. Gordon is an orator of incomparable power, of unique and compelling charm, who can make smiles and tears alternate as swiftly as Beecher did; whose touch is light enough for the after-dinner speech, with its potpourri of wit and story, yet commanding and weighty enough on occasion to shape the policies of church and state. Those who have not heard him when he is deeply stirred, and dealing with a great theme before an expectant throng, do not know him at his highest and best. The sweep and grasp and grandeur of his thought, aglow with virility, sympathy, and abounding hope, and shot through with the color, fire and beauty of a poet, is a thing of splendor. Master of a picturesque, variegated and brilliant homiletic, his eloquence blooms into literature, and if poetry is of his essence, "the prophet-warrior in him exorcises the table-serving priest."

DEMOCRATIC OLD SOUTH

Surely no one can ever forget a service in Old South church, where all classes of people mingle in an air of democratic fellowship. There the Back Bay matron worships with the simply-dressed school teacher, and the railroad president and the brakeman on his line are equally at home. Boston is a hive of student life, proof of which is seen in the rows of eager, intelligent faces in the galleries. The preacher arrests attention by his stalwart frame, his massive head, his shaggy brows, his piercing eyes, and by the simple dignity of his manner. Tall, broad-shouldered, finely formed, one can well believe that he did good work in the iron-foundry when he came, "a lad of pairs," from Aberdeenshire to make his future in America. The face and figure are worthy of the brush of a great painter of men. Rugged yet gentle, it is a face that one can study for a long time, reading in it the story of his struggle upward, his fearless facing of the issues of thought, and his fight for a larger faith; and there are lines where smiles fall asleep when they are weary. For all his learning, he is a man of the people, and as he prays one feels that he not only knows people, but loves them. The prayer is neither hortatory nor declamatory, but brooding, tender and far-ranging in its sympathy, mindful alike of the joys and sorrows of home and of the burdens of the man of state. He talks with a God whose love is equal to his power, and there are phrases that haunt the heart for years, as when he seeks "the consolation of moral self-respect," or death is described as "the last, ineffable, homeward sigh of the soul."

A MAN OF WIDE SYMPATHIES

When the sermon begins the mood of the preacher alters—disciplined thought takes the place of worshipful passivity, and the truth of the day is seen against a long background of philosophy and a far horizon of faith. His gestures are vigorous rather than graceful, as befits the forthright sinewiness of his thought, and if certain mannerisms are disconcerting at first, they are atoned for by a Scotch burr which still clings to his accent. The symmetry of the sermon is a feat of homiletic genius, and as its great power gathers and grows one feels that the secret of the preacher is that he has what Wordsworth called "the first great gift, the vital soul." Positive without being dogmatic, he has no "art of subtle phrases that touch the edge of assertion and yet stops short of it." What loftiness and range of thought, expounding the sublimity and tenderness of Christian faith; what gorgeous coloring of imagination, rich and vivid in its tints; what analyses of character, done with the stroke of the etcher; what wealth of allusion to literature, science, philosophy, the poets with whom he lives and the eager, troubled, aspiring life of man. Here is a man whose interest ranges from Aristotle to the records of champion athletes, equally at home in St. Augustine and Alice in Wonderland, to whom nothing human is alien or without meaning. There are scenes from nature in many moods, gusts of elemental feeling, and epithets Carlylean in their withering blast. Sunlight alternates with shadow, and the swift, terse summing up of an individual character or an historical epoch—surpassing Fairbairn in vividness—is followed by lines from Robert Burns so apt that they seem to have been written for the day. But he knows just how far he can lead us at the moment—how much strain feeling and attention can stand without fatigue—and before we are aware of it some flash of bright humor, never far away, has relieved the tension, before he takes us with him to the triumphant conclusion. Often we have a glimpse of his early days and then one hears a note of sweetness, melting pathos, as of one who knows the beauty and sorrow of life and the sadness of its long farewells:

I remember well the last walk that I took in my native land before I sailed for the Western world more than forty years ago. It was on one of the longest and brightest days in June. I had said good-bye to dear friends and my solitary path for ten miles lay through peaceful and fruitful farms and over the ridge of a mountain whose shapely summit had looked down upon the coming and going of immemorial generations of men. Then followed a long stretch of moor, barren, dismal, whose heather would in three months bloom again and fade like the hopes in the hearts of poor human beings. As I struck the moor, the sun was setting. The lonely path lay in the great transfiguring radiance. It became a path of beauty and infinite tender suggestion; a heavenly meaning seemed to beat in the boundless glow; a sense of companionship, not understood then, settled in the heart, delight took the place of loneliness, and the journey that thus lay in the path of the setting sun I could not wish to end.

More than forty years have come and gone since then. Farewells have been spoken to many friends for the last time on earth. The journey has been through much of the beauty of the world, and still the way has been over hill and moor, crag and torrent. The pilgrimage has often seemed a type of the lonely and sorrowful migration of men from the shadows of morning to the gloom of the evening. The happiest experiences have not deafened me to the still sad music of humanity, the evanescence of all things earthly has been a constant refrain in my spirit. Despair and utter heart-break would long ago have undone my days if nothing heavenly had been found to glorify and comfort and protect the precious burden of human love.

"The light that never was on sea or land" enfolds the way of every pilgrim. He is traveling in the glow that falls upon time from the Eternal; his path is in the transfiguring presence of the Infinite Love. . . .

Who would stop, or fear to advance,
Though home or shelter he had none,
With such a sky to lead him on?

The first volume of sermons by Dr. Gordon—as distinguished from his essays and lectures—was published in 1906, and its appearance was both a religious and a literary event. It is entitled "Through Man to God," and deals not with the passing moods and modes of thought, but with the fundamental issues of faith. What is final? What is sovereign? Who is God? How shall we appear before God? Is the character of the Eternal accessible to Man? And if so, how? Along what path shall we approach that character? No serious-minded man can read these discourses without being enlarged and enriched by them, and to have listened to them must have been one of the great inspirations of a life-time. In stateliness of thought, in scope and clarity of insight, in nobility of sentiment, in strength and beauty of diction, they match the greatest sermons in Christian history. The technique of the preacher is forgotten in the majesty of his thought, all is so spontaneous, so natural, so free. The short sentence prevails, but the poetic imagery of the style is in the fiber, not in the dress of the thought. It is a vision of God through humanity at its highest, and if it is humanity that interprets God only God can adequately interpret humanity. The universe is seen in its vastness as unveiled by science, but despite its seeming moral contradictions, it is the native country of the human spirit, for God is in it and love is its final law. The preacher lives with great men, great epochs, great events; the old philosophers are his fellows, the prophets and the classic poets, and one learns that it is the great truths that are the home-speaking truths. What is the great meaning of it all? is the ever-recurring thought, refrain of a volume the cumulative impression of which is simply overwhelming. The last sermon, "God All in All," is a theodicy exalting, subduing, satisfying—a sermon more majestic, more fundamentally true and beautiful it is difficult to imagine.

THEOLOGY OF FATHERHOOD

With the theology of Dr. Gordon I have not to do, except to say that his chief service has been the transformation of our thought of God from the partialism of a sovereign to the universal saving grace of a Father; and he is one of the few men who has had the courage to follow that vision through to its inevitable conclusion. My purpose here is not with his theology, but with the art and genius with which he has preached a faith not won without struggle—as we learn from a bit of revealing autobiography in the second of his lectures on the “Ultimate Conception of Faith.” It is thought by some that Dr. Gordon preaches philosophy more than theology, and theology more than religion, but that is to err; though his published works might leave such an impression. But in the ordinary course of his ministry it is not so. Life is above philosophy, and he touches its practical problems with the same insight and power with which he expounds the faith by which it is lighted and led, preaching righteousness so full of ideal splendor as to over-awe and win the heart, and so instinct with love as to stir the sluggish will. On public questions he can withhold his thunder-bolts, but if he speaks the spade is called a spade, as Plutarch said of one of his characters. He follows no fads, and is duped by no delusions, nor does he have any patience with clap-trap:

The cry for a revival of religion is natural; but the religion to be revived is not the right kind. . . . For this end professional revivalism with its organizations, its staff of reporters who make the figures suit the hopes of good men, the system of advertisements, the exclusion or suppression of all sound critical comment, the appeals to emotion and the use of means that have no visible connection with grace, is utterly inadequate. The world awaits the vision, the passion, the simplicity, and the stern truthfulness of the Hebrew prophet; it awaits the imperial breadth and moral energy of the Christian Apostle of the nations. . . . I have spoken of the few elect souls, men and women, in our churches who are worthy to stand among the best of the Christian ages. What about the mass of church people? Are they not as fond of the polluted book, the play with its appeal to sensual passion, as their pagan neighbors? . . . Do they not know every avenue of exclusiveness and pride, every black art of gossip, every twist and turn of the ropes of inhumanity, and do they not attend church and look for the coming of the kingdom of God? What kind of a revival will meet this case? Hysteria will not do, nor the devoutness of Lent, nor a turn at psychic healing, whether as patient or patron. What is demanded here is the axe laid at the root of the tree; the new heaven and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness; the renunciation of the devil and all his works, and the profound and sincere appeal to the Eternal God.

PRODIGAL BROTHERLINESS

There speaks a man who is as prodigal in his brotherliness as he is pungent in his rebuke of sin, sham, and unreality; a man to know whom is a religion. If there is such a thing as Christian envy, not evil but honorable—a kind of joyous jealousy in the presence of great work greatly done—the ministry of Dr. Gordon, alike by its completeness, its consistent devotion to an “august opportunity,” and its fruitfulness in practical service, would excite such an emotion. One cannot overestimate the worth, both in achievement and example, of his years of high, incessant work, full of the peace of great thoughts and the chastening force of pure motives, undisturbed by vulgar popularity. Lov-able as a friend, wise as an adviser, inspiring as a teacher, beloved as a shepherd of souls, the nearer one comes to him the more just and stainless he seems to be. No great preacher has ever been more responsive to the gallant and chivalrous love of his younger brethren, all of whom will join me in applying to him these words of his own, written of one whom he loved and admired:

Above all else for this high grace, we, his brethren in the ministry, revere and love him. Under his influence we feel upon our hearts the peace of God, and we do not grudge him his great gifts, his distinguished success or his place in the reverent esteem of thousands. He has blessed us with the sense of the grace that comes only from our Lord Jesus Christ, the love that issues from God the Father, and the friendship that stands in the communion of the Holy Spirit. Long may his witness continue. Long may he live in his hospitable home, among his books and his friends, with his fruitful pen busy in the service of the kingdom of heaven. In his day may there be no failing light, and when the inevitable evening comes may its soft farewell fires be lost in the glorious peace of the eternal morning.

VERSE

Going to School to God

I LIKE to go to school to God!
I hear such strange, revealing things;
He talks to me where rivers run
And where a skylark soars and sings.

He teaches me His love and care
Through every tree and blade of grass
Here on the hill where I may sit
And listen while the wild winds pass.

He writes with glaciers on the rocks
And with the stars that blaze on high;
With fossil shells and ferns that fall
And leave their imprint as they die.

His books are beds of slate and coal;
His manuscripts sequoia trees;
While earthquakes punctuate the tale
And turn the pages of the seas.

His blackboard is a canyon wall
Whereon He writes of ages past,
In even lines the strata tell
Of things that shall forever last.

He writes with rivers and they carve
The crevices He leaves, to tell
The story of His living love
In temple, tower and pinnacle.

I like to go to school to God
Because it always seems to me
He talks in every breeze that blows;
Through every bud, and bird and bee.

WILLIAM L. STIDGER.

Resurrection

DREAMING, within a forest deep,
I saw great Death himself, asleep,
And raised my sword to slay,
When lo, arising from the sod,
Even as a thousand suns of day,
I saw, not Death, but God!

CHARLES G. BLANDEN.

Kropotkin: A Modern Abou Ben Adhem

By William E. Gilroy

NEWS from Russia has long been surrounded with uncertainty, but there appears to be full confirmation of the report of the death, in Moscow, early in the year, of Prince Peter Kropotkin. After nearly sixty years of exile from his beloved Russia, against the remonstrance of his friends, when Kerensky offered repatriation to revolutionary exiles, he had hastened from his quiet home in England, a man already in his eighties, to spend his last years in assisting the Russian people in the task of reconstruction. The emergence to power of Lenin and Trotsky left little place in Russia for passionate lovers of liberty, like Kropotkin, and it was rumored that his old age, and prestige in the revolutionary world, did not save him from imprisonment and suffering. In any event he was stricken with a long illness, which has proved fatal.

For many years I have been deeply interested in the life and writings of Prince Kropotkin. I never met him, but through the kindness of a mutual friend I have seen many private letters from him, and if I had not already been drawn to him by the charming story in his own "Memoirs," and by many beautiful things in his other writings, these letters would have won my admiration, and would have established in relation to him a bond of fellowship. Never have I read letters more beautiful, both in matter and expression, breathing the pure spirit of love of truth and of love of humanity, and closing always with the simple, unaffected salutation, "With brotherly love, Peter," or "With brotherly love, P. Kropotkin."

AN APOSTLE OF BROTHERLY LOVE

In that salutation, I am convinced, one finds the clue to the character, outlook and activity of the eminent revolutionist and man of science. He was an apostle of brotherly love. And if love be the supreme thing in God and man, there is profound truth in the assertion of the friend to whom these letters were addressed that Kropotkin was a rare religious genius. To him, indeed, it was not given to pronounce the shibboleths of religion, nor even to believe in the God of church, creed and theology. Brought up in an atmosphere where all three were associated with baseness, ignorance and tyranny, he spurned their God. He did not even, like Tolstoi, come to associate the name of God with the things of freedom. In his "Ideals and Realities of Russian Literature," he wrote of Tolstoi with great sympathy and power of comprehension. He undoubtedly understood the nobility of ideal and character that men of goodwill associate with Christian symbols. But a striking element in Kropotkin is the uniqueness with which he held entirely aloof from metaphysics and speculation. His creed was that of a scientist, but he was as unique for what he found in science, as for what he failed to find in metaphysics and religious speculation. In an age in which science was making much of "the struggle for existence," and "the survival of the fittest," and in which men were building in science new defences of tyranny and of the crushing of the weak by the strong, Kropotkin rendered a profound service for idealism by showing that it was only through mutual aid, through the various forms of life co-operating and helping one another, that life had survived at all. In his book, "Mutual Aid: A Factor of Evolution," he marshalled the facts through all the stages of life, from the lowest to the highest, and showed that the deepest and greatest law of life and progress was not that of struggle, but of mutual assistance. In its highest aspect in human life what Kropotkin called "mutual aid" corresponded very closely to "brotherhood," or to the "brotherly love," in the salutation with which he closed his letters. While he never found a metaphysical God, as a scientist he found a creed of the highest optimism, and discovered in the facts of life and the constitution of the universe a sufficient basis for the noblest ideals. Thus, from youth to old age, in a character of great beauty, ingenuousness and sincerity, with rare persistency and consistency, he personified, possibly beyond all other men, Leigh Hunt's Abou Ben Adhem; and, though his name was not in the list of those who loved the Lord, in word and deed he wrote himself down

"... as one who loves his fellowmen."

HATRED OF TYRANNY

There is sad irony in the circumstance that characterizes a Russian like Pobiedonostseff, late procurator of the Russian church, as a "Christian," while for a Russian like Kropotkin there can be found only the term "atheist." The fact is that, having done its best to label God current Christianity has established some sad anomalies in the labelling of men. If we come back to simple, elemental realities, and actually believe that God is love and that "He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God," we shall be prepared for some fundamental readjustments in our judgments of character and service. We shall find a wealth of godliness in unexpected places. But I pass over these anomalous things to trace the origin and nature of Kropotkin's idealism.

It is not an easy task. Perhaps there is an unaccountable element in every man of genius. In his "Memoirs of a Revolutionist," Kropotkin has himself described with beautiful simplicity and clearness the circumstances of his early life, and his entrance into the revolutionary world. But this ingenuous narrative can hardly be said to account for the necessary causes underlying the springs of action. What is it that leads a man of ancient and aristocratic lineage, a man of princely rank and great worldly prospects, to renounce the conditions and privileges which his forbears have accepted without question, and which others similarly born fight to the last to maintain? Can there be any such explanation except that there is a divinity in man which in the darkest times and situations strangely asserts its presence and its power? Kropotkin's father was a typical aristocrat and landowner, one of the best, it is true, but never questioning his position and privileges, and capable of the relentlessness and cruelty common to his class and situation. His mother, who died when he was still a child, seemed to have left a deep impression upon Kropotkin. Pleasure-loving but gracious, she was beloved by the peasants, and Kropotkin tells how a peasant woman, meeting himself and his brother in the fields, would ask, "Will you be as good as your mother was? She took compassion on us." In the memory, rather than the influence, of his mother is the germ of his character and career. But the fact is that we see in Kropotkin the reaction of a curiously uncorrupted nature in a harsh and brutal environment. In the loss of the mother's love, Kropotkin says, he found among the serf servants "that atmosphere of love which children must have around them," and both he and his brother Alexander returned that love with full measure.

Two scenes, both typical of injustice and oppression, are indelibly impressed upon the child's mind. One is the flogging of a servant for some trivial offence. The servant, Makar, has returned from the police station, after receiving a hundred lashes with the birch rod. The children cannot eat their dinner. Makar enters with a pale, distorted face.

"Tears suffocate me," says Kropotkin, "and immediately after dinner is over I run out, catch Makar in a dark passage, and try to kiss his hand; but he tears it away, and says, either as a reproach or as a question, 'Let me alone; you, too, when you are grown up, will you not be just the same?'" And Kropotkin records his childish protest: "No, no, never!"

The other scene is of his father narrating for the children how he won the cross of Saint Anne and the golden sword which he wore. His father had served on the general staff in the Turkish campaign of 1828, and was lodged with the staff in a Turkish village when it took fire. Houses were enveloped in flames, and in one a child had been left. In response to the frantic cries of the mother, Frol, his father's servant, had rushed into the flames and saved the child, and the chief commander, who saw the deed, had at once given his father the cross, for gallantry.

"But, father," exclaimed the children, "it was Frol who saved the child."

"What of that?" replied the father. "Was he not my man? It is all the same."

A MAN OF THE PEOPLE

There can be little doubt that this last incident symbolized for Kropotkin the world of exploitation and oppression. The people labored, served and sacrificed, only to be robbed, not only of their heritage, but of the most direct rewards. It is surprising that this intense sympathy for the people, so early developed, survived the years of training in a military school, which Kropotkin underwent as a member of the corps of pages of the Russian court. But on the threshold of active life, well equipped and with an intense interest in literature and science, it is this passion for the people that dominates him. He describes how, when barely sixteen, he had made his start "as an investigator of popular life," and his intimate and pleasant association with the people during the holiday intervals from his school-life in Moscow. Already into his life had come that decision, which he so graphically describes in his "Appeal to the Young."

In his introduction to Kropotkin's "Memoirs," the eminent critic, Georg Brandes, does not hesitate to say that he thinks Kropotkin was mistaken in putting the task of the liberation of the people, through the bringing to them of knowledge already gained, above the work of making new discoveries. Brandes says that with this conception Pasteur would not have been the great benefactor of mankind that he has been. But Kropotkin evidently believed that the dissemination of knowledge among the people would itself prove the greatest possible boon to science. "We have to order things in such wise," he wrote in the "Appeal," "that all humanity may be capable of assimilating and applying them (i. e. the discoveries of science); so that science, ceasing to be a luxury, becomes the basis of everyday life. Justice requires this." He proceeds to say that "it is above all important to bring about a radical change in this state of affairs which to-day condemns the philosopher to be crammed with scientific truths, and almost the whole of the rest of human beings to remain what they were five or ten centuries ago, that is to say, in the state of slaves and machines, incapable of mastering established truths. And the day when you are imbued with wide, deep, human and profoundly scientific truth, that day will you lose your taste for pure science. You will set to work to find out the means to effect this transformation. . . . Weary of working to procure pleasures for this small group, which already has a large share of them, you will place your information and devotion at the service of the oppressed."

THE WORLD OF REVOLUTION

It was precisely this that Kropotkin proceeded to do. Neither his position in society, nor the fact that, through discoveries in an expedition to the Amur which practically revolutionized prevailing conceptions of the geography of Asia, he had achieved a commanding place in scientific circles, deterred him from the task of educating the people. A young man engaged in this work of education (Kropotkin insists that the early activities of many who afterwards were driven to terrorism consisted in nothing more than peaceful education of the people) was arrested, and it was discovered that he was one with the prince and scientist. Neither his rank, nor the urgent plea of non-revolutionary scientists, saved him. He was thrown into the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, whence he escaped shortly, only to begin the long period of exile from his native land—unbroken until the Romanoffs had fallen. For a few years he was in a French prison, held there for no explicit offence but because the French government wished for diplomatic reasons to please the Czar, but the greater part of his exile was spent safely in England, where he lived a very busy life, constantly giving forth the fruits of his labors in books, and in articles in reviews and magazines.

Kropotkin was a revolutionist. "Seldom," says Georg Brandes, "have there been revolutionists as humane and mild as he." But he was none the less a revolutionist. It is not my purpose in this article either to defend or expound his revolutionary ideas. What I am primarily concerned with is his spirit, his genius as a lover of his fellow-men, rather than with the forms or methods in which that genius found expression. It is possible to appreciate the man, and the great ideal that inspired him, without feeling bound to accept or defend particular ideas or actions.

I question, however, if Kropotkin were revolutionary in a sense very different from that in which every great Christian, or lover of his fellowmen, is revolutionary. He saw that the world needed re-making, and not merely re-forming; that it was the spirit of organized society and institutions that was wrong, and not merely some trouble on the surface. Technically he was known as an "anarchist communist," but one will find in his long, revolutionary career little that corresponds to popular notions either of anarchism or of communism. He was never, like Tolstoi, an advocate of non-resistance; but a friend, who knew both Kropotkin and Tolstoi, tells me that the former was in reality much the more peaceable man of the two. It has been said that "he did not rely on moral force alone for an amelioration of the world," but it may be said that very few men do, and least of all the strong upholders of constituted authority. The same writer has said that "he was prepared to justify revolt and even assassination if properly directed," and quotes another writer as saying that Kropotkin considered that "in the destructive work of anarchism force had its place as the 'midwife' of reform." I think that it would be nearer the truth to say that he did not regard violent acts against the state, as inherently different from, or more reprehensible than, violent acts in the name of, and under the professed authority of, the state; but that he regarded violence as of little value in the work of revolution. After considerable acquaintance with his revolutionary pamphlets, as well as with his other writings, I should say that the most pronounced, if not the only, case in which Kropotkin ever directly incited to violence and the use of force was at the outbreak of the recent war, when he strongly supported the cause of the Allies, and called upon all to do everything possible to defeat Germany.

A FREE SOCIETY

Two things must constantly be borne in mind in relation to Kropotkin as a revolutionist. First, that he regarded all domination of man by man as inherently evil, and sought to see it displaced by the spirit of cooperation and mutual aid. Second, that the background of Russia must be taken into account. For Kropotkin the state symbolized the usurpation of the authority, and the domination of man by man. The ideal of a free society is acceptable to all good men. The only question is as to the means of its attainment. Kropotkin believed fundamentally in the goodness of human nature, and in the power of man's social instinct. The state was an interference with and suppression of the natural forms of association and mutual aid that the people would have developed had conquerors and rulers left them alone. The fine irony with which Jesus spoke of those who exercised authority as being called "benefactors" appears in Kropotkin's references to the ruling and princely class that he had himself abjured. He believed that if the great usurpations of history could be undone the people would readily establish relations of mutual aid, and that all that was necessary for organized life would survive the overthrow of the state. It is evident that, whatever we may think of Kropotkin's idea of the state, there was nothing anti-social in the effort to overthrow the state as he conceived it. We remember also that if the state, in Russia, typified absolutism and usurpation, in Russia also were found in marked degree among the people the elements and possibilities of cooperation and communal life.

Kropotkin would undoubtedly have repudiated any tendency to qualify his reference to the state with the word "autocratic." He appreciated the freedom he enjoyed under the British crown, and I am told that on his tour through Canada he expressed surprise at the measure of popular liberty that he found associated with government, but he would probably have considered that even in modern democracies there is much that survives of the spirit and activity of the autocratic state. I venture to think, however, that, if Kropotkin had been born in the United States, or even in England, instead of in Russia, much of his revolutionary thought would have been expressed differently, or with at least some modification.

A PRINCE OF COMPASSION

I repeat, however, that I am not concerned with expounding, or defending, his revolutionary opinions. So much I have written to show how essentially these opinions were grounded in his intense hatred of tyranny, and in his passion for human brotherhood. If his estimate of man, and of his possibilities for freedom, was unduly optimistic; if he underestimated the place of sin, and of human perversity, as factors in the social problem; that does not lessen the beauty of that great compassion with which he viewed the poor and oppressed, nor the glory of that love with which he sought to aid them.

If to perceive with clearness a great ideal, to explore its foundations and relationships, and to pursue it throughout life with single-minded fervor, with a sublimity of directness, sacrifice, and courage, be the qualities of religious genius, Prince Peter Kropotkin had religious genius in masterful degree. Seldom has there been a life so nobly conceived and lived. He was an exile from the world of religion, as from the country that he loved, but in that exile he displayed in a glorified way some of the deepest things that Jesus taught. In the day when the church learns to seek, and rejoice in, every element of faith, however held and manifested, with the same intensity with which the church has hitherto sought to exclude the heretical—in that day, I am disposed to believe, we shall have a new Saint Peter on the roll of saints, and his other name will be Kropotkin.

"We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren."

BOOKS

Any book in print may be secured from The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago. Give name of publisher, if possible.

Who Takes the Loss of Industrial Depression?

THE usual objection to any plan of profit-sharing or other type of industrial cooperation is that labor is unwilling to bear a share of the loss. Gladstone even made this objection. Had he analyzed the situation a little more clearly Britain might have been saved some of the critical situations now facing her. Gladstone's ideas on social questions were not unlike those he advocated on religious questions; they showed more evidence of devotion than of penetration. Like most great men whose field is in one rather exclusive line he spoke with the tone of authority, but without the substance thereof. When Edison talks science all the world listens, but when he pronounces in like tones of authority on religion it is better not to listen. Just so it is with Mr. Bryan, and so it is with Mr. Gladstone, and so it is with many a master of finance and captain of industry in these days who speak on labor issues. Knowing their own fields, they transfer their tone of authoritativeness to fields wherein their knowledge is quite superficial.

In no field today are the issues more obscured than in that of labor: every man speaks with the tone of finality. The financier knows money and speaks with an air of infallibility on labor issues; the business man likewise knows markets and issues obiter dicta on labor; the editor knows news and judges labor problems in the same news-hunting manner; even the employer thinks in terms of machines and balance sheets without duly estimating the human factors in his labor relationships. He still persists in speaking of labor in terms of commodities, the law of supply and demand and other commercial and material factors. The fundamental things in industrial relationships are the human and ethical things involved. Men, both singly and in masses, require more precise and far-reaching study than do goods or markets or machines or any other factor involved in industry.

* * *

The Loss in Unemployment

There are between four and five million wage-earners unemployed in America at the present time and almost as large a percentage of the population in Great Britain. In England the fact that the majority were yesterday offering their lives for the defense of the empire adds tragedy to the situation. Yesterday they risked life and limb for a pittance per day, and today they return to bear the brunt of the loss involved in after-the-war readjustments. As in every country at war, the soldier fought for a pittance in wage and the great employer added to his wealth by making war munitions. The investor conserves his capital; the wage-earner saves his life if he can. This is the phase of the problem the business man, the employer, the editor and the average every other man does not adequately take into account. He knows capital will not work unless it is remunerated with profits, and he does not take the trouble to think through the human consequences of that fact in times of industrial depression; and many of him will call an article like this the work of a dreamer or a novice or a radical or some such thing that is meant to deprecate it.

But let us frankly face the human side of the issue. Who bears the major loss? Capital may be losing its profits or even be suffering impairment. To save this material loss it stops working and saves itself all it can. Labor is not merely losing dividends; it is losing bread and butter or its savings or both. The equation puts profits on stored up property over against daily bread and the very home and lives of those dependent upon the wage-earner. Capital has a chance to save itself; what chance does labor have? Capital is insensate material goods; labor is living human beings. There is no equity in the equation. Capital has a choice, labor has none; it must suffer and wait upon the fates.

* * *

Why Not a Surplus Fund for Labor?

Most investment concerns employing labor provide a surplus to cover times of depression. The steel trust now has more than a half-billion dollars laid up, besides depreciation and sinking funds. That would pay average dividends on their stock for a decade; it fortifies them against all panics, strikes and periods of depression. But such misfortunes would drop thousands of wage-earners out on a workless, wageless world. Today the millions out of work are told that they should have saved when times were good; in other words, they should have provided their own surplus and borne all the misfortune of unemployment. Of course they should save, but should the business that lays up great surplus funds for the stockholders have no thought of a surplus fund for the wage earners? Must profits be forever put over against bread and butter in a pitiless system of economics that thinks only of profits for production and never of safety for consumption?

The writer recently asked Arthur Nash, of the Golden Rule in Industry fame, if his company provided a surplus for a time of depression. He laughed ironically and said it was the Rule of Gold that did that sort of thing. Then he asked who provided labor with a surplus for such times and added, "We will not shrewdly say to our workers you help us to lay up extra profits in good times in order that we may receive our dividends in bad times while you shift for yourselves. What right have we," he said, "to keep back labor's share in good times to cover our profits in bad times?" "But," I protested, "why not lay up a surplus to be divided, just as your profits are, between labor and capital?" "That," he answered, "is the kind of surplus this company will have if it ever has one."

* * *

The Larger Problem

Temporary employment does not picture the whole case to us. In the average year there will be seven million unemployed at one time and another, one-half of them for from one to three months and two and one-half millions of them for from three to six months. In fact, many kinds of business cannot be run at all except on seasonal employment, implying seasonal unemployment. The New York State Department of Labor states that 18 per cent of the wage-earners will be out of work at any particular time. Yet the wages of these seasonal laborers are usually little above and often much below that of steady labor and there is no ample provision made for getting the casual laborer and the seasonal employment together. In other words, labor is left to bear the whole brunt of the loss. Then there is loss of life, limb and health involved in industry. The average compensation has always been very low as compared with earning power, and until compensation laws are enacted, the burden of proof is put on the injured worker. In ten years we kill 25,000 and injure 630,000 in coal mines alone. In the same period we kill 33,000 and injure 1,700,000 railroad employees. Professor Seager says we reduce 100,000 to destitution, make 15,000 widows and 45,000 orphans annually in preventable accidents in industry, and the wage-earner bears most of the loss.

We know all about carelessness and shiftlessness and all of that, but we also know that such qualities are human and can never be entirely eliminated. They should be reduced and they can be reduced, but there is an irreducible margin and there are always the innocent dependents of the injured. Why should the inevitable losses be so largely charged up to the bread and butter budget of the wage-earner? Why not as logical to charge them to the cost of running the business as to charge breakage in machinery, loss by fire, flood and depressions? Above all, let us cease to assume that capital bears all the losses, takes all the chances and should have prior consideration to the wage-earner and the wage-fund as a charge upon industry.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

London, May, 1921.

IT is six weeks ago since the coal lockout or strike began, and the end is not yet. There may still come a change in the spirit of the people, but so far it has been a spirit of amazing patience and self-control. There has been no outbreak of violence and even the language of controversy has been subdued. The prevailing mood is one of bewilderment. It seems as if the country were in the grip of some destiny carrying us whither none of us wish to go. Few are clear upon the facts and those few differ among themselves. The Christian church appears powerless to do more than commend policies of conciliation. It has no provision made for such an hour and a church cannot improvise a policy in a moment of crisis. It would be most unjust to declare that the church has paid no heed to the industrial problem. Two books published on the two sides of the Atlantic bear witness to a deep concern on this matter. On our side, the report of the archbishops' committee on "Christianity and Industrial Problems" was a document of singular thoroughness and courage. It stopped short—where perhaps most of our thinking stops at present—when it reached the application of its principles in detail to the practical choices of the hour. From the American side there has come to me a volume of no less power and insight in the report of the Inter-church committee on the religious situation after the war. If it is not out of my range to deal with such things, I shall tell everyone whom I can reach of this extremely lucid and convincing book. Our people have not listened very intently to the report of their own archbishops' committee, but perhaps they will listen to the voice from America, and these voices for the most part, though in different accents, say the same thing. It will be the task of the next generation, not so much to repeat the exposition of the problem to "the firstly, secondly and thirdly," but to proceed to the application.

* * *

Missions and Modern Science

We have had some valuable speeches this week before the Congregational Union and the London Missionary Society. One of the most telling was a defense of missions and particularly of medical missions, by Dr. J. A. Hadfield, the well-known expert upon psycho-analysis and kindred subjects. He is himself the son of a missionary, who is returning home after many years in the Loyalty Islands, and Dr. Hadfield therefore approaches the study of missions with an intimate knowledge and sympathy. Missions, he claims, are worthy of support because they are true to the higher biological law of the survival of the unfit. There is a law of the survival of the fittest; but there is a higher law. Care for the sick or for the degraded is one form of expression which the parental instinct takes. The same instinct which leads a mother to care for her child, leads the medical or other missionaries to care for the leper or the cannibal. If the doctrine prevailed that when the main task of life was done, the sick or the aged were to be put to death, or no attempt were made to keep them alive (which is the same thing), what would happen? The maternal and paternal instinct would be starved; that is, the very instincts upon which the existence of the race depends would be impoverished and threatened. If a race cared only for the "fit" it would lose in time the power to produce the fit. The missionary enterprise, though its friends never thought of this point of view, is strikingly true in this way to the teachings of modern science. It is not folly to preserve the sick and the primitive peoples. Even if they were of no importance in the future of the race, it would still be not only the way of mercy, but the way of wisdom to care for them.

Another argument the same speaker advanced. Missions were valuable because they were founded upon a belief in human nature, a belief that there is something in human nature wherever it is found, capable of responding to the divine touch; and missions have proved in experience that this faith is well founded. No long period was needed. In a very brief time the most degraded beings have become reborn. It was a surprising thing, and so Dr. Hadfield urged, that the church seemed ready to give up its belief in rebirth just at the moment when science was teaching it. In other language indeed, but with strong conviction, the science of the human mind taught today is that the history of man regarded as an intellectual and ethical being was marked by jumps. According to the teaching of psychology, it was possible for human beings to change suddenly. The church is foolish, in response to the demand of a "science falsely so called" to give up a doctrine like that of rebirth. Missions have this great gift to offer as their evidence, that in a moment the great instincts of the soul may be lifted out of base uses to nobler ends by the touch of Christ. Some years ago, Sir Oliver Lodge, in the name of science, warned a company of Christian ministers not to be so ready to whittle down their belief in prayer. And today we need not be so anxious to claim for the Spirit of God a long time before the soul by its touch can be born again. It may be long; it need not be long. There is no reason whatever why we should abandon our faith in conversion and the new birth. We are too often like that army of ours on Spion Kop in the Boer war—we had won the height, and we did not know that we had won, so we retreated.

* * *

The Mystic Touch in Art

It has been a joyful task of mine for years to follow any tracks which seemed to lead towards a fuller interpretation of Christ in our modern literature and art. It is a quest which has many disappointments. How few traces there are of the passion of the mystic in modern art! It is not that we seek for mere illustrations of Holy Scripture. These may be done with pains and cleverness and yet the spectator may have no thrill of wonder; nothing leaps out of the picture and holds him from the "dreamland of reality." It is not of formally religious pictures I am thinking, but of those which are manifestly the work of seers who read with unclouded eyes the glory of the earth as it is everywhere the sacrament of the eternal God. In a preface to Mr. Hubbard's little volume of beautiful poems, "The Dreamland of Reality," Miss Evelyn Underhill says that "every age demands its own initiation into truth and beauty at the hands of its own most clear-sighted sons, and cannot receive that revelation in its fullness from the past. Though the stars do not change, the angle from which we see them shifts a little, and the symbolism in which we seek to tell their secret must again and again be submitted to the crucible of the ardent mind, if it is to retain its compelling power." This is finely said. There is no writer more worthy of hearing on such matters than Miss Underhill. She has expressed her soul in novels and poems and treatises, in editions of the mystics and expositions of the New Testament, and for those who seek for an interpreter to lead them into the strange world of mysticism, this writer is waiting at several gates. From Mr. Hubbard's poems I should like to quote one. It is called "Within the Rose."

"Deep in the heart of a rose new-born
Stands a wicket-gate ajar,
To the shining paths of the golden morn
To the secret lands afar.

"As I enter the heart of the mystic rose,
Swings the wicket-gate behind,
And I gaze on a dreamland no one knows
Save the wise, all-seeing blind."

* * *

Signs of Promise in the Churches

There are signs of promise which should not pass unnoticed. The Wesleyan Methodist church for the first time for some years reports an increase in membership. It is the most closely organized of all our churches and it is able therefore more than the rest to survey in one glance the whole movement of its people. So far as numbers are concerned, it is probable that these gains will find their parallel in the story of other churches. It was once said that the Englishman's favorite book in Scripture was the Book of Numbers. We have a weakness for growing returns, and too much may be made of them, yet no church likes to see its number shrinking. There is something which rightly moves us when we read how the Lord adds daily to his church those that are being saved. . . . The Congregational Union has chosen the Rev. Thomas Yates of Kensington to be its chairman. He it was who followed Silvester Horne in Kensington and there he has ministered for sixteen years. He is an admirable preacher with a real eye for the spiritual concerns that matter most. He has, moreover, a picturesque way of his own which makes it always an easy thing to hear him. He will be a welcome visitor wherever he goes, during his year of office. None of my friends can vie with him in telling stories, and none can tell them better. Mr. Yates will adorn the great office upon which he will enter next year.

* * *

Business and Christianity

Shortly there is to be held a conference of business men to consider the relation of Christianity to commerce; there are many such conferences, but this one is noteworthy for the weight of its supporters. Among them are the speaker Sir R. V. Vassar-Smith, Mr. Seeborn Rowntree and Mr. W. L. Hitchens, all of whom are great powers in the world of commerce. Without doubt there is a widespread disquietude upon this industrial problem, and it is by no means limited to the Labor party. No one is happy about the legacy bequeathed to us by the industrial revolution, least of all the real leaders of industry.

* * *

Pentecost Not Restricted to Time or Place

These notes are being committed to the post on the day before Whitsunday. That festival will be long past before these words are read, but as Dr. Rendel Harris has reminded us: "The experience of Pentecost is not marked by any other chronology than that of obedience and faith, and these will make a Pentecost anywhere and at any time." As "The Times," through the pen of a correspondent reminds us today, there is a peculiar affinity between the modern mind and the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. But our first need is not to understand the theory but to experience again the power. I cannot close this letter better than with the words of this writer:

"The church has never given to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit the attention which it has given to other doctrines; that may be because the material has not been available in all its fullness. Or it may have been due to the fear lest men should forget that Pentecost brought to them not a theory of being, but a power for action. It was not a revelation of things that are fixed and immovable, but a power by means of which the moral and spiritual life of mankind could be lifted into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. The men of Pentecost did not leave things as they found them, but with the new power committed to them they turned the world upside down. They may not have known how they did this; but they did it and the doing is the greater matter."

EDWARD SHILLITO.

Contributors to this Issue

HARRY F. WARD, Professor of Christian Ethics,
Union Theological Seminary, New York.

WILLIAM E. GILROY, Congregational Minister,
Fond du Lac, Wis.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

A Christian Social Order *

DO you consider our social order in America in 1921 Christian? Can we say that the family is Christian? If you say "yes," what have you to say about divorce and infidelity? How many families hang together as a mere matter of form while love is dead? Can we say that the school is Christian? Are educated men better or merely brighter? Can we say that the church is Christian? With the formality and division, with the jealousies and rivalries, with the dead theologies and live devilttries—the church is following only afar off. If there is any doubt about family, school, or church, what can we say about business? With cut-throat competition, with the crushing of competitors, with the profiteering of thousands in all ranks—both capitalists and laboring men, with vulgar display on one hand and grinding poverty on the other—what can we say of the commercial order? How many men are in business to serve? They say that service and not money should be the motive of preacher and teacher—why not of business men? Have we a double standard here as elsewhere? I am willing to stake my reputation on the assertion that no business man is carrying Christianity into his business who is not in that business to serve society and who does not employ his earnings to serve humanity. If he makes money in an evil way he cannot save his face nor his soul by spending some of that money for worthy purposes. I want to add that a laboring man who has no regard for the service he renders, who loafs on the job and performs poor work, is as bad as the rich man—it's the same thing. The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil among all classes and everywhere.

Turn to Matthew 25 and with your pencil or pen make a circle around six words: "Hungry," "Thirsty," "Stranger," fully given us by our Teacher, we have the key words to almost, if not quite all, our social problems.

(1) "Hungry." Most of our time and energy is employed in securing a living. China and parts of Europe are in famine at this hour. We live in a hungry world. Yet we are madly extravagant. Alms-giving is no longer regarded, as in Savonarola's time, the sole social duty of the great church. The church must speak with authority upon commercial justice. The golden rule would solve the problems. The spirit of Jesus would satisfy every demand of righteousness. The word needed most in mills and yards today is "Brother" and the thing most needed is a human (Christian) contact. It works—and nothing else does—for long.

(2) "Thirsty." The cup of cold water in a hot country is the symbol of good-hearted approach. Every human need must be gladly met as Jesus would meet it. We know how he helped people. By a slight stretching of the word, we may include the whole problem of "Prohibition" and its enforcement. Unless we want a last state worse than the first we must see to it that "Prohibition" is not joked out of countenance. This is no time to quit in this battle.

(3) "Stranger." What is the church doing for the foreigners who now throng our shores? Very little. The stranger is surely "taken in"—but how? In every city is the despised foreign section—what is Protestantism doing?

(4) "Naked." Think of the children not properly clad to face the winter's stinging gales. Why is clothing so expensive? Why are garment workers so dissatisfied? Why do rich people swagger and strut while the poor slink away in rags?

(5) "Sick." Do you know about the poor wards in your hospitals? Have you investigated the causes of sickness among the poor? Do you visit the sick or carefully avoid them?

(6) "Prison." Is your prison a reform agency or a school of crime? Are you at the gate when he comes out? Do you care anything about him? Shall it be for you, on this basis, "Enter in" or "Depart, ye cursed?"

JOHN R. EWERS.

*International uniform lesson for June 19, "Making the Social Order Christian." Luke 4:16-21; Matt. 25:34-40.

CORRESPONDENCE

Are "Christians" Christian?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The recent vigorous discussion, in the columns of The Christian Century, of the question whether the Christian Church is really Christian, or tending to become so, has emboldened the writer of these lines to put and tentatively answer a more general and more fundamental question—namely, are those who call themselves Christians really Christians—and, if so, in what sense of the term?

Certainly the question is pertinent, especially in view of the fact that during the world war and since many writers, not to be suspected for a moment of levity, cynicism or paradox-mongering, have asserted that Christianity has manifestly failed—been weighed and found wanting; and in view of the further fact that, in replying to these critics, certain stanch defenders of Christianity took the position that a faith, or body of doctrines and principles, which has not been fairly tried cannot be said to have "failed." In other words, the position of these champions of Christianity is that the nations and communities calling themselves Christians are not, and never were, Christian in truth and deed.

This line of argument challenges attention and may be developed with intellectual and moral profit to all serious-minded persons. Let us put the question very simply. When a man says he is "a Christian" he means something—that is, if he is thoughtful and not merely repeating a phrase or formula parrot-fashion. Well, what does he mean?

Jesus would seem to have answered the question by supplying a test of claims or professions of Christian faith. "If ye love me," he said, "keep my commandments." In other versions we have the same thought even more strongly expressed. "If a man love me, he will keep my words"—or, elsewhere, "sayings."

Has anyone a right, in morals or reason, to call himself a Christian, if, as a matter of undisputed fact, he does not keep any of the essential commandments, words, sayings of Jesus, the founder of the Christian faith?

Suppose a sincere, scientific investigator from Mars were to visit our globe and learn that certain peoples call themselves Christians. He would naturally inquire, What does that term mean? He would as naturally be referred to the four gospels. He would examine these gospels without bias or guile. He would seek to ascertain in perfect honesty what Jesus taught and preached, and what he considered essential. He would read, re-read and ponder every sentence, every word credited to Jesus. He would then carefully separate parables, illustrations, answers to malicious and tricky questions, general and allegorical remarks designed to drive home the majesty and mercy of God, the wickedness of heedless men, the need of humility and self-subordination, from the explicit and specific injunctions and instructions. He would be struck particularly by these trenchant sentences in which the teachings of the Old Testament are sharply contrasted with the teachings of the new law. Surely, here, if anywhere at all, quintessential Christianity is found.

Now suppose we make a brave effort to put aside prejudices, mental habits, convenient excuses, and apply our own minds to the four Gospels for the by no means difficult purpose of determining what Jesus' message and commandments really are.

Beyond question, our conclusion must be that the essentials of Christian doctrine are embodied and contained in the following "sayings" or injunctions:

Resist not evil.

Love your enemies.

Do good to those that hate you.

Take no thought for your life.

Judge not, condemn not, forgive.

Love thy neighbor as thyself.

Love one another.

All these injunctions are addressed, without qualification, to the followers and would-be adherents of Jesus. On the other hand, it is most significant that the injunction to "sell whatsoever thou hast and give to the poor" is qualified by such phrases as, "If thou wilt be perfect," or, "One thing thou lackest."

Jesus never demanded of his followers that they should sell or give away all they had or might have. He admitted that only the few, the "perfect" Christians, could be expected to do that. But no ifs and buts, no conditions or qualifications, are attached to the other injunctions or "sayings" quoted above.

What is the unavoidable conclusion? Why, clearly, that they who resist evil, judge, condemn, refuse to forgive, do harm to those that hate them, and love their neighbors less than themselves, or not at all, are not Christians. I do not say "good Christians," for that is a weak, question-begging phrase. They are not Christians at all. They may be decent, respectable, fine men, according to the highest non-Christian standards, but they are not Christians.

It is necessary to labor over the proposition that no modern state or nation calling itself Christian practices a single one of the essential doctrines of Jesus? All so-called Christian states and communities resist evil, judge and condemn, punish and restrain. All Christian nations, in short, violate every one of the fundamental injunctions of Jesus, and nearly all Christian individuals do likewise.

Christianity, then, is not a fact, but an ideal, a hope, an aspiration. There are no Christian communities in existence, but there are communities which hope that some day they may become Christian in fact. But, if this be true, why not acknowledge it and cease to darken counsel?

Let us assume that honest and intelligent men calling themselves Christians recognize the truth of the foregoing and admit that Christianity is only an ideal with them. The question at once arises, What are they doing to realize the ideal? What measures and policies are they advocating to make Christian conduct and the Christian life possible? Are they working for international peace, disarmament, good will? Are they striving to abolish punishment? Are they endeavoring to promote harmonious and just relations between capital and labor? Are they seeking the elimination of hate and prejudice from human intercourse?

If they are actually doing these things, they are seeking to establish Christianity. But if not? Why, if not, then Christianity is not even in an honest sense an ideal with them.

It is scarcely necessary to say that wide differences of opinion may exist among sincere and devout Christians as to the kind and character of the social and economic reforms needed by modern society under the teachings of Jesus, if it is to become Christian. For example, George Bernard Shaw, in one of his delightful "introductions," argues that Jesus, in admonishing men to take no thought of the morrow, intended to advocate socialism. In a socialist state, especially of the Fabian order, men would not have to take thought of the morrow, for the state would take thought for them and relieve them of the necessity of planning, worrying, saving, insuring their lives, etc. They would be required to render service to the community, but, that done, everything would be done to provide for their welfare. Thus would Jesus' commandment be carried out in spirit, though not to the letter.

Mr. Shaw was quite serious in his plea, and he described his social scheme as an attempt to give Christianity a trial. But it may be recalled that St. Simon, one of the founders of "utopian" socialism, also claimed adherence to the essential teachings of Jesus and gave to one of his books the title, "The New Christianity." Today there are schools of "Christian socialism" in Europe that repudiate both Karl Marx and the utopians, and are not wholly in sympathy with the Fabian socialists either.

But it is not necessary to be any kind of a socialist, or a Tolstoy communist-anarchist, in order to reconcile one's acceptance of Christianity as an ideal with his conduct and his part in the drama of life. The socialist movement, or even the radical movement generally, has no monopoly of humanity, of altruism, of good will. Liberals and conservatives may be consistent and loyal Christians—that is, in the sense of treating Christianity as an ideal—provided they recognize the utterly un-Christian nature of our modern civilization, of our criminal codes and our industrial relations, and provided, further, they deem it to be their sacred duty to devise and promote solutions of our social and economic and moral problems that shall harmonize with, and represent, Christian doctrines. Not to seek solutions; not to try to apply Christian doctrines to practical affairs; to be indifferent to injustice, cruelty, misery, ignorance, degradation, is to repudiate Christianity quite as completely as it is repudiated by those who affirm explicitly that the doctrines of Jesus are impossible to human nature as it is or ever is in the least likely to become, and that Christianity not only does not function today in industry, in the courts of justice, in politics and social relations, but never can function or govern human conduct, and, therefore, had better be frankly renounced once and for all.

We may now revert to the original query: How many Christians are Christian? Or, in other words, how many of the men and women who call themselves Christian (whether they believe in the divinity of Jesus or not) either actually practice the quintessential Christian doctrines, or else truly regard them as sound, desirable and feasible and, deploring the flagrant shortcomings of the present un-Christian civilization, are earnestly endeavoring to determine what conduct Christianity requires of them and how these requirements are to be carried out and lived up to, here and now, in the workaday world? My own answer is—There are very few Christians in either sense indicated. Am I wrong?

The writer is an agnostic, but at the same time a seeker after truth and light in ethics, economics and sociology, a philosophical radical who believes in justice, equal opportunity and brotherhood, and sees no possibility of salvation for civilized mankind save in and through these cardinal virtues. Nietzsche asserted that Christianity was "slave" ethics and slave religion, and that a race of strong, virile men could never be induced to accept it. But this is nonsense. Tolstoy was right when he answered the Nietzscheites by saying that Christianity presupposes and requires infinitely more strength, courage, pride and dignity than any creed which countenances aggression, retaliation, yielding to impulse and passion. Kant was right when he affirmed that human good will was the highest product of evolution. In justice and beneficence—negative as well as positive—humanity must ultimately find the solution of its terrible problems. Thus the sincere, consistent Christians and the scientific and philosophical evolutionists, in the last analysis, entertain the same ideal work toward the same ends.

VICTOR S. YARROS.

Hull House, Chicago.

Questions for Ministers—A la Edison

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The widespread interest taken in the list of questions prepared by Edison, and submitted to those who desired to obtain a position in his workshops, led me to ask—How many ministers are guilty of the charge brought by Edison against college students? As your readers know, the charge is that of allowing information "to go in at one ear and out at the other." In order to test myself and a brother minister I hastily, and without preparation, struck off twenty-five questions. He struck off twenty-five more. I answered fifteen of his questions correctly; he answered eighteen of mine. I am afraid that Edison's test would have left both of us stranded had we been seeking a church under the conditions that the applicants referred to were seeking a job. And yet my friend is the highly successful pastor of a large and influential church, is a brilliant preacher, and is accounted a man of wide knowledge. If you can make use of the list we prepared you are welcome to it.

1. What prophecy in the Old Testament refers to the birth-place of Jesus?
2. Why were Mary and Joseph going to the place where Jesus was born?
3. Where is the term "Jesus Christ" first applied to the Master?
4. In what chapter is Paul first mentioned?
5. What was the nature of the dispute between Peter and Paul?
6. Who accompanied Paul on his first missionary journey?
7. Which of the disciples was the first martyr?
8. Where was the Temple of Diana?
9. What was the Acropolis?
10. Define the difference between the Stoics and the Epicureans?
11. Who were the Gnostics?
12. What religious movement of today is supposed to resemble Gnosticism?
13. Who was Telemachus?
14. Who was Polycarp?
15. Who was Bardesanes?
16. Who was Arius?
17. Who was Chrysostom?
18. Who were the Lollards?
19. What did Lecky say about the Calvinists?
20. What did Tacitus say about Christ?
21. Who wrote "Saint's Rest"; "Grace Abounding"; "Holy Living"?
22. What denomination did Wesley belong to before he established Methodism?
23. Who was Cranmer?
24. Who was the first Methodist Episcopal bishop in America?
25. What is the difference between the Immaculate Conception and the Virgin Birth?
26. What is the difference between Homoousian and Homoiousian?
27. What is Animism?
28. What is Monophysitism?
29. Who wrote "Cur Deus Homo?"
30. Who was the first Archbishop of Canterbury?
31. What are the Non-conformists?
32. What is meant by the Plenary theory of inspiration?
33. Who wrote the following words: "I delivered unto you first of all, that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins"?
34. Who first used the word "agnostic"?
35. Who wrote "Ecce Homo"?
36. Where was the first theological seminary in the United States?
37. Who was Jonathan Edwards?
38. What was the title of the sermon that he preached in many places with great effect?
39. Who established Harvard University?
40. Who was the founder of the denomination now known as the Disciples?
41. Of what college was Finney president?
42. What denomination first sent missionaries to Hawaii?
43. Who was the first missionary to India?
44. What are the Jesuits?
45. When was the doctrine known as the "Infallibility of the Pope," first promulgated?
46. What is the difference between "High" and "Low" Churchism?
47. What are the five leading denominations in the United States?
48. Who wrote: "Varieties of Religious Experience"?
49. To what denomination did Horace Bushnell belong?
50. Who was James Martineau?

Winnepeg, Canada.

GEORGE LAUGHTON.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Baptists Consider Biennial Conventions

The executive committee of the Northern Baptist Convention will propose at the coming Des Moines meeting of the convention that it meet henceforth every two years instead of annually as at present. The proposal first arose in the Pennsylvania state convention, which favors the change.

Preeminence of Chicago as Missionary Headquarters

The missionaries on the field are recruited from all over the land, but when they return on furloughs they seem to tend increasingly to go to the University of Chicago for advanced study. It is said that no school in the land has so many of these furloughed missionaries in its student body as the University of Chicago has had in recent years. During the past year more than fifty have been in attendance at one time. These have come from Japan, Korea, China, the Philippines, the Malay states, Burma, Assam, India, Syria, Egypt, the Congo and South America. These experienced workers from the field make the University of Chicago an increasingly significant school for volunteer missionaries, both graduate and undergraduate. The contact between the volunteers and the experienced missionaries is invaluable.

United Brethren Receive Fraternal Delegate from Southern Methodists

The General Conference of the Church of the United Brethren was held in Indianapolis recently. Among the pleasant incidents of this meeting was the address of a fraternal delegate from the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Dr. E. B. Chappell. Dr. Chappell expressed his regret at the failure of negotiations for unity with the Methodist Episcopal Church and laid the failure of the plan for unity at the door of the General Conference of that church. He spoke of an approaching change of name for his denomination which would make possible a broadening of territory. His address held out the olive branch to the United Brethren who were originally German-speaking Christians, but who now use English almost altogether. The two denominations are in point of doctrine and organization almost exactly alike.

Conservative Disciples Hold Another Congress

The conservative group among the Disciples are holding a number of gatherings called "congresses." One was held at Terre Haute, Ind., June 1 and 2. A meeting of more ambitious significance will be held in Minneapolis, June 21-26, to be called an "Americanization Congress." There will be addresses against higher criticism, evolution, the denominational missionary and benevolent organizations and other themes characteristic of the conservative wing not of Disciples alone but of most of the denominations. Among the leading personalities in this congress are Rev. D. E. Olson, Rev. S. S. Lappin, Rev. J. B. Briney, Rev. C. J. Sharp and Rev. C. C. Crawford. The latter two are connected with the Christian Standard, of Cincinnati.

President Helps Start Roger Williams Memorial

President Harding recently turned the first sod for the Roger Williams Memorial which will be constructed by the side of Immanuel Baptist Church in Washington. Dr. G. G. Johnson is pastor of this church and he has been a tireless worker in promoting the memorial in the national capital. The president did not make a formal speech on this occasion, but as he turned the sod he said, "We cannot have too many occasions celebrating religious liberty, and we cannot have too much religion in this country."

Conservative Baptists Will Meet at Des Moines

The conservative Baptists have learned a method from conservative Disciples and they now hold a doctrinal congress just prior to the national convention. This year at Des Moines on June 21 this annual event will be staged. It will be called the "Pre-Convention Pan-American Baptist Conference." The new name indicates that reinforcements are to be brought up from the south and from Canada to fight heresy in the Northern Baptist Convention. Dr. John R. Sampsey, of Louisville Seminary will speak on "What Jesus Christ Thought About the Old Testament." Dr. Jacob Heinrich will speak on "The Authenticity and Authority of the New Testament." Dr. W. B. Hinson of Oregon has for his topic "The Return of Our Lord." The "Committee on Fundamentals" which is managing the meeting is headed by Rev. J. C. Massee.

Episcopal Women Vote Men Out of Vestry

In a Rhode Island parish the women have voted out the men from the vestry of the Episcopal church and put in two lady wardens and six vestry-women. This is cited by one bishop as a reason for opposing the amendment of the Religious Corporation Law of New York striking out the word "male." In a number of diocesan conventions over the country the question of the place of women in vestries has been discussed, and in most cases a conservative position has been taken. The disarmament question is the occasion of a lively debate. Bishop Williams of Detroit was voted down in his own diocesan convention on the issue of disarmament, a majority favoring no pronouncement by the church.

Minister Makes a Success as Scenario Writer

An increasing supply of film that the church can whole-heartedly approve is one of the hopeful signs of the times. William Allen White's "A Certain Rich Man" has been filmed and presented to the Christian ministry for their approval. Rev. Frank Sheets, a Methodist minister, has produced a scenario called "The Stream of Life." This is now in film form, and is being shown in different parts of the United States. So powerful is its religious appeal that after one exhibition in a church, the net was drawn and thirty-five converts were secured. It is the story of a country boy who goes to the city and who meets with prosperity. He forgets religion and becomes a cynical unbeliever. His redemption through his mother is the climax of the scene. The city life of the young man does not descend to the level of the slums, but is a portrayal of city materialism.

Girl Organizes a Sorority Against Dancing

The old-time evangelical protest against the dance has almost entirely broken down in the educational institutions of the land. Miss Virginia Hamilton, daughter of a southern Baptist minister of Atlanta, Va., who is now a student in Richmond, Va., has organized a sorority which pledges all members not to dance and to discourage dancing in others. This anti-dance society has already enrolled over eleven hundred southern Baptist girls and continues to grow. Miss Hamilton proposes to spend her summer vacation to the extension of the society which she has created.

Missouri Disciples to Hold Convention

Missouri Disciples hold their state convention June 14-16, and the place Jefferson City. Rev. J. H. Coil is the president of the state organization, and Rev. C. C. Garrigues the secretary. The secretary is the executive officer. A single theme runs through the program this year, that of stewardship. Speakers from outside the state will be Dr. A. F. Hensey of Africa, and Dr. H. O. Pritchard, secretary of the Board of Education of Indianapolis.

Where Will They Find Union?

Some in the Protestant Episcopal church abhor all the proposals for union with Protestant bodies. For these the proposed concordat with the Congregationalists is tabu. The fact that Rome would never consider union with the Episcopal church if the latter set up intercommunion with a Protestant sect is urged as a reason for discontinuing all negotiations with Congregationalists and others. On the other hand candid students of the union question find little to encourage hope of union between the Episcopal church and either Rome or the Greek Orthodox church. Rev. Frank Gavin spent last winter at Athens on a scholarship, studying the Greek church. His report was published recently in the American Church Monthly. Mr. Gavin states his conclusion thus: "It is well to note that all questions of reunion between ourselves and this Greek Orthodox church are judged by the latter with the view of our becoming Orthodox. Certain observations may be made in closing: (1) The Orthodox theory of the church is as exclusive as the Roman. (2) Thus far no favor has been shown to the branch theory of the Anglican church, as having any historical or canonical justification. (3) Our aim in any of the projects of reunion is not theirs: we do not want to make Anglicans of them, but they certainly expect to make Orthodox of us."

The Larger Churches of the Disciples

How large should a church be? Denominational leaders disagree over this question, some asserting that a thousand members is the limit. The ten largest churches of the Disciples of Christ, according to the Year-Book, are Canton, O., 3,600; Independence Bld., Kansas City, 3,480; University Place, Des Moines, 2,849; Pittsburgh, Kans., 2,110; Linwood Bld., Kansas City, 1,985; Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, 1,927; Anderson, Ind., 1,800; Ft Worth, Tex., 1,800; Bellefontaine, O., 1,765; Atlanta, Ga., 1,700. Some of these churches have within a single pastorate achieved their present size from small beginnings. At Enid, Okla., a relatively small city, Rev. A. G. Smith began work nine years ago with 250 members. At the present time this congregation enrolls nearly 1,900 members. The Sunday school has an enrolment of nearly a thousand members. It is interesting to note that the ten churches with largest offerings to missions are not the same as the above, church for church. Some congregations much smaller excel these in their generosity.

Demand an End of Armenian Atrocities

At a time when the Christian world had expected to be relieved of their heavy burden in Armenia, the persecutions of the Turks have been renewed and many more refugees are being driven from their homes. Up to the present time the committee on Near East Relief has abstained from any kind of political action, being convinced that the Christian powers would act as soon as the war problems were solved. It is increasingly clear, however, that nothing will be done without pressure from Christian people. James L. Barton, Walter George Smith and Stanley White have joined in a call to Christian people to write to their congressmen and insist that the atrocities of the Turks shall cease. It is believed that the United States has power in her hands to make an end of the Armenian outrages. Sixty million dollars have been sent to Armenia. It is absurd to permit the outrages when the Christian world has only to speak and these outrages will end.

Church Dedicates a Bronze Tablet

The churches are feeling the propriety of erecting suitable memorials to their dead who fell in the great world war. This is well illustrated by the recent dedication of a bronze tablet in Union Avenue Disciples Church of St Louis. Three members of the church gave up their lives during the war and a total of 125 were in the service. Dr. George A. Campbell, pastor of the church, delivered an address at the unveiling of the tablet. Among other things, he said: "The fourth lesson is that this tablet stands for the program of Jesus Christ. When the war first started we frequently heard the remark: 'How ineffective the church has been that it has not prevented this war.' At first that seemed like a sinister challenge to the church, but it merely proved that the church with its constant preaching and teaching for the peace of the world had created a conscience among the people against the killing of one another. Never before in all the wars of history had this question been raised. With all the education of the Germans, the science of the world, the influence of commercial and banking leaders, the war was not prevented. Prevention of wars depends upon our ability to make men more lovable to each other, and only when we have established the program of Jesus Christ throughout all countries, then war will be prevented. There is no other solution of the problem except the spirit of brotherhood of our Saviour. The war was fought that the brotherhood of Jesus might be established and when it is established peace will come to all the earth."

Disciples Organize for Their National Convention

The Administrative Committee of the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ met recently and organized to care for the session to be held at Winona Lake, Aug. 30-Sept. 4. They decided to ask the state board of Indiana to care for the local arrangements, since the city of Warsaw, adjacent to the convention site would hardly be able to carry all of the burdens. The state board of Indiana has appointed Rev. C. W. Cauble, state secretary, the chairman of the committee with Mrs. O. H. Griest and Rev. J. D. Hull as the two other members. The work of assigning delegates to homes will be done by Rev. J. D. Hull, pastor of the Warsaw Disciples' church.

Federal Council in Favor of Educational Bill

The Smith-Towner Bill which died in the last Congress will be revived in this Congress as the Towner-Sterling Bill. The new bill will have some amendments which meet the objections to the old bill. It provides for a secretary of education in the cabinet of the United States as one of the advisors of the president. It authorizes the appropriation of $7,500,000 for the removal of illiteracy in the United States in cooperation with the state educational systems of the different states. It authorizes the appropriation of a like amount for the work of Americanization in the different states. Fifty millions are authorized for the equalizing of educational opportunities of the different schools. This appropriation would bring the schools of the country up to some minimum level, at least. The bill does not take over the state boards of education but provides a method of cooperation with them. The Roman Catholic hierarchy has set itself to defeat the bill because of its continued opposition to state participation in the work of education. The Federal Council of Churches is insistently in favor of the bill since it offers to wipe out the disgrace of illiteracy from the land. The religious bias of the country will have a great deal to do with the passage or defeat of the bill. The counter proposal is a Department of Public Welfare in which education would be one of four different interests.

Colleges Hold Commencement

The commencement season in the church colleges will be a joyous season this year as unusually large classes are being graduated in many institutions. At this season of the year new gifts are announced: At Northwestern University Dr. Scott will be inaugurated as president. At Eureka College the commencement address on June 8 will be delivered by Edward T. Devine, editor of the Survey.

Pastor Trains a Prize Fighter

Rev. James Campbell Bay, pastor of the Disciples' church in Danbury, Conn., recently trained a young man in the church gymnasium for a boxing bout. His man was defeated and the whole incident has become embarrassing for the pastor. President Roosevelt tried when a young man to include boxing in the program of his Sunday school class, but found it impossible to make progress against the "conservatives" of the church. A good many young men who were chaplains in France changed their views about boxing, but they are finding some difficulty in bringing about the change in custom that they had expected would follow the war.

Gipsy Smith Stirs Atlanta, Ga.

Gipsy Smith, the well-known British evangelist, has just concluded a month of special evangelistic services in the city of Atlanta. A tent with a capacity of five thousand was provided, and when this proved to be inadequate the seating was enlarged to seven thousand and even then the crowd that came could not be accommodated. It is said that some of the most prominent people of the city were converted as a result of the meetings. A Gipsy Smith, Jr. Club with three hundred members proposes to carry the gospel to adjoining towns and thus continue the work. Mr. Smith makes no enumeration of converts, so no report can be secured as to accessions.

American Board of Applied Christianity

A round table of church methods is announced by the American Board of Applied Christianity for the period between July 1 and September 15. The studies will be carried on in the Educational Building, Fifth Avenue and Thirteenth Street, in New York. Mr. Eugene M. Camp, president of the Seabury Society of New York, an Episcopalian institution, conducts the Round Table. His courses are given to ministers and laymen of all denominations. The aim of the board of Applied Christianity is to create a Church Engineering School which shall collect scientific management methods from everywhere and distribute them without charge to those in need of them. Especially is it regarded as desirable that laymen who are set officially to manage churches and their material affairs should become familiar with scientific management laws and methods that bring success. It is stated by this board that the work of maintaining churches in America cost $415,000,000 annually before the war, and that this amount has now increased to $600,000,000.

Post Office Mission Is Forty Years Old

A unique feature of Unitarian activity has been the Postoffice Mission. It was started by a young woman of feeble health, Miss Sallie Ellis. She began to write letters and to mail sermons and tracts. Since then a number of others have taken up this work until the mission now has five thousand correspondents throughout the world. The past year 112,700 sermons were sent out. A number of Unitarian ministers confess that it was through this agency that they were first drawn to the denomination.

Congregationalists Ordain Lay Preachers

The shortage in the ministry has led many denominations to consider the device of building up a lay ministry. Broadway Congregational Tabernacle of New York recently ordained five of its members as lay preachers. Dr. C. E. Jefferson spoke at the ordination. Dr. W. E. Barton of Oak Park will advocate in the coming National Council at Los Angeles that this kind of thing become a part of the national program of Congregationalism. These lay preachers will continue their secular callings but will preach as opportunity affords.

Sunday Laws an Issue in Vermont

The Sunday law of Vermont was recently changed by the legislature. While preventing any recreation on Sunday which charges an admission or which disturbs the public peace, it is claimed by Rev. M. D. Kneeland, secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance, that the new law is weaker than the old. For this reason the Lord's Day Alliance fought the new bill and came near defeating it. The Congregational State Conference stands for a local option bill which will give each community the right to say what kind of a Sunday it wants. The bill that passed in Vermont was defeated in New Hampshire and in Maine. The objection to the new law is that it will permit commercialized athletic sports and moving picture shows by the device of taking up a collection, and by other methods of financing.

R. J. Campbell in America Once More

The coming of Reginald J. Campbell to America is an event of national importance in church circles. His books written during the period of the new theology controversy stand on a great many ministers' shelves. Mr. Campbell arrived on the Aquitania the other day. While he is now an Episcopalian he has breadth of sympathies, as is indicated by the fact that during July and August he will supply the pulpit of First Congregational church of San Francisco. In these days he is sounding the mystical note rather than the theological which brought him his world-wide fame. Dr. C. Silvester Horne when a student at Oxford studied with Dr. Campbell and at that time prophesied that he would be a second St. Francis. If that prophecy was not fulfilled, at any rate Dr. Campbell has had a very large influence in the English speaking world.

Woman Question Disturbs English Presbyterians

At the recent meeting of the General Assembly in England the question of the status of women in the church was debated through a whole day. The motion to admit women to the gospel ministry was defeated by a narrow margin, pending conference with other branches of Presbyterianism throughout the world. The General Assembly carried by a small vote a statement of the equality of women in the church. It is understood that the question of women elders and deacons is to be studied for another year, and that it will be an issue at the next meeting of the General Assembly.

English Presbyterians Find a Precedent

At the general assembly of the Presbyterian church of England action was taken favoring negotiations with the state church on the subject of union. The speakers insisted that the established church had many points in its favor, but its weakest point was episcopacy. Dr. S. W. Carruthers, a physician who is well versed in church history, made an address in the assembly in which he declared there was a historic precedent for the bishops recognizing ministers not episcopally ordained. In 1582 Archbishop Grindal of Canterbury waived the matter of Episcopal ordination in the case of Rev. John Morrison, who was a Presbyterian. Mr. Morrison was given permission to administer the sacraments throughout the province of Canterbury without reordination. Dr. Carruthers declared that if the archbishops of today would be as liberal as they were over three hundred years ago, the cause of church union would make great progress. This historic incident, should it prove to have good foundation, may have a great deal of influence in England in the unity discussions, for one of the great points of contention has been the matter of reordination.

Conspicuous Methodist Missionary Leader Retires

The resignation of Rev. S. Earl Taylor, D.D., as secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal church is regarded as a great blow to that organization, through which he has exercised churchwide influence in behalf of world evangelization. Dr. Taylor took a furlough last June and went to Arizona and has made some progress toward the recovery of his health. He will not be able to live on the Atlantic seaboard again, so he has presented his resignation. This action leaves Rev. Frank Mason North as the only corresponding secretary. Dr. Taylor served once as secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement. He was executive secretary of the Centenary committee of the Methodist church. Dr. Taylor was also executive secretary of the Interchurch World Movement. It was the latter service which brought about his breakdown and continued ill-health.

Churches Discuss Disarmament

The observance of June 5 as the day to discuss disarmament seems to have been generally observed throughout the United States. In Springfield, Mass., every church in the city observed the day. The Chicago Church Federation has been strongly behind the observance of this special day, with the result that hundreds of Chicago churches had sermons on the subject of world peace and disarmament. The effect of this discussion upon the policy of the country should be decisive.

Church Federation Tries to Get Out the Vote

It is not often that a church federation would participate in a judicial election, but the Chicago judicial election this year was of such an important character that the federation sent out a call to all the churches to rally the vote at the polls. While the federation did not ask for the support of any particular ticket, it was generally understood that the Christian vote would be thrown to the coalition ticket favored by a big majority of the lawyers of the city, and against the republican ticket as presented by the William Hale Thompson organization.

Fraternalists Go to Church

Church calendars and parish papers from all over the country indicate that thousands of memorial services have been held this year in the churches in behalf of the dead of the various orders. Particularly do the Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias participate in such services. One half of the adult men of America are outside of church membership, and most of these men belong to lodges. The preachers seem to feel that Christian strategy demands cooperation rather than opposition to these fraternalists, since in the lodge ritual some beginnings are made of a religious faith and a moral and social attitude. The Knights of Pythias in Chicago will observe their Memorial Day in a big mass meeting on a Sunday evening at which a minister of the gospel will deliver the memorial address.

Ups and Downs in Congregationalism

If all cities were like Detroit, the Congregationalists would soon take the country. The gain there the past year was forty-seven per cent. The gain in New York was only three per cent, however, while Chicago shows a loss for the Congregational forces, in spite of the strong churches that are in strategic locations in the entire area. The shift of population is one of the forces that makes it difficult for all of the churches, and in the state of Michigan this is shown by the fact that fifty-three Congregational churches have fifty per cent of the membership of the denomination in the entire state. In the other 233 churches is the other fifty per cent. These interesting statistics were prepared by Rev. B. G. Mattison, supervisor of Congregational church extension work in the city of Detroit. He is authority for the statement that three Michigan cities have gained 840,895 in population during the past three years. These are of course the automobile manufacturing centers of the state.

Noted Disciple Judge Returning to United States

Judge Charles S. Lobingier, who has presided over the United States Court in China for a number of years, will return to the United States before the summer is over. Judge Lobingier has been a popular speaker in Disciple circles, as well as a writer, and his return is a real event in this communion. He is a powerful exponent of world peace and fraternity.

Cleveland Ministers and Billy Sunday

In 1915 a number of Cleveland ministers agitated for the coming of Billy Sunday, the evangelist, to hold tabernacle meetings. Many of the ministers would not cooperate with the movement, notably in the Presbyterian denomination of which Mr. Sunday is a member, so the evangelist would not accept the call. The question is being agitated again just now. The Methodist ministers' meeting has declared in favor of a Billy Sunday meeting and at the present time a referendum is being taken of the ministers of the city. That referendum will shortly disclose the sentiment of the Cleveland ministers.

Endowment Funds Are Shrinking

Unless church endowment funds have been very wisely invested, the chances are that there has been a great shrinkage in these funds. It is stated that the American Missionary Association, supported mostly by Congregationalists, has received the past year only $42,000 from investments that once produced $98,000. It is stated that the smaller rate of return is the one to be anticipated henceforth. The organization works among Indians, Negroes and other dependent peoples. The money from the churches increases its income up to $700,000 in some years, hence it is not failing in its work, but will be compelled to raise more of its money by public subscription henceforth.

Northfield Will Be Busy Place This Summer

Northfield is an institution which was left to the Christian world by Dwight L. Moody, the evangelist. This summer there will be a series of conferences running throughout the entire summer. The seminary commencement will be held June 4-6, at which time the largest number of graduates in the history of the institution will be presented for graduation. The Young Women's Conference will be held June 24-July 1. In this conference the outstanding speakers will be Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, Miss Margaret Slattery, Dr. Robert E. Speer, Dr. John McDowell and Dr. Carl Elmore. The Interdenominational Women's Home Mission Summer School, July 5-11, will consider the general theme of "Facing Our Unfinished Task in America." This conference will be followed by the Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies. July 21-28 the Summer School of Religious Education will be operated with Dr. Norman E. Richardson of Northwestern University as dean. Through the entire summer to September 10 there is a series of conferences with many courses of Bible study intermingled.

More Churchly Baptist Churches

Rev. Willard L. Pratt recently conducted the seventy-fifth anniversary celebration of the founding of his church, Stoughton Street Baptist church of Boston. One of the features in the sanctuary is an arrangement of the open baptistry with mural decorations, and the setting of the communion table in front of the baptistry in the center of the sacred platform. The pulpit is to one side. On the seventy-fifth anniversary there was an unveiling of a new mural decoration. Dr. Pratt has been responsible for a widespread copying of his ideas of church arrangement throughout the country. At the anniversary exercises he mentioned the fact that both the United States and Great Britain are now led by Baptists, President Harding and David Lloyd George. This he placed in contrast with the period when Roger Williams was banished from Massachusetts for heresy.

Methodists Fill a Theater

On a recent evening the Methodists of Chicago filled a great downtown theater, the Auditorium. The occasion was

Dr. Charles M. Sharpe, Dean of the Detroit School of Religion, writes that he knows of a young woman of superior qualifications and large experience who can be secured as pastor's assistant and director of religious education. He feels that any church which secures her services will be very fortunate. Address Dr. Sharpe, Room 316, Detroit Y. M. C. A.

WHEN YOU GO TO THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

You are invited to attend the
VERMONT AVENUE
CHRISTIAN CHURCH

Earle Wilfley, Pastor.

Earl Taggart, Assistant.

PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

An undenominational training school for
The Ministry Religious Education
Foreign Missions Social Service
Curricula high grade and modern. Graduate degrees. University of California privileges. Opportunities for the study of Oriental peoples. Open to men and women of all Christian denominations. For catalogue address

WILLIAM FREDERIC BADE, Dean,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA

a great get-together meeting in which the Methodists working in other than the English language joined with their English-speaking brethren. The speaker of the evening was Rev. Ralph M. Diffendorfer. Among the many interesting facts brought out by Mr. Diffendorfer was the statement that 1,344 Methodist churches in America are working among the immigrant peoples. Mr. Diffendorfer dealt with the statement of some Methodist ministers made when the Centenary Movement was inaugurated that the accessions to membership would fall off. He showed that the past year 190,000 new members were received into the churches. Among the significant results achieved by the Centenary Fund has been the saving of the China mission from disaster. The decrease in the purchasing power of the American dollar would have brought great trouble to the mission had it not been for the help secured from the Centenary Fund.

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

Home for Girls at University of Illinois

Bethany House, the Residence Hall for girls, maintained by the Illinois Disciples' Foundation at the University of Illinois, will remain open for the summer session, June 20th-Aug. 13th. Rates for double rooms will range from $8 to $15 per month, without board. Applications are now coming in. Reservations should be made as soon as possible. Board may be had from $6 up at near by eating houses. Address all communications to Mrs. Mabel Carlock, 1306 W. Springfield Ave., Urbana, Ill.

The Bethany Graded Lessons

126 Texts Covering
17 Years of Study

Send for returnable samples

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

MAKE YOUR CHURCH DEVOTIONAL

by putting into your homes the most beautiful book of personal devotion and family worship ever published—

"The Daily Altar"

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

FOR each day of the year a theme, meditation. Scripture, poem and prayer. 400 pages. In two editions: Gift edition, full leather, $2.50. Popular edition, purple cloth, $1.50 (Add 8 cents postage). The beautiful purple cloth edition may be had at $1 per copy in lots of 50. Write for full list of discounts.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

CHECK

For Your

CHILDREN'S DAY

Offering

should be sent at once. If you did not take the offering Sunday, June 5, please do so at the earliest opportunity, and have your Treasurer forward it immediately.

If your May Offering for Home Missions and your Easter Offering for Benevolences have not been sent, please send them.

BUDGET CHURCHES, please send your check for at least Three-Fourths of the Missionary Year BEFORE JUNE 30.

LIVING LINK CHURCHES, please remember the Missionary Year closes June 30. Don't forget your missionary. He is counting on your support.

Women's Missionary Societies

Please Send

YOUR LAST QUARTERLY PAYMENT before June 30, so it will be credited on this year's receipts and the five-year aims.

Round up all Missionary Money for the United Society and send it before June 30.

Make All Checks Payable and Send to

*United Christian
Missionary Society*

1501 Locust St.

St. Louis, Missouri

The Outline of History

A Plain History of Life
and Mankind

By H. G. WELLS

Written with the advice and editorial help of Ernest Baker, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir E. Ray Lankester and Prof. Gilbert Murray. Illustrated by J. F. Horrabin.

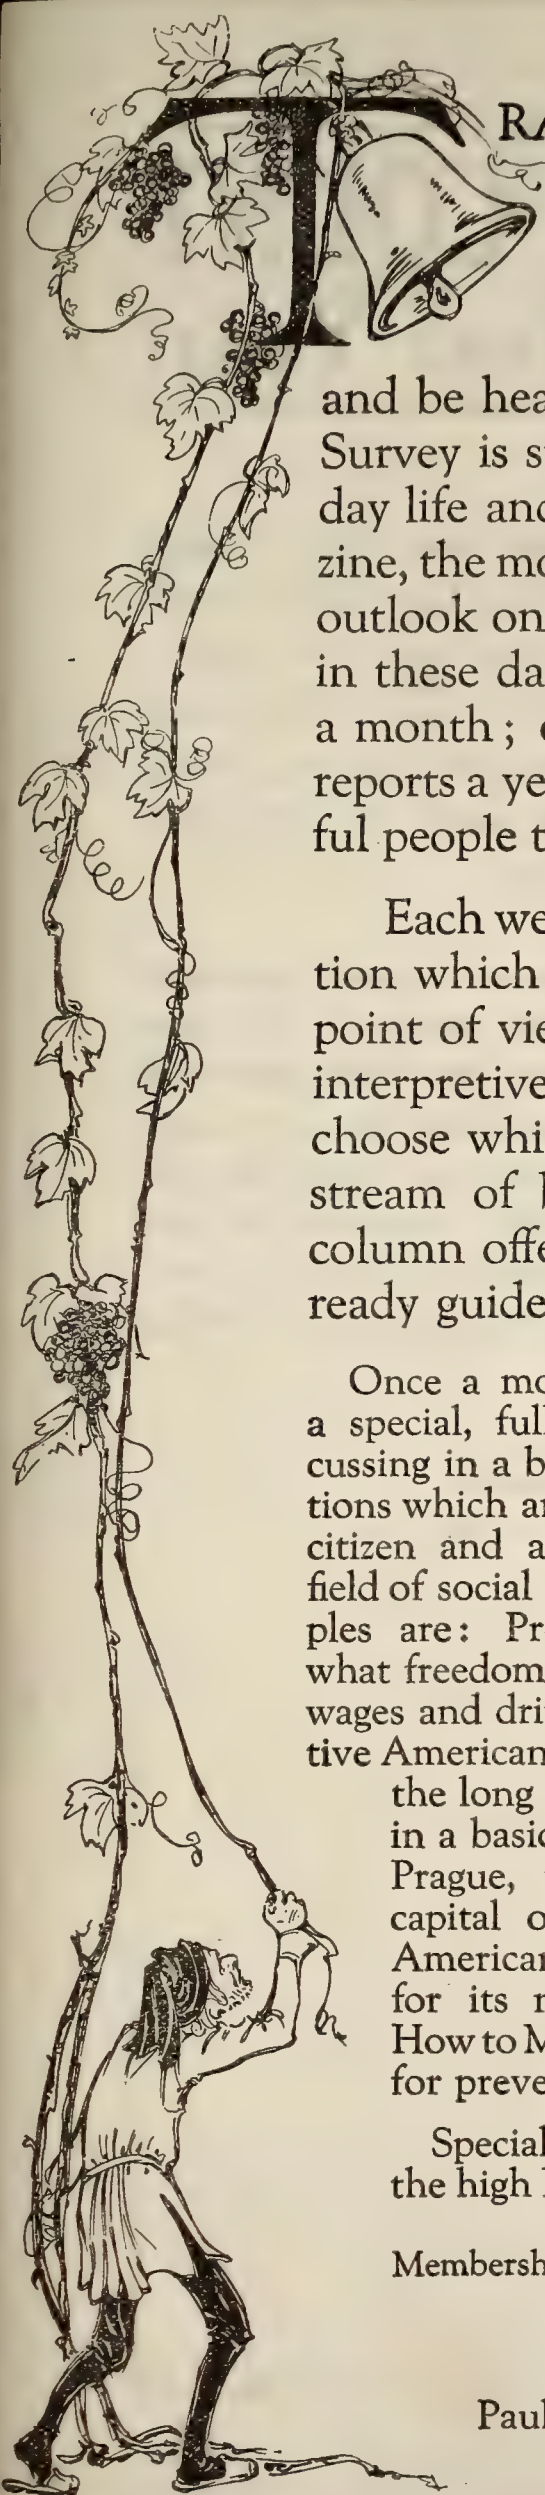

HERE is history from the beginning of life on our earth so far as we can trace it by paleolithic records, through the civilizing and decivilizing ages down to yesterday. And much of it is history from the standpoint of common sense. We would hold this view even after you pointed out that Mr. Wells does irreparable damage to many an ancient convention and orthodox tradition. He trains his guns fearlessly on superstition, on corrupting tradition, on historical malpractice.

The author's conclusions stimulate thought. He is an optimist. He sees a new sanity emerging from the hatreds of the war. He looks for a revision of ideas and institutions and the development of a citizenship of the world, with the breakdown of nationalism. Religion to his mind has been obscured by creeds—"the old political and social assumptions, the old religious formulas have lost their conviction." But he expects the future to bring a brotherhood of men rather than of nations, wider education and a religion apart from forms and creeds. Man is to become happier and more contented on earth. He does not seem to fear that, judging by the rate we are going, the old ball may become cold before we achieve that ideal.

This is the big book of the season. Every thinking citizen of these pregnant times should have it.

In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.
Special terms: $5.00 down, balance 30 days.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

TRADITION HAS IT that once in ancient times, the Re Giovanni, a king of Italy, hung in the market place of the town of Atri a strand of grapevine tied to a great bell. So that those who were in need or sought justice might pull at the grapevine, gather the people together and be heard. That bell was an instrument of social progress. The Survey is such a bell today, ringing in the public square of everyday life and labor. ¶ For The Survey gives, as does no other magazine, the most competent evidence, the keenest analysis, the broadest outlook on all the wide range of social problems which press forward in these days of perplexity. It draws on fifty specialized periodicals a month; on one hundred conferences, one thousand books and reports a year. It makes first-hand investigations. It gives to thoughtful people the groundwork of facts on which sound opinion is built.

Each week The Survey publishes a grist of news and interpretation which is the only one in this country to bring out from a social point of view the essential facts in the mass of weekly events. By interpretive reviewing, the Book Department enables the reader to choose which he would read and which he may skip in the great stream of books pouring from the presses. The Social Studies column offers the student of social problems and public affairs a ready guide to the best current reading.

Once a month The Survey publishes a special, fully illustrated number discussing in a broad way the social conditions which are of interest to every good citizen and adventuring into the rich field of social exploration. Recent examples are: Prohibition and Prosperity, what freedom from unemployment, low wages and drink means to a representative American city; Three Shifts in Steel, the long work-day and the way out in a basic industry; The Survey of Prague, telling how the ancient capital of Bohemia turned to the American social survey as a basis for its new democratic existence; How to Meet Hard Times, a program for preventing unemployment.

Special issues such as these are the high lights of The Survey's year.

But regularly, consistently, fairly, week by week, we keep our readers informed of the events, the ideas, the progress in seven great fields of human concern: Civics, Health, Industry, Family Welfare, Child Welfare, School and Community, Foreign Service. Each is in charge of an editor who is an experienced worker in his field.

Educational in purpose, non-commercial in character, The Survey is supported by more than 1600 members from every state organized as a cooperative enterprise for the promotion of social well-being, of community progress. "The Survey has probably been the most potent single factor," says Justice Brandeis of the Supreme Court, "in stimulating the present-day demand for social and industrial justice."

Membership, including subscription, $10

Subscription, $5 yearly

SAMPLE COPIES FREE ON REQUEST

Paul U. Kellogg
Editor

The SURVEY

112 East 19 St.
New York

MAKE THE SUMMER COUNT

Toward a More Fruitful Next Year!

EVERY minister who would succeed today must read. Every alert churchman and churchwoman must read. And they must read the right books. To choose right books, in this age of a superfluity of books, is no light task. A service for which The Christian Century has received unusual recognition is its announcement, week by week, of the best new books, especially in the field of religion. Note list of "100 Religious books" on opposite page.

MAKING BOOK-BUYING EASY. Ready money is not always at hand, especially in the summer time. But you must keep up your reading—to survive! Why not start a book account with us? Get the needed books now, pay for them later—30 days, 60 days. To make our proposition concrete: Why not send us, on coupon below, the titles of the books you need? This will start your account, and the account will be handled by our business department with full consideration and courtesy. Send in the coupon order today and the books will go out to you at once. (Special note: You need not limit your order to the books included in the 100 list. Any book now in print we shall be glad to secure for you.)

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn St. CHICAGO, ILL.

BOOK ORDER COUPON

Gentlemen: I wish to start a book account with you. Please send at once the following books, and I will pay for them in 30 or 60 days:

[illegible]

(Give author, if possible; also publisher, if known.)

100 Religious Books

A list prepared by Charles Clayton Morrison, Herbert L. Willett, Joseph Fort Newton, Alva W. Taylor and Thomas Curtis Clark

THE CHURCH AND PREACHING

- Psychology and Preaching. C. S. Gardner. $2.50.
 The Building of the Church. C. E. Jefferson. $1.50.
 The Christian Ministry and Social Problems. Bishop Charles D. Williams. $1.25.
 Can the Church Survive in the Changing Social Order? Albert Parker Fitch. 80 cts.
 A Community Church. H. E. Jackson. $2.00.
 Ambassadors of God. S. Parkes Cadman. $2.50.
 Modern Theology and the Preaching of the Gospel. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
 Wanted: A Congregation. Lloyd C. Douglas. $1.75.
 Six Thousand Country Churches. Gill and Pinchot. $2.00.
 The Little Town. Paul H. Douglass. $2.25.
 The Course of Christian History. McGlothlin. $2.25.

THE BIBLE AND THE LIFE OF JESUS

- Popular Lectures on the Books of the New Testament. A. H. Strong. $1.50.
 The Jesus of History. T. R. Glover. $1.25.
 The Manhood of the Master. Fosdick. $1.15.
 Our Bible. Herbert L. Willett. $1.50.
 That One Face. Richard Roberts. $1.25.
 Archæology and the Bible. George A. Barton. $3.00.
 Christ in the Poetry of Today. Martha F. Crowe. $2.00.
 Jesus—The Master Teacher. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
 Jesus—Our Standard. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
 New Testament in Modern Speech. Weymouth. $2.00.
 Moffatt's New Testament. $1.50. (Pocket ed., $1.75.)
 Jesus in the Experience of Men. T. R. Glover. $1.90.
 The Proposal of Jesus. John H. Hutton. $2.00.
 Epochs in the Life of Paul. A. T. Robertson. $1.50.
 The Life of Paul. B. W. Robinson. $1.50.

SOCIAL

- Social Principles of Jesus. Walter Rauschenbusch. $1.15.
 The Ethics of Jesus and Social Progress. Gardner. $1.50.
 Christianizing the Social Order. Rauschenbusch. $2.00.
 Christianity and the Social Crisis. Rauschenbusch. $2.25.
 Democratic Christianity. Bishop McConnell. 80c.
 Jesus Christ and the Social Question. F. G. Peabody. $1.75.
 Psychology of Social Reconstruction. G. T. Patrick. $2.00.
 The Great Society. Graham Wallas. $2.25.
 The Social Problem. Charles A. Ellwood. $2.25.
 The Church and Industrial Reconstruction. $2.00.
 Labor and the Common Welfare. Samuel Gompers. $3.00.
 Poverty the Challenge of the Church. Penman. $1.00.
 Religion and Business. R. W. Babson. $1.50.
 Fundamentals of Prosperity. R. W. Babson. $1.00.
 The Sword or the Cross. Kirby Page. $1.20.
 The Science of Power. Benjamin Kidd. $2.50.
 The Gospel for a Working World. Harry F. Ward. $2.00.

MISSIONS

- The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War. $2.00.
 Christianity the Final Religion. S. M. Zwemer. $1.25.
 Modern Religious Movements in India. Farquhar. $2.75.
 The Religions of the World. George A. Barton. $2.00.
 Mary Slessor of Calabar. W. P. Livingstone. $2.00.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

- The Experience of God in Modern Life. Lyman. $1.50.
 What and Where Is God? Richard L. Swain. $1.50.
 Holy Spirit in Thought and Experience. T. Rees. $2.00.
 The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation. Denney. $3.00.
 The Christian Hope. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
 Can We Believe in Immortality? J. H. Snowden. $1.50.
 Immortality and the Future. H. R. Mackintosh. $1.50.
 The Truth About Christian Science. Snowden. $2.50.
 Originality of the Christian Message. Mackintosh. $1.75.
 Basic Ideals in Religion. R. W. Micou. $2.50.
 What Christianity Means to Me. Lyman Abbott. $1.75.
 Outspoken Essays. Dean W. R. Inge. $2.25.
 Public Opinion and Theology. Bishop McConnell. $1.50.
 The Meaning of Baptism. Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.35.
 Living Again. Charles R. Brown. $1.00.
 The New Orthodoxy. Edward Scribner Ames. $1.50.

PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

- The Meaning of Prayer. Fosdick. $1.15.
 The Meaning of Faith. H. E. Fosdick. $1.35.
 The Meaning of Service. H. E. Fosdick. $1.25.
 The Religion of a Layman. Charles R. Brown. $1.25.
 Psychology of the Christian Soul. George Steven. $1.50.
 The Psychology of Religion. J. H. Snowden. $2.00.
 The Religious Consciousness. J. B. Pratt. $2.50.
 Finding the Comrade God. Walter Fiske. $1.15.
 Religion of a Mature Mind. George Albert Coe. $1.75.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

- Training the Devotional Life. L. H. Weigle. 75 cts.
 Talks to Sunday School Teachers. L. H. Weigle. $1.50.
 Social Principles of Education. G. F. Betts. $1.50.
 The School in the Modern Church. H. F. Cope. $1.50.
 How to Teach Religion. G. F. Betts. $1.25.

INSPIRATIONAL BOOKS

- The Daily Altar. Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.50. (Leather, $2.50.)
 The Eternal Christ. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
 The Ambassador. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
 Things Eternal. John Kelman. $1.75.

THE NEW AGE

- New Mind for the New Age. Henry Churchill King. $1.50.
 A Better World. Tyler Dennett. $1.50.
 The Christian Faith and the New Day. McAfee. 90 cts.
 Church Facing the Future. William Adams Brown. 80c.
 The New Horizon in the Church and State. Faunce. 80c.
 World Facts and America's Responsibility. Patton. $1.25.
 The Gospel and the New World. Robert E. Speer. $2.00.
 Some Aspects of International Christianity. Kelman. $1.00.
 The Democratic Movement in Asia. Tyler Dennett. $1.90.
 Is Christianity Practicable? William Adams Brown. $1.75.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature. Davis. $2.50.
 Everybody's World. Sherwood Eddy. $1.90.
 Princess Salome. Burris Jenkins. $2.00.
 First. Henry Drummond. 50 cts.
 The Strategy of Life. Arthur Porritt. $1.25.
 Life of Theodore Roosevelt. W. R. Thayer. $1.00.

(Add 10 cents postage for each book)

The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

THE PRINCESS SALOME

By BURRIS JENKINS

TO be able to reach into the dim past and touching it with the power of the written word, recreate it into living reality, is a gift that is bestowed only upon the chosen few. Dr. Jenkins in his new novel, "Princess Salome: A Tale of the Days of Camel-Bells," proves himself worthy of that distinction. Dead cities, resurrected, live again in all the mad, barbaric splendor of the past. Like a purple veil of witchery the languorous atmosphere of the East descends. The years between have rushed away behind, the present fading into unreality and unreality becoming real. One does not read, but rather lives and moves amid the scenes of long ago. This book by Dr. Jenkins, Kansas City's most popular minister and editor of The Kansas City Post, is a worthy successor to "Ben Hur" and "Quo Vadis."

The Chicago Daily News says of the book:

"DO you remember your first reading of 'Ben Hur,' and the second, maybe the third? Each time the lapse of a few centuries became an illusion and for a few hours the world under Tiberius was more real to you than the present. Here is a book, 'Princess Salome,' that takes us back with equal realism and ease to similar scenes. The foot race at Antioch may not be as madly thrilling as the thunder of Ben-Hur's chariot wheels, but it is equally vivid and no athlete can read it without a tightening of the muscles as for the start. And how could a tale of the days of the Caesars be complete without an amphitheater, dissolute patricians, and the tramping of legionaries in the background? And the people? They are most splendidly alive. Three pilgrims come to Antioch, the parting of the ways; Gomar, barbarian gladiator, hired out to Pilate; Stephanas, Greek-trained Jewish athlete, and a zealous young Pharisee named Shaoul, whose quest for the king had brought them to Antioch and would drive him on alone, for in Antioch was the Princess Salome and a race to be run for the winning of the great prize.

"In the character of Salome the author has trespassed most daringly on our credulity and been amazingly successful. In the few times that we see her she is by turns the most lovable, implacable and utterly tragic figure that ever toyed with the strings of fate, but when all is done the catch in one's throat makes one feel that she is real.

As the story goes on there are others: old, familiar names revived to fresh intimacy and life, for with scrupulous accuracy and reverent art the author has interwoven the Christ story time and the product of the loom is threaded with crimson thread of the great sacrifice. Even the tragedy of a dancing girl in the court of Herod is lightened by Salome's act of worship when Christ came before Herod. The broken life of Stephanas closes in a victory that will some day bring Shaoul to his king, and Shaoul, when he has said a last farewell to Mary, for the call of a great work is on him, faces the western sun while Gomar follows, driving the pack donkey, serving a 'man who is a man.' It is beautifully done."

OTHER COMMENTS

New York Tribune:

Make room beside "Ben Hur" for a worthy companion. "Princess Salome" is sure to receive a wide reading, for it presents the whole current of the great Christ-story in a simple, graphic and engrossingly interesting narrative.

Philadelphia North American:

Embracing occurrences and characters of "deathless interest," "Princess Salome" makes strong appeal.

New York World:

Mr. Jenkins' story is full of motion, of color and of reminders of the scriptural narratives.

The Boston Herald:

It is a dramatic and realistic story, shot through with threads of barbaric splendor and colored by the glory of the faith that led the followers of the Master to martyrdom.

Price of the book $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS 508 South Dearborn Street
CHICAGO

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH AND INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

BY WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

Fifteen Cts. a Copy

June 16, 1921

Four Dollars a Year

Religious Education in Your School

THIS is written only for pastors who feel some measure of responsibility for the quality of literature going into the hands of their Sunday-school scholars. And, no doubt, all pastors who read The Christian Century are of that sort. Their point of view is that of religious education. The Sunday-school to them is more than an aggregation of units brought together each week to go through a certain formal program—calling the roll, “doing” the lesson, “taking up the pennies,” asking for birthday money, and telling the children to be sure to “have a good lesson” for next Sunday! The Sunday-school is to them rather The Church Studying the Word of Eternal Truth, and developing in minds and hearts the spirit of the Christian religion. It is, indeed, the church’s best chance to guarantee Christly men and women in the next generation, as well as in this. To pastors who hold this high ideal of the work of the Sunday-school, the matter of literature becomes a most vital one. Second only to the influence of the teacher in the life of the pupil is that of the literature upon which the scholars feed their minds and souls. And, in many cases, we are sure the influence of the literature comes first.

Why you should be interested in The Bethany Graded Lessons (Interdenominational Syndicate)

There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.

They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.

They are free from the sectarian spirit.

They are soundly and fervently evangelical.

They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.

They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.

Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.

They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have cooperated to produce them and are now using them.

Every school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

Send for returnable samples today and prepare for a year of genuine religious education next autumn.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn Street CHICAGO, ILL.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, JUNE 16, 1921

Number 24

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly
By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

An Order of Preachers at Large

A BIG idea presented in various forms by Dr. Joseph McAfee, Mr. William Jennings Bryan and Dean Inge is that of an order of preaching friars to make a tour of the country with a single message representing the convictions of a life-time. It was urged that by means of these "preachers at large" villages could be lifted out of provincialism, and that thousands of people who do not now go to church would go to hear these distinguished visitors from beyond their vicinity. It is on such a mission that Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, president of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, will go this coming year. Long the interpreter of Christian union and of world peace, he has been released from his pastoral duties at the Christian Temple for a year in order to devote himself to a more general ministry among the churches. This is indeed a wise procedure. While many church leaders agree as to the desirability of Christian union and would be ready to unite at once, they are compelled always to remember their backward constituencies. The village with its sectarian rivalries and prejudices is the brake on the triumphal car of Christian unity. World peace seems an entirely obvious thing to many thoughtful men. But let the average preacher poll his congregation and he will find right now a majority of his members in favor of more battleships. The leaders must go in democratic fashion to the people and convince the average man. In more than one city the people regard the church as set against the school in the matter of science and history. If our outstanding church leaders would tour our small college towns and frankly face the thought problems of the student body they could do a world of good. In the past such an itinerant ministry either failed through lack of economic support or it profited after the fashion of many popular evangelists. An organization for the support of an itinerant ministry would dignify the calling.

The Propagandist Film

ASIDE from money-making, propaganda is one of the big motives in the production of film. Recently the mayor of Boston revoked the license of a theater which had advertised a long run for the film, "The Birth of a Nation." This film has been prohibited in various cities, and where shown has often led to clashes between the races and local trouble. The Negro citizens of Boston secured united action on the mayor to prevent the exhibition of the film in that city. The author of the scenario, Thomas Dixon, admits that besides the pecuniary interest his motive in producing the film was to arouse the nation against the Negro. The tobacco interests manage to get the film stars to roll cigarettes in all their pictures, whether the particular star has a personal use for tobacco or not. We come to know something of the bias of the newspaper and make allowance for it. We know some journals as capitalistic and some as socialistic. The journal that supports a particular political coterie has its news and its editorials properly discounted. The proper discounting of the film propaganda will be more difficult, for we are not yet well enough acquainted with the film world to make the discriminations. There does not seem to be the same consistency in the film producing agencies, for a producer will sell his medium of publicity to conflicting interests for a consideration. The use of the movie to break down religious attitudes in this country in order to further the interests of the sporting class has been the most outstanding film propaganda during the year. The campaign against "blue laws" has been a smoke screen to cover an attack on the Volstead act and to open the way for Sunday pictures in commercial theaters all over the nation.

Some Religious Test Questions

THOMAS A. EDISON has started something with his test questions. His list of questions is criticized by editors and educators all over the land, indicating that few people can answer them without an encyclopedia. Men of other professions than that of an engineer have proposed questions which doubtless Mr. Edison would have some difficulty in answering. Meanwhile the preachers have seen the publicity value of the device, and they have set up some religious test questions. Sometimes this is facetious, as in a recent issue of the Congregationalist. When the editor asks "Which has the more deadly effect on church attendance, a rainy Sunday, or a pleasant Sunday?" he probably thinks most of us know the answer. He contributes to mirth by asking "What are the salient differences between the pulpit style of George A. Gordon and William A. Sunday?" Rev. S. Edward Young, pastor of Bedford Presbyterian church of Brooklyn, N. Y., propounds a set of questions which are partly theological in character. He wants to know, "Should a spiritually-minded person be less or more joyful than others?" He also asks, "What are some of the glaring public sins in this community?" It would be rather interesting to ask Mr. Edison who David's father was, or to inquire of him what was the leading doctrine taught by Jesus Christ. There are some kinds of knowledge with which we do not need to clutter up our minds. Encyclopedias are so accessible that we do not need to remember everything. But in moral and spiritual things we dare not depend on encyclopedias. This knowledge should ever be present in our lives. The real test questions would be those that reveal the standards of religious knowledge in the community. Some of us know that this is preeminently the age of religious illiterates.

Forgetting the Fifth Commandment

AT the close of our American Civil War Robert E. Lee uttered these memorable words: "Human virtue should be equal to human calamity." Alas, it is not always so, and letters from England indicate that the moral let-down which was so sad a feature of the last year of the war, and the year following, still continues. The riot of nudity, and the way in which ill-managed young girls imitate the manners of the courtesan, are appalling. Young women are not only ill-managed, but unmanagable by their parents. A distinguished preacher-novelist writes: "I do not know how matters stand in America, but here in England home discipline is either dead or dying. Parents have little or no control over their children, especially girls from fifteen to twenty-two. They have obtained work with good wages and are independent of their fathers and mothers. At the slightest restriction on the part of their parents they defy them and leave home. There are thousands of such girls who live in London, often with the most disastrous results. Religion seems to have gone by the board with vast numbers of the young generation, and thousands of parents are in despair as to what to do. Latch keys for young girls are common, and indiscriminate dances are the order of the day. Without a rebirth of religion in the home and among the young there is little or no hope." If the situation is not so bad on this side, it is bad enough as is shown by the greater familiarity between the sexes, the coarsening of manners, a lowering of standards, and a cheap cynicism which deems it smart to speak of moral laws as if they were only antiquated conventions.

Finding Church Facts About St. Louis

AN organization has been formed to continue some of the city survey work which was begun by the Inter-church World Movement. This new organization has for president Dr. John R. Mott; recording secretary, Professor E. D. Burton; and treasurer, Mr. Raymond Fosdick. It has secured Dr. Frank O. Beck to make a survey of St. Louis. Great progress has been made in this work, and some important decisions have already been reached. The relation of church preferences to church membership has been studied. It has been found that the Presbyterians lead in percentage of preferences in St. Louis. The Disciples and the Episcopalians have a very low percentage of preferences. Does this mean that the two latter denominations are harvesting their children more efficiently, or is there some other explanation? Some sections of the city now have eighty per cent of the children outside the Sunday schools. The two leading Protestant denominations are the Evangelical and the Lutheran denominations. Contrary to a rather widespread impression, it is shown that Roman Catholics are considerably out-numbered by Protestants. Dr. Beck feels that the ordinary Protestant impression of Catholic strength over-estimates this religious force. The reports of the survey commission follow the churches in their migrations for twenty years back, studying the causes of the change of location and the results following the change. This migratory feature of Protestant church work has been one of the distinct weaknesses and to have a clear statement of its effect upon the church life will be of great significance. The materials when all compiled will go into a book that will be a guide to other cities when they undertake the work of discovering the exact facts with regard to the religious situation. Most cities are still in dense ignorance with regard to the trend of church development and entirely without any statesmanlike distribution of the Christian forces.

The Ever-Dying Church

ON all sides, all the time, with tiresome iteration we are told that the church is dying, if not actually dead. More often than not the statement is made out of irritation, and still more often from indifference. It must be so, since so many say so. Perhaps, after all, it is the business of the church to die, like its Master, and rise again to newness of life and power, as in our own day it is dying to an old, inadequate individualism and rising, radiant and new-born, with a vision of the gospel of the kingdom. "The church must go," said the rather impatient hero of Dr. Dawson's story, "A Prophet in Babylon"; but, somehow, it remains. If it falls into a deep sleep, its rest is like that described by Dante—"dawn-dreams of the truth pre-sageful." When one hears the lament about the dying of the church one recalls the apostrophe of Arnold to Oxford: "Home of lost causes, and forsaken beliefs, and impossible loyalties! Apparitions of a day, what is our puny warfare against the Philistines, compared with the warfare which this queen of romance has been waging against them for centuries, and will wage after we are gone?" The church is dead! Long live the church!

The Volcano Breaks Out at Tulsa

THE relations between whites and blacks have been particularly sensitive and strained since the war. Many thousands of Negro troops have been disbanded. These men have had a trip to France and an experience that lifts them above the provincialism of their past lot. In France and England they saw more liberties accorded the black man than in America. They are a leaven today among their fellows. Negro men are in many cases making more money than ever before. Educated Negroes are editing papers in which the racial grievance has full interpretation, sometimes a partisan and bitter interpretation. At the same time the white American has become less tolerant in his social attitudes. His old-time German neighbor is now called a "Heinie," and subjected to much criticism. Unabashed by the judgment of the civilized world on atrocities in Belgium, white men organize mobs and take away the legal rights from their fellow citizens of color. It is hard to tell who is to blame for the recent terrible riots in Tulsa, Okla. One newspaper story represents a group of Negroes gathering in a newspaper office and arming a large number of black men. But it seems incredible that the fury of the white mob could be justified on the basis of any actual damage done by the blacks. Thousands of Negroes are today homeless whose attitude toward the white has always been one of respect and even of subservience. The brutal injustice of this white mob has made the problem a little harder in every large city in the land. The Negro is made sullen and suspicious. The lower element of the whites commends the action of the Tulsa mob, and sets it up as an example to be followed. It may be possible that other cities will suffer similar catastrophes this summer by reason of the tragedy in Oklahoma.

A Traffic In Widow's Tears

A FIGHT between rival groups of cab lines in Chicago has brought to light the sorrows of the poor in the time when they lay away their dead. A new group of liverymen propose to furnish carriages at half the old rates, and insist they will make good money then. In recent times the older organization has raced the hearse through the streets at fifty miles an hour to lose non-union drivers, and has resorted to other tactics which indicates the most hardened commercialism. The cost of flowers, the fees of undertakers and the other expenses involved in the burial of the dead have all increased beyond all reason. Most of the poor families these days have a little industrial insurance policy on which they have been paying through the years. It has been the thought that this policy would give the widow an opportunity to readjust herself to the problem of life. Under present conditions most of it goes to the various people that are engaged in the burying of the dead. Reform in funeral custom must arise within the church. The present custom has much in it of empty display and pagan superstition. The burial of the dead in any large city runs into millions of dollars of expense. Already the wealthy and refined families of the city have seen the atrocious taste of lengthy hired processions and big floral displays. Often a family of social distinction will lay its dead away quietly with only the immediate friends present, and at less expense than some Irish widow will incur for a bricklayer husband. The fraternal orders have had an unhappy facility in running up funeral expense by sending considerable groups of mourners who are carried to the cemetery in hired carriages. The funeral benefits of the order are sometimes nothing, and seldom if ever enough to pay for the funeral. The pagan mind sees a great significance in the form of sepulture of the dead, but to the Christian mind the earthly tabernacle that is laid aside should need only the respectful and simple attention which love and hope and sound taste dictate.

Government Censorship of the Press Relaxed

DURING the war and in the days immediately following, the mailing privileges were taken away from certain socialist and radical papers. In this matter the government acted more upon European traditions than upon American. Our fathers wrote into the bill of rights the doctrines of free speech and a free press. From this lofty faith we have of late sadly apostacized. One does not need to agree with the Liberator, the New York Call or the Milwaukee Leader in order to wish them freedom to state their views. The suppression of these papers has made more social radicals in this country than their free circulation has ever done. The principle involved in forbidding the circulation of journals displeasing to an administration is essentially vicious. By this means a dictatorship keeps itself in power in Russia. In more than one Latin American republic has the limitation of freedom been the support of of tyranny. A democracy does not take the attitude of letting its political leaders do the national thinking. It is of the essence of democratic faith that the ordinary man's thoughts will be of service to the whole group. The test of his ideas is not to be found in some government bureau, but rather in the forum and the printed sheet. Error can always be answered. It is in essence weaker than the truth. Prejudice may blind the eyes of a nation for a time, but in the long run truth will prevail.

Dante and Today

SIX hundred years ago, September 14, 1321, the mighty spirit of Dante escaped from exile into the homeland of the soul, free of its foes. In Italy, in all lands where men love the things of the spirit, his name will be recalled with fragrant memory, and new tribute paid to his genius. He lived a troubled life in a stormy era, but the wonderful fourteenth century can hardly be reckoned among the Dark Ages, having had Thomas Aquinas for its theologian, Francis of Assisi for its saint, and Dante as its poet. It was a morning hour, when ideas from old Greek learning floated like pollen on the winds, quickening the human mind for new adventure.

There are classic men as there are classic books. A classic man is one who, living deeply in his own age, discerns the eternal in the midst of time, and speaks to all ages. Carlyle called Dante "the voice of ten silent centuries," and Ruskin thought him the central man of all the world, as representing in perfect balance the imaginative, moral, and intellectual faculties, all at their highest. For Dante the physical is the fleeting, the spiritual is the real. He saw time under the forms of eternity, and in a day of vanishing materialism, with its shadow of fatalism, we exult in his high assertion of the freedom and sovereignty of the human will, by one whom Lowell calls "the highest spiritual nature that has expressed itself in rhythmical form."

Tennyson faltered where he firmly trod, and stretched lame hands of faith, faintly trusting a large hope. Not so Dante, who began with faith and by his longer flight attained to a vision of the Most High, whose faith still lights the world with its splendor. If Shakespeare is world-wide, Dante is world-deep. Homer sings of the heroic deeds of men; Dante lays bare the soul to learn the meaning of life and the issues of character in a moral universe. For that reason, when we enter the mystic cathedral of his thought,

The tumult of the time disconsolate
To inarticulate murmurs dies away,
While the eternal ages watch and wait.

Is Dante a safe guide in these our years and times? In some respects, Yes; both for the revelation of his insight and the spiritual achievement of his experience. Take the last first. The story of his life furnished materials for what the Greek poets would have made a black tragedy. Born of knightly blood, dowered with brilliant genius, an unsullied patriot, by the fickle gust of fortune he was deprived of city, home, family, position, property, and doomed to lonely exile under threat of death. Bereft of those very things, the loss of which other poets have held made life a disaster, he turned his thoughts inward, and by fellowship with God won victory over malignant fate. If ever man was the sport of hostile forces it was Dante, but he was master of his soul by the grace of God.

Such is the power of the human will, reinforced by the faith of a Christian and the vision of a mystic. "God alone is great," said the theologians. Man is great, too, said Dante; he is no worm of the dust, but can be captain of his soul. No doubt this is his chief affinity with our age, which is the Age of the Will, when man is discovering that he can rise above environment and make a world fit to live in. Today we refuse to bow, fatalistically, to ancient evils, the playthings of forces we can neither define nor resist, like Macbeth and Othello. No; having spent a century in extending our knowledge of the universe, man is turning to a study of himself, to learn the laws whereby he can control his own acts, and shape his world and his destiny. But he will fail and end in confusion, unless, like Dante, he lays hold of the power of spiritual vision.

As for the bottomless, hopeless Inferno of Dante, it is as obsolete as his astronomy, but we dare not ignore his moral insight. The thesis of the Inferno is that we are not punished for our sins, but by them, each after its kind. Sin is hell, here and hereafter. If sin is eternal hell is eternal. But the dogma of eternal sin is a hideous blasphemy—unless we are ready to admit divine defeat, and bow to something which divides divinity with God. But for one grave defeat the Purgatorio of Dante would be what Dean Stanley called it, "the most religious book I have ever read." Christ is left out. In His place stands the shining figure of Beatrice, the lovely embodiment of the beauty and purity at the heart of things. It is salvation by a system, not by a Savior; by a process rather than by a person. One misses the warmth of fellowship, and the glow of spiritual immediacy, which is the glory of Christian experience in our day. Deeming fellowship with Christ and self-forgetful service the way of redemption, we do not think of life as a moral gymnasium in which souls toil at the behest of a self-centered salvation.

Perhaps, after all, there is a truth in the idea of purgatory which we have missed, because of the abuses to which it has lent itself. There is nothing in the physical ordeal of death to disinfect, much less to petrify us, morally. If the complete personality of man survives there must be some way of purification after death, else no mortal will be saved. No one of us may ever hope to attain the final goal of union with God while he is as imperfect as the best man knows himself to be. In such matters one may not be dogmatic, and there need be no less of moral urgency; but the Great War, cutting off so many millions of young men without conversion and the offices of religion, has profoundly modified our outlook upon the destiny of the soul. There is need of clear thinking here, and we must bring a Christian heart with us to the grand investigation.

Alas, we who live in the dim country of this world are dazzled by the blinding vision of the Paradiso, which in majesty of thought and sustained loveliness of expression is unrivaled in all literature. It is a theodicy, august, subduing, overwhelming, and we stand in awe of it.

There is a light above, which visible
Makes the Creator unto every creature,
Who only in beholding Him has peace.

Beyond this vision faith, even when glorified by great genius, cannot fly. It is the ultimate beatitude, timeless, spaceless, "light intellectual full of love; love of true good full of joy; joy that transcends every sweetness"; where faith is lost in sight and God is all in all.

Here vigor failed the towering phantasy;
But yet the will rolled onward, like a wheel
In even motion, by the Love impell'd
That moves the sun in heaven and all the stars.

Eugenics

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE Is a Good Woman Who seeketh every now and again a New Tail for her Kite, and among the last of these Appendages is the Science of Eugenics. And she came to see Keturah, and besought her that she would bring Safed and hear a Famous Woman Lecturer on Eugenics. And she said, Safed will not be disturbed if there be no other men.

And we went, I and Keturah, and I sat back, but I saw and heard all that was said and done.

And the lecturer told how many Defective children were born, and how many Morons were born, and how many children were reared in Unwholesome Surroundings, and how the world was on the Toboggan because no one had known the Science of Eugenics. And I am afraid that most that she said was true.

And the women sat around her, and listened with all their ears, and felt the importance of what was said.

And as we went away, Keturah inquired of me, saying, What didst thou think of it?

And I said, It was a fine example of the waste of Good Stuff on people who have no need of it, and furthermore, it dealt only with the Negative aspect of the question.

And I said, I hope the recording angel did not notice a little smile that I had all to myself when I looked over that bunch that listened to the lecturer. For a majority of the women were unmarried, and quite unlikely to marry. And a majority of the others were widows, and likely to remain widows, and a majority of the others were married and childless and some of them more likely to remain childless than to remain married. And as for the rest, they averaged about three-quarters of a child apiece, and that fraction was a Puny and Badly Pampered Fraction. And I mentally applauded the heroic resolution of that Whole Bunch that they would do nothing to add to the number of badly born children.

And I said, But thou, Keturah, who knowest mighty little about Eugenics, hast practiced it in the positive way. For thou hast given unto the world Five Strong, Healthy children, and these have married other five, and unto these God has given other children. Thou art the mother of more good, wholesome, promising American manhood and womanhood than that entire Bunch.

And Keturah said, Nay, I know Very Little. I have hardly understood before the meaning of the Word Eugenics

And I said, There is too much of our preaching which stoppeth with telling what ought not to be done. There ought to be fewer defective and poorly born children, but there also is need of good strong and well born children. And thy Eugenics has been of the Constructive sort.

By Joseph Ernest McAfee

Commerce

TO buy and not to sell is robbery.
To sell and not to buy breeds poverty.
The gold you hoard from selling in excess
Is naught but yellow dirt, enriches none,
For only riches spent are truly worth.
The goods you hoard from buying in excess
Can only feed a gourmand, satisfy
A gluttony, consumption that consumes
Consumer. Use and usefulness alone
Determine values. Money made an end
Is folly's compensation to a fool.
The profiteering robber robs himself
At last; the miser makes his own self poor.
Exchange is law. He violates the pact
On which society subsists, who gets
And does not give, or gives and does not get.
Who gives and naught receives buys his soul's bliss
With pauper's blight. Who gets and never gives Himself the pauper's part accepts, and breeds
A pauper soul. To bid for private good,
To join the scramble after place and pelf,
To rush the trough, and thrust the other swine
Away, is swinish greed, a bestial mood;
To strive, and count the cost in common gains,—
To share, is labor's full and glad reward.

Justice

THE practice and the sense of justice, that
Is democratic virtue sublimate:
To put one's self in others' place, to feel
As they must feel, to thrill with high desire,
Or low, as they must thrill, to strain and tug
As they must tug against temptation's pull;—
And then to judge, and hold the verdict firm,
Accept the palliation and the guilt;
No favors sought nor won, no winking eye,
No simp'ring, whimp'ring, fawning, suppliant plaint,
No weak misyielding to the weakling's whine,
Compounding cowardice by coward grace!
The while where's God? Not sitting potentate,
Not clothed in majesty, not scepter'd, crown'd,
Now smiling, frowning, as caprice may tick.
God is God-Man, his bone, His bone,
His flesh His flesh, his toil emprise divine.
The rev'ence due,—no puling spawn of fear,
But brother's clean respect for brotherhood,
The mercy meet,—no reckless benison
Of easy despot throned in blissful might,
But even-handed, level equity,
The dispensation of the right, no taint
Of privilege, the contrite suffering
For sin, the good on high because the good.

The Episcopal Church and Industrial Relations

By William B. Spofford

NOT long ago a debate was held in Baltimore on the question, "Does the Episcopal Church Stand for the New Social Order?" A liberal clergyman took the positive side, while the negative position was defended by a layman who had left the church because he felt it to be hopelessly reactionary. Both made out a clear case. Both won. The clergyman proved beyond question that the Episcopal church was for a social revolution. He consumed all of his thirty minutes in reading startling manifestos and resolutions issued by groups of Episcopalians, official and unofficial. The layman spent his time in relating reactionary deeds, and the lack of any deeds at all, ending his argument by saying that the church should be judged for what it was, not by what its officials said it was. In the rebuttal the clergyman carefully side-stepped these deeds by reading more resolutions, while the apostate confined his rebuttal to the simple statement that words alone would never save society.

Certainly if one is to judge the Episcopal church by its official pronouncements there can be no doubt as to where it stands. As far back as 1913 the general convention, the official legislative body for Episcopalians, passed the following resolution:

Whereas, the moral and spiritual welfare of the people demands that the highest possible standard of living should everywhere be maintained and that all conduct of industry should emphasize the search for such higher and more human forms and organization as will generally elicit the personal initiative and self-respect of the workman and give him a definite personal stake in the system of production to which life is given; and

Whereas, injustice and disproportionate inequality as well as misunderstanding, prejudice and mutual distrust as between employer and employe are widespread in our social and industrial life today; therefore be it

Resolved, the house of bishops concurring, that we, the members of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal church, do hereby affirm that the church stands for the ideal of social justice and that it demands the achievement of a social order in which the social cause of poverty and the gross human waste of the present order shall be eliminated; and in which every worker shall have a just return for that which he produces, a free opportunity for self-development and a fair share in all the gains of progress. And since such a social order can only be achieved progressively by the effort of men and women who in the spirit of Christ put the common welfare above private gain the church calls upon every communicant, clerical and lay, seriously to take part in the study of the complex conditions under which we are called upon to live, and so to act that the present prejudice and injustice may be supplanted by mutual understanding, sympathy and just dealings, and the ideal of thorough-going democracy may be finally realized in our land.

The criticism is often raised that resolutions passed then are meaningless today, since those were "safe" days when it was possible to issue resolutions without running the danger of being understood. We counter with the report of the Lambeth Conference of last summer, unofficial it is true, yet carrying official weight with members of our church. There the bishops call upon the church to "seek to make the outward order of society an embodiment of Christian justice and love" and to that end they demand a "fundamental change in the spirit and working of our economic life." It is of course quite possible to say that this might mean almost anything from the fundamental change that Judge Gary is said to advocate to the sovietism of Lenin. It is suggestive rather than direct, and yet it is reasonable to suppose that these bishops, among them a number of Americans, had something more in mind than putting patches on outworn garments.

ORGANIZED INDUSTRIAL IDEALS

With these resolutions sanctioning their activities there are two organizations in the church working for the new social order. The older group is the "Church Socialist League," which has been carrying on a propaganda work for a number of years, issuing a quarterly called the "Social Preparation," and getting out various tracts and pamphlets. Before the war there was room enough in this group for all with a social point of view. But with the war came the inevitable split between the pro-war radicals and the pacifists, which resulted in the formation of a new society called the "Church League for Industrial Democracy." Pink was chosen as their color instead of red, not because its organizers became less radical than they had been previous to the war, but because they wanted the support of those in the church whom they thought would rally under a banner labeled "Industrial Democracy," but who were repelled by the cry of the socialists for revolution. Both groups have been working side by side without bitterness; the socialists simply being convinced that in the long run an uncompromising position will be judged the more successful, while the new group is of the opinion that the immediate gains will justify moderation. The Church Socialist League has continued to publish their quarterly, the radicalism of which is very pronounced, and does what it can to defend the clergy who get into trouble because of their radical activities—men like Bishop Paul Jones and Irwin Tucker. The Church League for Industrial Democracy has gained steadily in numbers since its founding until it now has enrolled over four hundred members, including sixteen bishops. A number of conferences have been held, pamphlets have been sent to the clergy setting forth its claims, and a secretary, who gives all of his time to the work of the society, has been sent about the country presenting the message of the league to various groups, especially college students.

Aside from these two organizations, whose combined memberships hardly number six hundred, one can see little in the Episcopal church that indicates a serious intention of working for that fundamental change demanded by its bishops at Lambeth. Individuals there are who are doing all they can, but the way they are treated by the church succeeds only in emphasizing the difficulties of their task.

BISHOP WILLIAMS' LEADERSHIP

One does not have to hunt for cases. The recent one of Bishop Williams, for example, is typical. He is the one outstanding preacher of the Episcopal church, recognized as a great prophet by all Christians. This spring he delivered the Lyman Beecher lectures on preaching at Yale University, an event which places him among the immortals as a preacher. I am told by a man who attended that he has never seen such enthusiasm manifested in a classroom as was shown by the students at these lectures. Finishing his series at Yale, Bishop Williams went to New York where he delivered the substance of one of these lectures in a sermon from the pulpit of St. John's cathedral. A newspaper account of the event reads as follows:

The atmosphere was charged with electricity, mostly antagonistic to the preacher. Many hearers gave complete evidence of revolt against the opinions coming like thunderbolts from the pulpit, and more than a dozen walked out to show their disapprobation.

The following Sunday the newly elected bishop of New York, fearing, evidently, that people might have the impression that Bishop Williams represented the church, denounced him in no uncertain terms from the same pulpit. At the convention of his diocese held in Detroit the following week, Bishop Williams again called upon his church to stand firmly by its resolutions and manifestos. It was not a radical address. He merely quoted the resolutions and pronouncements of various Christian bodies on social and industrial subjects—the Canadian Wesleyan and the Canadian Presbyterian Assembly, the declaration of the Methodist Episcopal bishops, the Catholic Welfare Commission, the Social Creed of the Churches, the Lambeth report on Christianity and Industrial Relations—ending by stating that the church must either choose to back up these opinions or choose money, but that in his opinion it could not have both. This address resulted in such drastic criticism that Bishop Williams, rather than embarrass his diocese, offered then and there to resign, an offer which, fortunately for the reputation of the Episcopal church, was turned down. But what conclusions will be drawn from the fact that a church which professes to want a fundamental change in our economic life compels one of its most distinguished bishops to offer his resignation because of his liberal opinions? For anyone who knows anything about radicalism must understand that Bishop Williams belongs to that group whom socialists call "sincere but sentimental bunglers." When the church treats Bishop Williams—a liberal—in this way, one can imagine what would happen to a man who believed sufficiently in a fundamental change to do something besides preach about it.

Another affair which brings out the reactionary position of the church is that of Dr. Bernard Iddings Bell, the president of St. Stephen's College. A few weeks ago "The Churchman" reported an attack upon him by Dr. Cummins, a rector in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. A social and economic heretic was the charge. Yet this attack by a man who is known as a militant conservative is not as significant to my mind as the defense of Dr. Bell by another Poughkeepsie rector who rushed to Dr. Bell's defense with the statement that "Dr. Bell is no more of a socialist than I am." A true statement, doubtless, yet one that certainly conveys the impression that nothing could be said for a man if his enemies could prove such a charge to be true. An unimportant event, yet one that does show fairly accurately the mind of the Episcopal church on social questions. "Reform as much as you please, but go any deeper and you are in trouble."

This same issue of "The Churchman" reported a tremendous mass meeting held in London, sponsored by the Life and Liberty Movement, and presided over by an archbishop, at which clergymen who are avowed socialists called upon the church to ally herself with labor to bring about a revolution. Yet here this same church forces a bishop to offer his resignation because of his liberalism, and his friends rush to clear the name of a man who has been called a socialist. Of course socialism is but one way of bringing about that "fundamental change," but it is a way that is advocated by many brilliant thinkers and one would think that the church might tolerate a few in its ministry who subscribe to its tenets.

DEAN LADD AND BERKELEY

The case which to my mind best illustrates the unwillingness of the church to live up to its professional teachings is that of Dean Ladd and the Berkeley Divinity School. Dr. Ladd was elected the head of the school in 1918. At the time of his election there was a good bit of opposition to him on the part of some of the older alumni because of his interest in social and economic questions. He had been known to recommend Bernard Shaw, Wells and Tolstoi to students, was a member of a society which believes that men should have an intelligent understanding of socialism, and the report had gone out that a copy of "The New Republic" had been seen on his desk. But the younger men were as strong for him as the older men were opposed, and for exactly the same reasons. When I make these generalizations it will, of course, be understood that there were exceptions in each group. But in a general way the older alumni were opposed to his election while the more recent graduates were for him. There is significance in this fact, I believe, especially during these days when the question of securing men for the ministry is so much discussed.

College students can be divided into two camps. The majority are those who look upon their education as an investment which is to bring a dollars and cents return, the more dollars they get and the sooner they get them the more successful they will consider themselves to be. They have been Americanized into money-making machines. The minority are those who are conscious of being debtors to society. Their one desire is to serve. I have spent hours with these men discussing what fields they will enter. Most of them know that the world is in a mess, and, in a way that is fortunately characteristic of youth, they feel that they are the ones to put it right. But strange to say few of them choose the ministry. Why? Because no man can go through college these days without realizing that the big problems are social and industrial. This realization, combined with a passion for unselfish service, means that a man has entered upon that stage of mental development which for convenience we call liberalism. The church, with its ignorance of present day problems, has few attractions for these men. Those that do enter the ministry have a picture of the church as it should be in their minds; seeing faults, certainly, but sure that the faults can be eradicated if a few of them work from the inside. Naturally men of this type, who dominated the life at Berkeley, were keen for Ladd. No young man could be anything else. He has vision. He sees the evils and is anxious to have them corrected. And above all, he is a great teacher; one of those rare men who considers a mind as something to be developed by the owner, rather than molded by a professor. In any case the young men were enthusiastic enough about him to put him over as dean in spite of considerable opposition.

"SPAWNING PLACE FOR BOLSHEVISM"

Ladd made no changes at the school. The intellectual atmosphere of Berkeley has always been honest and liberal. Men and women of authority in various fields were invited to address the students as they had been in the past. The new dean did start a Sunday evening discussion group at his home, more of a social affair than anything else. But there was generally someone there worth listening to; Margaret Bondfield, Robert de la Mere, Irwin Tucker, John Spargo, Jessie Wallace Hughan—people liberal enough to develop the suspicion already latent in the minds of the townsfolk, that the school was becoming a center for radical propaganda. Things came to a head with an address by Mr. Wilfred Humphries, a former member of the Y. M. C. A. staff in Russia. He had delivered the same address on the Russian situation in most of the eastern colleges, but this did not prevent his presence at Berkeley being made the occasion for a public denunciation of the school, and especially the dean, in the local paper. For several days the one paper in the town ran scare heads across its front page denouncing Berkeley as a "spawning place for bolshevism and radical socialistic principles." As a result of the articles, and the petty small town gossip which naturally developed, Dean Ladd, wishing to clear up the matter, asked the trustees to appoint a committee to investigate the teaching of the school. The whole matter should have been settled in a week, but the committee gave six months to the task and then issued a typical church document, one of those beautifully balanced affairs which damned with faint praise. Instead of meeting the issue, which was whether or not the faculty of Berkeley were fit men to entrust with the education of men seeking the ministry, the report simply suggested that Dean Ladd prevent future criticism by giving up his membership in the Church League for Industrial Democracy, a society which they admitted advocated principles which would solve our social and industrial problems in a Christian way, but which they as citizens of the world thought it unwise for him to advocate "because of the present state of the public mind."

Dean Ladd has held his ground. He is still dean and will remain dean in spite of the attempt of men prominent in the church to "starve him out." Several people who have been lukewarm towards the church because of its reactionary tendencies have rallied to him, and have been won back to the church because they have found in him one man willing to stand firmly for principles regardless of consequences to himself. Men and women prominent in national life have come to his aid—Robert Gardiner, Winston Churchill, Learned Hand, Dorothy Straight, Lucy Sturgis, William Draper Lewis, Frank L. Polk, Caroline Ruutz-Rees, William F. Cochran, Mary Simkhovitch and many others. So his fight is a winning one. But regardless of the outcome, the fact remains that he has been compelled to fight church authorities for the right to do those things which the church officially instructs him to do. The general conventions of the church and the bishops at Lambeth have set forth ideals which, if applied to our life, would make the outward order of society an embodiment of Christian love and justice. If these ideals are to be carried out it is obvious that every opportunity must be given to the young men offering themselves for the ministry to fit themselves for leadership by a serious study of the problems involved. Dean Ladd, realizing this, has tried to bring Berkeley into tune with the new day by giving the students there this opportunity. Yet those who have publicly praised these words about social justice have secretly fought one who has tried to make the words a reality. Dean Ladd has taken his stand squarely upon the platform built by the church, and he has found his enemies among those of his own household.

SOME PROPHETIC VOICES

These cases indicate what invariably happens to a man who believes in an honest-to-goodness way that society must be ordered differently before it can be called Christian. It would be easy to speak of others. Paul Jones, for instance, was compelled to give up his work as the bishop of Utah because he stuck to opinions in 1917 which those who did the driving shared until it became unsafe and are now advocating again since opinion is swinging that way. He, too, took his stand at a time when it was unwise because "of the state of the public mind," and resigned from his diocese at a special session of the house of bishops held in New York in order to save the face of the church. In his case there is good authority for the statement that his pacifism gave his enemies an opportunity to get rid of a radical social thinker. Since then he has been doing work outside the church as secretary for the Fellowship of Reconciliation. A case of throwing the fish out of the boat into the pond.

There is Mercer Johnson, forced also to take up secular work because he refused to comply with the request of one of his vestry "to run the church like a grocery store—give people what they want." There is Harold Brewster, asked in a nice diplomatic way to give up his work in Bisbee, Ariz., for protesting against the now famous Bisbee deportations. There is the protest that has been raised against Percy Stickney Grant of the Church of the Ascension, in New York, for conducting a forum where modern problems are frankly faced; and the criticism of Dr. Guthrie, who met the challenge of a group of unemployed who marched into his church in the Bowery one Sunday morning in order to show up the hypocrisy of Christianity. The challenge was met with food and a warm bed instead of fatherly advice, and the "hoboes" who came to St. Mark's-in-the-Bowery singing the wobbles' song, "We'll eat pie, bye and bye, in the sky," left the service singing "Onward Christian Soldiers." For six months Dr. Guthrie has been feeding and housing such men as these in the parish house, doing everything possible to get them work. But instead of being supported in this work by the church he has received nothing but the nastiest sort of criticism—"publicity seeker," "one of Guthrie's shows" and comments of that sort. And finally there is Irwin St. John Tucker, a priest who loves the church passionately, a man gifted as few men are, yet forced to use his talents outside the church, since the church fears that its respectability will be contaminated by his radicalism.

THE CHURCH'S POWER

Just as during the war the church met the criticism that Christianity had failed with the statement that it had not failed since it had never been tried—a statement more condemning than the original charge—so now the church meets the charge of being reactionary with the statement that it is less so than other groups. Which I think is true but beside the point. Certainly the church is less reactionary than other groups—lawyers, doctors, politicians, and most American labor groups. But the Episcopal church believes, as these other groups do not, that God has endowed it with power to establish a rule of righteousness. Its bishops, blessed with the guidance of the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands, were inspired to issue a statement demanding that society be reorganized. One would suppose that the clergy would take up the work in earnest. Yet why they do not is obvious. Many of them are social thinkers; some radical ones. But they do nothing and call it expediency, when in fact their inactivity is due to the fear of losing their churches. The pew controls the purse-strings, and the pew is very well satisfied with the world as it is; especially the Episcopal pew. So when the issue is between the senior warden and the Spirit speaking through bishops most of the clergy feel obliged to side with the warden. The immediate returns are greater and the majority of them have children to feed. "Consider the lilies" is all right, but there is one problem that Jesus didn't face—a wife and three or four children.

As a result the Episcopal church as an organization does not stand behind its own teachings. No one is to be blamed. It cannot and continue as it is organized at present. Millions of dollars are required each year for operating expenses. The people with surplus enough to supply these funds are not going to allow the church to denounce the system which makes their surplus possible.

Does that end it? Perhaps, but it should not. Those in the church who stand for the new order can follow St. Paul and refuse to eat unearned bread. He found time enough to do productive labor and at the same time accomplish something as a Christian missionary. It is possible to be a Christian without a salary. It is even possible to be a preacher without a pulpit. It is possible to make Christianity the great adventure that it once was. God is with those who dare. So are young men. I'll warrant such an interpretation would end the discussion as to why men do not enter the ministry. A foolish suggestion? Perhaps. But how we need some of the folly of St. Francis and his band of Little Brothers.

Us Missionaries

By George Gleason

WHAT do you people at home expect of us missionaries?

You first of all expect us to have iron constitutions. You swing us around through different states, asking us to spend night after night on sleeping cars working between the jumps long hours that would disqualify us for membership in any labor union. You expect us to wake up smiling, rosy, and clear of mind. The tired looking missionary has no welcome on your platforms.

You expect reports of innumerable modern miracles, like Sherwood Eddy's story of the three boys in his Bible Class twenty years ago in India: Azariah is now Bishop of 40,000 members of the Church of England; Abraham is Bishop of the Syrian Independent Church. Last year he invited Mr. Eddy to speak to the largest Christian audience in the world—30,000 people gathered in a palm leaf pavilion which they had erected with their own hands to keep off the sun. The third boy, an outcast pariah, became Moderator of the General Assembly of the South India Church which has united five of the great independent Protestant denominations.

EVANGELISTIC MIRACLES

You expect us to report the development of men like my mechanic associate in Osaka, who came on our Association staff at the age of eighteen, a horny-handed worker in sheet iron. While he was out on his bicycle collecting membership fees he originated and organized an evangelistic band, signed up eight members, and had his constitution mimeographed before the General Secretary and I knew anything about it. This band now numbers thirty-five. They preach on street corners in winter, and at the seashore and in the parks in summer. They were once stoned by the Buddhists, when speaking to a great crowd from the municipal bandstand. I saw them one evening when they were "compelling them to come in" to an evangelistic service in a small chapel. In a busy section they beat their drums and clanged the cymbals. When the crowd gathered, one of the members shot out a four-minute speech on the value of Christianity to the nation, and announced the meeting. The drum major then started toward the church while his accomplices gathered around the little group of curious people and shooed them along into the chapel. By such methods I have seen them fill a half empty church. In the spring and fall Kimura takes his band to the top of a hill overlooking Osaka and during the midnight hours they pray for the regeneration of our great wicked city.

You want us to be statesmen. At anybody's request you expect us to speak on the most intricate international problems. Your newspaper reporters wish us to make sensational remarks on delicate political situations and you expect us to commit no indiscretions. Recently when I spoke in Chicago on American-Japanese relations, I tried to interpret Japan's actions in the Far East as an adolescent effort to develop a Monroe Doctrine for Asia, similar to our American principle. A newspaper editor commenting on my diplomatic effort remarked: "We trust that the gentleman representing a great Christian organization will be put on ice by those in control until his symptoms can be properly diagnosed."

INTERESTING TO ALL, OFFENSIVE TO NONE

Before Rotary Clubs and at Chambers of Commerce we are asked to speak on international trade, foreign exchange, and business methods; and then at Sunday schools to tell all about the curious customs of "the natives."

You expect us at a moment's notice to give Bible talks which for eloquence and moving power will immediately put in the shade all local talent. You expect us to be interesting to all and offensive to none. Even the most conservative and the most liberal must find the missionary "sound."

You who are editors expect us at any time to write a "nice readable article of two thousand words" which will help sell the magazine. You do not care what we write about as long as it reads well.

You expect us to have fresh ideas on the management of most everything in the home land, as well as on the regeneration of the part of the world we are working in. I have sat for hours and poured into my sympathetic heart, the social, religious, and educational problems of America. I sometimes honestly wonder why, with the indescribable needs and miraculous open doors of the Far East weighing down my soul, America's load must be added to.

I have discovered that you do not expect us to be authorities on dress, carburetors, or the conduct of afternoon teas. We fortunately are not required to shine as social lions. I recently heard of a group of missionaries who on their field were for the moment disrupted over matters of social etiquette. I have never found that you home people look to us for any leadership of this sort.

After analyzing your expectations of us, I wonder if we missionaries should not build on these ideals and become the sort of people you believe us to be.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

IT was a delightful summer day. The Lion was in the spot we called his outdoor study. It was a big porch looking out on the rear garden and so sheltered from observation and secure in a certain fine quiet. Vines were clambering all about. The tables were full of books and magazines. The couch upon which my friend lay was so placed as to be near to pretty much everything he could possibly want. The green grass outside was full of a certain rich beauty. And the flowers in the garden tossed their heads in a gay riot of color. The Lion looked up as I came in from the heat and the rush of the life outside.

"The world is too much with us," he quoted with a smile. "Come and brush the dust out of your mind, and see what a little quiet will do for the lines on your face. There's a little bit of the Middle Ages hidden in this garden. It's warranted to take you out of the hectic life of the twentieth century. Come and try it."

I looked down at his face with a bit of half wistful envy. There was such a curiously vital quiet about him. And his eyes had deep wells of spiritual content.

"It isn't the garden," I said, "it's you. What would the thirteenth century be without Saint Francis?"

But he would have none of my praise, not even when indirectly expressed. He picked up a book which lay beside him.

"I've been reading about the middle west," he said. "It's rather right to call it the Valley of Democracy, isn't it?"

"Sinclair Lewis would call it—" I began.

My friend interrupted. "Why read Sinclair Lewis when you can read Vachel Lindsay? Why read the literature of scorn when you can read the literature of understanding? Why read about the old clothes of the middle west when you can read about its awakening spirit?"

"You are fairly keen about Vachel Lindsay, I observe," I suggested.

The Lion responded at once.

"Well, rather," he admitted. "You see when Edgar Lee Masters wrote the Spoon River Anthology I began to fear that nobody would really tell us about the Mississippi Valley who had felt the beat of its heart. The ugly things and the sordid things and the hot beastly things were seen clearly enough by Lee Masters. But the thing which gives wings to this great inland country he did not see at all. Then Vachel Lindsay showed us the other side of the picture. All the while you knew that he was looking at something very noble and very full of lofty promise even when he gave a hint instead of a description. He had all sorts of sympathy. He could take you on a sudden trip into the barbaric soul of an untutored race and let you see its spirit reaching out toward spiritual heights. He could bring the quality of a civilization with a thousand delicate dreams of beauty into the night dullness of a Chinese laundry. He could set the hopes of the Salvation Army to high lyrical music. But best of all this democrat of cosmopolitan sympathies felt the possibilities and the promise of the great middle west. He did not patronize it. He did not analyze its weaknesses with cynical scorn. He listened to the beat of its heart. He watched the play of its mind. He felt the outreach of its spirit. And all the while he was finding more to believe in and care about, more upon which to build a great hope. He knew that sometimes the Valley of Democracy is inarticulate. But he was sure that it was not empty of meaning. He was convinced that it was rich with unexpressed idealism and laden with uninterpreted dreams of beauty. He brought to the middle west the simple reverence of a child of genius. And so the great wide land began to tell him its secrets."

"Walter Pater would have seen very little of all that in our western plains with their ugly little villages," I remarked when the Lion had paused for breath.

My friend lay silent for a moment with a little wrinkle of thought upon his brow.

"You are right about Pater," he said at length. "Marius the Epicurean would not have found the middle west a homeland for his spirit. But that is just the limitation of a type of mind so sophisticated that it can only recognize beauty in certain stately garments, and a taste whose disciplined self consciousness can only recognize charm in a marble finish. There is a touch of decadence about the refinement which cannot pierce the rude realities of a rugged and growing country to see the sound and strong spirit which moves through its life with a rhythm all its own. There is a variety of classic taste which consists principally in despising what does not conform to its own rules. And it comes at last to lose all contact with the creative realities of the human spirit. It is only when classic taste is wedded to the endless expectations and the exhaustless hopes of the romantic spirit that a man is safe. Without this the classic mind comes to a hard rigidity at last."

"You are making a good many concessions considering your own austere taste in a good many matters," I ventured.

The Lion smiled easily.

"Some day we'll learn that there is no reason why sternly disciplined taste cannot be combined with hearty human sympathy," he declared.

Then a light came in my friend's eye. He moved a little restlessly. And then he spoke the words which ended our talk for the day.

"Can't you see it?" he asked. "Here we are with all sorts of people from everywhere living together. Think of all the traditions. Think of all the dreams. Think of all the varied capacities. Think of all the kinds of mind. And here we are in the wide spaces of the middle west busy with the great adventure of living and thinking and making a republic of the mind and heart. If we respect each other and try to travel the wonderful paths from mind to mind and keep dreaming our great dreams and hoping our great hopes, at last something very fine and beautiful is to come out of it all. It requires faith. And expectation. And insight. And patience. And the fire kept burning in one's own heart. If you listen to the life of our great plains you will hear wonderful sounds. For it's turning into music after all."

I went away quietly quoting to myself the lines of Lindsay:

"Look in your own heart, she said,
Aladdin's lamp is there."

VERSE

To the Master-Poet

O MASTER-POET, give utterance to Thy song!—
This overflow of Thy creative heart,
Lilting in mine with joyous lyric art:
To Thee these inward cadences belong.
Sing to be heard despite the strident throng,
Filling Thy world with discords of the mart.
Sing Thou, above life's plaintive minor part.
So let Thy love o'erflow my heart in song.

Not, O my God, that I would heedless be,
While men strive, eager, hollow-eyed, and thin,
Grasping for larger life, yet scorning Thee,
The Source of Life, Thine increase from within;
But, Lord, how can I help such to be free,
Till Thou hast freed the wings of song in me?

ELEANOR INGLE PILSON.

Prayer for a Little Home

GOD send us a little home,
To come back to, when we roam.

Low walls, and fluted tiles,
Wide windows, a view for miles.

Red firelight and deep chairs,
Small white beds upstairs.

Great talk in little nooks,
Dim colors, rows of books.

One picture on each wall,
Not many things at all.

God send us a little ground,
Tall trees standing round.

Homely flowers in brown sod,
Overhead, thy stars, O God.

God bless, when winds blow,
Our Love, and all we know.

FLORENCE BONE.

Contributors to this Issue

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD, a clergyman of the Episcopal church, managing editor "The Witness," an Episcopalian weekly; counsellor on Industrial Relations for B. Kuppenheimer & Co.

GEORGE GLEASON, Y. M. C. A. missionary to Japan; author "What Shall We Think of Japan?"

LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, minister Central Methodist Church, Detroit.

Too Few Preachers or Too Many Churches?

THE alarming cry has gone up throughout the length and breadth of the land that there is a shortage in ministerial supply. In other words there are not enough preachers to man the churches. It is at least worth while to raise the question as to whether or not there are too many churches. Perhaps we need a reduction in churches more than a larger number of preachers.

In a recently completed survey of three central Missouri counties with a combined population of less than 90,000 there was found a total of 320 churches. This is an average of one church for 280 people. Now it takes at least 280 members to make a going church, with ability to support a good preacher. But only a little over one-third of the population belong to any church and approximately one-fourth are resident members of these 320 churches. In other words the actual average active membership of these 320 churches is only about 70 souls, and that is putting the large town churches with from 300 to 1,000 members into the division. Count these out and we have some 300 small rural, village and town churches with an average active membership of about fifty. This means that twenty of these churches are able to support pastors and 300 are not. The actual facts are that there are only two resident rural pastors in the entire three counties and both have been located with newly organized community churches within the past six months. They are probably the first resident rural church pastors giving all their time to a single church in the 100 years' history of these three counties.

A careful calculation of all the factors involved shows that the entire service functions of these 300 unpastored churches could be provided by forty trained men. They could put a live, going church within reach of every resident in the three counties and a Sunday school within reach of every child. There are no unchurched areas in this territory, but there are many areas with no Sunday schools in reach of some of the children, and there are few efficient Sunday schools anywhere in the rural districts. The reason is simply the divided condition of the forces. It should be particularly noted that while a large percentage of these churches are preached to once a month, only two have pastoral care.

* * *

The Cost of Sectarianism

Such facts as these reveal the appalling cost of sectarianism. There is not, between these 300 unshepherded churches, a single difference of conviction that has any saving power in it. There are just as good Christians in any one of them as in any of the others. If every church building with all its vested interests, and every tradition and memory of old alignments and every prejudice, were wiped out tonight the Christian people of these various over-churched, un-shepherded communities would come together tomorrow on the simple basis of a common allegiance to Christ. Instead of 300 little rectangular meeting houses of one room each they would build forty church plants with provision for Sunday school and the social life of the community, and instead of small, inefficient Sunday schools duplicating each other's work there would be opportunity to combine all the best teachers in every community into an up-to-date graded school. And instead of 80 once-a-month non-resident preachers they could have 40 resident pastors and pay them living salaries, receiving for their part a full week of service every week in place of two sermons per month.

The cost of sectarianism in these over-churched communities is not a money cost. It is perhaps cheaper to keep to the present way. The cost is greater than cash can account for. It is a deficit in religious life; communities without pastors, church buildings empty the year round with the exception of a dozen days; small, inefficient Sunday schools, no young people's organizations and the social life of the community running to dances and movie shows and night time auto riding without that definite moral direction that a live church could give.

Then there is the cost to the larger interests of the church in terms of missionary and benevolent support. The farmer's church supplies nine-tenths of our ministry and missionary staff; it will also supply the sinews of their warfare if given the instruction, organization and leadership that brings it in the well-manned city churches. The writer has seen it demonstrated again and again even under the handicap of a part-time ministry if only it was a ministry that organized and led out for those things. The vital things are forfeited to the small things of sectarianism.

* * *

Where Is the Ministerial Shortage?

It is in these small but multitudinous churches that the shortage of ministers is found. The going-church gets the prepared men and the struggling church goes without a preacher. It is out in these pastorless churches that the uneducated preachers are found. We have no words of criticism for them; without them the religious life of these over-churched communities would be barren indeed. They are good men and as a rule render full need of time for their pay; but their time and salary are given to railroads to so great a degree that while they are not overpaid for the time spent, the church fails to receive full time for its payment. An average of five dollars per preaching Sunday for each of these 300 small once-a-month churches would give a total of $18,000 to transportation alone and the church receives only about one-half the time that the preacher gives.

In the state of Ohio Mr. Gill found that 55 per cent. of the 6,060 churches had a membership of less than 70, and 68 per cent. of them less than 101. He found there were 4,431 churches without resident ministers or 67 per cent of them all and that 3,755 of them had preaching less than every other Sunday. One can close his eyes and see that it is in this strata of church life the ministerial shortage would be found.

* * *

The Salary Question

In a recent number of Christian Work E. Guy Talbot gave a very informing review of ministerial salaries under the title "Boycotting the Ministry." According to his figures one-half of the Methodist ministers receive an average salary of $543 and 91 per cent. of them an average of only $907. The average for all Baptist North is only $950 and that for the Baptist South is much less. This included the highly paid men in the averaging and covers up the worst part of the situation. The Disciples average for the smaller churches, numbering three-fourths of their total, only a little better than the Methodists. It is safe to say that these three great communions, possessing the overwhelmingly greater number of the smaller rural and village churches, will be found paying three-fourths of their ministers less than $1,000 per year. And it is also safe to say that in the average overchurched community all three of these communions will have churches made small and weak by the very fact that all three are in a community that could not more than support one. Mr. Talbot finds that 51.3 per cent. of all American ministers receive less than $1,000 per year. The minister must live, but he cannot live and be efficient on such income; and these little duplicating churches can never support him better. The cure would seem to be fewer but larger and thus more adequate churches rather than more underpaid ministers who must perforce be less educated and give less time to their ministry than is due the church.

The present state of affairs is even more aggravated than usual through failure of salaries to keep pace with the rising cost of living. A study issued by the United States Bureau of Standards shows that a salary of $1,000 in 1914 is worth only $500 now. It was never as difficult for the minister to make ends meet as now, for the average increase among this 75 per cent. under consideration has not been over 30 per cent, and for many it has been nothing.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

Dry for Spiritual Leadership

London, Mar. 23, 1921.

THE appeal for spiritual leadership, mentioned in my last letter, is being insistently reiterated. It is significant that the demand does not arise only in distinctly Christian circles. Sir Martin Conway, the great traveler and climber—who, by the way is the son of a Church of England canon and married an American—in a vigorous, in places even passionate, communication to The Times, written from the house of commons, protests that sectional appeals from representatives of organized religious bodies will not nowadays evoke a national response. "The puny pipe of a religious denomination no longer reaches beyond the bounds of its relatively small active membership. Even an orchestra of all the denominations has little general resonance. The call to be effective must awaken an echo in the heart of the great public and must affect not only all who profess and call themselves Christians but men of all creeds and of none." Contrasting the single ideal that animated Western Europe in the Middle Ages, and that time and science have killed, with the modern outlook and attitude, he says: "Today we possess no common ideal, we thrill with no common hope, we tremble at no common terror. The nations are all adrift one from another and the classes within each nation have likewise fallen asunder. The respect for real superiorities has vanished along with that for the traditional superiorities. Vulgar ostentation replaces true distinction." What then is to be done? This eminent man of the world answers: "All men of goodwill must turn their backs on all that divides them in the paltry non-essentials they have inherited from ancient theologians squabbling over incredible dogmas expressed in incomprehensible language. The ideal that will unite us must indeed embrace all that Christianity has given to the world—the love, the renunciation, the faith in all-embracing fatherhood of God, the belief in the presence of a divine Spirit of righteousness with which the spirit of each individual can come in contact and by which it can be quickened into eternal life. It must likewise embrace whatever of truth and essential beauty mankind has inherited from the great seers of other lands—the wise men of the east and farthest east and the visionaries of the new worlds where, in contact with the untamed lands of new occupation, wanderers from the old countries have had to build up new societies in desperate struggle with the untamed forces of nature." Agreeing with the clerics that the world languishes for a new St. Francis, Sir Martin says he will not have to go very far for his message: "the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it," and he cries, "Who will utter this word in all simplicity?" The letter breathes a fine spirit and is animated by a religious motive.

* * *

Bishops and Miners.

The deep-seated industrial unrest and the growing frequency and extent of disputes that imperil the prosperity of the state and threaten the very life of the community, has led the government (Mr. Lloyd George told Lord Robert Cecil in the house of commons) to contemplate the setting up of some form of systematic inquiry, and is compelling religious leaders to address themselves more and more directly to the problems involved and to face concrete issues. Discussion in Convocation revealed considerable sympathy with the miners. A resolution passed by the upper house of Canterbury censured the government for neglecting to prepare for the critical moment of de-control of the mines. The Bishop of Southwark declared that he was frankly and increasingly with the miners, whose demand for a national pool was an attempt to make practical the principle, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ." The Bishop of Lincoln pointed out that over and over again the miners, like the merchant seamen and agricultural laborers, have shown themselves capable of rising to heights of heroism, and the time has come, he considers, when the working man should be a partner in industry. The Bishop of St. Alban's criticised the capitalist system, contending that it had broken down in the key industries of the country, and commended Labor for refusing any longer to be treated as mere hands. The Bishops of Lichfield and Petersburg also put in pleas for the miners. The resolution, carried nem, con., quoted the Lambeth Conference resolution as indicating the only lines on which lasting settlement could be hoped for in industrial disputes. "An outstanding and pressing duty of the Church is to convince its members of the necessity of nothing less than a fundamental change in the spirit and working of our economic life. This change can only be effected by accepting as the basis of industrial relations the principle of co-operation in service for the common good, in place of unrestricted competition for private or sectional advantage. All Christian people ought to take an active part in bringing about this change by which alone we can hope to remove class dissensions and resolve industrial discords." The upper and lower house of York passed a resolution expressing the conviction that no permanent solution of industrial problems can be found until the people generally in all classes of society prefer spiritual to material good and bring to bear on economic matters the mind of Christ. The Bishop of Birmingham at a meeting of the Industrial Christian Fellowship, which is trying to bridge the gulf between organized labor and organized Christianity, confessed that he personally wanted what the miners were asking for—a wage that would enable the worker to live reasonably. Thus there is no lack of episcopal sympathy with the reasonable demands of labor.

* * *

The Churches and Labor

Not only the bishops but other religious leaders are holding out a friendly hand to the organized workers. A letter signed by Dr. Clifford, Canon Barnes, Dr. Horton, Father Adderley, Principal Garvie, Tom Sykes (Brotherhood Movement), Miss Maude Royden and others, while not endorsing all claims advanced by every section of labor, urges Christian people to take part as such in labor celebrations in order to give expression to their deep conviction that it is possible to be loyal members of the Christian church and ardent sympathizers with the fundamental aspirations of the labor party. The letter condemns "the grossly unequal distribution of wealth, the warfare of man against man, the absence of any security for the workers, and, still worse, the violation of the sacred claims of human personality by the denial of any honorable status, men and women being treated as mere instruments of production, and not as intelligent and voluntary cooperating agents." Dr. Carlile, president of the Baptist Union, points out that at the Reformation the church took over the economic system of the country with its industrial serfdom, its grinding poverty and glaring injustice, its terrible laws framed in the interests of the rich for the oppression of the poor. "It became the champion of property and was often blind to the claims of personality. With brilliant exception, the pulpit stood for conventional and convenient ethics." Dr. Orchard and the Rev. W. C. Roberts, rector of St. George's, Bloomsbury, in a joint pronouncement laid down certain principles whose violation makes lasting peace impossible. First, the adequate maintenance of all the workers in an industry must be the first charge on its proceeds. If any industry cannot bear this charge upon it, there must either be such reorganizations as will guarantee an honorable status to the workers concerned or the industry itself must be abandoned. Further, the responsibility for securing a full and free life for the workers lies not so much on the government or the employers as upon the whole mass of citizens. "If these remain indifferent to the sufferings of others until they are themselves made to suffer, they cannot complain if methods are used that seem alone to end their lethargy." Lastly, "any resort to violence on either side is absolutely non-Christian." The volume recently issued by the American Federal Council, "The Churches and Industrial Reconstruction," is being referred to on this side as making valuable contribution to current discussion.

* * *

Christianizing Industry

While such pronouncements as the foregoing must do good in helping to shape public opinion, the present need is for some definite attempt to bring about a Christian order of industry. The movement in this direction mentioned in my last letter has been carried a stage further. Lord Robert Cecil presided on May 18 over a national conference of business men for further discussion of the subject and to start a campaign to unite all men of goodwill engaged in the administration of industry, commerce, and the professions in the application of Christian principles to industrial and commercial life. We must not, he said, blame any one section of the community for the present deplorable state of things. We need a new point of view, and must get back to Christian morality. Two principles formulated at the previous conference formed the basis of discussion: That the governing motive and regulative principle of all industry and commerce should be service of the community; that any competition should be subordinated to service of the community. Mr. Arnold S. Rowntree, of the celebrated chocolate and cocoa firm, submitted resolutions: That industry should create and develop human fellowship and that any practices calculated to destroy such fellowship are immoral; that every individual man and woman is of intrinsic worth, and that human labor cannot be regarded as a commodity. Therefore every industry should be organized to provide as a first class charge an income sufficient to maintain in reasonable comfort all engaged in it; provision for any special burden to which those engaged in the industry may be liable—this in addition to any general provision which may be made by the state or otherwise; provision for superannuation—in addition to state or other provision healthy conditions for all engaged in the industry and opportunities for development of personality, talents, and self-expression. Another business man, Mr. Charles Smithson, who argued that the golden rule was good policy industrially, socially, internationally, supported the propositions: That the receipt of an income lays on the individual the duty of rendering service in accordance with his capacity; that every person should perform the best possible work; that the receipt of an income from industry should carry with it a responsibility for the conditions and purpose of the industry; and that the value of all natural resources and every natural privilege, which owes its worth to the labor or necessities of all should be held and utilized for the benefit of all. The Conference appointed a governing council of fifty representative business men and women to set the movement in operation throughout the country. This effort is a very promising one and it is hoped will have far-reaching results. An international exhibition is to be held at the Crystal Palace in September and October to demonstrate the success attained in Great Britain and other countries in promoting industrial peace under conditions of co-partnership, profit sharing and other forms of industrial cooperation.

* * *

Personal

Returning to Westminster Chapel May 22, after six months' absence, Dr. J. H. Jowett stated that he was fully recovered and felt equal to resuming his normal work.—Canon Horsley, the veteran churchman and social reformer, now in his 76th year, wires the Daily News, in response to an inquiry, "Internal cancer. Days numbered. Well and thankful in many ways. Am taking 100 friends to Moiringen for the last time, June 3. 'Vixi sed magis vivam' (my life is done—say rather my life begins)."—Dr. Estlin Carpenter after a long illness and severe operation is mending. His Hibbert Lectures, "Theism in Mediaeval India," are just published.—Rev. Thomas Yates, who was originally a Methodist, is chairman-elect of the Congregational Union for 1922.—The chairman-elect of the Baptist Union, Mr. John Chown, is son of the late Rev. J. P. Chown, a former president.—Bishop Welldon has returned to Durham deanery, after a three months' tour in Uganda and other parts of Africa.—Rev. D. Macfadyen sails June 18 for a short period of service at Ann Arbor. His address is care Dr. Julian Beal, office of the Regents of the University, Ann Arbor, Mich., U. S. A.—Rev. J. R. Fleming, acting general secretary of the Presbyterian Alliance, has left for an extensive tour in America; he visits Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, and Canada.—Dr. F. B. Meyer spends August and part of September in the States; he has engagements at Ocean Grove, N. J., Grove City Bible School, Penn., and Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York.—Dr. Chas. Brown sails September 16 for a week's service at Bloor Street Baptist Church, Toronto.—Dr. Howard H. Russell, Westerville, Ohio, is in London, reporting on American prohibition.—Dr. Douglas Adam, Hartford Theological Seminary, Conn., has agreed to supply the pulpit at Highbury Quadrant Church, London, for an indefinite period.—Mrs. M. Marie Varney, U. S. A., is preaching and speaking at St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, Westminster Chapel, and elsewhere.—Mr. Harry Jeffs, of the "Christian World," who is deeply respected by all who know him, has received from the French government the Order of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor for his work on the British Auxiliary of the French Protestant Resettlement Fund.—The new speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. J. H. Whitley, is a strong Y. M. C. A. supporter and worker.—The Bishop of Sodor and Man says that when at the front he was once described by a telephonic error, as the Bishop of Sodom and Gomorrah.

* * *

General

The American invasion of England has started. Over 150,000 visitors from the United States are expected this summer.—Hitherto mainly supported by "two generous and far-seeing Americans, father and son," the World Conference on Faith and Order appeals for funds. About 17,000 pounds per annum is needed. Donations should be sent to the United States Trust Company, Assistant to the Treasurer, 45 Wall street, New York.—Farnham Castle is to be let furnished, and the bishopric divided into three.—"Rubbish may be shot" into the moat around Fulham Palace, the Bishop of London's official residence, so as to fill it up and save the cost of upkeep. Protests are numerous.—Wesleyan Methodist membership last year increased 3,235 pounds—the first increase since 1907.—The Presbyterian Church of England has decided to admit women to the eldership and deaconship and sees no barrier in principle to their admission to the ministry, in which case they would resign on marriage.—Mr. Louis Tracy raised 15,000 pounds in America for Westminster Abbey, apart from sums sent direct.—St. Paul's Cathedral Preservation Fund amounts to 82,569; another 75,000 pounds is needed.—The Methodist Oecumenical Conference meets in London September 6-16. The American representatives are trying to arrange that all shall travel together on the same ship on both journeys.—The church congress meets in Birmingham, October 11-14. The general subject is "The Church in the New Age."

ALBERT DAWSON.

"MAIN STREET"

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

The chief merit of this latest "best seller" is that it holds up the mirror to the provincialism of our small town life.

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn Street Chicago

CORRESPONDENCE

The Mind of Labor

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The very suggestive article by Dr. Douglas "In Re Sermons on Wages," ignores as do almost all writers of political economy the mind of the laborer. And as a result the only workmen affected by this philosophy of well-intentioned primitive Christianity are those who are by birth and training prejudiced in favor of the Christian church. The assumption made by Dr. Douglas that the status quo is accepted to begin with, is an entirely erroneous assumption. So that a "fair day's work for a fair day's pay" does not settle the question, because, in the mind of the worker, the legal right to property now held is not a moral right. This fundamental error makes the brilliant sermons of Christians like rose water thrown in the path of a cyclone. Tomorrow afternoon I am called to preach the funeral sermon of a switchman, smashed between cars, who leaves a wife and four little children. Many in the community understand this death was avoidable if the "hurry up" methods to make money for the stock owners had not been conscientiously applied. And the rights of the property owners to have a decent interest on their investments conflict with the rights of life of the switchman and his family. That is, there is a social ethics today that cannot be settled by the individualistic Christianity of Asia. As an owner of 15 shares of New Haven stock that has not paid a cent of dividends for years and years, and which was bought by my father for $160.00 per share, I am interested, and hope I am not prejudiced. But the old individualistic Christianity, has it not been weighed in the balance and found wanting?

Conneaut, Ohio.

CARLYLE SUMMERBELL.

A Fine Editorial Spoiled

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It is a pity you spoiled your fine editorial on the Greenville appeal with that outblaze of anarchic fury at the last. Your refusal to countenance the narrow designs of certain zealots among those of your own affiliation has the charm of heroic consistency, and is worthy of all emulation. But your evidently engaged thurst at "the impertinent control of religious life by unmeaning sectarian organizations" indicates a thought-distortion that "has all the seeming of a demon's that is dreaming."

Admitting that the frequency of pleas and reminders from the "irrelevant overhead organizations" is sometimes a little wearisome and even irritating, I am by no means convinced thereby that the whole system is evil. And I assume that the men and women composing these denominational boards are at least as unselfishly religious as I am. My wrath at their "control" (which is too strong a word) might spring from a noble enthusiasm for righteousness—but, also, and much more probably, it might spring from my own disturbed indolence, excessive individualism, big-headed provincialism, or even from a desire to do a little "exploitation" on my own account. To imagine sinister motives behind every suggestion from without has a peril no less threatening than even a servile submission to "impertinent control." It is my observation that those who chafe most under extra-parish demands are either lazy or disgruntled because no device has lifted themselves into the "seats of the mighty." Of course, though, there are exceptions to all rules. You are one yourself, no doubt.

But whatever the evils of denominational control, your alternative is surely a jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire. You would burn down the house to kill the rats. Your putative prophets in Greenville would do infinitely more harm than the twenty-seven sectarians. For the upshot of their labors would be the spiritual isolation of unhappy Greenville and the languishing of all vital religion within its pseudo-prophet-infested borders. For the religion that does not look beyond local boundaries is bound to atrophy. I have read much from your pen regarding the community church, and the total impression is very vivid, that the community church tends inevitably to become self-centered and to lose the vision of world-wide service. Your prophets would bring a message the sure result of which would be disintegration and final stagnation. Your paper stands for unity; but its community church policy is the plain road to a diversity immeasurably more devastating than present denominational rivalries.

Frankly, this particular dream of yours hasn't even the virtue of being beautiful—to say nothing of its practicability. It is disruptive rather than irenic. It is neither possible nor desirable. If persisted in, it may produce another small sect among the multitude—the sect of community church faddists. "A consummation devoutly to be wished?" I'll say, No.

Greenville, Tenn.

J. B. ELY.

Pastor, M. E. Church, South.

BOOKS

THESE THINGS SHALL BE. By George Lansbury. This little book, like the author's "Your Part in Poverty" contains more to stir the conscience than a dozen weighty tomes written in labored tones of learning. It is so obviously true and so inspired by love of men and withal so serene in its patience with time and trial that it is nothing less than a great little book. There are more sermons in it for our time than in half a library of the conventional sort. When laymen and labor leaders see the Kingdom of God as the editor of the London Daily Herald sees it in these two small volumes it is time the ordained servants of the church turned again to learn of Holy Carpenters. (Huebsch. 96 pages).

THE UNFINISHED PROGRAM OF DEMOCRACY. By Richard Roberts. Richard Roberts came out of the same Welch hills as did Mr. Lloyd George. He is possessed of prophetic visions of a real democracy as was the great premier before the war, but the war only deepened his democracy and made more keen his interpretations of it. In this volume he seems to find the implications of the democratic principle in the world of work, in the social fellowships of men and in the international relations of governments. His is a fundamental democracy, not an opportunism that approximates autocracy; it is a democracy of souls. This is a deeply religious book. Democracy is found, not in covenants and constitutions and the machinery of politics, but in those deep principles that will govern the human spirit in that social order that is the Kingdom of God as Jesus taught it. (Huebsch. 326 pages).

MY NEIGHBOR THE WORKINGMAN. By Chancellor James Roscoe Day. The workingman who fawns before prestige and wealth and kisses the shoes of those who give him charity would doubtless accept the title here given him as a "neighbor," but the self-respecting workingman who believes in his own manhood and in our great democracy would repudiate it from pages like these. He is looked upon as good when he is good, but over him hangs the suspicion of badness until he is proved otherwise. Out of his class spring stratagems and conspiracies, and bolshevism spawns in his fetid soul. He ought to be good and obedient and loyal to those born above him and often he is, praise God! Foster's book on the Steel Strike is a mild, objective treatise, even though it was written by a defeated radical, by the side of this volume composed in the study of a university president. We fear there is a deep red spot in the chancellor's eye. (Abingdon Press. 373 pages).

THE NEW SOCIAL ORDER. By Harry F. Ward. Anything Professor Ward writes commands attention by its authoritativeness, timeliness and its ardor for a better and a more democratic world. He is radical only in the sense that all prophetic voices are radical, that is, they are called radical by those who so profit by things as they are that they selfishly refuse to consider ways and means to a better world for those who do not possess the good things of life. This volume is the most complete thing that we possess, bringing together the programs proposed by the main schools of thought. Part II. sums up the aims of the British Labor Movement, The Russian Soviet Republic, The League of Nations, various social movements in the United States and that which has been made vocal in the churches of late through their common pronouncements on social and industrial questions. In Part I. is a discussion of the principles of the new social order under such heads as Efficiency, Universal Service, Equality, Solidarity and the Supremacy of Personality. He sees beneath the outward calm a great turning point in social history following the war; its destruction, he says, was social, and its reconstruction will be social. Fundamental to this reconstruction is an industrial new era. Other autocracies than those of Czar and Kaiser are sure to crumble. The revolutionary force of the war is not yet spent. The so-called lower classes are being educated and they are questioning their status. There is a great expectation among them and in the world at large and in it is a faith in better things for the lesser man. Will it be a peaceful progress or will it be crushed by the powers that be into a smouldering discontent later to erupt in revolution? The author holds that it is in the keeping of the Christian conscience to determine the issue. (Macmillan. 383 pages).

RURAL PROBLEMS IN THE UNITED STATES. By James E. Boyle. Ph. D. This is one of the admirable little dollar books of the National Social Science Series. It covers very fully, in brief, paragraph-like treatment, the fundamental rural problems in America. It is conservative and more economic than social in its viewpoint, as, e. g., its advocacy of "good" tenant conditions but not of any program to stop the growing of tenancy. But it is clear and informing and a good brief for the rural life problem. (McClurg. 142 pages).

THE VISION WE FORGET. By P. Whitwell Wilson. The point of view of the author may be gauged by the following words from his introductory note: "In John of Patmos I greet one who seems to have comprehended this world in which somehow I have to live. As a father to a child, he tells me how the Christ he remembered looks at things here and now—what part the Christ plays in our drama—what greater part He will play when the time comes. I have no idea how John came to put on paper much that I have read. All I know is that John's words are there. And the words fit facts." (Revell. $2.00.)

THE GROPING GIANT, REVOLUTIONARY RUSSIA. By William Adams Brown, Jr. The author presents the points of view of the three important groups in Russian life at the present time—the Masses, the Bolsheviki and the Intelligentsia. "Truly," he says, "it seemed as if I were in some strange new world as I sat there in the Hall of Nobles, listening to Trotsky himself haranguing his own soldiers, teaching them, inspiring them, moulding them into an implement by which to carry out his will and establish his mastery over confused and leaderless Russia." (Yale. $2.50.)

THE SCHOOL-MISTRESS AND OTHER STORIES. By Anton Chekhov. Translated by Constance Garnett. The service being done to the English-reading public by this translator can hardly be estimated. Chekhov, who is a realist, is painting for the world the Russian people as they are, and his artistry is as flawless as his sympathies are wide. (Macmillan.)

THE BAD RESULTS OF GOOD HABITS AND OTHER LAPSES. By J. Edgar Park. A book of delightful essays, some of the titles being: "Life's a Jest," "In Praise of Eve," "A Trip Around My Soul," "Unorthodox Interpretations," and "The Unhappiness of Being Grown-up." (Houghton Mifflin. $1.75.)

WHAT BIRD IS THAT? By Frank M. Chapman. The latest and one of the most practical guides for lovers of birds. The author attempts to make it easy to recognize birds at a glance, and he limits the material offered to the end of making this possible. The group pictures given are very helpful. (Appleton. $1.50.)

RECENT FICTION. Eunice Tietjens is widely known as a poet, but she reveals fine artistry also in this her first novel, "Jake," which is a work of rare insight and sympathy. (Boni. $2.00.) "The Custard Cup" is also a first novel, by Florence B. Livingston, being a story of "folks" and being full of a most fascinating humor. (Doran, $1.90.) "What David Did," by Helen S. Woodruff, author of "The Little House," tells how two interesting babies save two grown-ups from letting a misunderstanding ruin their lives; black and white drawings by the author add to the book's attractiveness. (Boni, $1.75.) "Further E. K. Means," is another book of delightful black folk humor by a minister of unusual writing gifts—E. K. Means himself. (Putnam, $1.00.) "The Man in the Dark," by Albert Payson Terhune, is a virile open air tale of adventure and romance. (Dutton, $2.00.) "The Mystery of the Sycamore," by Carolyn Wells, is a new Fleming Stone tale of cleverly woven mystery. (Lippincott, $2.00.)

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Touch of Perfection*

THIS morning we come to the review for the quarter. We have discussed—in very brief, but I trust inspiring words—such great social themes as "Living With Others," "A Christian's Health," "Work," "Money," "Education," "Recreation," "Cooperation," "The Family," "The Community," "The Nation," "The World," and finally "A Christian Social Order." This is a big order. As we carefully ponder over this appealing, challenging array of interests we long for some mighty motive that will be strong enough to carry us through. There is only one such engine—love. After all it is "love" that is the peculiar contribution of Jesus—"love" as incarnated in his super person. We must get that. You get religion when you get "love." How can I live rightly with others? Shall I buy a book on etiquette? Even Chesterfield admitted that love (and he had poor estimate of that glorious element) would solve every problem of good manners. "Love" is the best promoter of good health—an atmosphere of sunshine that guarantees quiet and gentle nerves.

"Love" will cause me to toil for the objects of my affection.
"Love" will cause me to do only good work.

"Love" will quickly solve my use of money. My treasure will be in heaven.

"Love" will lead me to educate mind and heart for the good of others.

"Love" will teach me recreation and the joy of play. I must be strong and glad in order to make my life count.

"Love" and love alone knows the secret of cooperation. "Love" and love alone will make me a good parent, a good member of my community, a good citizen of my nation and a big hearted man of the whole wide world. Moreover a decent social order is impossible of attainment until "Love" rules in the hearts of all men—capital and labor and middle-class.

Here is the intricate lock; here is the only key. Insert your key in the lock and lo—! the door quickly and quietly opens. Why bombard us with isms and ologys? Why stand on soapboxes shouting out the man-made schemes, as impracticable as perpetual motion? There is one cure and that is love. There is one plan and that is Christ's. We tried force—how awfully it failed. Now let us try "Love." We have tried dividing up the stuff and no one is happy—now let us try "Love." Let us, with abandon, throw away our little theories and our pet hobbies and sitting at the Great Lover's feet, learn how to live together as brothers because we are all sons and daughters of the Most High God. This is Jesus' way.

JOHN R. EWERS.

*June 26. Review lesson, "The Social Task of the Church" Scripture, Rev. 21:1-14.

BOOKS

Any book in print may be secured from The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago. Give name of publisher, if possible.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Prof. Taylor Will Go to England

Prof. Alva W. Taylor, of the editorial staff of The Christian Century, who is also secretary of the Board of Social Welfare of the Disciples of Christ, will spend the summer in England. Mr. Taylor lived in England for a number of years and married an English wife. His mission this summer is a study of the labor problem in the British Isles. Mr. Taylor once tramped across Ireland, and he will gain this summer some fresh information with regard to the Irish problem. When he returns in the autumn he will take up an itinerant ministry among the churches in behalf of the interests which he represents so ably.

Religious Education Expert Confers with President Harding

Prof. Walter S. Athearn, professor of religious education in Boston University and formerly a member of the faculty of Drake University, a Disciple foundation in Des Moines, was recently summoned to Washington by President Harding to confer concerning the educational needs of the nation. Prof. Athearn has been known as one of the most enthusiastic exponents of week day religious education in this country.

Memorial Day for Deceased Ministers

Fraternal orders have their memorial days and now the Methodists of Rock River Conference in Illinois have developed a custom of visiting the graves of deceased ministers on Children's Day. It is stated that the graves of 235 ministers are to be found in the borders of this conference. Those will all be decorated on "Preachers' Memorial Day" and in many cases sermons will be preached which will commemorate the life and labors of these men. Rev. O. F. Mattison of Evanston is secretary of the conference committee.

Protestant Hospital Association

There are over seven thousand hospitals in the United States. Of these only 100 are under Protestant auspices, while 82 are under the direction of the Roman Catholic church. A new organization was launched recently called the Protestant Hospital Association. It will hold a meeting in West Baden, Ind., in September. It has been asserted that there are 1,000,000 people sick in bed in the United States every day in the year. During the winter months there is often a grave shortage of hospital facilities as there always is in time of contagion. It is hoped to develop new enthusiasm among Protestants for hospital work, and to arrange some plan of comity in the doing of this work.

Japanese Evangelist Will Sail for Home

Rev. Paul Kanamori, the noted Japanese evangelist, has been in America for the past eighteen months. His celebrated three hour sermon covering the salient points of Christian doctrine has been his chief sermonic offering. He has given this sermon 452 times, and has traveled 40,000 miles in carrying on his work. In two hundred universities he has hunted up the students, and lived with them in order to come into as close contact as possible with American student life. He will return to Japan the latter part of June.

Methodists Will Put a Spire in Chicago Loop

At last the picture of the new Methodist building in the Chicago loop has been published. In place of the old and outgrown building at the corner of Washington and Clark Streets a noble office building with a spire on one corner will be erected as soon as conditions permit. It is stated that this spire will be the highest point in the loop. The building will be erected of stone and in the spire will be church chimes. The church auditorium will be on the main floor of the building. The seating capacity on the main floor will be 800 and in the balcony 400. The building will stand in the hotel district. It will be erected at a cost of three and a half million dollars. The present pastor of First Methodist Church is Rev. John Thompson, also secretary of the Methodist city mission society.

Religious Revolution Continues in Bohemia

Since the war there has been a great defection from the Roman Catholic church in Bohemia. The Pope refused to conciliate the leaders of the movement when it began and a recent dispatch from Paris asserts that in all Bohemia there are not left 10,000 loyal supporters of the papacy. Whole communities have gone over, and in consequence the churches have fallen into the hands of the leaders of the new order. At first the demand was simply that the priests be allowed to marry. Now it is reported that in many of the churches the mass is being omitted and the movement is taking on a genuine Protestant character. John Huss, who was martyred by the Roman church is revered as the greatest name of Bohemian history and his name was never more powerful than now.

Union Graduates a Record Class

Union Seminary of New York raised the standards of admission last year and the result is that they have had the largest student body of their entire history. The graduating class this year is also among the largest. Twenty-one men received the degrees of bachelor of divinity and fourteen the degree of master of theology. The awarding of the fellowship for foreign study is always an interesting feature of the commencement week. The fellowship went this year to Wendell M. Thomas. The commencement address was delivered by Dr. Robert E. Hume of the chair of missions and formerly a missionary in India. In spite of the disfavor of many ecclesiastical leaders throughout the country this free and scientific institution of theological learning seems destined to come to even greater power and influence.

Minister Will Debate Theatrical Manager

Dr. John Roach Straton, a Presbyterian pastor of New York, recently preached a sermon in which he declared against the stage as being immoral. His remarks came to the attention of Mr. W. A. Brady, the theatrical manager, and the theater man has challenged the minister to debate. The minister could do nothing but accept the challenge, so New York is in for some thrills in ecclesiastical circles.

Baptist Men Are Being Organized

The "brotherhood" idea had its vogue among the denominations and finally went the way of all earth. Most of these organizations perished because they were run mainly by preachers for sectarian ends, and had no worthy program to challenge laymen. In these latter days some organizations are arising which are made up of laymen and who want to do something big. Both the Unitarians and the Universalists have new laymen's organizations. The Baptists have recently federated six hundred groups of men and they now have a secretary-director in the person of Dr. J. Foster Wilcox.

Sunday School Membership Decreases in Philadelphia

The annual reports of the Philadelphia presbytery indicate that the denomination in that city, while making large gains in church membership, has suffered very considerable losses in the matter of Sunday school enrollment. The total loss in Philadelphia for Presbyterian schools is 1,865. This experience tallies with that of many other communions, and with the reports from many cities. The church leaders are puzzled to find a reason for the phenomenon, but there is obviously a need for some change in the methods of the average school where so much stress has been laid on numbers in recent years.

Denominational Complexion of Prison Inmates

What denomination produces the largest number of criminals in its circles? This question agitated Rev. Leo Kalmer, chaplain of the Illinois penitentiary, so he undertook a census which would determine the matter. According to his figures, of every ten thousand Catholics in Illinois, seven are in the penitentiary; of every ten thousand Methodists, ten; of every ten thousand Presbyterians, six; of every ten thousand Baptists, seventeen; of every ten thousand of all other religions taken together (Jews, Mormons and others), ten. The prisoners are asked for religious preferences on entering the prison and these figures do not mean that the inmates have actually been members of the various denominations indicated.

though in many cases they have been. No Catholics were enumerated save those who had gone to communion once a year while in the Protestant column, preferences were counted. This helps to account for the seeming criminality of the Baptists.

Church Publicity Recovers Communion Set

The advertising expert has a new story to tell now of the miracles wrought through publicity. Pleasant Ridge Presbyterian church of Cincinnati recently had its communion set stolen. The set was prized for more than its intrinsic worth, because of its historic associations. The minister, Rev. W. L. Schmalhorst, advertised for the return of the set in a newspaper, telling the story of the sacred relics. The result was that some man with broken English called up and told them to look in the cemetery the following day for their communion set. He gave as his reason for stealing that he was out of work and hard up. The church has never been able to find the man that it might extend aid to him.

Combine Services by Means of Automobile

The automobile solved the Sunday evening problem for the Presbyterian churches at Alden and Crittenden, N. Y. The two churches are only a few miles apart and each had a struggling little second service. The pastor who ministered to both churches proposed that the Alden congregation should be transported to Crittenden by automobile, and that one service should be held. The experiment was tried and now more Alden people are going to church at the second service than formerly. Thus the automobile which is widely advertised for emptying the churches, in one instance at least has been pressed into the service of the gospel.

New Governor of Holy Land Respects Religious Feeling

Col. Ronald Storrs is the military governor of Jerusalem, appointed by the British government. Under his administration the various sects interested in the holy places have gotten together and agreed to protect all ancient buildings against change except such as may be necessary to preserve them. The new governor has forbidden trolley lines in the Jerusalem district, and will not permit the erection of stucco or corrugated iron buildings which would mar the antiquity of the region. New industries are being developed, such as weaving and tile making. The Mosque of Omar will soon receive a new tile roof from the native kilns.

Southern Presbyterians Meet in St. Louis

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States was held in St. Louis beginning May 26. The business was conducted with great despatch and the docket was entirely cleared, in spite of the fact that over one hundred overtures were presented. This denomination was for a time out of sympathy with the Federal Council. At this assembly the Federal Council was interpreted by Dr. Robert E. Speer. The assembly increased its gift to the Council from $400 to $5,000. The matter of comity with the northern Presbyterians was entrusted to an entirely new committee with the hope that all moot questions could be amicably settled.

Children's Day Observed Over the Land

Children's Day is one of the big days of all the year in the evangelical churches. Special programs, sermons to the children, with music and flowers makes the day a gala occasion. The Disciples churches make this day an occasion for an offering to foreign missions in the Sunday schools. Many schools report large offerings. Central church of Buffalo raised over a thousand dollars this year in the face of a building fund and a campaign for the Underwritings deficit of the Interchurch. At Springfield, O., where C. M. Burkhardt is ending a fruitful pastorate, the offering reached three hundred dollars.

Lutheran Church Makes Gains the Past Year

The figures have been gathered for one third of the United Lutheran churches as to membership gains the past year, and from these reports an estimate has been made of the gains between Easter and Easter. In the fellowship of the United Lutheran church the confirmations are estimated at 53,721, and the accessions by letter as 57,636, making a total of over a hundred thousand new members. The infant baptisms for the year were over forty thousand. These figures are pronounced by the Lutheran, the denominational weekly, as being the best in the history of the church. This church uses the catechetical method along with the personal evangelism of the pastor as the chief agencies of its propa-

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful.....1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)

Green tea—1 glassful.....2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz......61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

ganda, being particularly suspicious of mass evangelism. Lutheran statistics may now be secured from a fresh issue of the Lutheran World Almanac. This book contains 996 pages and is the largest manual ever published by the Lutheran churches.

Will Try to Bring National Council to Chicago

The Chicago delegates to the National Council of Congregational Churches are going to the meeting in Los Angeles determined to bring the meeting of the National Council two years hence to Chicago. Prominent in this delegation is Rev. W. E. Barton of Oak Park, a suburb of Chicago. Dr. Barton will spend his summer on the Pacific coast instead of going east this year, as is his custom. His vacation will not be a period of idleness, for it is his purpose to add another book to his list of literary achievements.

Disciples Hold Retreat in the Ozarks

In the heart of the Ozark country in Missouri the Disciples have a revered leader whose service to the mountain people has been noteworthy. On his invitation the ministers of the state have gone into the Ozarks for a retreat several times and this summer retreat is now an annual observance. President Arthur Holmes, of Drake University, Des Moines, will bring six lectures to the group this year. A young people's conference will be conducted by Rev. Charles H. Swift, of Cape Girardeau. Every day there is a recreation program so that the ministers are recruited not only in their spiritual life, but are also built up physically. The list of recreations includes fishing, rowing, hikes, swimming and various games. The retreat has been recognized by the railroads, and a special rate has been granted.

Summer at the University of Chicago

The announcement of the summer courses at the University of Chicago this summer are of particular interest to religious workers. Large numbers of ministers go to the university either for the summer quarter of eleven weeks or for half of that period, since the quarter is broken up into two terms of five and a half weeks. A number of instructors from other institutions will give courses this summer. Among these are Clayton Raymond Bowen, Professor of New Testament Interpretation, and Theophile James Meek, Professor of Old Testament, Meadville Theological School; Allan Hobben, Professor of Sociology, Carleton College; Lewis Bayles Paton, Professor of Old Testament Exegesis and Criticism, Hartford Theological Seminary; Harris Franklin Rall, Professor of Systematic Theology, Garrett Biblical Institute; James Henry Snowden, Professor of Systematic Theology, Western Theological Seminary; and Edwin Diller Starbuck, Professor of Philosophy, State University of Iowa. The open lectures are also an attractive feature of a summer at Chicago. The present intense interest in the Orient makes especially timely the new series of Haskell lectures to be given at the University of Chicago during the first term of the summer quarter by Dr. Kenneth Saunders, of Cambridge, England. The general subject of the series will be "Buddhism in India, China, and Japan." Dr. Saunders, who has lived in Ceylon, Burma, Japan, Korea, and China and been to the borders of Tibet, has based his lectures on personal observation among the Buddhists. He has been a lecturer at the Universities of London and Toronto and recently at the Pacific School of Religion in Berkeley, California, and is now engaged upon an extended history of Buddhism. The first lecture in the series of nine will be given on July 5. Three lectures will be given each week and will be on the following subjects: (Illustrated) "The Idea of God in Buddhism"; "Gautama Buddha—His Essential Teachings"; "The Brethren of the Yellow Robe"; "Asoka and the Early Missions of Buddhism"; "Buddhism at Nalanda and in Gandhara"; "Buddhism in China"; "Buddhism in Korea and Japan"; "The Buddhist Revival (especially in Japan and China)"; and "Buddhism and Christian Missions." The Haskell lectures are intended to set forth the relations of Christianity to the other faiths of the world.

Churches Hear the Bishop on Christian Unity

Bishop McCormick visited St. John's Episcopal Church of Ionia, Mich., recently, and announced as his evening sermon an address on Christian unity. This topic proved of so great interest that the Baptists, Evangelists, Disciples, Methodists and Presbyterians dismissed their services and went to hear the bishop. The result was a congregation which overflowed the accommodations of the local Episcopal church. Many ecclesiastics now believe that the most important work in behalf of Christian unity is that of convincing the rank and file of the churches in the smaller cities, where sectarianism has had its chief seat.

Baptist Financial Campaign Has Not Succeeded

The New World Movement of the Northern Baptist denomination has not succeeded. The goal was a hundred million dollars, which was pretty high. In order that the directors of the movement might be made very free in their consideration of future plans, Dr. R. M. West has resigned as executive secretary of life work and Dr. E. M. Poteat has resigned as executive secretary of prayer and stewardship. Dr. J. Y. Aitchison is the general director of the movement.

Southern Baptists Have Harmonious Meeting

The Southern Baptist Convention held in Chattanooga in May was a very pacific gathering with no points of sharp contention. The decision to grant women representation on the executive committee and on the general boards of the body was reached with only three dissenting votes. The number of people received by baptism into the southern churches last year was 173,595, and the amount of money received on campaign projects was $12,924,943.60. Rev. J. C. Gambrell retired from the presidency of the convention after four years of arduous service.

Missionary Conference Has Eighteenth Year

The eighteenth year of the missionary conference at Lake Geneva will be marked this year with a program of large interest. The committee that has the conference in charge is headed by Rev. Francis C. Stiffler of Wilmette, who will also be dean of the open parliaments. Prof. A. G. Baker, of the department of missions of the University of Chicago is a member of the conference committee. Some of the most outstanding missionaries of the various denominations will be present.

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

An undenominational training school for
The Ministry Religious Education
Foreign Missions Social Service
Curricula high grade and modern. Graduate degrees. University of California privileges. Opportunities for the study of Oriental peoples. Open to men and women of all Christian denominations. For catalogue address

WILLIAM FREDERIC BADE, Dean,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA

Beware of Contagious Diseases

THOMAS  COMMUNION SERVICE

INDIVIDUAL SAVES 1/4 COST OF OTHER SERVICES
Clean and sanitary. Used by over 40,000 churches. Send for catalog and free trial offer.
Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 495 Lima, O.

The Community Churchman

Only publication devoted to the most prophetic religious movement of modern times.

July Issue:

Feature articles by Dr. A. W. Taylor, Dr. Edmund deS. Brunner, D. Elmer Nourse of the Colorado Association of Community Churches, and others. News of 38 community churches.

If you need help to organize your church for community service—

If you are interested in the rise and growth of the community church movement—

This is the magazine for you.

$1 per year. 30 cents per copy.

The Community Churchman
CANTON, MO.

MAKE THE SUMMER COUNT

Toward a More Fruitful Next Year!

EVERY minister who would succeed today must read. Every alert churchman and churchwoman must read. And they must read the right books. To choose right books, in this age of a superfluity of books, is no light task. A service for which The Christian Century has received unusual recognition is its announcement, week by week, of the best new books, especially in the field of religion.

MAKING BOOK-BUYING EASY. Ready money is not always at hand, especially in the summer time. But you must keep up your reading—to survive! Why not start a book account with us? Get the needed books now, pay for them later—30 days, 60 days. To make our proposition concrete: Why not send us, on coupon below, the titles of the books you need? This will start your account, and the account will be handled by our business department with full consideration and courtesy. Send in the coupon order today and the books will go out to you at once. (Special note: You need not limit your order to the books advertised in The Christian Century. Any book now in print we shall be glad to secure for you.)

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn St. CHICAGO, ILL.

BOOK ORDER COUPON

Gentlemen: I wish to start a book account with you. Please send at once the following books, and I will pay for them in 30 or 60 days:

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....

.....
.....
.....
.....
My name
Address

(Give author, if possible; also publisher, if known.)

THE most difficult period in the whole fiscal year, for colleges to meet their financial obligations, are the closing months of that year. May, June and July is when the pinch comes hardest. Most of the Christian Colleges are operating with big deficits. They need, just now, every available penny. The missionary year closes midnight June thirty. Please make sure that all education money is forwarded on or before that date, to the Board of Education of the Disciples of Christ, 222 Downey Avenue, Indianapolis, Indiana.

Four Great Books for Thinking People

Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City, on being asked what are the outstanding books of the day for alert churchmen and churchwomen, submits four titles. He considers these essential books:

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1860. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 So. Dearborn St., Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

Dean Inge of St. Paul's

By Joseph Fort Newton

The Negro Question

By Rodney W. Roundy

When the Books Close JUNE 30

Will the Name

OF

Your Church, Your Bible School,
Your Endeavor Society, Your Woman's Society and Yourself

BE WRITTEN THERE?

IF YOU HAVE NOT SENT YOUR

White Gifts Offering for Ministerial Relief;
March Offering for Foreign Missions;
Easter Offering for Benevolence;
May Offering for Home Missions;
Children's Day Offering,

PLEASE SEND THEM NOW

BUDGET CHURCHES, Please send your check for at least Three-Fourths of the Missionary
Year Before June 30.

LIVING LINK CHURCHES, Please remember, the Missionary Year Closes June 30. Don't forget your Missionary. He is counting on your support.

WOMEN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETIES, Please send Your Last Quarterly Payment before June 30, so it will be credited on this year's receipts and the five year aims.

Please Round up all Missionary Money for the United Society and send it in before
June 30.

Make All Checks Payable and Send to

*United Christian
Missionary Society*

1501 Locust St.

St. Louis, Missouri

"The Daily Altar" and the Devotional Life

WITH current developments in church history and life
it becomes increasingly evident that the real need of the churches is the deepening of the devotional life of their membership, the attainment of true spiritual poise.
The church cannot bring the world to Christ unless it reveals evidence of having the spirit of Christ in its own heart-life. Organizations of churches, however vast and efficient, cannot of themselves put the spirit of true religion into the heart of a single man.

"The Daily Altar"

By Herbert L. Willett and
Charles Clayton Morrison

has come into being for just such a time as this. Rev. Walter M. White, of Memphis, Tenn., reports that he is growing a new religious spirit in his great congregation through the ministry of this book in the homes of his people. Rev. B. S. Ferrall, of Buffalo, N. Y., is equally enthusiastic. And there are scores of other church leaders who are strong in their praise of The Daily Altar
as the ideal manual of daily devotion needed for these strenuous and stressful times.

*Have You Considered "The Daily
Altar" for Your Congregation?
Note Our Special Prices in Lot
Purchases.*

Full Leather (Gift) Edition: 5 copies for $11.00; 8 for $17.00; 18 for $35.00; 50 or more at $1.75 per copy, net.

Popular Edition: 5 copies for $7.00; 8 for $10.00; 18 for $20.00; 50 or more at $1.00 per copy, net.

Special Note: Add from two to 5 cents per copy for postage when ordering in lots, or instruct us to send express collect.

Price of Single Copies

De luxe full leather, gold stamp and gilt edges,
$2.50 net. Popular edition, purple cloth, $1.50 net.

(Add 6 to 10 cents for postage.)

The Christian Century Press

508 S. Dearborn St.

Chicago, Illinois

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, JUNE 23, 1921

Number 25

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

Roman Catholic Try to Block Educational Measure

ROMAN Catholic opposition to the public school system never sleeps. When the Smith-Towner bill to provide a department of education with a secretary in the cabinet was introduced in congress, there came a counter proposition to include the educational interest in a new department of public welfare. Education is already included in a department, the department of the interior. That arrangement safely guarantees that nothing of moment will be done by the federal government in education. Meanwhile we have thousands of illiterates, and the Americanization of the immigrant is left to chance or to the ministry of partisan radicals instead of the constructive labors of educational leaders. The Smith-Towner bill does not threaten in any way the parochial schools of the Roman Catholic church. There are some who believe in abolishing these parochial schools. With such sentiment the majority of Protestants do not agree, for to do so would seem to them an infringement of religious liberty. It is ungracious therefore for Roman Catholic leaders, after they have gained all the liberty in educational matters that a church should seek in a republic, to carry on obstructionist tactics against the educational system which more than nine-tenths of the children of the United States continue to use. Recently the situation seemed so serious that friends of education rallied in Washington en masse. The leaders of practically every Protestant organization were heard from. A group visited President Harding, and acquainted him with the attitude of the churches of America. Among the absurdities of the Roman Catholic bill that is before congress is the provision that the educational leader of all America is to be offered a salary of five thousand dollars, a little more than half what a superintendent of schools receives in most enterprising cities. This would guarantee the selection of a little man who would never be heard from. It is naively suggested that already two or three men have been found who would take the position of educational director in the department of public welfare at the salary suggested!

Shall America Accept the Shame England Has Repented Of?

JUST when China's laws against the growth of the poppy were becoming effective, America began shipping drugs there in sufficient quantity to defeat the beneficent legislation of that country. If Canada were to develop across the border a bootlegging organization that would completely nullify the eighteenth amendment, it would not contribute to the good will between her and the United States. It is almost impossible for China to protect herself against the aggressive importation of those drugs that have been the most debauching influence in the life of the oriental nation. The exportations of morphine and opium from the United States are sufficient in quantity to give a dose to 400,000,000 men, women and children in China every five months. As the drugs go to the habitues, such a supply means a continual state of debauch for several million men. It is difficult enough to control drug habits in a thoroughly modernized country, but when one adds the complications that arise from ignorance and inadequate ethical conceptions, the problem is greatly intensified. Years ago Great Britain shamelessly stained her honor by forcing opium upon the Chinese people. She has begun to show signs of repentance, but the story will be told against her for a hundred years. So far the people of the United States have hardly been aware of the fact that our own drug vendors are engaged in the exploiting and debasing of the Chinese. If, however, the public becomes informed and continues to be indifferent to this great wrong, the United States must share the ignominy of every other great nation that has made profit out of the sin and the weakness of mankind. The Jones-Miller bill directed against this evil practice failed of passage in the last congress. In the present congress the bill has been reintroduced. Its passage waits upon some earnest expression of the conviction of the American conscience. The prohibition of opium in China is even more important to the human race than the prohibition of liquor in this country. Christian sentiment the world over instead of hindering should reinforce the moral aspirations of every people struggling out of weakness and bestiality toward civilization.

A Pastor for Every Farmer

UNDER the leadership of Prof. Paul Vogt, the Methodist Episcopal church is planning to re-form its rural parishes so that they will cover every square mile of territory within the area where the Methodist denomination is represented. The Rural Church department of the Board of Home Missions has now placed thirty trained men in as many church colleges as teachers of rural sociology and rural church economy. These men, with the help of the district superintendents, will make maps of every Methodist district, county by county, showing every church of that denomination. They will then plot the parish lines so that every parish joins its neighbors and no American home is left out if it is within reachable distance. The next step for the pastor or circuit rider is to make a survey and religious census by calling upon every home that has no regular church affiliation. This work will be followed with a definite evangelistic appeal. Preliminary examples of the method have yielded large evangelistic returns. This type of enterprise will win if persisted in. One cannot, however, conceal the regret that it is being undertaken by one denomination by itself when it is the very sort of thing that should be done by all the churches in concert. But too many still prefer the time honored method of competing within the community by high pressure methods and gathering in whomsoever they can, rather than systematically shepherding all the people. So long as the churches will not undertake the greater task together, the Methodists are to be commended for their initiative and enterprise. In the transition now on in rural life those churches will live that best serve the communities; those should die that persist in exploiting the community needs for the purpose of building up their own particular sectarian church.

The Industrial Attitude of Judge Gary

AT the annual meeting of the stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation on April 18, Judge Gary made an address in which he set forth what he calls "Principles and Policies." How little influenced he is by ethical ideas of industrial relationships is shown by a perusal of this address. He says: "The security holders must be recognized as rightfully in control. Their capital permits the existence, the activities and the success of the corporation." The obtuseness of such a statement is amazing. The man who works for wages is, of course, making an investment in the industry utterly incommensurable with the investment of capital. Yet this captain of industry refuses even to mention labor's share, giving precedence and a monopoly of control to the rights of inert capital. In many modern factories today there is a recognition of the fact that the control of factory policies should not be in the hands of the stockholders alone, but should represent the joint mind of stockholders and workmen. By such a policy of justice and democracy many industrial plants avoid destructive strikes and have actually given their stockholders better protection for their investment. Another passage in the address of Judge Gary shows further how little impression the recent discussion of steel policies and practices has made upon him. He says: "The steel corporation inherited a twelve-hour day and the seven-day week system for necessary continuous operations. These had been and still are in vogue in many lines of industry in various countries. Perhaps they will never be entirely abolished." It is clear, to be sure, that certain types of industrial operation cannot be stopped on Sunday, but it is possible to give every workman one day in seven, even though his rest day cannot always fall on Sunday. There are ignorant workmen who would prefer the additional wage of a seven-day week. These should be protected against the consequences of their ignorance. The widespread complaint among industrial employers against a discussion of industrial questions by the church should find in the unimaginative materialism of Judge Gary's point of view its effective and silencing reply. Without such discussion we might continue our present system of strikes and lockouts for another generation, with inevitable degradation of human life. The stockholders of the steel corporation will one day demand a better informed leader than Judge Gary.

Fighting Prohibition Ghosts

A VERY good example of the way anti-prohibitionists and anti-censorists are fighting ghosts is given in a recent syndicated article by a popular writer. He sees blue Sundays and sumptuary legislation written large in the minds of all who want clean movies, decent dress, anti-cigarette laws and other clean things. Instead of arguing frankly for the indecencies he goes back to Cato and Sulla and Julius Cæsar and other tyrants as horrible examples of prohibitive decrees. He tells how Cato regulated women's dress by forbidding different colors in the same costume, and forbade that they should ride in carriages except at religious ceremonies. This ancient and despotic attempt to prevent women from exercising the common rights of men he uses to combat the demand of decent church women of our time who ask their careless sisters to protect the chastity of their sex by a little more cloth in their garments. The proscription against serving more than a fixed amount and kind of food at a feast, a relic of class regulation, is used as a horrible example of what will come next if we allow prohibition of drinking to go on. The mediæval laws prohibiting certain classes from serving more than a certain kind and amount of food are also cited to show the horrible next step of the prohibitionists. The mediæval autocrat made such laws to preserve the aristocratic class lines, but our modern champion of something that he calls "personal liberty" ignores the historical facts for the sake of the devil's homily he wishes to read us. He then piously perverts logic by telling us that because George Washington and Patrick Henry fought to put an end to that sort of thing we should not forsake the heroic gifts of the fathers but stand like valiant patriots against all who would take away our beer, save our daughters from indecency and all our children from the perverting suggestions of lewd picture shows.

A Newspaper or a News Factory

THE Chicago Herald and Examiner furnished a nice illustration of the methods by which a certain type of newspaper "writes up" news. Six of the twelve Negroes condemned to be electrocuted at Little Rock for the Elaine riots of last year were to have been executed on a certain Friday of a near-past week. A writ secured in the courts delayed the execution, and the condemned men are still alive. But the enterprising Chicago daily told its reading world all about the execution. It gave a detailed description of how the men went to the electric chair and in what order they were taken. It told how the colored Baptist preacher, one of the six, accompanied the other five with unquailing nerve, consoling them for the ordeal, then bravely took his own seat and died calmly. It called him a simple, unassuming hero and characterized him as a man of nerve without a peer. The story represented that the preacher had converted the entire "death squad." The fact is that they were all members of his church or of some other before the riots took place. The description is made vivid by the narration of how he led in singing the old-time Negro hymns as the death march proceeded, and how the other prisoners in the penitentiary caught up the songs, until the whole prison was solemnly ringing with the pathetic melody. Every word of this was manufactured.

One Hundred Years of Liberal Journalism

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN has just been celebrating its centenary. It has received the congratulations of liberal minded leaders, and of all others who admire a fair opponent, from all over the world. It retains the solid qualities of well written and scholarly editorials and of well edited and dependable news; there is not the least tint of yellow in it nor is it as prosaic and devoid of human interest as a Peking Gazette. It is essentially human, bright, ethical and contemporary. It began as a journal of protest. Printed in England's greatest manufacturing center, it protested against inhuman labor conditions, advocated free trade in the days of the corn laws, reform of the franchise when the masses were denied it, home rule for Ireland in the days when it cost Gladstone his premiership; it opposed foreign wars that were wholly imperialistic, like the Crimean and the Boer wars, and it is today the enlightened and vigorous critic of French militarism, of English terrorism in Ireland and of the policy of iron-handedness in dealing with Germany. The ardent supporter of Lloyd-George in his Liberal days before the war, it is now an incisive critic of his toryism and exaggerated opportunism. It opposed French imperial policy in Morocco, combatted English imperial policy in Persia, forewarned its readers of Prussian intentions before the great war and has ably fought realpolitick in all nations. It exposed Dwyerism in India and advocates a British commonwealth instead of the British Empire. We do not find Lord Curzon or Arthur Balfour in the list of those who sent congratulations, but Lord Robert Cecil and General Jan Smuts are among them, and great men from everywhere who believe in a league for peace, a newspaper policy of truth-telling as over against one of propaganda, and a genuinely democratic policy in all human relationships.

A Positive Step Toward Social Justice

EVERY Canadian province and every one of our states, excepting five, has adopted some form of compensation law covering accident and death suffered by a worker while at work in another's employ. In other words, public opinion generally has come to accept the principle that the hazard of accident and death while at work should be charged to the cost of production, just as is the wear and breakage of machinery. Some states make an exception of extra-hazardous occupations and all make exceptions of domestic service and farm labor—because of the smallness of the "plant" and the consequent inability of the employer to bear the risk. The compensational usually provides $100 for burial in case of death, and compensation for the injured or for his family at the rate of from one-half to two-thirds of his wage. Employers carry this as a group insurance risk and charge the premium cost to cost of production or carry it in the same way as they do depreciation funds. The five states that have not yet passed laws are the two Carolinas, Florida, Arkansas and Mississippi. Several have gone so far as to provide state insurance at cost. All this legislation has been enacted in the past decade. Much of it needs extension and improvement, but it is all exemplary as a beginning of that social provision which will ultimately life the burden of disease, accident, old-age and death from the backs of those least able to bear the hazards of industry and charge it up to society at large. A compensation law is in these days one of the tests by which men judge the "social status of a state." Another is its legislation on behalf of women and children.

Radical Dealing With One's Wealth

MEN who would immolate self today do not take themselves to the monastery, giving their wealth to found retreats for those who would escape the world's wickedness. Instead, they dedicate their material means to the common good and devote their lives to some form of social service. One of the recent notable examples is that of Austin Hopkinson, a British M. P., who gave his limousine to his chauffeur to set him up in the taxi business, his $150,000 house to the city council for municipal purposes and a score of houses for such purposes as the council might devise as the most useful. His large engineering factory he has put on a profit-sharing basis that will ultimately make the employees the sole owners. He does this as an earnest of his contention that it is only such voluntary division of property on the part of the rich that will prevent revolution. This may be heroic in method, but it is stimulating in example, for it is a genuinely sacrificial spirit that is shown and a protest against that form of social selfishness which claims superior right to any and all kinds of material possession. An increasing number of the fortunate possessors of wealth are becoming convinced that they have no right to use it in luxury or for self-aggrandizement alone, and one would think they could all see that with this wealth comes the hazard that their children will be despoiled of those characteristics which bless a democratic society. The riches of the rich are seldom a blessing to their children if one counts blessing in terms of Christian character and social usefulness.

Letting the Negro on the Inside

THE Negro cannot be lynched out of existence. He cannot be packed off to Africa. He cannot be "colonized" in separate states or communities. He is here, in the midst, rubbing elbows, carrying brick, cooking victuals, running errands in the hotels, and running banks—some of them.

It is interesting to observe how the stubborn fact of the Negro's presence is being accepted anew by the south. Perhaps more rational measures for meeting the fact are developing there than elsewhere, though the Negro himself is growing more rather than less wrathful and rebellious over his treatment in and by the south. The south has always believed that it had a policy. The north has had no policy, except to denounce the intolerance and spleen of the south. Now that the Negro is trekking north, the north has simply accepted the fact. It cannot be said to have developed a policy for meeting the situation.

The race has made marvelous progress, as a race, since emancipation. Everybody agrees to that, numerous southern white men among the rest. Indeed southrons are often foremost in protesting it, and cherishing the hope of the efficacy of education and patient progress,—with the accent on the patient. Keeping the process slow and sure is the emphatic insistence of most whites who are squeamish about Negro contacts.

And all are not less well agreed as to the basis of this unprecedented race progress. The Negro has profited by his contacts with a superior civilization. Thrown on his own resources, herded on virgin soil in the heart of Africa, his evolution would follow that painful, tedious course which all undirected human progress has pursued. The very rigors of the Negro's tutelage have proved his salvation. Most Negroes themselves recognize the fact, however rebellious they are against the excesses of those same rigors.

One often hears conservative white leaders of the south protesting that the surest way to elevate the Negro is to elevate the whites. The excessive proportion of public funds expended upon white education as against Negro education in the same state in the south is sometimes justified by that reasoning. The Negro will advance most rapidly through imitation. It is of first importance, therefore, that he shall have high standards of morals and intelligence to imitate in the civilization round about him.

A hiatus in such reasoning which has not yet been squarely faced is this. Under slavery all classes of Negroes came into personal contact with white civilization. Indeed the more capable individuals came into the closest contact. All, to be sure, enjoyed these relationships on a basis which greatly reduced their cultural value. None dared forget for a moment that he was and must permanently remain an inferior. Such culture was, of course, hopelessly vitiated from the point of view of a democratic order of society.

Now the contacts calculated to prove of the most cultural value are limited to the least capable of the race. This fact is still little appreciated by any, northern or southern. Only menials are permitted to enter the white homes of culture and refinement. They not only have little or no influence among their own race, but the very fact that they are willing to accept the menial status required of them disqualifies them for social leadership. They see beautiful furniture, and touch art at numerous points, but the contacts mean little or nothing to them individually, and mean even less to the race as a whole.

Most of us would be amazed to discover how little the Negro of intelligence and standing in his own race knows of the inside of the standard white American home, or even of the public institutions which play so important a part in setting the standards of American civilization. Negro bellboys swarm through the highest-grade hotel in the cities, north and south. But, though seeing, they do not understand. They carry no intelligible message to the race, permanently and inexorably disbarred from those hotels. The tortures which the Negro of culture suffers in travel all over the country today are beyond the imagination of most white people. He enjoys a degree of comfort and cleanliness in his own home. Many now enjoy a very high degree, indeed. But the Jim Crow hotel is an even greater horror to such than the Jim Crow train. The most influential and progressive element of the Negro race usually have no idea what standards of culture are maintained in high grade hotels of the country. They do not even see inside, nor have they the basis for imagining what the life therein may be.

A company of well-educated and cultured white people were the other day invited to take a meal in a Negro home of a community where there were no white accommodations. The hostess seated the guests at the table, excluding all members of her own family. She was embarrassed, perhaps at first resentful of the social conventions which prompted that course in her own home. Later she overcame her diffidence, and banished her resentment at least to the extent of showing the most cordial hospitality to her guests. Before the company left, the whole house was thrown open for inspection, with the same enthusiasm that any ambitious housewife would display her achievements in home-making. The home quite justified inspection and admiration. On their leaving, members of the company were assured by the husband that his wife had never before in all her life had the opportunity to come into contact with white people on anything like the basis then adopted. She knew nothing of the interior of white homes. She had never been a house-servant in one, and of course she had never been permitted to see inside of one otherwise, nor had she ever before sat down in the same room to talk with white gentlemen and ladies.

A group of Negro leaders, merchants, capitalists, men of affairs, interested in the erection of a Y. M. C. A. building in their community, were recently escorted through a standard white Y. M. C. A. plant in the same city in which they lived. It was a special concession, and the party was conducted by the general secretary in person. They were almost breathless in their amazement. They had no idea that such appointments existed. Members of their own race, content to play the menial, and boasting only the menial's capacity, were familiar enough with the last detail of the equipment, but these who alone could profit by the knowledge of the advancement of the race, were as guiltless of an acquaintance with the interior of the institution whose exterior was a familiar landmark of their own city, as if it had actually been located in another world.

This inability of the Negro race to get at the inside of the civilization from which it is supposed to be learning so much, and through whose contacts it is assumed to be so vastly profiting, is revealed in numerous ways. It is a notorious fact that many Negro homes, tasty and pleasing to the eye of the passer-by, are dowdy and ill-kempt within. The exterior is modeled after what all can see. The interior is left to chance, or the faltering imagination of those who never seen the interior of a standard white home, or to the visionless devices of those who have seen a high grade home only through the eyes of an ambitionless menial.

In an important Negro community there stands a building of splendid proportions, and apparently complete and fully appointed. It is headquarters for one of the largest social organizations of the Negro people. Inside nothing is complete. For eight or ten years, since its erection, it has been used without ceiling or plaster on one whole story, without plaster on part of another story, without window weights, without window casings on the interior, with very poor seating facilities, with every feature glaring out its indictment of the race as shiftless, slovenly and all but hopeless. Yet inquiry shows that those who have so well profited by their contacts with a superior civilization in exteriors, always and everywhere on display, are simply oblivious to models of interiors in that same civilization. Those who have builded and are conducting that eminent public institution literally do not know any better. Their very capacity for the leadership of their race has debarred them from contacts which would enable them to complete the work so handsomely begun.

It is manifest that some way must be found to open up the interiors of our civilization to this aspiring race. This is not a preachment for amalgamation, or the establishment of equal social status, or for any other move except the introduction of a little common sense into the program upon which all seem more or less consistently to have settled down. We have agreed that the future of the American Negro is to be wrought out in contact with white civilization, and that his most rapid advancement is to be insured by his imitation of the best he sees in the superior civilization around him. Yet our conventions confine those who can alone raise the standards of the race to a passing view of exteriors, and shut them away from the inside, the heart of our civilization, almost as effectually as if the race were herded to Dahomey. Even under present social conventions we might at least organize exploring parties, and expose our interiors on stated parade occasions. Those who have it in their power to mold race standards might consent to join such excursions, even if they shall be permanently disbarred from more normal social contacts.

Backing Up to Go Forward

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE was a long freight train, and it stood upon a track, and it essayed to go forward, but it could not go. For the train was heavy, and the track was wet, and the wheels of the locomotive went round and round, neither did the sand enable them to grip the track.

And I stood and watched it, and I wondered if it could make its Get-away.

But the engineer was wise in his generation, and he backed up a few inches, and then quickly threw his lever ahead, and opened the throttle tolerably wide.

And the engine started ahead, and the first car started with it. And the second car felt the jerk a little later, and started also, and the third likewise. Then did all the cars fall in line, each one of them with a jerk and a change of its mind, and the engineer sat in his seat and whistled a quiet tune, for he had everything coming along fine.

Now what he had done was only this, that he gave unto himself the benefit of the fraction of an inch of slack that is between each car and its neighbor, so that he did not have to start the first car until the engine had gone ahead for the half of an inch, and the second car started not till the first was going. And each car gave unto him a little slack, and all the time the engine and the moving cars were gathering momentum. And by the time the last car started, it was with a jerk that overcame all its hesitation and then some.

Now there are plenty of good people who fail because they never learn this little trick. They undertake to start the Universe in the way it should go, and the Universe is conservative. And they pull and puff and wear flat places on the rail, and get Nowhere. But the wise man learneth the value of a little slack in the Couplings, and even the wisdom of backing up a little that one may the more surely go forward.

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's

Sixth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

AT a meeting of the Whitefriars Club one night Dean Inge read an essay on immortality. It was an able essay, of course, albeit so abstract and difficult to follow that it left the company puzzled, if not depressed. The eternal hope seemed as remote as a star, as vague as a dream, and so attenuated as to be hardly desirable at all. No one had the courage to start the discussion, until Bernard Shaw made bold to say that having lived sixty years, or thereabouts, he was not encouraged to go on by such a prospect. It was too awful to contemplate, and he proceeded to advocate the organization of a Suicide Club. The essay, or an elaboration of it, appeared in "Outspoken Essays"—one of the few books of our day which will be read fifty years hence—and the impish attitude of Shaw, who is never more happy than when he can gibe a dean or a bishop, may be inferred from his review of that volume. Among other saucy things, he said:

These essays, dazzling as they are, have done much to confirm me in a conviction which has been deepening in me for years, that what we call secondary education as practiced in our public schools and universities is destructive to any but the strongest minds, and even to them is disastrously confusing. I find in the minds of all able and original men and women who have been so educated, a puzzling want of homogeneity. They are full of chunks of unassimilated foreign bodies which are more troublesome and dangerous than the vacancies I find in the minds of those who have not been educated at all. I prefer a cavity to a cancer or a calculus: it is capable of being filled with healthy tissue and is not malignant. In the mind of the dean, which is quite unmistakably a splendid mind, I find the most ridiculous substances, as if, after the operation of educating him, the surgeon-pedagogue had forgotten to remove his sponges and instruments and sewn them up inside him.

"THE GLOOMY DEAN"

There is no doubt that Dean Inge is one of the greatest minds on the British Isles, but his thinking does not give one exactly the impression of hopeless confusion which Shaw described. He sets one wondering over that extraordinary bundle of antinomies we call the human intellect. An aristocrat by nature and training, he has the knack of catching the ear of the crowd, as much by the vivid colors he employs as by the challenge of his thought. If not actually a pessimist in his temperament, he is at least a Cassandra—doomed to tell the bitter truth and have nobody believe it—whose dismal outlook entitles him to be called "the gloomy dean", a title given as a reward for his remarkable lectures on "The Church and the Age." One such prophet, if no more, is needed in every generation, and we are sorely in need of one in America, if only to mitigate our easy, evasive optimism which plays ostrich in the face of dark facts. A great Christian teacher, the dean seems to contradict in one breath what he says in the next; so much so that the Methodist Times, after reading his Romanes Lecture on "Progress," was moved to ask: "Has Dean Inge heard of the gospel?" A rationalist who relegates miracles to "the sphere of pious opinion," he is an apostle of a lofty, if somewhat severe, spirituality; and at the very moment when one expects his shrewd, positive mind to be dogmatic, he "slips through the stile of religious imagination to gather moon-flowers betwixt dusk and dawn."

The surprise was general when the dean chose Christian mysticism as the theme of his Bampton Lectures; and if at first reading he did not seem to get beyond the fringe of the subject, interest soon shifted from the thesis to the personality of the author. It was astonishing that one of his type of mind, who apparently had not the slightest suspicion that "they see not clearest who see all things clear," should undertake such a study. But a further reading revealed an odd mixture of nationalism and spiritual immediacy, and in spite of his criticisms of the excesses and excrescences of mysticism, the sober web of his thought was shot through with the glow and fire of the reality he sought to expound. Since that time there have been many manuals of mysticism, some wise, some otherwise. Evelyn Underhill is scholarly, weighty, noble, though a medievalist; E. Herman is worth looking into, albeit too much inclined to cleverness—like a juggler doing tricks with the Pearl of Eternity. The great masterpiece in exposition of mysticism in our day is "The Way of Divine Union," by A. E. Waite, who writes from the inside and with the winged wisdom of a poet, as one who has in his experience that which gives him the key to much that is hidden from others. But Dean Inge led the way in the study of mysticism, and it is his subtle, shy affinity with the mystics that makes him a worthy successor to a great dynasty of deans, and the one voice to which all England listens.

AMAZING PULPIT MANNERISMS

As a preacher Dean Inge is singularly effective, if one forgets the most amazing mannerisms ever seen in a pulpit, and attends to the matter of his discourse. With clear-cut, ascetic face, scholarly in bearing, looking taller than he is, he has a sober, dry-eyed, didactic personality, and an elocution atrocious in its angularity. As he rises to read his sermon—often without noticing that the audience is present—that straight, level, self-contained look makes no appeal, and the thin, flexible lips seem made to set inferior folk right on no very gentle terms. He makes little concession to dulness or ignorance. As he reads on, his facial expression suggests a contortionist, as he launches his clear, carrying voice—rather rasping at times, owing, no doubt, to his deafness—into the vast spaces of the cathedral. His attitude is one of aristocratic carelessness, as if he trusted to the vaults and pillars to bear his message, but is not greatly concerned whether they do or not. His matter is a compound of epigram and paradox, of mordant wit and rapier-like satire, matching the tartness of his tones. His humor is of the intellectual variety, and more often than not with a sting in its tail. Without wasting a word, in a style as incisive as his thought—clear, concise, keen-cutting—he sets forth the truth as he sees it. There is no unction in his preaching, no pathos. It is cold intellect, with never a touch of tenderness. Much of what he says is more able than mighty, more brilliant than moving, leaving one wiser rather than better, abashed rather than lifted. Yet, at rare intervals, in the middle of a lecture, there is sometimes a brief unveiling, and one sees the prophet-soul behind the superficial habit of sardonic criticism and pungent epigram.

So the Dean of St. Paul's stands before us with his dry, biting speech, his formidable sarcasm, his alarming air of finality, his startling gift of characterization, and even in his gentlest moods one feels a black wind round the corner. It would not do for all preachers to be of his order. Men need comfort as well as castigation. Yet what austere sincerity is his, what intrepid courage, what weight of clear judgment, what prophetic power! His quality is that of the Hebrew prophets, with more of Jeremiah than of Isaiah in his spiritual outlook, and if he inspires less affection than any great preacher of his time, it is due partly to his forbidding temperament, but chiefly to his habit of exploding shams and absurdities. Using the flail of John the Baptist, he is a gift of God to our age with its "Lo, here" and "Lo, there," and every kind of fad run rife. The dean is unconcerned about majorities, impervious to popular feeling. Indeed, one suspects that he is uncomfortable in a majority, like the elder statesman who, when his speech was applauded by the multitude, asked uneasily, "Have I said anything very foolish?" Anyway, he holds it to be a maxim that "the church can rarely cooperate with a popular movement;" by which he means that it can seldom tread the path of success, and never because it is the path of success. Unfortunately his bald veracity is not graced by the genius of speaking the truth in love, and he utters hard sayings regardless of consequences; but he will not compromise his gospel. During the Great War, when so many churchmen of all communions took low ground, he never mitigated by one iota the severity of the Christian message. Later, when so many pandered to the growing power of the labor movement, the dean stood firm, refusing to weaken his gospel in the service of a political party. It did not matter that he was denounced as an obstinate obscurantist; he upheld the dignity of a faith which commands, and can never be subject to the experiences of the hour.

LACKS FAITH IN DEMOCRACY

Every right-thinking man must honor the dean for his unyielding tenacity to principle; but at times he seems to stand so straight that he leans backward. Even before he has uttered a word against it one knows that he despises democracy and has no faith in it, because it smells of the mob. Certainly he does not believe that the majority is right, much less that massed ignorance makes wisdom. Often he seems to identify democracy with socialism, if not with demagoguery, and he smites both with the swift sword of his satire. Not that he is opposed to social reform. He would indeed build the City of God "in England's green and pleasant land;" but always with the tools of the spirit. Nor does this attitude mean, as his critics are so ready to infer, that Christianity should be the fortress and bulwark of aristocracy. Far from it. His point is that the church must be ready, if need be, to incur the antagonism of old aristocracy and the vituperations of young demos alike, truckling to neither. She must not cringe to the masses in our day as she once did to the classes; must not seek to be applauded by a multitude who demanded the crucifixion of her Master, and could demand it again—that is the core of a message delivered with needless acerbity, invective and scorn. It is a sound message and one sorely needed in our day, unpalatable though it be. But like all men of wisdom, the dean has his defects, his blind spots, the chief of which—as one might have guessed—is an incredible astigmatism with respect to the social meaning and application of Christianity. Take, for example, his lecture on "The Kingdom of God in the World," and one feels that the gibe of Bernard Shaw was well nigh justified.

WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY?

Can we point to any recognizable type of character and belief and say, This is Christianity? We might try. Say that belief in the fatherhood of God, in the brotherhood of man, in the sacredness and eternal importance of the essential part of each personality; the immeasurable superiority of moral goodness to any worldly advantages; love as the crown of all the virtues; selfishness as the root of sin; hypocrisy, hard-heartedness and prudent worldliness as the three things our Lord hated most, trust in God and joy even in affliction; the simple life; the love of wisdom; accumulations of money a snare to their owner; the great renunciation,—he that will save his life shall lose it, and he that will lose his life shall save it—and what Matthew Arnold calls the method of inwardness—these do seem to be enough for a fairly clear notion of what a real Christian is like, and in considering the influence of Christianity on the social order this is also important: that the gospel works by personal influence upon the will and affections and not by external machinery. Jesus left no book, no code, no system: he wrote his gospel on the hearts of men. A slow method? Yes, it is a slow method: it is not easy to change people, but that was the method he chose—like the ancient torch race in which the wearied runner handed on his torch to someone else to carry on. The Christian religion is not taught; it is caught from someone who has it.

The preaching of this gospel is and always has been the great business of the church. All Christians must agree in combating, for example, all exploitation and ruining of souls, all that great network of cooperative guilt with limited liability which makes up so much of secular society. But when we are invited to go further and take sides as a church in matters in which good and wise men are divided, the case is different. I am not suggesting for a moment that Christians should not have political opinions. I am speaking of organized Christianity as such, and I say deliberately that Christians ought not to organize themselves as Christians for any particular social or political propaganda. We do not want a powerful political church again, whether run by Catholics or Independents. Christianity is a leaven, it can never be more. Our Lord made that absolutely plain, that he never expected to have the majority on his side. Our Lord never gave any reason to suppose the church would ever be successful in winning the masses as such. He never gave any reason to think there would ever be an inconvenient crowd gathered round the narrow gate. Therefore all this kind of clerical demagoguery and democracy is fundamentally contrary to his method, and it is, though many good people think otherwise, a treachery against his teaching.

There we have it "plain and flat," as Lowell would say; on the one side a powerful political church to be avoided, and on the other not even a cooperative conscience with limited liability to match the organized iniquity of the world. In short, every protest of the church against political infamy, every effort of Christians—other than individual—in behalf of juster, wiser, more merciful laws, every attempt of the pulpit to translate the teachings of Jesus into practical social justice is, as Dean Inge sees it under the glorious dome of St. Paul's, a form of treachery and demagoguery. "What can we do?" is surely a fair question, and the dean answers it in his closing lecture on "The Church and the Age," from which we learn, after a merciless flaying of nearly every forward-looking movement of our time, that "the whole duty of the church is to hold up the Christian view of life, the Christian standard of values, steadily before the eyes 'of the people, laying emphasis upon love, sympathy, economy, sincerity, holy living, setting a good example' for the poorer members of our own class, and indirectly for 'the class below;' upon charity, prayer, and the duty of helping to form a moral public opinion against the evils of foolish fashions, gambling, and the like.

More specifically, three avenues of influence seem to be open to Christian enterprise, three modern tendencies with which "we, as church people, may cooperate and assist." They are the breaking down of class barriers, the spread of education, and the care of public health, and especially the support of the new science of eugenics! Such is the program of the Christian church, as outlined in the old grey cathedral of England, at a time when the world is shattered by universal war, disfigured by industrial brutality, plundered by greed, and staggering under the shadow of a vast despair! One recalls the word of Carlyle: "The world asks of its church in these times, more passionately than of any other institution, the question—Canst thou teach us or not?"

SHORTCOMINGS AND VIRTUES

Howbeit, my purpose here is not to argue with Dean Inge, but simply to portray his outlook and art as a preacher. He stands for a point of view—held by many noble and true hearted men—which, if held by all, would make the church an arcana celestia of a barren and immovable conservatism; but that is not the attitude of the church of today and it never will be! Jesus was not put to death for laying emphasis upon love, sympathy, prayer, and the doing of good, but for making a definite proposal for the public policy of the world; and if following him leads the church to Calvary, it is not better than its leader. For the character, the scholarship, and the noble prophetic courage of Dean Inge, we give thanks, but we refuse to follow him in his advocacy of "the public impotence of religion." His fame will outlive his defects, and the stones he has laid will abide as a foundation for other and perhaps more genial workers. One such stone is his vision of a church truly one, not in organization or creed or ritual, but because drawn to communion through a profound veneration and love for its Master. He has taught us out of long and deep study that the mystics all tell the same tale; all climb the same mountain, and their witness agrees together. All ages, all sects, all languages are blended harmoniously on that shining Jacob's ladder which scales the heavens in far other fashion than was ever dreamed of by the builders of Babel. Despite the deflections of his insight, he has interpreted that eternal religion which is the original divine poetry, whereof our theologies are imperfect translations, summing it up in a golden passage which Bernard Shaw was "wicked" enough to say is one of the rare intervals of inspiration enjoyed by the dean in the midst of the years:

It allows us what George Meredith calls "the rapture of the forward view." It brings home to us the meaning of the promise of Christ that there are many things yet hid from humanity which will in the future be revealed by the Spirit of Truth. It encourages us to hope that for each individual who is trying to live the right life the venture of faith will be progressively justified in experience. It breaks down the denominational barriers which divide men and women who worship the Father in spirit and in truth—barriers which become more senseless in each generation, since they no longer correspond even approximately with real differences of belief or of religious temperament. It makes the whole world kin by offering a pure religion which is substantially the same in all climates and in all ages—a religion too divine to be fettered by any man-made formulas, too nobly human to be readily acceptable to men in whom the ape and tiger are still alive, but which finds a congenial home in the purified spirit which is the throne of the Godhead. Such is the type of faith which is astir among us. It makes no imposing show in church conferences; it does not fill our churches and chapels; it has no organization, no propaganda; it is for the most passively loyal, without much enthusiasm, to the institutions among which it finds itself. But in reality it has overleapt all barriers; it knows its true spiritual kin; and amid the strifes and perplexities of a sad, troublous time it can always cover its hope and confidence by ascending in heart and mind to the heaven which is closer to it than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.

The Church

By Arthur B. Rhinow

THE keeper of the sacred fire sat by the altar on the mountain, and mused. He was sad.

Day and night the torch bearers came to the altar to light the torches with which to kindle the fires that warmed the homes of the valley and illumined the night.

From his aerie he watched them and saw they were selfish and careless. They thought more of the pretty flambeaux in their hands than the cheer they could bring to others.

The keeper was sad. Oh, that he might go down to warm and brighten the valley. But the fire, the sacred fire! Who would guard it? He dare not let it die.

One afternoon, he noticed gross neglect, for his eye was keen. Fires were left unkindled. He knew that men would grope in the dark and stumble in the night.

Ablaze with zeal, he seized a torch, tipped it with the holy flame, and hurried down the narrow path. He fought the offenders, and kindled the fires.

Homeward, the hills echoed his praises. He was proud as he reached the height and saw the fires below.

But as he turned to the altar, his heart was chilled. Alas, the sacred fire had died.

The Negro Question—the Acid Test

By Rodney W. Roundy

THE inner life of American citizenship certainly needs a wholesome cleansing when it so settles on its lees as to be unable to prevent such a raging flame of violence and bloodshed as occurred in Tulsa, Okla. What else can come from the hands of an inefficient, lifeless police force, a lax county sheriff and corrupt politics motivated by graft! Under such circumstances "an impudent Negro, a hysterical white girl and a yellow journal" can furnish plenty of explosive to burn up any city.

How Christian is America anyway? Looked at en masse the 42,140,997 men and women who are in the membership of the various Christian churches in our land make an imposing array. The fact that 667,007 more men and women are in definite church connection this year than a year ago is distinctly heartening. Numerically the United States may be said to be 40 per cent Christian. Counting the Christians one by one such a significant minority of character, influence and point of view makes it right to call our country a Christian nation.

Christianity applied has brought forth its rich fruitage in many fields of life and many branches of human endeavor. In patent results and unreckoned resources it has not been found wanting. Will applied Christianity stand the test of interracial understanding and good-will? Will the law of brotherhood prevail? Does it fit? Do the principles of Jesus apply to the white man's treatment of the Negro? Is there a solution to America's outstanding race problem? Can America stand the acid test?

To answer these queries facts must be weighed and tendencies appraised. Not all church members are really Christians. A considerable percentage know not the law of Christ. For them to love one's neighbor as one's self has no depth of root or practical meaning. From such a soil small returns of a justice and charity which maketh not ashamed will come.

DAMNING DISCRIMINATION

Even though there is Christian living, allegiance and aspiration outside the visible church, yet in the large sense there is no social salvation in the 60 per cent unattached ecclesiastically in so far as social salvation means the bridging of the gap between the races. From this nest of the unchurched flies forth the brood of cruelty, unrestrained passion, blind unbelief and a host of man's besetting sins. In this crowd selfishness does its perfect work of damning discrimination. The hope for better America rests not in pagan America. Stimulated by an unwarranted revival of yellow journalism and widely extended but grossly unjust agitation not alone in the south, but in the national capital, in all parts of the country and, but yesterday, in Tulsa, Oklahoma, Negroes were driven to a defense of their own lives, their homes, their property. Nothing in America seemed secure to them. The dastardly practice of lynching reached its highest mark in the number of lives ruthlessly slain. The disorders of mob violence sullied the fair name of several of our great cities. America as a whole was not meeting the acid test of applied Christianity.

The Negro people were greatly hurt at the close of the war. Their loyalty, courage, work and sacrifice were distinct factors in war service. They were not slackers; they were not bolshevists; they were genuine patriots. Yet when the armistice was signed they had to meet the chagrin of special insults, the bombastic assertions of domination by the white race, the cruelties of mob violence.

THE TURN OF THE TIDE

But the Christian conscience of America was being stirred. It was asleep; it needed awakening. The tide turned. The lynching record for 1920, bad as it was, sixty-one in the whole country, was a total reduced by twenty-two from the previous year. Better still the gospel was finding expression through the enforcement of the law. Louisiana had no lynchings. The effective state constabulary of Tennessee, thanks to ex-Governor Roberts, effectively gave notice to the whole state that there was no longer an open season for killing Negroes. In the south alone forty-six mobs were balked of their prey. In fourteen of these cases armed forces were used to restore order. Four mobs were fired upon with seven resulting deaths. Suppression of lawlessness is a real test of applied Christianity.

Governor Dorsey of Georgia has arisen in the might of his moral power as a Christian governor. He has submitted his findings to a conference of citizens. Facts concerning 135 cases of maltreatment of Negroes have been grouped under the four heads of lynching, peonage, driving Negroes out by organized lawlessness and individual acts of cruelty. Only two of the whole number were for "the usual crime." All these maltreatments with one exception only were by native Georgians. The governor tells his fellow citizens that "we stand indicted as a people before the world"; that unless conditions are changed "God and man would justly condemn Georgia more severely than Belgium and Leopold were condemned for the Congo atrocities"; and that continuation of such crimes means "the destruction of our civilization."

Remedies recommended by this Christian governor include the widest publicity within the state for all white lawlessness; a campaign for justice by all Christian churches; compulsory education for both races; committees of each race on race relations; the repeal of certain laws which make possible peonage for debt; a state constabulary under the governor's control; a money penalty on counties in which a lynching occurs; state investigations of lynchings; state juries to try the accused at such places as the governor may direct and the governor empowered to remove from office after due investigation, any official delinquent in the discharge of his duty.

NEGROES ORGANIZED FOR JUSTICE

The strategic value of the varying program of the interracial committees cannot be over emphasized in their Christian importance. Of the 769 counties in the south in which there are sufficient numbers of colored people to warrant organization, 500 are reported as organized. Programs calling for justice in the courts and especially opposition to lynching under all circumstances; economic justice, adequate educational facilities, improved living and sanitary conditions, recreational advantages, better traveling facilities and welcoming returned colored soldiers, have been carried through with different degrees of success. In all cases better interracial understanding has been the result. Both races have been more fully constrained by the law of Christ.

The principles of the Interracial Committees must be developed in the north as well as in the south. Wherever possible the functions should be assumed by the local city, town or county federation of churches. But with Negroes in all parts of the country, with work slack, with housing inadequate and expensive, with dangers of lawlessness in many places, colored and white leaders together should have at hand the machinery which will produce the remedy at the right time. Christians will be responsible if they do not act, act promptly, act by method and act to practical ends of prevention and cure.

THE POWER OF THE PREACHER

The thinking self respecting Negro smarting under discriminations, perhaps insults, which he does not deserve, sadly wonders why the white Christian churches and their leaders have not been more effective in promoting better race relations. Even Dr. J. H. Dillard of the Jeannes Fund is strongly convinced that when the preachers really set about the task the grosser forms of injustice and cruelty will cease. "The masses of the people know the preacher. He is the man who more than any other can influence them to right thinking about law and order as well as the higher reaches of Christian charity." Both are right. The great reforms, the forward marches in human progress in Christian lands have always found in the Christian pulpit and church the leaders for the new day. There has been no more important expression of the power of their effective service than through the interracial Sundays proclaimed by governors of southern states—in Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Florida and Arkansas. In Kentucky over a thousand preachers of both races applied Christian principles to interracial problems. Endorsing the call, Governor Dorsey urged the preachers "to appeal to the conscience of our people for a more even justice in our courts, for better housing and sanitary conditions, for better school facilities, for better traveling conditions, and for more patience and self-control, growing out of the spirit of the Christ, in the association of the two races."

Such developments make only for one conclusion, namely, that in the principles of Jesus is the only solution of the Negro problem. It is but another way of putting Principal Moton's statement that "the better white south was never more friendly to the Negro than today."

The acid test of Christianity rests in the criterion of real worth. Is a man a man for a' that? Is color or real achievement to be the test? Heartening confirmation of a new point of view is at hand in the increasing number of Christian white men and women who are no longer asserting that they know the Negro but are reappraising the progress of racial development during the last half century. More leaders than formerly are saying there are Negroes and Negroes. There are not only mountain peaks of individual Negro characters arising out of low lying and fever breeding swamps and plains; there are many smaller hills of real personal worth and attainment. There are broad plains of Negro life rising above the submerged meadows and stagnant pools of a civilization just emerged from slavery.

All too much of the old Negro remains; but there is a new Negro. To his voice we must listen. This voice is resonant with a new hope based on solid achievement. A new era has dawned. The day of Booker Washington has not passed; it can never pass. His soul goes marching on not in solitary leadership but in a host of wise racial generals in all fields of life. They are insisting that the principles and ideals of American democracy shall be applied to them and their people. All too slowly, yet on all hands there is developing a determination of white Christian leaders to meet this reasonable request and to find a way out in the Christian demands of Negroes for better treatment, a fair chance for education, a more even handed justice, reasonable economic conditions in city and country, a fair appreciation of accomplishments under difficulties, a single standard of morals, a security of life, property, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Browning's bishop asks his friend: "Like you this Christianity or not?" Like it or not, Christianity is not Christianity until it is expressed in terms of the great commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The acid test of Christianity as applied to race relations of all America is that of brotherhood. By no means is blood brotherhood required. Marriage bonds are personal and incidental. But brotherhood in the terms of mutual understanding, of honest cooperation, of real good will, of the application of the golden rule is not only reasonable and practical; it is the only sufficient pathway of light for the living together of the varied races of America. Nothing less than the spirit of Christ can lead to the fullest realization of Christian America and America all too slowly but really is finding her way and must find her way to the application of the law of brotherhood to the Negro question. Conflicts of opinion there are bound to be, clashing of interests must come as offenses in all forms of life must come, compromise must be resorted to, the light will sometimes flicker and then brighten again, but the law of brotherhood makes sure headway. "Through present wrong, the eternal right . . . step by step" makes its "steady gain."

Contributors to this Issue

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, minister Church of the Divine Paternity, New York.

RODNEY W. ROUNDY, associate secretary Home Missions Council.

A Larger Life for the Farmer's Wife

DEAN BRADFORD KNAPP of the Arkansas State College of Agriculture would be named by all informed southerners as the greatest agricultural leader in America. All will admit that he is foremost in the southland. His distinguishing characteristics is what might be called his evangelistic spirit. He is an apostle and prophet of the better rural life. He possesses all the cool acumen of the scientist, all the practical administrative ability of the detached executive, and adds an enthusiasm for his task and a fervency of interest in human life that would honor a social reformer. In fact Dean Knapp is a social reformer; he is not primarily interested in the material factors he so ably promotes—he is interested in them as means to the making of better farm homes, less provincial rural communities, a larger outlook for the farmer and a wider chance for his children to share the good things of life.

The last thing Bradford Knapp would do would be to give his time merely to help a farmer grow more corn to feed more hogs to buy more land to grow more corn and so on round and round that vicious circle of materialism. He helps make two blades of grass and two strands of wool grow where one grew before as a means to less drudgery, more culture, better schools and churches and a better citizenship. It is a striking fact in American university life that the agricultural college faculties take an interest in the church to a greater degree than any other faculty in the university circle. And there is no other single profession, not even excepting the teachers and Red Cross nurses, that shows more interest in rural churches than do the county farm agents. Dean Knapp says "Emancipate the farmer's wife and you will emancipate the farmer: solve her problems and you will have solved the rural problem."

* * *

Emancipate the Farmer's Wife

Yesterday the farmer's wife was the home maker and the domestic manufacturer of the farm household. Our grandmothers not only did the sewing but the spinning as well; they did the washing and also made the soap. And they often helped to harvest the cotton or the flax and shear the sheep. They had neither magazine nor telephone, and there was no "flivver" to take them to town or to the neighbor's. No wonder they often smoked a pipe for consolation and came to substitute a firm voice for tones of tenderness. Our mothers got rid of the manufacturing end of household duties but they still did the baking, sewing, washing, scrubbing and chicken raising, and most of the farm wives are doing it yet, though their city sisters have turned it over to the baker, the tailor and the steam laundry. The saying goes that they are even sending their scrubbing out. But the farmer's wife now has a woman's page in all the weeklies, can get her own journal, the telephone has brought every neighbor next door and the "flivver" is rapidly becoming a household necessity.

The sewing machine was the first household machine. In our boyhood it was as much the sign of enterprise on the farmer's part as an automobile or membership in a farm organization is today. The day when the Singer was brought to our two roomed cabin on the prairie is as vivid in memory as the first pair of suspenders or blue topped boots. It cost sixty dollars at a time when the entire annual cash turnover was not three hundred, but it lifted a great drudgery from mother's hands and we look back with tender reminiscence to the light that came into her eyes that day. Then came the other household utensils and the things of culture began to slip in beside them. That day was a milestone in household life. The next milestone was marked by the purchase of a covered buggy, and the next by the telephone.

Emancipate Her From What?

It has been said with rather more truth than facetiousness that everybody is interested in the farmer's uplift but himself. No doubt many would still ask what emancipation is now needed for the farmer's wife. The answer is put together well in Circular 148 of the United States Department of Agriculture. It is a statistical summary of a survey made through 10,000 records secured by home demonstration agents, covering homogeneous sections in thirty-three northern and western states. They were not picked homes but selected areas in which every home was surveyed. This gives a very good cross-section analysis for all those parts of the country. The figures vary somewhat for east and west and the south is left out but they are indicative of the general situation.

Figures are dry, but we will "boil them down" as much as possible, trusting the reader to visualize the farm woman back of the statistics. Her average hours of daily toil are thirteen for the summer and a fraction over ten for the winter; all her days of rest, taken one at a time usually, add up less than two weeks per year. She cares for an average of eight rooms, carries in the water in three cases out of five and does her own sewing, mending, baking and washing in ninety-five cases out of every hundred. In eight cases out of ten she cleans and cares for kerosene lamps, keeps from one to two stoves going, and in more than one-half the cases carries in the fuel herself. Forty-two per cent of the farms have power machines but only fifteen per cent of the houses. There is running water in one house in three and a bath tub in one out of five. Most of the homes have sewing machines but only fifty-seven per cent have washing machines and forty-seven per cent carpet sweepers. One-fourth of the farmers' wives still help out in the field in rush seasons, and as many help all the time with the live stock. They live strenuous lives, as do their husbands, but more indoors than out and in a monotonous routine from which his work finds more frequent relief.

* * *

Emancipate Her to What?

The farm wife does not wish to become a parasite on the family income as some city wives become. Those city women who boast that they cannot cook a meal and go to bridge parties for breakfast while their husbands go to the club or hotel for dinner if the cook fails to come, are not mere characters in fiction. They toil not, neither do they spin, yet Solomon in all his glory is not so arrayed. The farm home will remain the bulwark of our society so long as it remains a cooperative household. It still furnishes eighty per cent of the nation's leading men, even in city affairs, because everybody works out there, including father's boys and girls. It is not the farm home as such, but the cooperative home that grows character, initiative, enterprise and a sense of duty.

The farm wife's emancipation will consist in a shorter working day, more social intercourse and relief from drudgery. It is not work that kills her spirit but the monotony of her work, its endless routine and drudgery. Give her a furnace and running water and a good lighting system—all easily installed in farm homes now. Bring the farm power into the house and train her hand to drive the "flivver." She will not object to eggs and butter as her part in making the family income, but let them be her part with full control of their expenditure or saving. Good roads will bring the doctor near, the rural visiting nurse will promote health for the children, the county hospital will guarantee safety in times of sickness and remove toil even if it does not remove anxiety, the consolidated school will give her children the education she did not get but would like to give. Organize her life so she will have time to train her children in religion and morals as the little once-a-month rural church cannot do and will never be able to do until it is redeemed from its sectarianism. She is the mother of tomorrow's leaders in church and state; give her a chance!

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Leadership of the Church

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The May 19th issue of The Christian Century is to me a notable and valuable one. Mr. Nearing's "Capitalism and the Ideals of Jesus" cast me into an awful experience of gloom—that such an octopus as capitalism could actually in so short a time fasten itself insidiously and effectively upon the nations, the Christian nations of the world. The one ray of hope is that it "went to pieces in less than a decade" because it "was so inethical in its aims and so unsocial in its workings that it had neither stamina nor endurance to withstand the shock of the war"; and further, I hope, because when we "compare the ethics of capitalism with the ethics of Jesus—they contradict word for word, line for line." But did it go to pieces in the shock of the war, or, if it did, can we hope that the ethics of Jesus will find sufficient backing among the millions of Jesus' adherents in the Christian nations to assure the world and the Lord that it shall "never be revived in its old forms"? Only if many preachers in industrial centers and elsewhere shall have the courage to apply the parable of the talents to other Scriptures as suggested by Lloyd C. Douglas in your issue of May 12th. The fight is on, O Christian soldier! But how and where is the minister going to function if what Mr. Joseph E. McAfee wrote in your columns about "The Minister's Professional Mind" is true—where he shows that the clerical spirit has been accurately "assayed and found wanting," and where "the professionalism of the ministry is seen to be in the direct path to hopeless reaction in religion," and especially if what Mark H. Turk wrote in your May 19th issue on "The Layman's Professional Mind" is true! For "the subordinate place which the clergyman holds when compared with the men of other professions" (as Mr. Turk with merciless logic and fact sufficiently clearly shows), if it bursts as a crashing revelation upon some ministerial minds, is surely crushingly humiliating to any self respecting minister of God! If in the congregationally governed churches, and some others, "the pastor of the church is understood by the laymen who compose it to be the servant of the church" (and I have in my pocket a letter of invitation from a church which shows that very thing): if "there is not one prerogative which the minister can claim or demand as an intrinsic right," if "the gamut of his ministry is derived from the church which creates him and controls his service," if "every student of the church knows that there has been a wide-spread and positive movement to subordinate the minister increasingly to the decisions and desires of the churches," and that "in the minds of many laymen and in the practice of many churches the minister is regarded as an employe to be 'hired and fired' at the pleasure or displeasure of a majority of the members 'present and voting,'" if when a "larger and well known city church of featured conservatism had occasion to call a minister, the lay leaders who dominated the life of that church deliberately selected a young man whom they could manage," if "another church specified that the new minister must be a conservative in theology and not interested in social questions"—I say, if these things are so, how and where is the minister going to function in the adjustment of the delicate and long time estrangement between labor and capital?

God, give us churches, glorious, holy, and without blemish, freed from "the fossilized customs, the piffling sectarian limitations, the cheap and unheroic ideals which the church holds as the norm of ministerial activity." Lord, give us churchmen with a worthy vision of the splendid challenge which Christ is right now throwing out to men, and, as if by magic, our young men and young women will respond to thy call for leadership!

Santa Maria, Calif.

W. STAIRS.

Is Christianity Too Difficult?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I confess I do not quite get the sense of your editorial of May 26 under the above title. To me its whole tenor seems to exhibit that confusion and inversion of thought which helps to make Christianity difficult. I have not yet had an opportunity of reading Dr. Roberts' book, "The Untried Door,"—I shall find one as soon as possible—but to me it seems that all such attempts to "inquire what Jesus actually taught, whether he had a coherent and self-consistent philosophy of life, and whether his teaching can be applied to our problems," are in the last degree foolish and gratuitous. They remind one of the man who understood Shakespeare very well indeed, but could make neither head nor tail of the explanatory notes. It is precisely what churchmen have been doing all through the Christian centuries—the result being the spinning of systems of theology.

In the first place, even if Jesus had a systematic philosophy of life, the fragmentary and disjointed record we have of his life and teachings render it next to impossible to reconstruct it. And in the second place, even though reconstruction were possible, it would have nothing but a historical interest or value, for philosophies of life are, in the nature of them, local things—the adaptation of principles to existing conditions,—and his philosophy of life, in Palestine and in the first century, could not possibly have any concrete application to conditions in the United States in the twentieth century. As a matter of fact, we find, here and there, among the sayings of Jesus, fragmentary bits of life-philosophy, and they bear out this view. Any plain-thinking man, who is not a theologian and does not read strained meanings into Christ's words, recognizes that, so far as they are concrete at all, they are intended to apply sheerly to local conditions.

If, on the other hand, by "philosophy of life" we mean principles of life, (really quite a different thing), then, as it appears to me, the difficulty is not to comprehend "what Jesus actually taught," but to understand (1) why it is necessary to undertake a course of research to find it out, and (2) why their application to our problems should be questioned. Did Jesus, then, speak so ambiguously or uncertainly when he enunciated moral and spiritual principles? Or is it that he spoke so disagreeably plainly that theologians must be retained, like corporation lawyers, to interpret him ex parte? Will any honest man really pretend that he does not comprehend the few, simple, uncompromising principles of living that Jesus laid down? And will anyone really pretend that, in reading Christ's words, he does not know when Christ was laying down fundamental principles and when he was making mere logical application?

As to the application of these principles to modern life, what is the idea of questioning that, either? He enunciated nothing particularly new. They are, in essence, the same principles that every teacher of life has taught. They are the recognized and proven laws of the moral universe. The question is not whether they can be applied to our problems; but whether our problems are being worked out according to them. If their application to modern life means the destruction of civilization, than our civilization will probably have to be destroyed. More than one civilization has been destroyed because it clashed with the principles laid down by Jesus—not because Jesus laid them down, but because they are the eternal principles of living.

The truth of the matter is, we look to Jesus and his teaching for that which they never were intended to do; just as we have got in the habit of looking to some mysterious function of government to solve our economic problems. No appeal to Jesus, no frantic search of his teachings, will ever show us the way to solve our problems. That is not his business; it is distinctively ours. The mathematician and physicist—that is to say, the teacher of mathematics and physics—does not teach us how to build our cities and bridges; that is the business of those who want the cities and bridges; but woe be to them if they be not built according to the eternal laws enunciated for us by the teacher. The adaptation of those laws to the work in hand is altogether the business of the workers; and it differs in every age, in every clime, and with every set of materials and conditions. Jesus is the teacher of a set of moral principles as immutable and inexorable as the laws of physics—perhaps more so. By those laws we must build our civilizations, or they fall.

Certainly it is difficult; it always has been. Certainly it serves no purpose to call Jesus Lord, Lord, if we do not or cannot do the things he commanded. But, when you come to think of it, he never commanded any things—concrete, definite acts—that we should do, or not do. He laid down certain laws and principles to which the things we do must conform. "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." What things? How should he know or say? Work it out for yourselves. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom of heaven." But then,—never mind, all the 'buts' in the world won't alter the law that a man with great earthly possessions will find it hard to look at things from God's viewpoint. Difficult? Yes,—not to understand, but to put into practice. The difference between the working out of physical laws into concrete achievement, and the working out of Christ's laws, is not one of understanding; it is one of desire. Every individual man and woman sincerely wishes the outworking of physical laws; men do not wish the outworking of Christ's laws. And we appeal to Christ for some way of forcing their observation en masse. Just as well could we hope to erect a usable building, if every department of the work, from the architect's office to the stone-layers' union, were honeycombed with men who persisted in violating the laws of physics. So do we seek, through some wonderful operation of "government," to shield ourselves from some folly that we are all, as individuals, committing.

Personally (although I know I am a voice in the wilderness) I am disposed to think that the church has abdicated her highest and most influential position toward the industrial and sociological problems of the day. Her voice has lost its old ring of decision and authority. I have tried to show how, in the face of all world problems, in all times, the Christ stands, with inscrutable smile and inexorable finger on the Law. As Christ's vicar, the church ought to take the same attitude, proclaiming, over and over again, with inexorable iteration, the simple laws of life. As a church, indeed, this is her prime business. I do not say she ought not to help the thinkers and workers with their problems. This she ought to do and not leave the other undone. But above all else it is her business to avoid all the entanglements and compromises into which the problems always lead, and to bring them back, again and again, to the touchstone of the few, simple principles of Jesus. It is this simplifying, two-edged-sword-dividing function of the church which, more than anything else, is needed to illumine and save the situation.

Litchfield, Ill.

T. G. ATKINSON.

The Pastor in the Community Church

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It is not so long ago, when the pastor in a small city or town was looked upon as the community oracle, as the best educated man among his fellows. His views of public and social questions were accepted as authoritative, he held a dignified monopoly on questions religious, social and political. But a change has come into the old order of things. The railroad, rural mail delivery, the telephone, the consolidated school and the Ford flivver have carried a new spirit even into the remotest hamlet. The magazine and the metropolitan newspaper has thrust its informing pages into every rural home, it brings to every fireside the current history of the world. The Sunday newspaper, laden with pictorial and literary attractions is delivered in every rural home of the parish. Then there is the professional periodical and the endless issue of modern books, whose authors write scholarly upon every conceivable subject. The people in the rural country today are well informed with the progress of the time and their interest in the world's affairs is just as lively as that of the city dweller. In the rural country we find graduates from reputed colleges and universities, the scientifically trained agriculturist and university farmer are here in reality and they are here to stay.

Under these changed conditions the rural pastor finds it a man's job to keep himself intellectually abreast with the best men and women in the parish. He is looked upon as the leader of a keen, intelligent people and his profession demands that he should have a fine intellectual equipment and a trained mental discernment. If he should happen to have an intellectual culture inferior to the best in his parish, it would not be surprising to see him lose the respect and confidence of his parishioners and the community at large.

The rural pastor of today finds himself in the position of a pioneer in the advance of the new order of things. He needs to be a statesman, a prophet, a priest and a servant, a king, a skipilot, a schoolmaster, a social worker and a saint. If he lacks any of these qualifications, he will never do for a rural church. He must emancipate himself from the atmosphere of intellectual narrowness and intolerance, he must stand for the highest truth as related to human life and destiny and be a sane partaker of present day thought as related to the problems of the day, even at the expense of sacrificing his old style orthodoxy and traditional denominational views. The rural country has or is now experiencing its illumination and consequently the rural pastor must be a growing pastor. Many of his old sermons of 25 years ago would bring real illumination, if deposited into the fireplace. His sermons must keep step with the advance of the time and present continually to his people a living, modern interpretation of the living, modern Christ.

There are, however, several handicaps under which the rural pastor must, of necessity, always suffer, it is his cross that he must learn to bear with patience. He lacks for himself and his personal inspiration the privilege of social contact, music and the drama, the high class motion picture, the Lyceum platform and the ministerial fellowship. The city pastor has his Monday morning preachers' meeting, where great theological or philosophical lights may bring illumination, but the rural pastor is like the "Lone Scout," finding his inspiration in the magazine and preachers' journal. If he is aggressive as well as progressive, he must be prepared to endure the unfriendly criticism and long-distance nagging of the pastor of the other meeting house across the street. If one dreams of complacency and the quiet life and a normal functioning of the ministerial anatomy, where a man may spend his life in ease and preach a discourse upon some ancient subject once a week, he has a mistaken view of the importance of the rural church. He must outgrow his early thinking and if he cannot discover any advance in the range of his memory, he may then look upon his mental process with some suspicion. There is no reason why he should not continue his service with increased efficiency far beyond Dr. Osler's line of utility and he will continue to fill his place with credit to his position and himself, if he continues to broaden himself mentally and spiritually.

FREDERICK W. MAGDANZ.

Fremont, Mich.

British Table Talk

Christianity's
"Lost Radiance"

June, 1921.

THE utterances of Dr. L. P. Jacks, editor of the Hibbert Journal, and principal of Manchester College, are always, like those of the Dean of St. Paul's, original and arresting. Delivering the Essex Hall Lecture, Dr. Jacks discussed "The Lost Radiance of the Christian Religion" and how to recover it. Christianity in his view is a religion of young people which has lost a good deal of its savour by being adapted to the needs of the minds of the old. The chief difference between the original genius of Christianity as we find it in the New Testament and its modern form is, he says, that it has lost the note of encouragement and acquired the note of repression which has no place in the good news of Jesus Christ. Most serious of the corruptions of Christianity is in a loss of brightness and of radiant energy, in a tendency to revert, in spirit, if not in terminology, to much older conceptions of man, God, and the world than those which are congenial to the mind of Christ. It was in the form of a Person that the radiance of the Christian religion made its first appearance and impression on mankind, and its power to move us lies in the vision that He brought of a hidden beauty in the world. The radiance of the Christian religion is not an adventitious quality, not a mere alleviation or adornment of an otherwise stern and uncompromising code of duty, but an essential and all-pervading energy in which duty becomes transfigured into love. There is that in the gospel which is akin to the song of the skylark and to babbling brooks. Almost the first thing to greet us when we open the New Testament is an angel's song. We are too apt to place the New Testament in a church-and-chapel atmosphere. There are moments or phases when the whole meaning of our religion seems to turn on the tragedy of human life, when Christ becomes a Man of Sorrows before everything else and the cross overshadows everything; but if at times the melody dies out in a sad cadence or even a cry of despair it is never final, but only the prelude to a greater song. Dr. Jacks urged that the Christian principle still awaits its application at the central point, that the opportunity for applying it exists now, and that nothing can allay the discords into which society has plunged short of those radiant conceptions of God, man, and the world which are the life and essence of the Christian religion. Treat man after the mind of Christ as a being whose first need is for light and whose second need only is for government, and we shall find that as his need for light is progressively satisfied his need for government progressively diminishes. Dr. Jacks put the growing recognition of this fact as chief among many hopeful signs. "If the Christian church, led by the Spirit of God, should ally itself with this recognition the lost radiance of the Christian religion will return to it, and it will become the foremost teacher of mankind. If not, the spiritual revival will take place all the same, but in the schools and not in the churches. In the next generation there will grow up, there is indeed now growing up in this country and in many others, a vast army of unordained ministers of religion who will find their mission at the teacher's desk." Dr. Jacks' lecture will shortly be published in book form.

* * *

Foreign Missions
Finance

The Central Board of Missions states that £1,530,862 is the total income of the chief Anglican and interdenominational missionary societies in 1920. The Church Missionary Society heads the list with an income of 691,572 pounds, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel coming next with 342,540 pounds. The British and Foreign Bible Society raised 125,000 pounds in 1919. Its 1920 figures are not yet available. Other societies had incomes as follow in 1920: Universities' Mission to Central Africa, 63,125 pounds; Church of England Zenana Missionary Society, 79,553 pounds; South American Missionary Society, 22,939 pounds; Jerusalem and the East Mission, 16,451 pounds; London Jews Society, 51,701 pounds; Religious Tract Society, 11,346 pounds. The total is much above that for the previous year. A number of important societies are not included in this list. Practically all of them have increased their income but are in financial difficulties because of expansion of work. The London Missionary Society, whose income has risen from 105,000 pounds to 158,000 pounds, had a deficit of 38,900 pounds, which has been wiped out by legacies. The Baptist Missionary Society spent 243,000 pounds on the foreign field, and would have had a deficit of over 100,000 pounds but for the Special United Fund, which amounts to 270,000 pounds. The C. M. S. has a deficit of 145,835 pounds. The Wesleyan Methodist Society, with an income of 271,796 pounds, has a deficit of 36,000 pounds, and the United Methodist Society a deficit of 12,000 pounds. The Friends Foreign Missionary Society is also in serious straits. The crisis in the foreign missions of the United Free Church of Scotland has been triumphantly passed. "A church which has so strong a pulse of generosity," says the report, "is indeed a living force for good in the world." The total income of that church shows a very large increase; it amounts to 1,455,214 pounds. The British and Foreign Bible Society spent half a million pounds last year and circulated 8,655,781 Bibles or portions—139,851 more than the previous year.

* * *

The Ministry of Healing

In recent years a movement has been growing in the churches, Anglican and Non-conformist, for the recognition and practices of the healing of bodies as well as souls as part of the Christian ministry. The astonishing claims and testimonies made in the name of Christian Science are partly responsible for this. The subject is beset with difficulties and dangers, and the bishop of Southwark spoke some wise and cautious words at the fourth annual meeting of the Guild of St. Raphael. It was not sufficiently recognized, he said, that the church had a commission to heal, and this implied the duty of regulating the gifts of healing. He uttered three warnings. Any revival of the use of unction must be kept very distinct from extreme unction; emphasis must be laid on prayer and preparation to avoid the idea that unction was a magical or superstitious act; it must be made quite clear that unction or laying on of hands is not to be regarded as a substitute for help through medical science. Canon Roseveare, warden of the guild, reviewing the progress of the guild during the five years of its existence, noted the widespread interest taken in it, practically every diocese in the British Isles and very soon overseas being represented among its members or associates. An Office Book, containing an Instruction on Healing in the Church and Offices for Anointing and for Laying-on of Hands, will be issued in July. The bishop of Birmingham advocates the giving of addresses on health subjects in churches outside the usual service hour. A Service of Healing, with prayers for individuals who are sick, is held every week at St. Martin-in-the-Fields.

* * *

Chesterton on the American Creed

Mr. G. K. Chesterton made his first public appearance after his return from America at a meeting at Brighton on behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. In his whimsical way he made the American Declaration of Independence the text of a defense of creeds. What was the Declaration? he asked; how many people in England knew? He maintained that it was a creed. People tell us, he said, that creeds limit the mind, cramp the intelligence, and so on. He contended that creeds are the only condition of permanence in anything intellectual. A man who had not got a creed was a man who could not think, could not fight, could hardly even joke. The enemies of the American creed had spat upon it and trampled it under foot, but it existed as an ideal, quite independent of subsequent corruptions—just as the Christian ideal existed. We had the fundamental Christian conscience in us because it had descended to us from a united Christendom in the past, and Americans had the fundamental democratic conscience in them. God forbid he should deny that Americans required being converted to Christianity!—but they did not require it more than English people did. All the same, Mr. Chesterton's Protestant admirers find it less difficult to understand how a man of his physical bulk became chief constable of Beaconsfield (where he lives) than how a man of his type of mind can subscribe to the creeds of the Roman church.

ALBERT DAWSON.

BOOKS

THE CRISIS IN CHURCH AND COLLEGE. By G. W. McPherson. Finding that "the modern university has become a decidedly anti-Bible, anti-Christian institution" the author sets forth on the valiant mission of telling the world about it. There ought to be an end of it all because he believes "the facts presented in the following pages will convince the honest seeker after truth." He presents the "facts from the critics' own works." We have it from the author himself that "this volume is the first of its kind, and it will, doubtless, present to the Christian world a valuable revelation." Let us admit that he does make as good a case against scholarship as could be made in one volume. (236 pages).

THE BIBLE AS A COMMUNITY BOOK. By Arthur E. Holt. Mr. Holt is the social service secretary of the Congregational church. He has had successful experience in both the rural and city pastorates. This small volume is an interpretation of those elements in the Bible that underlie community building. They furnish an admirable contrast to those, so often printed in the past, that underlie the building of sectarianism out of community life. It will be found an excellent class text or basis for discussion groups in this time when community churches are so much in the mind of forward looking religious leaders. (Woman's Press. 99 pages).

LABOR AND THE EMPLOYER. By Samuel Gompers. LABOR AND THE COMMON WELFARE. By Samuel Gompers. These two volumes are carefully culled from the writings and addresses of the veteran American labor leader by Hayes Robbins. They are a re-script of the wisdom, the philosophy and the statesmanship of one of the world's most conspicuous leaders of labor. Mr. Gompers' successful retention of the presidency of the American Federation of Labor is of itself a sign of great capacity, but the things won for labor under his chairmanship are a much greater testimonial of it. He is now grown old and his viewpoint may seem to many a little belated, but his vigor and clear-headedness are not. His rather close adherence to "better wage, fewer hours" is fundamental if not ideal. In these volumes the best he has said on such questions as the following is given: Labor and Law—Labor's Stand on Public Issues—Labor in the War—Industrial Warfare—Union and Open Shop—Child Labor—Woman in Industry—Shorter Day—Industrial Agreement, etc. These volumes are a necessity to one who would know the fundamentals of the labor movement in this country, for however much the theories and more idealistic dreams of others may entice, the solid gains of the wage earner have been won by the American Federation of Labor under the leadership of Mr. Gompers. (Dutton).

THE A. B. C. OF EXHIBIT PLANNING. By Evart G. and Mary Swain Routzahn. In this age of picturization, a scientific study of the art of planning and exhibiting facts and conditions in regard to social, religious or other moral situations is of great value. Many a good case is spoiled by a poor setting forth, and a great many more by failure to comprehend the value of such methods of education and information. In this age of propaganda it is worth while to consider using methods that awaken and suggest truth in the mind of the public instead of so much hot-house forcing of ideas by the propaganda method. (Russell Sage Foundation. 235 pages).

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Good Beginnings*

WITH what eagerness, in all our study of biography, do we study influences that played upon the birth and early life of famous men and women! The projective force and the curve of the life may be estimated when we master these facts. There are children who are "fore-damned," to use an expression of Graham Taylor's. Born of immoral parents, reared in a fetid tenement, environed by polluting influences, lacking sunshine, sweet air and clean food, playing in alleys and congested streets, the only possible adventure stealing and smashing things—this is fore-damnation.

We have in this city of Pittsburgh a most unusual judge, Tensard DeWolf. He presides over the Moral Court. Twenty-five hundred boys and girls come before him every year. He knows just where they will come from, Soho, the "Hill," Lower Allegheny, "Woods Run" and other over-crowded districts. One girl was brought in from our fashionable East End. She was a giddy young creature, who at 2 a. m. was trying to get into her own home with her night key. The police thought she was a burglar and arrested her. They should have arrested her parents! The Judge says that he can understand why a boy would steal a pie, but why should he steal false teeth? Gangs of these potential thugs invade the five and ten cent stores and steal combs, powder-puffs, hinges, socks, candy, pencils, cards, ribbons, dishes, perfumes, hammers, pins, games, paper-napkins, mouth-organs, boudoir caps, jewelry and whisk-brooms. Meeting in the alleys, he is the hero who has "swiped" the most. To fool the policeman is the greatest joke. Eluding capture at the Five and Ten, they are bold to try the department stores; winning there they hold up some man and take his pocket book; again escaping, they next attempt to enter a house at night. The Judge says that in practically every case the home influence is to blame.

Turning now to successful people, we think of the charming western home of Jane Addams; of John Ruskin in his velvet suit, reading before the study fire; of Lloyd George being molded by "Uncle Lloyd," that combination of granite and fire; of Saul and that gentle home in Tarsus. Ramsey is the great authority upon Paul and if you desire to master this series of lessons it would be well for you to buy his books. He seems to think that Paul was brought up in a very well-to-do home, with a gentle but religious Jewish mother and a father who was a free-born Roman citizen, probably not a Jew. Well-educated, surrounded by every liberalizing advantage, a witness of the Grecian games, possessing some knowledge of Grecian philosophy, coming in contact with many people of many races, watched at home and most carefully trained in her faith by the mother, we can picture the delightful early life of the Great Apostle, whom God was grooming to be a cosmopolitan, the one to carry the gospel to Athens, Corinth, Ephesus and Rome.

When the time came to send Saul away to school he was sent to Jerusalem and placed under the tutelage of the noble Gamaliel, a man of such power, light and leading that when he died the Mishna says, "With the death of Gamaliel the reverence for the law ceased, and purity and abstinence died away." He was a Pharisee and Saul became like his illustrious teacher in this respect. He was a liberal, being the founder of the more liberal school of the Pharisees. According to Acts 5:34 ff. he intervened in the Sanhedrin in favor of Peter and other apostles. There is no ground, however, for the tradition that Gamaliel was a secret disciple of Jesus. He lived and died a strict Jew. He advocated justice and generosity. Paul became his favorite pupil, keen, fiery, scholarly, a brilliant orator and a marked personality.

JOHN R. EWERS.

July 3, "Saul's Early Life." Acts 21:39; 22:3, 28; 2 Tim. 3:14, 15; Deut. 6:4-9.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Summer School Work in the South

When Pres. William Rainey Harper announced regular university courses for the summer quarter a generation ago, he was regarded as a dangerous innovator. It was thought that work of university grade could not be done in the summer. The idea of summer study is now so thoroughly popularized that even in the southland it has caught on. Texas Christian University at Ft. Worth announces a summer school of ten weeks this summer, and the school of theology will have for its principal lecturer Dr. S. Parkes Cadman. This school has come up quickly from small beginnings and is now a member of the Association of American Colleges. There are seven hundred students of college rank and the graduating class this year numbers 31. One of the achievements of the year has been the erection of a gymnasium at an expense of $175,000.

University President Resigns

Syracuse University is the third largest Methodist institution in the United States, and it has been brought up to its present high efficiency under the leadership of Chancellor James R. Day. Dr. Day was a Methodist preacher of New England parentage and training when he was called to the responsible position of head of Syracuse University. His institution now numbers five thousand students. Many dramatic incidents are connected with his life. At the General Conference in 1904 a newspaper made a veiled attack upon him. He answered from the floor, and the conference voted to withhold press privileges from the offending newspaper. He was elected bishop at this conference, but two days later resigned, preferring to end his life in educational work. Dr. Day takes the conservative side of social problems and his book, "My Neighbor the Workingman," sets forth his objections to the present management of labor unions. He is now in the seventies and proposes to spend the remainder of his life in travel and literary labors. Several thousand ministers and missionaries of the Methodist church have been trained under the leadership of Dr. Day, and these hold him in grateful remembrance.

Council of Church Boards Studies Ministerial Supply

The Council of Church Boards of Education has been somewhat stirred up by the press reports on the religious situation at Amherst. In the senior class of that college there is this year only one candidate for the ministry although the school has a strong Christian tradition. A list of twenty colleges and universities of various denominations has been compiled and this is being used for the purpose of studying the supply of candidates for the Christian professions. In these twenty schools there are 1746 graduates this year. Of these, 303 have adopted the Christian work as a life calling, 144 of them choosing the ministry. The twenty institutions chosen probably represent the most evangelical of the Christian colleges, and the story for the whole range of the colleges would hardly be quite so favorable as the above statistics would indicate.

Church Has Twenty-one Employees

Linwood Boulevard Disciples Church of Kansas City is an example of the development that is taking place in large city churches. This congregation now has twenty-one people on its payroll. These are as follows: Ministers (2), Sunday School Superintendent and Church Visitor, Organist, Choir (4), Business Manager, Matron, Stenographer, Superintendent Primary Department, Janitors (2), Evening Organist, Music Director, Orchestra (4) and Movie Operator. The individual pledgers to the budget of this church last year numbered 1,578 and the disbursements for local work totaled $47,364.03.

Want Sixty New Parsonages in Illinois

They are called rectories in the Episcopal church and manses in the Presbyterian church, but among the Disciples and Methodists they are parsonages. Illinois Disciples have formulated a five-year program which includes the building of sixty new parsonages within the period. It is believed that this will greatly stabilize the ministry which is now on the move among the Disciples as never before. Twice as many new church buildings will be erected in this period. Less commendable is the slogan of sixty new churches in five years unless these are very carefully located in the light of real religious needs. Another item in the program is to have a regular minister for ninety per cent of the churches and to put the other ten per cent under the care of a neighboring minister.

Where the Salaries Are Best

It has been widely announced that the Unitarian church paid the highest average salary of any church in America. This statement is challenged by the leaders of the United Presbyterian church. They report that the average salary in their denomination last year was $1,970. This denomination is interested in the welfare of its ministers in a number of other ways. It now has a maximum grant of $500 per year for its old ministers. Though it is small in numbers it leads the Christian world in many ways, showing great zeal in missions and education.

The Community Church Defined

The new quarterly named The Community Churchman, recently launched at Canton, Mo., gives in its first issue a definition of the community church which

Tulsa Ministers Speak Out

THE ministers of Tulsa, Okla., met following the disastrous mob action and set down their conclusions as to the causes of the race riot and the remedy. The pastors put the riot in Tulsa in the same class with the Belgian outrages of Germany. While admitting that the attitude of certain criminal black men was provocative, they have not hesitated to put the major blame for the catastrophe upon the heads of the white population of the city.

Whether the ministers have rightly stated the causes of the outbreak may be judged by our readers. It is asserted that the public schools are first of all to blame, having thrown the Bible and religious instruction out of the curriculum and installed the dance in its place. The wide-open Sunday, particularly the commercialized amusement on that day, has broken down the conscience of the community on matters of major importance. The fight and lust portrayed by the movie film is also held responsible for part of the moral breakdown of the community. The officials of the town are brought to book for seeing a car parked too far from the curbstone, but never seeing the blind pigs. Far more significant than the above consideration is the fact that the officials of Tulsa have already winked at two lynchings. Hours before the last outbreak they knew it was coming. The release of criminals on bond is held by the ministers to be a cause of crime. The citizens who boast of breaking the Volstead act are also placed on the pillory with others who break down respect for law and order.

The ministers adopted a program of action for the emergency. They want a complete investigation and a full punishment of whites and blacks who were implicated in the riots. They demand that the carrying of guns shall be made a felony. Christians are urged to be more strict in the practice of their religion both in word and deed, that right influences may be released in the community. In this connection, Christians who are not connected with a church are urged to become useful in the community life by co-operating with the churches. The business men of the city of the two races are urged to get acquainted, and the ministers, in order to set a good example, have invited the colored ministers of the city to join the Ministerial Alliance.

While the report of the ministers does not exhaust the sociological possibilities of the situation, it shows that the churches are deeply in earnest in using their influence in behalf of peace and justice. The suggestion of friendly contacts between the leaders of the two races, is one which especially merits attention in every community where the race question has become a perilously real one in recent years.

will help toward a standardized conception of that interesting institution. This term is used of "any religious organization in which at least the major portion of the Christian people of a community have united to serve the whole community." The journal states that there are four hundred community churches in the United States. These are divided into three different groups: The federated church keeps the denominational distinctions, but unites different groups in work and worship. The union church dissolves the denominational distinction. In addition there are many denominational churches which in the absence of other churches make the whole community welcome in the membership but continue to maintain affiliations with some particular denominational organization.

A Pastoral Successor to Dr. F. E. Clark

Williston Congregational church of Portland, Me., has become a church with a world wide reputation through being the birthplace of Christian Endeavor. It was in this church over thirty years ago that Dr. F. E. Clark gathered a group of young converts together to form the first society in a fellowship that has belted the earth. Dr. Morris H. Turk, recently of Kansas City, Mo., has been installed in this church. Dr. Turk was of Methodist antecedents, having been educated at De Pauw University and at Boston University, but for a number of years he has been prominent in the Congregational denomination.

Bishop Manning in Favor of Free Speech

It seems likely that Bishop Manning of the Episcopal diocese of New York will have a more liberal policy than his predecessor with regard to the social and theological opinions of his clergy. He holds that the church has no special wisdom with regard to specific programs of reform but believes that the pulpit should be unhampered in its views, save as limited by fundamental religious considerations. He said: "It would, I think, be unfortunate if all of us in the church thought alike on these subjects. I hold it to be most wholesome and important that all social views which are reconcilable with the ten commandments should have their representation within the church and among the clergy. In the church there should be, and there is, freedom of opinion upon these questions to the full limit of consistency with the principles of Christ."

Secular Papers Develop Religious Features

While many denominational newspapers in the United States have the past year continued to lose subscribers, the secular papers have continued to add religious features to their service. The Brooklyn Eagle has long had a Monday sermon supplement, while the Boston Transcript prints in its Saturday edition a great deal of news of the New England churches. Papers in smaller towns are connecting up with the religious institutions. Rev. Byron Hester now contributes a weekly sermon to the Electra News, in Electra, Tex., and Rev. Hugh McLellan writes editorials for the leading daily paper of San Antonio. In many other cities the ministers are finding the secular newspaper a medium by which the unchurched of the community may be reached.

Stereopticon Is Still New in India

The Y. M. C. A. finds that the old fashioned "magic lantern" is not despised in India but will draw together large congregations of people. Last year a total of 67,760 people were reached by this means. Religion, sociology, natural science, useful arts, fine arts, literature, biography, geography and travel slides represent some of the interests treated in the lectures. Many commercial firms in the United States and England have generously donated to the Y. M. C. A. industrial slides showing the particular operations in which these firms are engaged.

Disciples Make Progress on Underwritings

No group of church leaders ever went out on a more difficult mission than that which was undertaken by the committee for raising the Disciples' share of the underwritings of the Interchurch World Movement. The most recent reports issued by the committee indicate that considerable progress has been made. Previous to April 1 the money raised totaled $73,713.93. Since April 1 the cash and pledges have reached the total of $282,524.53. This amount is not sufficient to validate the pledges which have been conditioned on the whole amount being raised, so the campaign has been continued through June. Many churches have raised money without signing the official card, and it is thought that when these send either their pledges or their money the whole amount will be raised. June 26 has been set as "clean-up day," and by July 1 the committee hopes to be able to report that the whole amount of $600,000 has been pledged.

Disciples Board Branches Out

The Board of Temperance and Social Welfare of the Disciples of Christ has taken several advance steps lately. With the appointment of Prof. A. W. Taylor as secretary, the social cause now has an alert and scholarly exponent. The board now has a number of foreign correspondents who serve the cause of world temperance by translating into other languages and circulating in other countries the facts about the workings of prohibition in this country. The countries immediately affected by this propaganda are England, Mexico, the South American Republics, the Philippine Islands and China. July 3 is the day for the interpretation of the work of this board in the churches and it will probably be more generally observed this year than ever before.

New Appointments at Transylvania University

Transylvania University, a Disciples school at Lexington, Ky., is having many changes in its teaching staff this year. The resignation of the president, Dr. R. H. Crossfield, who accepted a secretarial position with the Federal Council of Churches, has been followed by the loss

General Pershing Defends the "Y"

GENERAL PERSHING spoke at the annual dinner of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. in New York recently, and went into the war record of the organization in considerable detail, giving the "Y" a clean bill of health. This should entirely silence those propagandists who have delighted to tear down the association to further selfish interests. General Pershing in speaking of the unique demand upon the Y. M. C. A. to conduct the canteens said: "This placed the Young Men's Christian Association on a business basis, involving direct responsibility to the A. E. F. for an immense undertaking. They had to buy and sell without profit just as the army would have done. At first Mr. Carter's request for a certain allowance of tonnage was granted, but as time went on and our limited shipping became less and less able to carry out actual needs in war material, his quota of monthly tonnage was very much reduced even in the face of increasing demands. So through lack of transportation facilities, he was unable to provide the canteens with all they required. Furthermore, the personnel of the Young Men's Christian Association had to be expanded in almost the same proportion as the army, had to be organized to conduct this large business, which was only one of its numerous activities, with such untrained personnel as could be hastily mustered here at home.

"All these things were a tremendous handicap, and when its work came to be compared with that of other welfare organizations operating with far less responsibility and covering only special areas, there arose some unjust criticism of which other organizations too often took advantage. But as a matter of fact this feature of the work of the Young Men's Christian Association deserves great praise, and I should like to express here in this presence my deep appreciation of the results obtained.

"In the field of education, athletics and recreation after the armistice the Young Men's Christian Association took the lead, without any sort of question, and as a matter of fact about nine-tenths of the welfare work that was carried on in the A. E. F. was carried on under the direction and guidance of the Young Men's Christian Association. Due largely to its efforts, our men were given opportunities for improvement, travel and entertainment that aided us materially in upholding the high standards of conduct always maintained in our forces abroad."

of Dr. George Wm. Brown, who goes to a professorship in the College of Missions at Indianapolis. Dr. Brown's position will be filled by Rev. Rodney L. McQuary. Mr. McQuary had a teaching experience in Eureka College after he took his B.D. at Yale. During the war he was an army chaplain, and for the past two years has been pastor of First Christian Church, South Bend, Ind. Another appointment is that of Prof. J. A. Gunton, Ph.D., as head of the chemistry department.

Church Plant Now Extends Across the Block

Independence Boulevard Christian church, Kansas City, owns one of the most complete and modern church plants in America. A recent addition to the property is a parsonage. This, with the other church buildings, makes a line of buildings a block long in the service of the church. Under the ministry of Rev. R. H. Miller there have been constant accessions to the membership of this church and a large growth in the financial income.

United Presbyterians Define Their Social Attitude

The United Presbyterian church in its General Assembly, May 25, at Philadelphia adopted a statement of social principles which will guide them this coming year. These are as follows: "In response to the request of the permanent committee on temperance, asking that the work now assigned to it be designated by this assembly as a part of the work of the Board of Home Missions, and that necessary arrangements be made for the prosecution of the work under this board, we recommend that the request be granted, this work to become a part of its social service program.

We recommend cooperation with all organizations and influences that will lead to disarmament, seeking ever to hasten the day when the nations shall learn war no more.

We recommend continued loyal support for the Anti-Saloon League and other organizations that war against strong drink.

That we seek in every way to encourage the proper enforcement of our state and national prohibition laws.

That we endorse the State and National Lord's Day Alliances.

That we approve the splendid work done by the National Reform Association through their speakers and their publication, "The Christian Statesman."

That we urge pastors to preach on this subject and in every way to try to counteract the effort to make the Sabbath a day for commercialized pleasure.

We recommend the informing of our people from the pulpit and in other ways of the real danger of Mormonism.

That we cooperate with all reform agencies in the effort to make polygamy anywhere beneath the flag of these United States a legal crime."

Episcopal Healer Now at Work Among the Chinese

Mr. James Moore Hickson, the faith healer of the church of England, whose mission in this country was a remarkable success a year ago, is now on a healing mission in China. He recently held a healing service at St. John's cathedral in Hongkong. A thousand people were present, more than half of whom were ill. Mr. Hickson spoke in English, and was interpreted by a Chinese Christian physician. Mr. Hickson's work is characterized by sanity, and is lacking in the commercialism so often dominant in such operations. He does not claim to cure every case, but as a result of his labors great numbers of people have been benefited in their bodies and nearly everybody in their souls.

Churches Coming to Self-Support

The goal of missionary endeavor is a self-supporting native church with a native ministry and the institutions necessary to the proper development of the religious life of the nation. Most mission countries have not progressed so far, but already some churches are reporting themselves economically independent. Recently the First Baptist Church of Tampico, Cuba, notified the mission board of the Baptist denomination that they would not need any more mission

The "Y" at Fork of the Road

AT the recent dinner of the international committee of the Y. M. C. A., held in honor of General Pershing, Dr. John R. Mott made a noteworthy speech in which he expressed his sense of the emergency of the present hour for the association. The title of his address was "At the Forks of the Road." He reviewed the achievements of the association and at the close the alternatives with regard to future action. Dr. Mott said:

"The Young Men's Christian Association in this country alone is working at over two thousand centers and has a membership of nearly one million men and boys, not to speak of the successive millions who in other days have been impressed by its program and caught its spirit and translated into business, professional and civic life the principles and spirit of Jesus Christ. It has thus become a great power in permeating the life of the nation with its vitalizing principles and with its spirit of service. The Young Men's Christian Association has also consolidated the scattered lay forces of our all too divided Protestant Christendom and enabled them to present a united front to a united inertia, to a united indifference, to a united sinfulness and to a united unbelief; and as a result has pushed forward constantly and triumphantly the limits of Christ's kingdom on earth.

"Think also of the great unifying power of the Young Men's Christian Association. It is dealing with the three greatest problems of our day. One of those is the social problem, especially in the industrial area, the other is the racial, and the third, the international. The social problem in the industrial area—by breaking down the barriers between man and man and fusing together all right thinking and forward-looking men, no matter to what group we call the zone of agreement but likewise under the power of Christ and in following his principles ever widening that zone of agreement, this organization is fitted to render unique service. The racial problem—I was in the south last week and saw, under the splendid leadership of such white men as John Eagan of Atlanta and Dr. Dillard, and of such colored men as Major Moton and Bishop Jones, the most remarkable service being rendered by the association in promoting right relations between the races. It impressed me as one of the greatest contributions being made on any continent for the solution of what is a world wide problem—the racial problem. The international problem—the American ambassador in Paris once said to me that in his judgment this movement was doing more to unite the nations than are arbitration treaties, peace conferences, and military alliances. Later when I had the honor of being received by his majesty, the King of England, and quoted this remark, the King quickly said, 'The ambassador is right because this movement is uniting the hearts of the coming leaders of nations.' Most aptly did he express what we see in progress in the international contacts among the rising generation. It will be more true of the boys who are coming on, because the present is the most remarkable generation of boys that ever lived. By the way, General Pershing, a few days ago on my way east from California, I was much pleased to hear a fellow passenger say that your boy is one of the most active and beloved of the boys in the Young Men's Christian Association in Lincoln, Nebraska.

"The Young Men's Christian Association is today at the fork in the road. We have come as an organization to one of those points of decision at which every now and then each individual stands, when it becomes necessary not only to give play to our feelings and to exercise our brains but also to use our wills. You ask, What is this fork in the road for the Young Men's Christian Association? It is a choice between contraction and expansion. Are we going to minister to millions of men and boys or only to hundreds of thousands? Are we going to enter those thousands of doors recently opened across the world or are we going to let them close before our eyes? It is a choice not only between contraction and expansion, but also, to use the military phrase, between guiding on the past and guiding on the future. Surely the men or women who are in this room tonight do not wish us to guide on the pre-war past. Surely you do not wish to guide upon the confused days when the world was in convulsion. We must regulate our plans not so much by the inadequate plans and standards of the past and by our visible resources as by the beckoning hand of Christ; his beckoning hand is a pierced hand, and that hand never pointed an organization save to great need and to boundless opportunity."

money. They will pay their minister $130 per month out of their own funds. The church passed a resolution of thanks to the missionary society for its long continued support and guidance.

National Social Workers at Milwaukee

The national conference of the Episcopal social workers is being held at Milwaukee, June 19-23, in St. Paul's church. Bishop Gailor and Bishop Johnson are among the speakers. Prominent laymen will address the conference and among these is Mr. John M. Glenn, director of the Russell Sage Foundation. Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, director of the Social Service department of the Episcopal church, is in charge of the conference.

World Conference Halts for Lack of Funds

The World Conference on Faith and Order was originally financed by three Episcopal laymen. Since the preliminary meeting at Geneva last summer, it has been understood that the movement should make an appeal to the various great denominations that have shown interest. The response has been very discouraging, and as a result lack of money has made it impossible to hold either one of the two important meetings scheduled for this summer, and has seriously restricted the work of the secretary's office. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church has given a thousand dollars and the Disciples of Christ have contributed five hundred. Money has come from a number of foreign countries in small amounts and the ecumenical patriarchate at Constantinople has issued a call on the churches of that communion for gifts to further the cause of union.

Hiram House Marks Twenty-fifth Anniversary

Hiram House, a social settlement in Cleveland, recently celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. The house was first conceived in the discussions of a Y. M. C. A. Social Study class at Hiram College. The leader of the class insisted that there should be a settlement house in Cleveland. His proposal was regarded as visionary by many, but the project was finally put on a secure foundation. At one of the anniversary meetings, Dr. Graham Taylor of Chicago spoke. Mr. George A. Bellamy, the moving spirit of the house from the beginning, is still its head resident.

World's C. E. Convention Secures Distinguished Speakers

The World Convention of Christian Endeavor will be held in New York July 6-11. The committee is prophesying that the enrollment of delegates will reach six thousand. These will represent every state and province of the United States and Canada, and will come from half of the countries of the world. About 200 of the world's foremost speakers and conference leaders will be on the programs of a score of morning, afternoon and evening meetings, including William Jennings Bryan, Billy Sunday, Roger Babson, Will Hays, Frederick A. Wallis, Robert E. Speer, David James Burrell, Wm. Hiram Foulkes, S. D. Gordon, Sherwood Eddy, and John R. Mott. Homer A. Rodeheaver and Percy Foster will lead a convention choir of a thousand trained voices, in a series of special musical programs.

Dr. John R. Mott Has Not Resigned

Reports have been current for some time that Dr. John R. Mott had resigned from the leadership of the Y. M. C. A. This report is now authoritatively denied. Dr. Mott has greatly improved in his health and is ready for aggressive leadership once more. He has issued a call upon the association to go forth to even greater things than have yet been accomplished.

Prominent Churchmen Will Arbitrate Labor Trouble

Cleveland has for many weeks been at a standstill in its house building program on account of a deadlock between employers and laborers. The difficulty is now being arbitrated by a committee composed largely of the prominent churchmen of the city. Heading the list is Judge Frederick A. Henry, former president of the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ. Other committee members are Bishop Joseph Schremps, Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, Warren S. Hayden, Rabbi Abba H. Silver, Robert E. Lewis, general secretary of the Y. M. C. A., Col. Leonard P. Ayers and Mr. S. M. Bond. The employers were ready to go forward on their construction plans with non-union labor, but have agreed to wait the settlement of the difficulty by the arbitration process.

English Baptists Send a Representative to America

Rev. J. H. Rushbrooke is the English Baptist representative sent to America to attend the conventions of the northern and the southern Baptists. He was at one time a pastor in London, but is now engaged in the task of enlisting the aid of English and American Baptists in rehabilitating the Baptist work in war stricken countries. The organization under whose auspices he travels is called the Baptist World Alliance.

Protests the Apportionment Method

One of the oldest and most influential Congregational churches is Old South Church of Boston. Recently the association sent this church its apportionment for the various congregational causes. The church immediately took official action demanding by what authority they were apportioned. Dr. Gordon, the pastor, opposed the Interchurch World Movement, and is known as a vigorous opponent of the centralization process within the Congregational body. At the same time his church is very liberal in its contributions to the various missionary causes.

Preacher Becomes a Film Star

Dr. Russell H. Conwell, the well known Baptist minister of Philadelphia, has written a story called "Johnny Ring and the Captain's Sword." The story is now to be reproduced on the screen. The proceeds from the film will be devoted to the work of Baptist Temple among poor boys. The story is that of a boy in the civil war ridiculed by his captain for his habit of evening prayers. The boy rescues the captain's sword at the risk of his own life and this results in the conversion of the captain. Dr. Conwell and some of his deacons will supply the dramatis personae of the film. Rev. James K. Shield wrote the popular motion picture scenario, "The Stream of Life," but this is the first time a well known minister has himself become a movie star in a religious film.

Detroit Faces Metropolitan Problems

Detroit is conscious of having become in very recent years a metropolis of the first rank with more than a million of population. Dr. John E. Martin, superintendent of the Detroit Methodist Union, spoke recently before an Episcopal organization giving facts and figures about the religious life of the city. Of the city's million, only half belong to churches and only half of these are active in church. The population of Detroit is now three fourths immigrant or Negro. It is among the immigrants that the church has signally failed in the large cities, and Detroit is no exception to the rule. Each denomination in Detroit is forming a city mission organization and henceforth the problems of the city will be attacked with the scientific precision that marks operations in Chicago and New York.

Chicago Will Have More Vacation Bible Schools than Ever

A teacher training conference for the Vacation Bible School teachers of Chicago will be held in Northwestern University building in the loop district, June 23, 24, 25, and July 5, 11, 18 and 25. It is being freely prophesied that between 500 and 1,000 workers will attend these various sessions. The Presbyterians are so insistent upon the vacation Bible school work that three fourths of these churches will be in line this year. The Baptists report that half of their churches will have vacation Bible schools. The Disciple schools are to be found on the west side chiefly among the immigrant peoples. Mr. Karl Borders, who directs the Disciples immigrant work, is raising a fund with which to send to the country at the close of the daily vacation Bible schools large numbers of city children.

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

An undenominational training school for
The Ministry Religious Education
Foreign Missions Social Service
Curricula high grade and modern. Graduate degrees. University of California privileges. Opportunities for the study of Oriental peoples. Open to men and women of all Christian denominations. For catalogue address
WILLIAM FREDERIC BADE, Dean,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA

A BOOK TABLE for YOUR CHURCH

Read this testimony from Rev. Wm. L. Stidger, of Detroit, Mich.:

“WE have a book table at St. Mark’s. Every book on that table is worth-while. One of our circles of women has charge of these book tables. There is a table in each lobby. The idea is not to make money but to see that good books are available for all. The women sell the books in exactly that spirit; they feel that they are helping in a real ministry of books when they sell a book to a member of the church. They feel that their work is an extension of the preaching ministry of the church. We do not allow this sacred idea of the ministry of books to degenerate into a money-making scheme, even though it is that to a certain extent. The average person actually does not know how to get a book when he feels the impulse to possess it. He must either write to a publishing house or he must go downtown to a bookstore. And many of the book stores know little about books. The book table in a church makes it easy for folks to buy books, and the alert minister will be willing to take time out of his busy life to see that books are made easy of access to his people. People really want books. They are proud of having a well-chosen library, although few of them know how to select books for such a library. It is not an uncommon thing for the women who run the book table in my church to have a young man or an older man come to them and say, ‘I want every one of the books that Mr. Stidger has preached about. Get me one copy of each.’ The last request of this kind meant an order of twenty-five books. I see to it that several copies of the book on which I am going to preach are on our tables. They are invariably sold following the sermon.”

Dr. F. F. Shannon, successor to Dr. Gunsaulus at Central Church, Chicago, Dr. Lynn Harold Hough and Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones of Detroit, are all exponents of the book table for churches.

Why not have a Book Table in your church? Note list of 100 selected books on page 24 of this issue. Send us, on coupon below, list of from five to ten books which you think your people would be interested in. We will ship books at once, for your Book Table, and you may have from 30 to 60 days to pay for them. Note, however, that you need not confine your selection to this list. We shall be glad to secure for you any books now in print.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn St. CHICAGO, ILL.

BOOK ORDER COUPON

Gentlemen: I wish to start a book account with you. Please send at once the following books, and I will pay for them in 30 or 60 days:

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....	My name
.....	Address

(Give author, if possible; also publisher, if known.)

Have You Sent in that Offering for Education?

Remember that the present missionary year closes June 30.

All budget offerings for education should be forwarded on or before that date.

If a church is not using the budget system, then an offering for education should be taken for that cause.

The Annual Reports and Year Book will be made up with all books closing midnight, June thirtieth.

Owing to the continued high costs, the decreased incomes and unprecedented demands, the colleges are in hard straits.

Please send all monies, intended for any of the 28 Colleges belonging to the Board, at once, to

The Treasurer of the Board of Education of the Disciples of Christ
at 222 Downey Ave., Indianapolis, Ind.

100 Religious Books

A list prepared by Charles Clayton Morrison, Herbert L. Willett, Joseph Fort Newton, Alva W. Taylor and Thomas Curtis Clark

THE CHURCH AND PREACHING

- Psychology and Preaching. C. S. Gardner. $2.50.
The Building of the Church. C. E. Jefferson. $1.50.
The Christian Ministry and Social Problems. Bishop Charles D. Williams. $1.25.
Can the Church Survive in the Changing Social Order? Albert Parker Fitch. 80 cts.
A Community Church. H. E. Jackson. $2.00.
Ambassadors of God. S. Parkes Cadman. $2.50.
Modern Theology and the Preaching of the Gospel. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
Wanted: A Congregation. Lloyd C. Douglas. $1.75.
Six Thousand Country Churches. Gill and Pinchot. $2.00.
The Little Town. Paul H. Douglass. $2.25.
The Course of Christian History. McGlothlin. $2.25.

THE BIBLE AND THE LIFE OF JESUS

- Popular Lectures on the Books of the New Testament. A. H. Strong. $1.50.
The Jesus of History. T. R. Glover. $1.25.
The Manhood of the Master. Fosdick. $1.15.
Our Bible. Herbert L. Willett. $1.50.
That One Face. Richard Roberts. $1.25.
Archæology and the Bible. George A. Barton. $3.00.
Christ in the Poetry of Today. Martha F. Crowe. $2.00.
Jesus—The Master Teacher. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
Jesus—Our Standard. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
New Testament in Modern Speech. Weymouth. $2.00.
Moffatt's New Testament. $1.50. (Pocket ed., $1.75.)
Jesus in the Experience of Men. T. R. Glover. $1.90.
The Proposal of Jesus. John H. Hutton. $2.00.
Epochs in the Life of Paul. A. T. Robertson. $1.50.
The Life of Paul. B. W. Robinson. $1.50.

SOCIAL

- Social Principles of Jesus. Walter Rauschenbusch. $1.15.
The Ethics of Jesus and Social Progress. Gardner. $1.50.
Christianizing the Social Order. Rauschenbusch. $2.00.
Christianity and the Social Crisis. Rauschenbusch. $2.25.
Democratic Christianity. Bishop McConnell. 80c.
Jesus Christ and the Social Question. F. G. Peabody. $1.75.
Psychology of Social Reconstruction. G. T. Patrick. $2.00.
The Great Society. Graham Wallas. $2.25.
The Social Problem. Charles A. Ellwood. $2.25.
The Church and Industrial Reconstruction. $2.00.
Labor and the Common Welfare. Samuel Gompers. $3.00.
Poverty the Challenge of the Church. Penman. $1.00.
Religion and Business. R. W. Babson. $1.50.
Fundamentals of Prosperity. R. W. Babson. $1.00.
The Sword or the Cross. Kirby Page. $1.20.
The Science of Power. Benjamin Kidd. $2.50.
The Gospel for a Working World. Harry F. Ward. $2.00.

MISSIONS

- The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War. $2.00.
Christianity the Final Religion. S. M. Zwemer. $1.25.
Modern Religious Movements in India. Farquhar. $2.75.
The Religions of the World. George A. Barton. $2.00.
Mary Slessor of Calabar. W. P. Livingstone. $2.00.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

- The Experience of God in Modern Life. Lyman. $1.50.
What and Where Is God? Richard L. Swain. $1.50.
Holy Spirit in Thought and Experience. T. Rees. $2.00.
The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation. Denney. $3.00.
The Christian Hope. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
Can We Believe in Immortality? J. H. Snowden. $1.50.
Immortality and the Future. H. R. Mackintosh. $1.50.
The Truth About Christian Science. Snowden. $2.50.
Originality of the Christian Message. Mackintosh. $1.75.
Basic Ideals in Religion. R. W. Micou. $2.50.
What Christianity Means to Me. Lyman Abbott. $1.75.
Outspoken Essays. Dean W. R. Inge. $2.25.
Public Opinion and Theology. Bishop McConnell. $1.50.
The Meaning of Baptism. Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.35.
Living Again. Charles R. Brown. $1.00.
The New Orthodoxy. Edward Scribner Ames. $1.50.

PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

- The Meaning of Prayer. Fosdick. $1.15.
The Meaning of Faith. H. E. Fosdick. $1.35.
The Meaning of Service. H. E. Fosdick. $1.25.
The Religion of a Layman. Charles R. Brown. $1.25.
Psychology of the Christian Soul. George Steven. $1.50.
The Psychology of Religion. J. H. Snowden. $2.00.
The Religious Consciousness. J. B. Pratt. $2.50.
Finding the Comrade God. Walter Fiske. $1.15.
Religion of a Mature Mind. George Albert Coe. $1.75.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

- Training the Devotional Life. L. H. Weigle. 75 cts.
Talks to Sunday School Teachers. L. H. Weigle. $1.50.
Social Principles of Education. G. F. Betts. $1.50.
The School in the Modern Church. H. F. Cope. $1.50.
How to Teach Religion. G. F. Betts. $1.25.

INSPIRATIONAL BOOKS

- The Daily Altar. Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.50. (Leather, $2.50.)
The Eternal Christ. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
The Ambassador. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
Things Eternal. John Kelman. $1.75.

THE NEW AGE

- New Mind for the New Age. Henry Churchill King. $1.50.
A Better World. Tyler Dennett. $1.50.
The Christian Faith and the New Day. McAfee. 90 cts.
Church Facing the Future. William Adams Brown. 80c.
The New Horizon in the Church and State. Faunce. 80c.
World Facts and America's Responsibility. Patton. $1.25.
The Gospel and the New World. Robert E. Speer. $2.00.
Some Aspects of International Christianity. Kelman. $1.00.
The Democratic Movement in Asia. Tyler Dennett. $1.90.
Is Christianity Practicable? William Adams Brown. $1.75.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature. Davis. $2.50.
Everybody's World. Sherwood Eddy. $1.90.
Princess Salome. Burris Jenkins. $2.00.
First. Henry Drummond. 50 cts.
The Strategy of Life. Arthur Porritt. $1.25.
Life of Theodore Roosevelt. W. R. Thayer. $1.00.

(Add 10 cents postage for each book)

The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The
CHRISTIAN
CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

SPIRITUALISM

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON

BUDDHISM

BY CLARENCE H. HAMILTON

Education for Citizenship

The Church and the Neutral Zone

Fifteen Cts. a Copy

June 30, 1921

Four Dollars a Year

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it. we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage. (Pocket ed., $1.35 plus 8 cts.

The Shorter New Testament (Kent), $1.00 plus 10 cents postage.

The 20th Century New Testament, $2.00 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, $1.50 plus 8 cents postage).

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

YALE TALKS

BY CHARLES R. BROWN, LL. D.

ALTHOUGH these "Talks" were delivered at Yale, Harvard and other colleges, they afford a wealth of illustrative material for addresses and sermons to young people, especially to young men. Among the themes are "The True Definition of a Man," "Unconscious Influence," "The Lessons of Failure," "The Men Who Make Excuse," "The Wrongs of Wrong-doing," etc.

Price, $1.35 plus 8 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

"Our Bible"

By Herbert L. Willett

Dr. Willett, of the University of Chicago, and for a score of years the most popular lecturer on the Bible on the American platform, has put into this, his latest book, the scholarly fruitage of a life-time of study, and he has put it into a form that is both useful and attractive.

Some Chapter Titles:

*Religion and Its Holy Books.
How Books of Religion Took Form.
The Makers of the Bible.
Growth of the New Testament.
The Higher Criticism.
The Bible and the Monuments.
The Inspiration of the Bible.
The Authority of the Bible.
The Beauty of the Bible.
The Influence of the Bible.
The Misuses of the Bible.
Our Faith in the Bible.*

Price of the book $1.50, plus 10 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 South Dearborn St., Chicago

FAITH-BUILDING BOOKS

Belief and Life

By Principal W. R. Selbie

Price $1.25

Modern Belief in Immortality

By Newman Smyth

Price 75 Cents

Through Science to Faith

By Newman Smyth

Price $1.75

Belief in God

By Jacob Gould Schurman

Price $1.50

The Christian Hope

By William Adams Brown

Price $1.75

The Religion of a Layman

By Charles R. Brown

Price $1.25

Add 10 cents per book for postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

An Undenominational Journal of Religion

Volume XXXVIII

CHICAGO, JUNE 30, 1921

Number 26

EDITORIAL STAFF—EDITOR: CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON; CONTRIBUTING EDITORS: HERBERT L. WILLETT, JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, THOMAS CURTIS CLARK, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ALVA W. TAYLOR, JOHN R. EWERS

Entered as second-class matter, February 28, 1892, at the Post-office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of March 3, 1879. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 3, 1918. Published Weekly By the Disciples Publication Society 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago

Subscription—$4.00 a year (to ministers $3.00), strictly in advance. Canadian postage, 52 cents extra; foreign, $1.04 extra. Change of date on wrapper is a receipt for remittance on subscription and shows month and year to which subscription is paid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a free interpreter of essential Christianity. It is published not for any single denomination alone, but for the Christian world. It strives definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and its readers are in all communions.

EDITORIAL

The Purchase Price of Orthodoxy

THE Baptist denomination is exercised over the action of their home mission board in accepting a gift of a million and a half dollars with a creedal string tied to it. The proviso is made by the donor that no missionary shall be employed who does not hold to the essentials of theological conservatism which are stated in the form of a creed. Henceforth this rich man's creed is to be demanded of every earnest young man who wants to serve Christ on the home mission field. This situation in the Baptist camp is paralleled by that in many another communion. Though the Disciples have a traditional aversion to all forms of creedal statement, a rich man made a Bible college the recipient of a fund with the inclusion of a creed to be signed by the faculty. Why all this interest among rich men in theological conservatism? Many bits of evidence taken together show that it is a counter movement against the social gospel. These men want a gospel preached which will make people docile and contented under the present industrial system. They do not want to hear child labor or social injustice denounced in the church or by the church. Their money goes for the preaching of a heaven which is intended to compensate poor people for all the losses suffered at the hands of exploiters here on earth. If all business men were like the Baptist layman who has just given the million and a half with a creed tied to it, the situation would be very difficult. Fortunately there is in all communions another type of business man. He knows that all is not well with modern industry and commerce. He looks hopefully to constructive reform movements to stabilize business. He knows perfectly well that discontented workmen are never efficient workmen. He believes that the teachings of Jesus are the salvation of society as well as the salvation of the individual. This kind of business man may be trusted to reinforce teachers and ministers who preach the whole gospel of Christ instead of a mutilated half gospel.

Where Do the Young People Lose their Faith?

CONSERVATIVE ministers are constantly asserting that the young people lose their faith at the church colleges. Dr. J. C. Masee, in his address at the Conference on Fundamentals at Des Moines, asserted that he had three or four such young people in his parish now. The teachers in the church schools tell quite a different story. They tell of bright young people who have been unable to endure the kind of teaching heard in the home churches, and who enter college consequently in great mental confusion. These young people under the careful tutelage of the professors are often led out into a faith more firm and clear than they had known about at home. The statistics in some church colleges show a greater number of church members in the junior class than in the freshman. Yet if it were otherwise, it should be remembered that students of the psychology of religion have shown how late adolescence is almost inevitably a period of doubt. Inherited views are cast aside, and the youth tends to assert his individuality with a temper of mental vehemence. He thinks himself a skeptic at this time of life, and is very likely to absent himself from the church. Unsympathetic treatment and denunciation may confirm him in bitterness and opposition. On the other hand an intelligent and patient meeting of his problem will usually result in clearing up his mind. Probably young people have these doubt problems wherever they are. More factory young people are lost to the church than college young people, and the church is often unconscious of their needs. In Fourth Presbyterian Church of Chicago there is a special congregation of young people and a sermon each Sunday morning for them. Not every church could arrange this, but it is significant as showing that one church recognizes a responsibility to the distinctive intellectual problems of late adolescents.

The Writing and Reading of Religious Books

THE small circulation of some seemingly excellent religious books has led many to generalize that a religious book cannot have large circulation. On the twenty-fifth anniversary of the publishing of "In His Steps," by Charles M. Sheldon, it was announced that twenty-two million copies of the book had been sold. The figures of "Ben Hur" are also impressive. It is now being sold to a second generation of readers. Shrewd selling methods sometimes circulate large numbers of rather worthless books. Several million copies of the Millennial Dawn books are now in circulation by reason of the colportage activities of the International Bible Students' Association. Some of the very best religious books have caught on, as in the case of the Fosdick devotional manuals, one of which has run into a circulation above a hundred thousand. It is inevitable that the technical religious book must be limited in circulation. Its interests are more or less scholastic, and only that restricted section of churchmen which enjoys a true scholarly exercise would buy and read such books. The need of the day is more religious books which, while popular in character, will set forth the great new ideals that are burning in the hearts of present day religious people. "Pilgrim's Progress" presented the religion of three hundred years ago, but though of perennial interest it does not interpret the evangelical conviction of today because it lacks the sense of social responsibility. Had some modern Christian the literary feeling of John Bunyan, he would immortalize himself in a religious book. Our most widely circulated novels touch the religious question. Hall Caine, Marie Corelli and many other modern novelists have found the religious interest in their public the most responsive impulse.

Does the Sunday School Face Extinction?

PROTESTANT Sunday schools of England lost in numbers steadily before the war, and during the war the loss reached the astounding total of a million pupils. There have been large losses in the United States in some of the denominations. While some smaller cities still have large adult classes, millions of children in the United States are without adult instruction. This condition among the Sunday schools follows an era in which the outstanding emphasis of the movement was placed on numbers. The first problem of the Sunday school is to bring the level of its teaching up nearer to the level that obtains in the public schools. The children have no respect for a school where the lesson is never studied and where the teachers have a low general average of intelligence. The teaching function of the church should go to those members of the church who have had good general training, who know the Bible and the Christian religion and who have the gift to teach. It is hard to expect a group of volunteer workers to equal the ability of trained specialists in the public schools, but the difference may be less than it now is. In the second place, there should be a nation wide propaganda in favor of the idea of systematic religious education. In many homes there is no longer a conscience about religious instruction. Going to Sunday school is a matter that depends upon the mood of the child and is not the ordered program of the family, as in the case of the public school. In many cities there should be a campaign of publicity in the public press to bring home to the parents the need of biblical teaching. Such publicity, in addition to the more essential spiritual benefits, may well set forth the fact that the man who does not know the Bible cannot read the best English literature intelligently or understand the genius of American institutions. Honesty and respect for the law depend upon attitudes built up in religious education. The Sunday school still has a work to do, but this work must be supplemented by the week day religious instruction that will eventually come into the program of every community.

Legal Footing of Week-Day Religious Education

THE introduction of week day religious instruction in connection with the work of the public schools is usually challenged in each community by a few malcontents upon the basis of alleged illegality. Both in Evanston and Oak Park, suburbs of Chicago, certain members of the Christian Science organizations, whether with the knowledge of their leaders is not known, have raised this issue in order to prevent if possible the giving of week day religious instruction. It is clear that it would not be legal or even desirable to use in any way tax payers' money for the giving of religious instruction. This would at once open the door to public support for parochial schools, a practice abhorrent to American principle. The plan of religious education followed in Gary, Hammond, Batavia, Oak Park, Evanston and several other communities adjacent to Chicago involves no infringement of this principle. The instruction is paid for by a fund raised by public voluntary subscription. If the public school buildings are used in any way, compensation is given the school board. The right of a school board to rent public buildings for community purposes is unquestioned. In most cases, the religious instruction is given by special teachers in other than publicly owned buildings. The only legal question remaining is the right of the school board, on the request of the parents, to dismiss children from school for religious instruction. The state law of Indiana and Illinois does not prescribe the length of the school day. Children are often dismissed for part of a day as a reward of merit, or because of lack of room in the school buildings for whole time instruction. If the state dismisses children from the public school for the whole day to the parochial school, it would be a manifest injustice and discrimination for the state to hold that a Protestant could not claim part of the time of his child for the study of the ethical and religious disciplines under special teachers. No test case has ever been brought on these points. If the obstructionists continue their nagging tactics in the various communities, the legal rights of the parents of Protestant children may at last be determined by judicial action.

Religious Reading for the Immigrant

MANY immigrant groups in this country are entirely without religious reading, for newspapers of religious character in their own language are not published. An exception must be made of such religious literature as is produced by such cults as Millennial Dawnists or the Seventh-day Adventists. In the language of these immigrants has been translated the most radical social teachings of the country. Many things which would not be printed in English have been circulated in the past through the medium of the foreign language newspapers. These papers never fail to treat churches and preachers in a contemptuous manner, often retailing ancient falsehoods concerning them. There is a field here for the Home Missions Council. Journals supported jointly by the large denominational groups would not prove a very great burden on any single society and would be of large significance in the future of Christianity in this country. A group of churches in Buffalo recently took a census of their neighborhood and found that 136,000 of the 158,000 people in the district were foreign born or the children of foreign born. Fifty-four per cent of these attend no religious service. If these immigrant groups are influenced only in one direction, away from the church, it means that in the future we will have in this country a solid anti-religious class which will be more difficult of approach than in these impressionable days. There is authority in the printed page. A great many people believe that when a thing is printed it is true. Religion must not only talk itself on street corners and in mission halls, but it must use the modern propagandist tools, speaking the message boldly after the manner of various kinds of successful propaganda. Foreign missions has now established some great union journals for the lands beyond the sea. Is home missions to be any less modern in its methods?

New Grounds of Confidence for Religion

HOW far the wave of anti-religious feeling originated by the French revolution has spent itself may be seen by recent utterances of two great English writers, Mr. Wells and Mr. Shaw. Neither of these writers is chargeable with having any bias toward religion. In their writings they often show shocking ignorance of religious matters, as for instance when H. G. Wells confuses the idea of the virgin birth with that of the immaculate conception. Yet both of them have come around to the belief in recent years that religion is indispensable in the life of our world. H. G. Wells hopes to have a new religion with a new Bible, one in which the Hebrew cosmogony will be displaced by the account of a creative evolution and in which literature later than the Hebrew canon will appear. Shaw, who has enjoyed flinging gibes at religious people all his life, has recently written a sort of apologetic in behalf of religion. He goes farther than Wells and thinks that we might even accept a great deal of myth and legend in our religion. He scorns Wells' idea of manufacturing a new religion over night, as one might invent a new type of automobile engine. From the business world have come of late many voices declaring the fundamental importance of religion. It will perhaps take quite a while for the village church to feel the change of front on the part of many of the leaders of world opinion, but the keen observer of public affairs must be impressed with the idea that religion is coming into an era of easier going. If the world's leaders, after accepting the idea that religion is necessary will only go forward in taking upon themselves responsibility to religious institutions, we shall enter upon a time of spiritual quickening for all mankind.

The Church in "Main Street"

IT has long been an observation of the English, who for three generations have delighted to read criticisms of America, that our people are self-satisfied. This observation may or may not have been well-founded, but the present popularity of Sinclair Lewis' "Main Street" would seem to indicate that we are now willing to sit in judgment upon our complacency, our braggadocio and our lack of æsthetic feeling. This novel steers us into a good many modern problems—the familiar one of the discontented and idle married woman, the narrowness of political conservatism and the shabbiness of American architecture. Everybody is interested in the unfavorable picture of the church as the author describes it in Gopher Prairie. The facts concerning this kind of village church of whatever denomination fall into some well defined categories. The minister is half-educated and therefore more ridiculous as well as more of an obstructor of the normal development of the religious life of the community than if he were just ignorant. He presents half-baked judgments on evolution and higher criticism. His breadth of moral vision is indicated by his conviction that the two great American problems are cigarettes and Mormonism. The church people are pictured as a community of self-righteous gossips, unimaginatively intolerant, who can tear a reputation to tatters and drive a good if rather unconventional woman to the brink of suicide with their evil tongues. The Christian Scientists are satirized for their unwillingness to abide by their philosophy when they are really sick, and the Episcopalians are pilloried as aristocrats quite aloof from the community life. The Baptists and the Methodists use up much of their energy in church suppers. One gets but little encouragement from the book with regard to organized religion. As a universal picture any informed person knows it is distorted and unfair. But it will be well if the religious leaders frankly recognize that there are thousands of churches in America living under the constriction of vision and sterility of idea such as characterize the church in "Main Street." This is the sort of church that sectarianism produces in a village. It is quite possible for us to have a different sort of church in a community where Christian people will organize the church from the community point of view instead of the sectarian point of view, and thus end church competition.

The Church and the Neutral Zone

IN the recent discussion of the place and function of the church and other Christian institutions there has emerged the concept of a neutral zone as the field within which the activities of organized religion should be restricted. The concept first emerged in the controversy among Young Men's Christian Association leaders over the attitude their brotherhood should assume in the present industrial situation. That organization was bound to feel the stress and challenge of the industrial problem in a peculiar fashion. It holds intimate relations with both sides of the economic order. Its membership is almost wholly composed of men who work for others in mill, factory, office, store or railroad service. Excepting only its college and army camp departments the direct activity of the "Y" is centered wholly upon employed classes. On the other side, the Association derives its financial support almost exclusively from the employing class. It is maintained by the voluntary gifts of limited groups of relatively wealthy citizens. In function, the more intimate affiliations of the Association are with labor. In what we may call its auspices, its affiliation is with capital. This dual fact presents to Association statesmanship a situation of great delicacy in times like these when the social order is rocked and wrenched with revolutionary ideas. What ought the attitude of the Association to be? Dare it link itself with the industrial aspirations of workingmen? Or should it lend its prestige to the interests of those who sustain the organization with their gifts?

Conservative opinion in the Y. M. C. A. has adopted the neutral zone concept as defining the solution of its problem. There is, those thus minded argue, a zone of need in which employer and employee can cooperate, leaving the industrial controversy to be decided by other agencies and forces. There are practical benefits—the finding of jobs, the providing of social, cultural and physical help for young men, and of course the evangelistic appeal to individual souls—in which men of all sorts of economic opinion and interests may join. It is therefore contended that the Association should confine itself to this undebatable strip of common need and decline to cast the weight of its prestige in favor of either party to any social issue that may arise.

In the church itself much the same sort of reasoning is going on. The church, it is said, has no business meddling with social and industrial questions. Its region of activity is the spiritual life of individual men and women. This restriction of the church's activity to a neutral zone of agreement finds expression in such utterances as the communication of the Pittsburgh Employers' Association urging business men to withhold financial support from the Federal Council of Churches because of their attitude on social questions as set forth in the now well-known "Social Creed of the Churches." The issue was precipitated in Pittsburgh by the campaign for funds undertaken by the Young Women's Christian Association of that city. This Association in its national gathering at Cleveland more than a year ago had adopted the essence of the Federal Council's "social creed" as a statement of its own convictions, and the Employers' Association worked actively to hinder the success of the campaign. Consistently enough, the employers included the churches and the Federal Council in their threat to withdraw financial support, unless the churches would confine their activities to the zone of agreement. Another expression of the same view emerged in the controversy within the Lutheran denomination over its affiliation with the Federal Council. While no decisive action has yet been taken, there is a strong enough body of opposition to the Council's social pronouncements and services to inhibit this conservative denomination from identifying itself with an organization which it fears may be in danger of encroaching upon the function of the "state."

These are just a few indications of a very common view that religion's business is departmental in its nature and that it must be kept strictly within the limits prescribed for it. It is a view held probably by the majority of churchmen, for the church is made up chiefly of a bourgeois constituency. The church affords such adherents an escape from the irritations and sordidness of the mart and factory. Within its portals they wish to find soothing, relief, comfort, reassurance, inspiration. To it they delight to give their money, the prestige of their names and presence, with the sense that its activities are carried on in the well-worn grooves of individual evangelization, foreign missions, charitable amelioration and biblical instruction. To the average churchman of the bourgeois class organized religion is a static thing, an end in itself. Its success and progress he conceives in terms merely of a larger church, with more people doing and enjoying the same things that he does and enjoys. Of the church as a dynamic of secular change, a piece of social engineering for the bringing in of a new order of society in which the will of God shall be done as it is done in heaven, he has only the vaguest idea. Industry and commerce are likewise static; they have their own laws—economic laws—and these laws operate in the closed system of a secular order just as the principles of religion operate in the closed compartment of the spiritual life.

Mr. Lloyd George—strangely enough, when one recalls the almost religious character of his earlier championship of radical social policies—stated the hard-headed churchman's view the other day when he was talking to a gathering of Welsh ministers. "Atmosphere! That is the business of the churches," he said, "to create atmosphere. To neglect the decent transaction of spiritual affairs for the controversies of the social and political order is a thing I greatly regret. These subjects do not belong in your conferences." He rebuked churchmen for their activity in making a religious issue of the Irish question, the league of nations and the industrial conflict, declaring ominously that "if you attempt specific solutions in these things, you will divide and destroy the churches."

This all sounds quite plausible to a certain type of business men and to politicians. The pity of it is that it sounds plausible, too, to a certain type of minister. The notion that "atmosphere" can be created without dealing with the merits of the great vital issues that are pressing upon men's souls is a delusion and a snare. The atmosphere that conduces to the solution of the social, political and industrial issues can never be generated by a church that confines its activities to a neutral zone. Atmosphere is no abstraction. It cannot be created by fiat. It is of the concrete stuff of the issue under discussion, especially when the issue is one that vitally concerns human welfare. We have here the fallacy under which religion has operated all too long—the fallacy that it is its business to deal with subjective attitudes apart from the real world of objective fact. The public impotence of our religion is its shame. Considering the potentiality of the moral emotion which the church induces and manipulates, it is nothing less than a historic scandal that after nineteen centuries our social order is yet so far from the kingdom of God.

An ethical religion like Christianity cannot be content merely with atmosphere. Its business is transacted in direct and immediate contact with life, and nothing affecting human welfare is foreign to its province. The "decent transaction of spiritual affairs" cannot take place in a neutral zone between the clashing forces of an ancient social order guilty of the most flagrant inhumanity to man and a new order striving to be born in which the ideals of Christianity may have some chance of being realized in human life. For religion to seek such an area of refuge apart from the glorious field of conflict where the world that is confronts the world that is to be, is ignoble. It were better far to let the church divide, as Mr. Lloyd George says it will do, than to purchase unity at the price of impotence. One thing of which we may be sure is that the new times into which we have come are demanding and will demand increasingly that religion find its chief apologetic in what it is able to effect in the world that now is. As a thing apart from life, as a function restricted to one compartment of life only, as a mere umpire in the blood and iron struggle between justice and injustice, as a stretcher bearer at Armageddon—the thoughtful and earnest portion of mankind have become so impatient with a religion of that sort that it is not too much to say they are quite done with it.

This judgment against the neutrality idea of religion is not based upon theoretical or a priori considerations. On the contrary, it is grounded in the necessities of actual experience. The fact is that it is practically impossible to define the boundaries of such a neutral zone as is assumed by the advocates of the doctrine of a sequestered church. The moment the church or any other Christian agency undertakes to deal in real earnest with human life in human terms it finds itself drawn inevitably beyond the peaceful area of neutrality into the complex scene of conflict. This can be beautifully illustrated in the words of Mrs. Robert E. Speer written with a bearing on the Pittsburgh employers' criticisms of the Y. W. C. A. After enumerating the service the organization offers to young women in the way of instruction, physical exercise, social fun, and moral inspiration, Mrs. Speer continues:

But this is insufficient if a girl's working hours are too long to leave any zest for life when her day is over. It is not enough if her best efforts to earn leave her with no provision for illness or emergency. It does not help in times when unemployment is general and income stops absolutely for a whole family. If a factory is unsanitary, all our Y. W. C. A. buildings and secretaries cannot save a girl from tuberculosis. Now I cannot believe that it is radical or wrong of us, that it is subversive of our best American ideals, to insist on knowing everything there is to know about hours, wages and factory conditions, and when we know of hard conditions, to do everything in our power to help change whatever is working avoidable hardship for girls. . . . We are a long way off from the fulfilment of the golden rule of really doing to everybody else—motorman, miner, ashman, elevator girl, laundry worker, canner hand—exactly as we would want others to do to us or our daughter if we were in that particular place; but if Christianity means anything, it means trying to move in that direction. The move means better laws, more interest in the individual worker everywhere, greater public knowledge, a more sensitive conscience.

The men say we don't know about business. It is quite true that we don't know all about their anxieties, their struggles, their problems, but we do know about the girl in the workroom,—much more than the business man knows. . . . But when our knowledge of girls and our responsibility for them bring us into conflict with a business interest that has not thought out its hours, its wages, its unemployment or health provisions in terms of girls, what are we going to do? Buckle under and say "All right, run your business as you like, only give us the money to stop a few leaks in the dyke?" Or are we to stand up—perhaps to our best friend—and say, "My dear John Smith, I know more about a girl's struggles than you do?" When the day comes that women drop behind the public conscience, instead of leading it, the nation will be in a bad way indeed.

Here is a very human and lucid setting forth of the necessity for the Young Women's Christian Association leaving the zone of neutrality and invading the actual fighting field where the industrial struggle is going on. The same principle applies to the Young Men's Christian Association and to the church itself.

Looking deeper into the situation it becomes clear that a position of neutrality is impossible. Just as the official neutrality of the United States during two and a half years of the great war had the effect of giving to the Allies, through Great Britain's sea power, a practical monopoly of all the war materials we produced, so a church or other religious organization that undertakes to remain in a neutral position when vital and fundamental moral issues are at stake, plays inevitably a partisan role. The church in the neutral zone is a church on the side of the status quo. A church attending to "the decent transaction of spiritual affairs"—taking these "spiritual affairs" in terms not of human life and justice, in terms of the actual kingdom of God, but in terms of creating an "atmosphere" out of nothing in particular—such a church has already cast its vote on the side of the existing order and against the order that is striving to come to birth. There can be no doubt about that.

It was so in 1914. Previous to that year the church had been engaged in the business of making "atmosphere." It had remained snugly and innocuously in the quiet zone of neutrality while, for a generation, a few prophetic voices had been calling in vain for an invasion by Christianity of the potential battlefield of international relations. August, 1914, found the church limp and impotent and dumb, while to purely secular forces was committed the fate of the world.

It was so at Versailles. The church had nothing to do with the war; it likewise had nothing to do with the peace. But if the church had been accustomed to thinking of its mission in terms of the kingdom of God, that is, in terms of actual human welfare, it would have found some part to take in the war beside that of a stretcher bearer for the dead and wounded, and it would have set Christ in the midst of the peace where, in his absence, the spirits of Bismarck and Napoleon and Nietzsche ruled.

That is the church's business—her direct and unmediated function—to put Christ in the midst of all our human life. He is no prince of a petty province, but the king and ruler of all reality. All authority is given to him. His church is his body, to bring to realization in industry, in family life, in commerce, in education, in public opinion, in international relations, in all human dealings and intercourse the spirit and character that was in him. His body can accept no repressive or restrictive dictation from the secular forces without. And it must not cower before the fears and solicitudes that grow up within its own heart.

The Large Fire Cracker

A Parable of Safed the Sage

IT came to pass in the days of old that a small boy bought for himself a Bunch of Firecrackers, that he might shoot them off on the Fourth Day of July. And he was Perfectly happy until his Firecrackers gave out, save that he met a boy who had a Five-Cent Cracker that made more noise than his Whole Bunch. And he determined to go him One Better.

And the next year he bought a Ten-Cent Cracker; and in the year that followed, he bought a Cracker that cost Twenty-Five Cents.

And by that time he was the admiration of all the boys. But he considered that now he had them going, they would all buy Twenty-Five-Cent Crackers in the next year, and there were no larger ones in the store.

Therefore did he study the mechanism of the Firecracker, and he bought Powder, and Fuse, and Glue, and he took Clay to stop the ends of the Cracker, and he rolled the paper around the powder, and made a Firecracker as large as a length of Stove Pipe.

And it went exactly as he had anticipated, save that the Coroner had to get into his Ford Car and ride over about seven townships before he could decide where to hold the Inquest.

Now I have lived long since that day, and I have seen the process repeated more than once. I have seen men spreading themselves like Green Bay Trees, and determined to make more Noise than their neighbors, and to do things that the neighbors could not surpass.

And several times in the history of the human race, I have had occasion to look around to find those same people and, lo, they could not be found. Yea, I searched diligently for them, but they had fired their big Cracker, and blown up with it.

Now this have I observed concerning those men who seek to outdo their neighbors, that an Whole Bunch of Medium Sized Firecrackers costeth no more than one Cracker, and that the Bunch lasteth longer, and so, sometimes, doth the man who fireth it.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

Prayer of the Poor

(Written in a city park)

FOR the joy of cool, green places,
For the smiles of kindly faces,
We, the poor, give thanks today;
We, the care-beridden toilers,
We, the broken, prisoned moilers
Would not, thankless, go our way.

But we want the scent of roses
For our joy, when each day closes,
Lest our drudging starve our souls;
For our children give us flowers,
Give us rest and laughing hours,
Give us homes and hearths as goals.

We would work, but not with sighing;
We would build, but not by dying—
We are not dumb brutes, but men!
For our errors grant us pardon,
But, O Lord, let Eden's garden
With its beauty come again!

The Deed

IT matters not how fair the vow,
How eloquent the spoken creed,
Their glory is a tinsel show
Beside the grandeur of a deed.

Blind

"GREAT PAN is dead!" they cried. And sad-robed priests

In long processions gloried in his death.
But even as they went their way, the breath
Of God blew over hill and vale, and feasts
Of loveliness were set for men. June spread
Upon the earth a carpeting of green,
And where was bleakness, pink and gold were seen.
The priests saw not. They cried, "Great Pan is dead!"

The Poet

THOUGH part of all I meet,
I walk my way alone;
Knowing the hearts of men—
To them, alas! unknown.

Education and World Citizenship

By Joseph Fort Newton

MR. PRESIDENT and Friends:—In no perfunctory manner, but very simply and sincerely, I must be allowed to say what a joy it is to visit the University of Iowa,* though I feel so much at home that I may easily forget that I am a visitor. It is a great strategic institution, and the fact that I was for a brief time a fellow worker here gives me a right to an honorable pride in its strength, its growth, and its aspiration. Here, in other days, I enjoyed lovely and fruitful friendships which nothing can destroy. Alas, some of the men with whom I labored in my humble way have vanished, but they are still a part of the living memory and creative spirit of the university. Calvin, Wilcox, and Eastman were men to know whom was a kind of religion, and they left a noble tradition both of character and of scholarship. Others are toiling in different fields, but many remain, and to the inspiring memories of the past is added the joy of renewing gracious fellowships in the present.

THE CHANGE IN A DECADE

Much has happened since ten years ago, shifting the play of light and color over the human scene. We seem to have lived a generation in less than a decade. The look of the world is different, and we need not go far to discover the reason for it. The burnished surface of civilization, which held the happy and confident reflections of those years, has been cracked, and our vision is blurred. A history of civilization written before August, 1914, reads like a romance. What pictures men painted of the triumphs of art and industry, of disease yielding to the skill of science, of the intellectual linking of nations, of the annihilation of time and distance by the ingenuities of invention. The bright cities of earth, with their temples of art and prayer, lay bathed in sunlight, and wireless messages flew everywhere, telling of the advance of man.

And then—a high school boy in remote Bosnia fired a pistol, and a pall of ancient barbaric night fell over the earth, darkening the heavens. In an instant nation was leaping at the throat of nation, and the beautiful energy of humanity was devoted to slaughter. Commerce languished, art was paralyzed, religion was mocked, science became a fiend of destruction, and civilization seemed tumbling to a fall, filling the world with measureless woe. The cost of the world war in money would educate the human race and equip it to fight its ancient enemies, famine and plague. What man may ever hope to find words to tell the shame, the crime, the pity of life without a sob, remembering the cold law of biology by which, if the fittest fall, the race decays? Indeed, the story of those years of blood and fire and tears reads like a volume from the library of Hell.

RANCOR AND CHAOS FOLLOWED

Then followed rancor, reaction, and chaos, hardly less appalling, and in some respects more dismal, than the war itself. The spirit of solidarity and sacrifice evaporated;

the sense of a common ideal and obligation dissolved in a welter of ruthless, grasping selfishness. For more than two years we have lived in an air of cloudy cynicism, in which the highest ideals of the race have been at the mercy of its lowest instincts, and the earth has been an auditorium for every hoarse and bitter voice that could make itself heard. Starvation has stalked to and fro over wide areas, leaving trails of skeletons in its path. Anarchy has run wild and run red—a gaunt and ghastly shape to affright and dismay—as if the shock of world war has actually shattered the foundations of society, and released the imps from some Inferno. Moral collapse and spiritual fatigue gave free play to every vile and slimy influence, reviving old enmities and inventing new envies, until the world is well nigh bankrupt, not only financially, but spiritually. And today, though millions of young men have died, there is no sense of security, and no assurance that we shall not suffer like disasters in the future.

Such a picture is none too dark to fit the facts of the time in which we are living, and it is idle not to see it as it is. No easy evasive optimism must be allowed to blind us to the haggard realities, lest we fall into a deeper pit. Temporarily, at least, the world has run into a blind alley, and cannot find the way out. After all, fleets and trenches are only the outward manifestations of war, which has its beginning and ending in the human soul; and the soul of the world is in tumult. The guns are hushed for a time, owing to physical and financial exhaustion, but the fires of hate burn as brightly as ever. What we need is order, stability—order not only in the streets but in the secret places of the soul—and this can come only from a better mind, a nobler spirit, and a truer way of thinking. There must be a finer spirit of fraternity than we have known before, not only finer in its sympathies, but more practical in its achievements. Force is a failure. Diplomacy is a delusion. War is organized anarchy. Unless spiritual influences now take up the task, evoking diviner impulses, and mustering the moral insights of humanity, the world is doomed to run on in the old ruts, disaster following fast and following faster.

THE OPTIMISM OF SCIENCE

Here then is our period, just emerging from a maelstrom, disillusioned, bereaved, marked by a vast depression of mind, and forced to grapple with realities at close quarters. Our vision is befogged, our minds are appalled by the complexity of the situation, and our dreams of a new world seem to belong rather among the utopias than the practical schemes of reform. No wonder that many see in our day a tragedy of hope and the bankruptcy of the human mind. Oddly enough, the only men who are not depressed are the men of science, and one turns to them to learn the secret of their serene hope. Perhaps it is because they see the passing day against a long background of slow ascent, and are aware of unmeasured sources of energy still untapped. They warn us of our dangers, but they have no doubt that, with due foresight and skill, we may overcome them, and make the reign of man upon the earth wider and firmer than before. For this task, they tell us, two things are needed. First, we must act as one with all our fellows, and strive for unity as well as power. Second, we must follow and obey the laws of life which an advancing science has already revealed in part and will reveal more fully in the future.

*This article by Dr. Newton was delivered as the Commencement address at the State University of Iowa, June 14.

The message of science is that henceforth man must not only undertake, but carry forward, the conscious and purposeful direction of human evolution, adding to Divine Providence a sagacious, skillful, and forward-looking Human Providence. Science reminds us, for our humility, that there has been no notable advance either in the physical or intellectual capacity of man in the last two or three thousand years. Aristotle and Shakespeare still out-top us. It may be possible by eugenics and education to raise the level of the mass, but they cannot create a new order of intellect. The futile progress of humanity, it tells us, must be ethical and social, and the evolution of groups of individuals is only at its beginning, opening a vista to which no one can see an end. The world is not only safe for democracy, but it is unsafe for anything else. No prophet can set a limit to what men can do and be upon this earth if once they learn to live together in fellowship, not fratricide. The last century expended its effort in extending its knowledge of the universe; today man is turning to the study of himself, seeking intelligently to exercise a rational control over his own acts. Can we develop social organization in spite of individual liberty, democratic equality in spite of hereditary inequality, and universal fraternity in spite of national and class antagonism? Science says, Yes! It not only can be done, but it must be done; and here lies the line of march marked out for the days and ages ahead.

EDUCATION MUST BE DIFFERENT

Obviously our hopes lies in education; but education must be something different and better than it has ever been before. It must be what Huxley defined it, "the training of the intellect in the laws of nature, and the fashioning of the affections and the will in an earnest, loving desire to live in harmony with those laws! It must be different not only in method, but in spirit and objective, for the ideal of a people determines its technique of living, alike in manners and in morals. Knowledge is indeed power, but it may be power for ill as well as good. Science, as we have seen in the last six years, may be a demon of destruction, as well as an angel of mercy marching under the banner of the Red Cross. The motive of the heart, the spirit of the mind, the ideal aimed at, determine the use to be made of the facts and forces of which science gives us command. What we need is a faith, a principle, a spirit to give coherence, cohesion and beneficent direction alike to educational endeavor, economic processes and political policies. For the healing of a sadly wounded world we must have not only more knowledge, but more insight, more sympathy, more hope for all mankind; and it is not without significance that men of science turn their thoughts in last resort to a great, God-illuminated emancipated religion.

What is our objective in education? The ancient Greeks knew what they wanted in education. They aimed at making a race of athletes and artists, and they did it. The Romans educated for war and dominion, and gave to civilization its organization and its jurisprudence. The Middle Ages educated for the other world, and their vision, enshrined in everlasting art by Dante—whose death six centuries ago we remember this year—still lights up the world with its splendor. They produced a race of spiritual heroes who swayed the world with their faith, and brought something of heaven down to earth in their architecture, painting and music. The French have educated mainly for social charm, and the Spanish for a stately personal pride, England has a mixed ideal, but it has educated chiefly for literature and its literature is the greatest in existence. It was a jest of Bismarck that, as England owned the sea and Russia the land, nothing was left for Germany but the sky, which they conquered in a mastery of metaphysics and music. The later Germany pursued power, and evolved a technique of social regimentation called Kultur, the story of which is a ghastly tragedy.

THE EDUCATIONAL OBJECTIVE

What does America want in education? What is its ideal? Prosperity, and the production of wealth? Wealth is not culture. Luxury is not civilization. Is our ideal an educational democracy, giving every one an even chance? If so, it is praiseworthy, but impossible, since the minds of men differ more in their quality than the grain of wood in the forests. As a result we come to think that one kind of gift, one kind of success, is as good as another. But it is not. There are hierarchies of talents; there are some kinds of genius so rare and precious that they outvalue all the rest. In America today the men who are most and first in the public mind are the wielders of vast wealth, the masters of finance, then statesmen, then men of science, then, last of all, the philosopher, the artist, the poet. But that is a world upside down, as if we were trying to reverse the decision of all time. Perhaps, after all, America is too young to have a definite ideal, but it must have an objective worthy of its stupendous educational enterprise, else it will be abortive and end in confusion. What we must have is an education which shall draw its motive not exclusively from the past, but also from the thought and life of today, broadened and deepened by that sympathy of men for their fellows—nay, more; by devotion to the common human good—which is the highest development of civilization.

WORLD CITIZENSHIP AS AN IDEAL

Hence my proposal today that world citizenship—nothing less or else—shall become the ideal and objective of education everywhere. Never shall I forget a talk over the tea cups with Tagore, the seer of India, and one of the loftiest personalities now upon earth. Hereafter, he said, he intended to devote all his means, to the establishment, first in India, and then elsewhere, if possible, of a university in which the better minds of all races, to which we must look for leadership, may mingle, and the culture of the east and the culture of the west may unite in fellowship. It is men of world-mind that we need, he said, men of the spirit who see that we are all citizens of one Kingdom of Idea. In this way, long after he is gone, when in the purpose and mercy of God the time does come for a Federation of Humanity, there will be men large enough to see the whole human scene; men who understand that the good of humanity as a family actually exists and must be the supreme object of allegiance, and we shall not again suffer such a bankruptcy of constructive faith and vision as we have suffered in our day.

Hitherto, alas, we have had, if not a perverted, at least an inadequate system of education, which has hindered the growth of good will among men. American boys have been taught to dislike Britain, and British boys have not been taught anything about America. Prejudice on one side has been matched by indifference on the other, and men who are kinsmen have met as strangers. French boys have been taught to hate Germany, and Italians to suspect Austria; and such teaching bears fruit in armed men. But if men can be educated into antagonism, they can be educated out of it. If our schools have made narrow, bigoted nationalists, they can train men and women to see that "above all nations is humanity," in the words of a great Englishman who assisted in the founding of an American university. They can be taught respect for unlikeness, a sense of otherness, and that appreciation of what is unique, particular, and precious in every people which comes of knowledge and sympathy. It was the thesis of Benjamin Kidd, in his "Science of Power," that by knowledge touched with "the emotion of the ideal," in a single generation the temper of the world can be changed from suspicion to friendship.

LOCAL LOYALTY NOT ENOUGH

Goldsmith's "Citizen of the World," as he traveled into strange regions, exclaimed: "When I have ceased to wonder, I may possibly grow wise." Nay rather; when we learn to love we are already wise, and no other wisdom—however witty or clever—can heal the hurts of this broken and bitter world. "World history is becoming one history," said James Bryce, and no nation can live unto itself, much less be truly great, without regard to the welfare and happiness of other nations. The Great War involved all of us in a community of calamity, showing that we are tied together whether we will or no. There must be a transvaluation of patriotism from a local loyalty to a human allegiance—not something taken from love of country, but something added to it. Unless our education takes bigotry, vanity and hatred out of our patriotism, and trains the new generation to think in terms of all humanity, it fails of its high end and adds to the irritation of the world.

Where else, if it be not in a university, may one make a plea for the larger interests of humanity? With fragrant gratitude I remember the heroic endurance of the students of this university when I delivered a series of six lectures in appreciation of Cardinal Newman; and the memory of that fortitude encourages me to recall his statement that a university training "aims at raising the intellectual tone of society, at cultivating the public mind, at purifying the national taste, at supplying true principles to popular enthusiasm and fixed aims to popular aspiration, at giving enlargement and sobriety to the ideas of the age, at facilitating the exercise of political power, and refining the intercourse of private life." If that be the function of the university, just because it is universal in its nature, no less than in its name, taking all knowledge and life as its province, it should furnish us with men of world vision and beneficent leadership. It is a home of idealism, to which we have a right to look for light at a time when our intellectual life seems most at the point of suffocation in the welter of materialism and mediocrity.

EDUCATION IS WORLD WIDE

Surely here, in spite of all that materialists, pessimists and cynics say, there is no need to argue that human unity is a fact, not a dream. Here we know that culture refuses racial or political labels. There is no German astronomy, no British chemistry, no American mathematics. What is great in France, England and Italy is a part of the sacred treasure of humanity, to be shared by all as a common heritage. Goethe and Kant, Shakespeare and Darwin are kinsmen with Hugo and Pasteur, with Emerson and Lincoln. The Republic of the Mind knows no frontiers; it is the inspiration and consolation of men of all nations and tongues. Here, in the light and fellowship of the best that has been thought and achieved by humanity, we may learn to bring order out of chaos, symmetry out of angularity, and to see clearly by broadening the horizon. For, as Ruskin said, to see clearly is poetry, prophecy, and religion, all in one. Here we know that all humanity is toiling in a common enterprise, and that culture makes a man a better citizen of his own country by making him a citizen of the human race.

After all, only spiritual forces can hold the world together; only God, working through the providence of man, can guide humanity to its true destiny. When Rodin modeled a mighty hand, the Hand of God, holding within it Man and Woman, Bernard Shaw is reported to have asked the sculptor:

"I suppose you mean your own hand after all?"

"Yes," said Rodin, "as the tool."

Such is the real faith and hope of our time. If the human world is to be made acceptable to the conscience of man, it must be through the effort of man himself struggling toward his own ideal. It is as though the world itself had to be redeemed by man toiling as a fellow worker with the eternal creative Goodwill. Slowly, and in the midst of strife and confusion, the City of Equity rises, a city built by the hand of man moved by the Spirit of God. The eternal God is Lord of the tomorrows, as of the yesterdays, and the wisdom of man consists in the knowledge of and obedience to his holy will. During recent decades the mind of man, working in the physical real, has unveiled the lucid and wise order of the world. If, in the next few decades, a like inventiveness is devoted to enterprises of moral discovery and social engineering, there will be a new revelation of God in the fellowship and service of man.

It behooves us, gathered in a university, to seek anew the spiritual foundations of life, which alone can endure the wind and weather of the world. By religion I mean no mere abstraction, much less a huddle of sects, but a mighty law and principle of being; the faith that what is needed for the good of humanity is obtainable; the confidence that, under God, the moral intelligence of the race can be mobilized to defeat ignorance, iniquity, and stupidity. It can be done, and we can have a part in the divine enterprise, lifting our fleeting lives into epic worth and meaning. History—the great voice from behind—speaks in no uncertain tones, telling us that in spiritual faith and fraternal righteousness lies the way to national greatness, world order, and the far off divine event toward which humanity moves.

Keep heart, O Comrade! God may be delayed
By evil, but He suffers no defeat;
Even as a chance rock in an upland brook
May change a river's course; and yet no rock—
No, nor the baffling mountains of the world—
Can hold it from its destiny, the sea.
God is not foiled; the drift of the world Will
Is stronger than all wrong. Earth and her years,
Down joy's bright way, or sorrow's long road,
Are moving toward the purpose of the skies.

Dear Pastor, You are Careless

An Unmailed Letter to a Member of the Clergy

DEAR PASTOR: Not that I blame you at all. We are all careless. The other day Mrs. Smith entered the store and came directly to me, a slip of paper in hand. I had, it seems, sold her three yards and a half of goods some days before at eighty-five cents a yard and, by some arithmetical method now quite inscrutable to me, had made the total amount of her bill three dollars and sixty-eight cents. When she reached home she figured over her sales slip and I stood condemned in black and white. Confronted with the evidence of my guilt, I shame-facedly confessed, apologized, restored the amount of the over-charge, owned myself wholly and completely in error and sought, not I hope wholly without success, to re-establish myself in Mrs. Smith's good opinion.

One day last month Mr. Reltin, another member of your congregation, sat as is his wont at the receipt of custom when Mr. Brown entered the bank and thrust through the wicket his bank book and fifty dollars, whereupon Mr. Reltin took the book quickly and wrote down sixty, not like the unjust steward to curry favor, but merely through inadvertence; and the next day Mr. Brown came back and said, "Look here, Jim, am I entitled to this?" and Mr. Reltin compared his entry and the deposit slip and made correction and thanked Mr. Brown and wondered, "How did I happen to do that?"

All of us make such blunders, for which the excuse never seems quite sufficient, but we make them and people "call" us and we are grateful, or ought to be—I think that often we really are; it depends much of course upon the manner and spirit of our correctors. You differ from Mr. Reltin and me only, I think, in that the nature of your high calling usually denies you the blessed privilege of being checked up and called promptly and sometimes sharply to account and thus in the easy flow of sermonic phrases you now and then let slip a fact which closely scrutinized proves to be no fact at all.

You told us one day about Elijah's curing Naaman the Syrian. Now of course it was not Elijah who did that, it was Elisha; but three times in the same sermon you made that slip of the tongue and no one twitted you with it, because to have done so would not have been respectful. Then one day you told us a story (used simply to point a moral, and for the purpose a good, effective story) about Napoleon and I enjoyed it until some months later when you told us the same story, this time about Alexander. It may, for ought I know, be true of either one, but, from its very nature, it can hardly be true of both. Then last week you quoted two lines from Keats which lines, when I reached home, I found in the collected works of William Shakespeare. Inside the family circle I proudly displayed my erudition, announcing that the next time I saw you I should remind you of that quotation but my wife vetoed the idea and, on reflection, I gave it up. A man is not always thankful for having his carelessnesses corrected, especially when his position is one of standing in the community and his calling one singularly free from face to face criticism—as to criticism which is not face to face, of that you perhaps have your share.

"Besides," my wife continued, "suppose it was William Shakespeare, instead of Keats? What does it matter?"

Upon which question I have been thinking deeply.

If there be any man to whom not only lying lips but inaccurate lips should be wholly unknown, one who should have truth in the inward parts and wisdom even in those parts which are hidden, is it not the man who from the pulpit proclaims the gospel which is to save men? And because he is not, like the merchant and banker, called often to account by others, should he not therefore set the more careful watch upon his own words? He speaks not only to grown men and women, whose creeds are for the most part made and their characters fixed; he speaks also to the young, whose creeds are without form and void, whose characters are still plastic; and he talks to them concerning the most important questions which they will ever consider, questions of right and wrong, of duty and sacrifice, of their relations to each other and to God. These young people are immature but they are not therefore uncritical. Their training of every day is largely directed to the quick recognition and prompt rooting out of little carelessnesses; for just such carelessnesses they are "marked down" in their tests and recitations; and when one to whom they should look for guidance and direction mentions Heroditus and Homer in such fashion as to imply that they were contemporaries, when he attributes the Songs Without Words to Haydn, or quotes from John Ruskin sentiments uttered by John Stewart Mill, is he not fatally undermining their confidence in anything that he may tell them? If they have found that they cannot, with unshaken confidence, accept his statements regarding earthly things, how shall they believe him when he talks of heavenly things?

I owe you much, dear pastor. I can perhaps repay a little if I can make you also ponder upon this matter. Sincerely,

REMINDER SPURLING.

Spiritualism—Would Christ Approve It?

By William E. Barton

SPIRITUALISM is a relatively new word, but the thing for which it stands is as old as the witch of Endor. A belief that our loved ones who have died are still living leads very naturally to the inquiry whether it is possible for us to communicate with them. Spiritualism, which may be said to have begun its career of publicity in the United States in Hydesville, New York, in the year 1848, ran its course, proved subject to the law of diminishing returns, was repudiated publicly by the survivor among the Fox sisters who gave it being, and seemed in the way to pass as nearly out of existence as any such phase of belief ever passes. Then rose the Society for Psychical Research, with its effort to investigate scientifically the phenomena of alleged spiritual communication, and its proceedings have filled many volumes of more or less interesting reading.

The investigations of this society, however, had a very limited vogue, nor can it be claimed that the investigations of the eminent men who comprised it led any further than to the working hypothesis that some form of influence that might be defined as the conscious attempt of disembodied spirits to communicate with their friends on earth might be the agency by which to explain certain very vague phenomena recorded by the investigators.

The world war has given a new impetus to these forms of investigation and belief. We are reminded by persons whose names carry no little weight that it is unfair to denounce as frauds any whole class of people such as professional mediums, and that many who are not professionals have been the vehicle for transmission of alleged messages whose origin is not as yet explained except on the hypothesis of spiritual communication. In Great Britain there has been a perfect epidemic of spiritualism, and America has had and is having its share of interest in it.

"RAYMOND"

Most notable of the products of the war as it relates to the growth of spiritualism is the book "Raymond" by Sir Oliver Lodge. It is a memoir of his son and an account of alleged communications with him since his death. Raymond Lodge was the youngest son of Sir Oliver and Lady Lodge. He volunteered for service in the British army in September, 1914, received a commission as second lieutenant and was killed in action, September 14, 1915, aged twenty-six. About six weeks before the death of Raymond, Sir Oliver received from Mrs. Piper, the noted American medium, a message purporting to have come to her from the spirit world, from his old friend, F. W. H. Myers, author in his lifetime of two massive volumes on spiritualism. The message read as follows:

"Now, Lodge . . . Myers says, you take the part of the poet, and he will act Faunus . . . Ask Verrall; she will understand."

Sir Oliver had no difficulty in recognizing the reference to Verrall. Mrs. Verrall was a well known spiritualist and also a classical scholar. Sir Oliver was already a spiritualist, an active member of the Society of Psychical Research, and for a quarter of a century had been actively interested in the subject of survival after death. He made haste to inquire of Mrs. Verrall whether she understood the allusion to Faunus. She turned to her Horace and found a place where that poet referred to his narrow escape from death from a falling tree. It is a well known passage and one sometimes quoted in books on Latin grammar because of an unusual grammatical construction. Horace says that the falling of the tree might have killed him had not Faunus, guardian of poets, preserved him. Conington's translation of these lines reads:

Me, the curst trunk, that smote my skull,
Had slain; but Faunus, strong to shield
The friends of Mercury, check'd the blow
In mid descent.

A SAFE GUESS

Mrs. Piper received this communication August 8, 1915, and mailed it to Sir Oliver. He wrote to Mrs. Verrall and she answered him on September 8, citing the above text and translation. It would be interesting to know just what impression Sir Oliver got from it when he first received this interpretation. Apparently Mrs. Verrall guessed correctly the meaning of Mrs. Piper's allusion. It is not necessary to suppose that Mrs. Piper received any supernatural information concerning Faunus, nor was it necessary for her to become a classical scholar. In her rather wide and superficial reading she could quite easily have fallen upon the passage. No great risk was run in sending it to Sir Oliver. Assuming that his studies in other lines had caused him to ignore the passage, it was a safe guess that Mrs. Verrall would be able to identify the reference. If after that nothing happened to Sir Oliver it was because his friend Myers was doing for him what Faunus did for Horace. If anything terrible happened it would be safe to assume that it would have been worse, but for the protection of Myers still acting the part of Faunus, defender of the friends of Mercury. Sir Oliver Lodge is no poet and the allusion was rather far-fetched. But it answered all the requirements.

It is interesting to note, however, that Myers, who was a noted spiritualist in his day and master of all the arts of that system, being now in heaven, was compelled to send his messages to his old friend, equally skilled in matters of spiritualism, by way of Mrs. Piper and by further way of Mrs. Verrall. Far-fetched and ambiguous and roundabout as the message was, it is the only thing in the book possessing any approach to inherent dignity. The delphic oracle was not more ambiguous. The Faunus message, if never interpreted, did no harm, and if interpreted it was certain to be a comfort to a man like Sir Oliver Lodge, whether anything happened or not.

VISIT THE MEDIUM

Six days after Sir Oliver received Mrs. Verrall's interpretation of Mrs. Piper's transmitted message from Mr. Myers, Second Lieutenant Raymond Lodge was killed in action. His death occurred on September 14 and the family soon learned of it. Sir Oliver and Lady Lodge lost little time in going to a professional medium. A Mrs. Kennedy, who had lost a son in June of the same year and had introduced herself to Sir Oliver Lodge by letter on August 16, offered her good offices as soon as she knew of the death of Raymond, and she arranged for very nearly all the sittings which followed in which Sir Oliver and his wife consulted professional mediums and obtained what they thought were revelations. Lady Lodge went on the 25th of September, and Sir Oliver hurried to London two days later to see the same medium, a Mrs. Leonard. This Mrs. Leonard had as her control a little Indian maiden named Feda and talked a sort of foolish baby-talk, pronouncing Raymond, "Yaymond" and who wiggled her own body to show how Raymond's dog wagged its tail in heaven.

We will not follow Sir Oliver and Lady Lodge on their weary and credulous tramp from one medium to another. The story from this time on is the drivel of mediums under the alleged control of Feda, the Indian child, Moonstone, a dead Yogi, Biddy, an Irish washer-woman, and other puerile or senile personalities of the spirit world. The details may be read in full in Sir Oliver's book and they are pathetic in their vapidness.

The first message came to Mrs. Kennedy from her own son through a professional medium. It read:

"I have seen that boy, Sir Oliver's son; he's better, and has a splendid rest: Tell his people."

INFORMATION NOT IMPOSSIBLE

Perhaps in the spirit land a lad of seventeen speaks of a man of twenty-six and commissioned officer as "that boy." But that is not the custom in the British army; indeed, the activity of Mrs. Kennedy in these subsequent sittings with professional mediums opens every necessary opportunity for such information as a medium requires. Sir Oliver states he believes that Mrs. Kennedy did not give the medium any information as to who were the distinguished visitors coming to them; and he says, it is not probable that mediums have time to hunt up family information. Both suppositions are distinctly contrary to probability. Indeed, when it was known that a son of Sir Oliver Lodge had been killed every medium in London must have been on tiptoe with expectation that he and his family would be seeking communication with Raymond. The newspapers must have furnished them a considerable part of the information they wanted and Mrs. Kennedy may at least have dropped a few unintentional intimations that the people for whom she was arranging sittings were very important people.

To this low estate has science fallen in Sir Oliver Lodge's investigation that the evidence which he submits contains all the crudities and vulgarities of the trance-medium, the table-rapper and the automatic writer. By these several methods each with its invitation to fraud and its necessity of employing professional interpreters of alleged spirit messages, he and his family are supposed to have communicated with his dead son. All Sir Oliver Lodge's twenty-five years of work in the Society of Psychical Research had not availed to make it possible for Raymond to come to his father directly. All his dead associates in the Society of Psychical Research, including Mr. Myers, were helpless to come to him, excepting through these crude and suspicious agencies. It is interesting to read that at one of these seances a table which had been rapping out Raymond's messages became so charged with Raymond's living personality that it tried to climb up into Lady Lodge's lap.

Sir Oliver Lodge himself in an interview a few months after the publication of his book, admitted that no progress had been made in subsequent revelations. He said:

"The stress and anxiety to communicate have subsided in our case. The wish to give evidence remains, but now that the fact of survival and happy employment is established, the communications are placid."

The happy employment referred to would appear to be chiefly the use of cigars and whisky and soda and playing with the dog which Feda described with characteristic ambiguity. If Sir Oliver and his family are comforted, no one else need complain.

PROFESSOR HYSLOP'S VIEW

Prof. James H. Hyslop in his book, "Life After Death," published just before his own death, approaches the phenomena of the professional mediums in a much more scientific spirit than Sir Oliver Lodge. He admits the crudity and vulgarities of the mediums, and he urges that the intellectual limitations of the medium, the inadequacy of language to convey meanings except in terms of the sensory life and the pragmatic nature of the ordinary mind, carry with them an almost irresistible tendency to conceive of any spiritual environment after the analogy of the physical world.

This is the best explanation that can probably be given and it is entitled to some weight. Hyslop says:

"The spiritual life after death is mentally created, so to speak, and hence the analogies with the earthly life are not sensory in respect to stimulus, but mental and creative." That is to say, it is not the physical life that survives, but the inner life and death leaves us with the internal mental faculties intact. The spirit enters into the new life with memory, imagination and self-consciousness; and it builds up an idealistic world in the new state of existence formed according to our degree of progress in spiritual things, and more or less a reflection of our earthly experience.

He, therefore, maintains that there is a three-fold limitation. The spirit itself is limited in its new environment. The medium is limited in powers of interpretation. Those for whom the message are intended are limited in respect to that which they are able to receive from the spirit world.

Accepting this statement by Prof. Hyslop as reasonable two questions then arise. First, why is it that with heaven filled with spirits in all grades of spiritual development, virtually the only ones which have succeeded in establishing communication with earth are those who talk baby talk, or who jibber in foolish, broken sentences? Why must Raymond in looking about heaven for someone to convey a message to his father, communicate through the little Indian maiden Feda, whose Indian chatter appears as such only to those who never knew any Indians? Why must he go to the spirit of Moonstone, the dead Yogi, or to the soul of Biddy, the Irish washer-woman? Why do none of Oliver Lodge's associates in the Society of Psychical Research talk to him in language as good as they were accustomed to use when on earth?

Agnes Repplier in a magazine article, entitled "Dead Authors," makes a rather long list of people who were able to write good literature when they were on earth, from whom alleged revelations have now been received, and neither Mark Twain nor O. Henry nor Charles Dickens is now able to write anything nearly as good as when he was on earth.

THE CALIBRE OF THE MEDIUM

The other question relates to the intellectual and spiritual calibre of the medium. Even Mrs. Piper, most famous of American mediums, had as her habitual "control" a queer named spirit less intelligent than herself. Prof. William James, who studied her for twenty years, had to admit that he awaited "new facts, clearer and more precise" before he could say with certainty whether her alleged revelations contained anything of the supernatural. He died waiting. Meantime her powers of this character instead of growing more brilliant have diminished.

My own mother died more than twenty-five years ago. She was an earnest, spiritually-minded woman, who had implicit faith in immortality, and if there is such a thing as communication between the two worlds, her spirit could have no greater joy than in communication with the children whom she dearly loved. Let us suppose then that my mother desires to send a message to me. What would be the process by which, under the existing order, she is to establish communication with her eldest son?

In the first place she will be compelled to look about heaven until she finds some little Indian maiden, or some Irish washer-woman who is on speaking terms with some particular medium; then Feda or Biddy will communicate with me through some woman, whom my mother, if living, would be very desirous that I should not know. Then with my mother's beautiful thoughts vulgarized into alleged Indian baby talk by Feda and still further vulgarized by the medium, I obtain some precious piece of information which it is supposed the medium could not have known and which therefore the spirit of my mother must have communicated.

CHARACTER OF MESSAGES

What will that message be? This perhaps, or something as important, that there is a small hole in the toe of my left stocking caused by a nail in my shoe, of which up to the present time I have had no knowledge. If having paid

$2.00 to the medium I return home and find the hole and the nail I am supposed to admit that this must have been a message from my mother in heaven.

It is my opinion that if my mother in heaven ever sends a message to me she will send it through some channel that she would have recognized while living and that the message itself will possess inherent value.

Would Jesus have recognized this system of alleged communication with the dead as part of his system of faith and righteousness? Would he have sanctioned a system which in its very nature is such an invitation to fraud and which in all the years of its operation has proved so barren of spiritual results?

I do not think he would. I think he would tell us to have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. This utterance of his apostle is thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of Jesus himself. In the dark he said nothing, but came that men might have the light of life.

A belief in immortality is not of necessity religious. The Jews in Old Testament time had hardly any faith in immortality but were religious. The devotees of the ouija board have faith in immortality, but it is a faith utterly destitute of religion. A heaven made up of the bad smells of earth, which is Sir Oliver Lodge's scientific statement of the material basis of his heaven, is not made other than malodorous by reason of its being located in some other world than this. A heaven whose occupations are wholly carnal and whose interests are destitute of any element of spirituality is no more spiritual in the other world than it would be in this. This is the patent characteristic of modern spiritualism, that it is profoundly unspiritual. This is plain in the whole dreary mass of so-called evidence on this subject that, true or false, it is unimportant in its content and wholly non-religious in its spirit.

REVELATIONS FROM JESUS

With Jesus faith in immortality was more than belief in continuity of existence. This is life eternal, as he taught it, that men may know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent.

I read last summer a dreary mass of stupid "revelations" which were turning the heads of some otherwise sensible people. Abraham Lincoln, Samuel Taylor Coleridge and Jesus were among the people who, as alleged, talked through a medium. Neither Lincoln nor Coleridge had risen in intellectual stature since leaving the earth, and I should not like to be asked to characterize the alleged revelations from Jesus.

If in all this mass of fraud and credulity and superstition there be any element of truth, it is truth which thus far has yielded the world no good whatever. It would be better to believe that our dead friends were mercifully lost in dreamless and never-waking repose than to suppose that they were to be confined forever in the kind of heaven which the mediums reveal, which is nothing more nor less than a celestial asylum for the feeble-minded. Those who were otherwise than feeble-minded on earth appear to deteriorate speedily on reaching the heaven of the mediums. And those deteriorate mentally, and sometimes morally and spiritually, who here on earth follow these wizards that peep and mutter.

I heard George Adam Smith in a parlor conference of ministers say in reply to a question that he had not known a single instance in Great Britain of a person who had given himself to these spiritualistic investigations who had not appreciably deteriorated mentally, and he added that in very many cases the deterioration did not stop there.

The religion of Jesus is the religion of righteousness and peace and of a sound mind. He, I think, would have no fellowship with modern spiritualism.

Buddhism: An Impression

By Clarence H. Hamilton

IT is not easy for a westerner to formulate in few words the totality of impression which comes to him from a study of the vast and many-sided phenomenon which we know as Buddhism. His experience is best symbolized by his emotions on first entering a real Buddhist temple in an eastern land, if such is his good fortune. Within its dim recesses he may become aware of much that awakens no sympathetic chord in his soul, some things that may seem grotesquely irrelevant to the goods that he is taught to esteem in life, and a few elements that he may believe had better not be at all. The droning chant to the clang of bells, the sharp knocking of wooden blocks, the booming pulsations of the great drum; the bowings and posturings of the priests, the curling smoke of the incense which fills his nostrils and seems almost to drug the sense—these may arouse his curiosity but they seem vacant of living significance. As he surveys the array of images lining the wall, patrons of superstition and magic, at the same time reflecting on the sterile futility of the monastic life in the midst of the vast unmet needs of society, he may find kindling within himself a mood of adverse criticism, it may be even of revulsion.

IMAGE OF BUDDHA

But in the midst of the variegated trappings there is one thing that calls forth another reaction which cuts across the current of this mood and stems it. High above the great altar, drawing the gaze with something of the secret irresistibility of a lode-stone, there is an object of dignity, of beauty, of impressiveness which is the center and solving significance of the whole scene. It is the image of Buddha, seated in passionless serenity, his eyes half closed in deep meditation, his brow unruffled by trace of earthly care, his hands resting in his lap. Despite the apparent absorption in its own inward thoughts, the figure bends slightly forward in an attitude suggestive of benign pity and graciousness toward the restless human life below—yes, even to the questioning occidental in its midst. He must be a dull, unimaginative soul indeed who, knowing even a little about the life of Gautama, can look up into that calm, golden face without some sense of awe at the power that is suggested behind its repose. Whatever may be the feeling about other aspects of the temple here, at least one becomes aware of something universally human and profound.

Buddhism presents itself to us wrapped in many folds of legend, speculation and ritual. On attempting to read its sacred books the student finds grotesque and puerile stories mingled with long, repetitious didactic passages and dreary wastes of instructions governing monastic practice. He is astonished to find how meagre are the ascertainable facts in the life of the founder, to learn that there is no full canonical biography. He is confronted with stupendous masses of subtle theological and psychological analysis. He discovers that the order founded by Buddha has gone through many vicissitudes, has split into various sects and spread in diverse forms to other countries than India, the home of its birth. He spends many a weary hour over the vast miscellany of material, and, like the visitor in the temple, has moods in which he questions the worth of much that confronts him.

INNER ELEMENT OF UNITY

But continued study makes him increasingly aware of an inner element running through all the bewildering ramifications of the complex mass that gives it unity and significance. That element is the spirit and personality of Buddha himself. Despite the fact that his earthly life is but dimly revealed to us through mists of legend and miracle and the dust of intellectual conflicts of by-gone ages it is yet marvelous how a breath, a spirit, a life reveals itself, giving us the feel of a definite personality. We can appreciate Buddha as well as, perhaps better than many other figures in history, the facts of whose lives are more surely known. It is the phenomenon over again of the "Little Flowers of St. Francis" than which nothing could be less reliable as history or more certain as revelation of spirit. What, then, is there about this personality revealed through the many books and the far-flung historical organization that makes Buddhism the powerful influence it has been and still is in great areas of human life?

Buddhism is a philosophical religion. We venture a philosophical interpretation. Buddha's tremendous human appeal lies in the fact that he recognized one great hemisphere of life's fullest need, and realized in his own experience the achievement of its satisfaction. The need of inner calm, of collectedness, of complete self-control, of hedging in all the split-off ends of action that tend to disintegrate personality—this is one of the great enduring human needs. It matters little that Buddha conceived spiritual poise under a false psychology of desire and a reading of existence under the caption of misery. It matters little, also, that he involved it in a curious notion of ethical causality, karma, and that other basis for great debate, Nirvana. These conceptions, with all the subtlety of discussion gathering about them, are after all accidents of the time. They are the media through which the thought of Buddha moved in the explication of his insight to his followers. But the insight itself and the surety of its attainment blazes like a beacon light from the experience of the Great Enlightenment, sparkles among the gems of the Dhammapada, relieves the tedium of long discourses on the non-existence of the soul and the components of existence, and shines with all the beauty of poesy in the psalms of the brethren and sisters.

"The Master, seeing me by troop of gods
Begirt and followed, thereupon a smile
Revealing, by this utterance made response;
'By discipline of holy life, restraint
And mastery of self; hereby a man
Is holy; this is holiness supreme!'"*

Complete, inner, spiritual poise, enabling one to meet all the exigencies and disturbances of life with a profound sense of being somehow superior to every situation—the recognition of this need and the possibility of satisfying it is the element of universal appeal in Buddhism, and the part that remains as fresh and young as the stars in heaven. It is the far-blown fragrance of this great truth that touches the heart with awe in the presence of the gilded image of the temple.

OUR DIFFERENT AGE

I have said that this is a hemisphere of human need. It is not the whole. And herein reflection raises questions about Buddsim. The Master's vast pity led him to teach broadcast the way of rigorous self-control to the end of inward poise and peace for his wandering, distracted brethren. But we have fallen upon a different age in which wide over the ball of the world we have become aware of the intricate tangle of society's needs. We realize that the external world which is the object of Buddhistic aversion and scorn is a system of influences that play upon and include the individual in a way that makes his separate salvation an all but impossible affair. So we do not stop where the Master stopped, but ask after an end beyond his end. Poise, collectedness, serenity—but to what end? Here Buddhism gives no clear answer beyond saying that this condition is good in itself, that he who has attained it is a Buddha, or enlightened one, and that it is the privilege of a Buddha to teach this doctrine. But this answer fails to satisfy our present-day understanding of the condition of humanity. Spiritual poise is a great good, but when it expends itself in simply cultivating more of itself, whether in its original possessor or in others it appears to move in a circle too remote from the full range of legitimate human interests.

CURING LIFE'S ILLS

The reason for this is largely the fact that we no longer share Buddha's original presupposition that the scene of existence is one of essential misery from which we should turn resolutely away. Our age is realistic and pragmatistic, blinking no evils of life, whether individual or social, but believing profoundly in the progressive melioration of conditions. There is no diminishment of the need for men of the deep spiritual refinement and balance which Buddhism recognizes, but the need is for them to put their hands to the tasks of our work-a-day world, to absorb the shocks which the grind of solving problems of human relationship inevitably entails. Buddhism can bring itself abreast of this modern demand, only if the notion of saviorhood in the Mahayana doctrine (which was not a part of the Master's original teaching) be broadened to mean more than preaching the law of the great world-soul, Dharma-kaya; broadened to include mingling in all the ways of men in the spirit of self-forgetting endeavor, to the end that the total burden of humanity may be lifted not by solving the problem of evil in general, but by searching for each of the separate ills of life its specific cure.

Can Buddhism make the transition? When one considers its deeply entrenched monasticism, its heavy load of ceremonialism and ritualism, its past sluggishness in purging itself of degrading and idolatrous tendencies, the back-drag of its original assumptions that desire is evil, that the world is but a theater of empty phenomena of no permanent worth, that the highest goal of effort is the non-social Nirvana, the outlook for any adequate adjustment to modern world tendency is indeed dark. In spiritual poise it centered upon a great value, but it omitted its counterpart, ameliorative service. Some of its modern reformers attempt, indeed, to supply this defect, but it involves a reversal of some of its foundation principles. In the meantime there is dawning upon the horizon of the eastern world another religion penetrated with the spirit of another great personality which likewise proclaims the beauty of spiritual tranquility and the loss of the life of self, but which places this good in the setting of a continuous endeavor to make better the conditions of all men in this world here and now.

Public Opinion and Theology

The Earl Lectures of the Pacific School of Religion

By BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL

Bishop McConnell says that the influence of the congregation itself upon preaching has never been adequately expounded. This is perfectly true. Nor has the whole popular spirit in its influence upon theology been expounded anywhere, so far as we know, with such insight and logical setting forth as in these lectures.—The Biblical World.

Price $1.50, plus 12 cents postage.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

VERSE

The Never-Old

THEY who can smile when others hate,
Nor bind the heart with frosts of fate,
Their feet will go with laughter bold
The green roads of the Never-Old.

They who can let the spirit shine
And keep the heart a lighted shrine,
Their feet will glide with fire-of-gold
The green roads of the Never-Old.

They who can put the self aside
And in Love's saddle leap and ride,
Their eyes will see the gates unfold
To green roads of the Never-Old.

EDWIN MARKHAM.

I May Not Have a Garden

I MAY not have a garden,
For I am one who roams
Along the high road far and near,
Past many flower-lit homes.

I may not have a garden,
For I'm of gypsy birth,
No measured plot with gates and bars
Can hold my love of earth.

The long white road's my garden,
With stones its rows are set,
And wayside flowers for posies,
And dreams for mignonette.

But oh! the little gardens
Folks tend as I pass by—
They make my song a wistful song,
My laugh a wistful sigh.

HILDA MORRIS.

Power

IF power is not a trust it is a theft.
No claim of personal possession holds.
No private right makes good the title. Power
Inherently and indefeasibly
Belongs to all. The individual Unaided and alone scarce generates
A mite of might. The mass creates; the mass Alone can own. Democracy entrusts
Authority, may often delegate
Dominion well-nigh absolute, as trust;
But never does nor can it alienate
Its power, make over its authority
Beyond recall. Its chieftain wields a might Beyond the fondest dreams of despot kings.
But dare he rule by right claimed as his own,

At once he topples from the throne, is dragged Incontinently down to bite the dust
He's made of first and last. The sacrilege
Of idols of today's tomorrow's grace.
Democracy is merciless when rule
Is flaunted, vain and smug, as rule. The great
Is servant, only service can exalt.
The service ended, all the gews and gaws
Of pomp and circumstance are forfeit. All
Revert to those who can alone bestow.

JOSEPH ERNEST MCAFEE.

The Thief

MY lady frowned on me, alas!
And so to gain her sweet good will
I borrowed all the gold that lies
Imprisoned in the daffodil;

And all the silver that the moon
Spills down upon the sleeping lake
From her rich store; and yet no love
In my dear lady's heart could wake.

But then I stole the blackbird's song
That rings from out the lilac tree
In praise of sunlight through the rain,
And lo, my lady smiled on me.

H. H.

Trees

MY sorrow to the trees I took;
They seemed to read it like a book.
The pines and hemlocks filled the air
With incense sweet that seemed a prayer;
The spruce shed drops of golden balm,
The oaks dropped mast into my palm;
The silver birch, like any sprite,
Seemed dancing in the morning light,
As though it said, "Come dance with me;
Forget your sorrow in my glee."
The poppies laughed like girls and boys
That fling abroad their sunny joys;
And, ere I knew it, sorrow fled,
And in my heart was peace instead.
So wonder not if I am seen
In woodlands when the leaves are green,
Or when, in autumn, I behold
Them clad in brown or red or gold,
Or yet in winter when they're bare
(Save pines and hemlocks, ever fair);
For every tree is good to know,
And none but has a balm for woe,
That gladly it will give to bless
A soul that's full of wretchedness.

CHARLES G. BLANDEN.

The West Virginia Miners' War

THE West Virginia Miners' war is not over. It began more than a decade ago, and it will continue another decade or so if the conditions that cause it are not removed. There are periods of truce or lulls in the fighting, but the sense of wrong, the denial of fundamental rights, the suspicions that are implicit in a relationship resting upon ideas of force, and the continuance of a paternalistic social order all conspire to make for internecine war. Nor will it ever be settled by the appeal to force except as that appeal convinces both parties that the contest is futile and persuades them to adopt ways of reconciliation.

The lurid reports of wholesale killings seem to have been somewhat overdone. Outside such genuine street battles as that in Mateawan, for which several officers of the law and others have recently been on trial, the shooting seems to have been confined to sniping and to promiscuous firing from the mountain sides. These are mountain people. It was in this section that the famous McCoy-Hatfield feud raged for so many years. One of the Hatfields is sheriff and was on trial for the shooting. The judge remarked that this fact had much to do with the situation. It is a habit among them to appeal to the rifle, and a sense of wrong dies hardly in their hearts. A pure American stock makes the cry of alien and bolshevik not so easy an explanation as has been the case of late in labor warfare.

* * *

The Causes of the War

The mountaineers are strongly individualistic; mine operators are paternalistic. The valleys are narrow, the land has been purchased by the mining companies, and the homes, stores, schools, churches and everything else which men live by are largely company owned and controlled. When a miner's pay envelope is handed to him it has rent and other bills subtracted; when his wife buys things the family needs, she goes to the company store. This is not always the case, but the "company system" is all too much the rule, and even if it is administered in a way that is economical to the miner, so far as dollars and cents are concerned, it is still paternalistic and full of petty irritations. It breeds trouble in the Anglo-Saxon breast. When one sees his family evicted, his goods set out in the road, his wife and children facing snow and chill because he dared assert the free-born American right to join an association of his fellows, he reverts to his mountain habit and takes down his rifle.

This is exactly what has happened in these West Virginia mining districts. The New York Post, the Baltimore Sun and other papers sent investigators into this district to study the situation, and this is their story. The men joined the miners' union; the companies hired spies to report upon them; the penalty was discharge; and the Baldwin-Felts detectives were hired by the company and sent to evict them. Some employers there were who refused to evict their workers, but hundreds took to tents and lived the winter through in them, dependent upon union funds and fellow miners' help for daily sustenance. The chief irritant seems to have been the employment by the company of spies and detectives of the Baldwin-Felts variety, and the enlisting of deputy sheriffs under company pay. This is a type of Hessianism that is at the bottom of more of our labor strife than we are aware of as yet.

* * *

The Miners' Demands

The superficial impression has obtained, of course, that the West Virginia war was a part of the general tendency of labor to go radical. The history of the miners' federation in the west, the general impression aroused by the thirty hour week demands of soft coal miners in 1919 and the hysteria aroused over all labor demands as bolshevik, which was so largely promoted by the steel interests, have conspired to create this impression. From a careful reading, however, ones does not get the impression that the objects of the miners' union are particularly radical, unless the demand for a six hour day be so considered. When one considers the dark, wet, underground nature of the work, six hours would seem to be a humane workday. The expressed objects run as follows: 1. Earnings equal to dangers and arduousness of the work. 2. Lawful pay, in cash, for work done, and abolition of all company charges for rent, etc. 3. Use of all latest appliances for protection of health, life and limb. 4. Installation of best possible drainage, ventilation and safety devices to reduce the appalling accident, health and death rates in American mining. 5. Adequate timber installations for roofs, pillars, etc. 6. A six hour day underground. 7. Prohibition of labor of all children under sixteen years. 8. Abrogation of all laws and rules that permit cheating or indefiniteness in weights.

* * *

The Way Out

There is a way out of all such industrial strife. There are those who say of labor war, as they do of all war, that it will always be war. These minds are essentially pagan. The fact that they give assent to the church conventions in their personal relations does not change the pagan character of their philosophy and ethics. They believe in might, not as a means to right but as a means to conquest and personal, class or national advantage.

Fundamental to all else, as a way out, is a frank, open recognition of the right of workmen to unite. Next is the abolition of paternalism and the adoption of fraternalism in its place. We live in America and the twentieth century, and both are democratic in their convictions and principles. Then must come, as it will, an end of the hiring of spies, armed thugs and armed retainers employed by the corporation under the guise of deputy sheriffs. On the labor side, union powers must come to mean validation of all contracts and promises and an end of all such mischief as lowering production in order to create jobs. Conciliation will have to be appealed to by both sides, and the club and gun put under taboo. All such radical nomenclature of agitation as red, bolshevik, anarchist on one side and tyrant, Czar, slave-driver on the other, will have to be given up, for it creates a vicious state of mind and inhibits conciliation.

Of course none of these things can be done without a basic recognition of the human factor precedent to the economic. So long as dollars are put before men in industrial organization and the technique of machine process is made paramount to that of labor policy, there will be trouble. "Men may saw wood and hammer iron without love," said Tolstoi, "but they cannot handle men without love; you cannot handle the honey bee as you would wood and iron without injury to both yourself and the bee." More fundamental than any scheme of organization is the divine plan of good will, mutual regard and the use of the golden rule. There will always be war in a democratic state where corporations own the earth on which men live and out of which men must earn their living, and where these same corporations administer their business as if the men on the earth were mechanical fixtures in the business of turning natural resources into profits.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

Contributors to this Issue

WILLIAM E. BARTON, D.D., minister First Congregational Church, Oak Park, Ill.; author "The Soul of Abraham Lincoln," "Four Hitherto Unpublished Gospels," etc., etc.

CLARENCE H. HAMILTON, Ph.D., Disciples' missionary, professor of philosophy in the University of Nanking, China.

British Table Talk

London, June, 1921.

NO one with small boys within hail will be allowed to forget that the one thing of interest in the world today is the Test Match beginning at Nottingham. Coal troubles may be unsettled; Silesia may engage the grave attention of the Powers; the world may be in distress and men's hearts may be failing for heaviness, but first we shall look at the scores of the great match. And while the prime minister, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. H. G. Wells and others have their place in our scheme of things, they will yield for the moment to "Johnny" Douglas and Warwick Armstrong, and it is doubtful whether Dean Inge will refrain from reading the newspaper for this once.

The curious interest of this people in cricket and like matters must have been responsible for our reputation in Germany before the war. We were written down as a decadent race, with no other concern but sport. But Germany, as Mr. Gustave le Bon shows in his psychological study of our times, "The World in Revolt," made serious errors in psychology, and this was one of them. It is a mark of this people that men have won fame in the cricket field and have afterwards been cabinet ministers; that the same mystical poet wrote "The Hound of Heaven" and an ode to the "Lancashire County Eleven" with lines like these:

"Oh Mr. Hornby and Mr. Barlow long ago";

and that a cardinal (one of our few) remembered late in his pilgrimage the joy and honor of being in the Harrow cricket eleven. It is all very strange to the Teuton professors. But who am I to condemn it? I, too, shall look first at the cricket scores tonight!

P. S.—Since I wrote this, the blow has fallen and Australia has won the first round.

* * *

The Decline in Candidates for the Ministry

At this season of the year the church of England is able to compute the number of its members seeking ordination with those in other years. It may be said that there is a very severe decline before the Anglican and other churches. For the present, the normal establishment of clergy will be far below strength. From a fearless article in "The Challenge" it is possible to gauge what is the present situation:

"This means not merely that the existing clergy in the towns are cruelly overworked—in itself a cause of ineffectiveness—but that evangelistic and missionary work (when the whole future of civilization depends on it) is practically an impossibility. Either we must obtain far more clergy or we must devise another system. I think we shall find that both are necessary. During the years 1872-1918 the total number of ordinations to the diaconate was 30,494, and of these 8,336 men were from Oxford and 8,635 from Cambridge. These figures are significant of a state of affairs which will not recur for a long time. The supply of men from the public schools and older universities is dwindling almost to nothing. Headmasters say that hardly any boys at the leading schools are considering holy orders, and the number of ordinands at present in residence at Oxford and Cambridge (excluding the 'Service' candidates) is believed to be very small."

This state of things is not peculiar to the church of England. All churches are suffering, though in churches less institutional, the loss is not so quickly felt. There is much to be said for the explanation that the failure is due to the economic barrier that fences off the ministry. Men must be content to put away the dream, not merely of wealth, but of freedom from financial hardship, if they are to enter the ministry. But it is certainly true to say that the men most needed are not kept out of the ministry by the fear of poverty. They are troubled by a theoretical uncertainty; they are not ready to commit themselves, so long as on many matters they are still seeking for light. And too often the gateway is made too straight. The shortage of these coming years will not be without value if it leads all the churches to call in their unused powers. Discoveries may be made of preachers with splendid gifts, now silent in their pews, and it may even lead to the useful inquiry whether it is necessary to the work of Christ that every district of a city should be equipped with a complete set of denominations with ministers to match.

* * *

Mr. Ponsonby's Criticisms of the Church

We are growing accustomed to criticisms of the churches from friends and well wishers outside the sanctuary. Some manage to "dissemble their love." Others are genuinely sorry that societies like the churches are missing their way. Much of this criticism fails because of its exaggeration. Much of it is weak because it is out of touch with present day facts. Indeed we who are within, could give the outside critic many valuable points if he were willing to receive them. In a recent work upon "Religion in Politics," that fine spirited rebel, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, makes the following charges, among others, against the churches. They are attacked for regarding certain recorded events as something spiritual. And then he adds, "That the salvation of the world should, for no intelligible reason, have suddenly been decided upon two thousand years ago by the Creator is a fact which does not appeal to the average twentieth century mind." Of course it does not. But even if unthinking Christians have so misinterpreted the plain faith of the church, there is no society on earth which should be judged by the most childish of its members, and no church should be measured by its camp followers. Or again, how foolish it is in these days to speak of "numberless sects" at strife with each other, or to picture the great majority of members in the churches as absorbed with doctrinal niceties which make no difference and have no ethical implications! And it is a wild and baseless charge to say, "It is very doubtful indeed whether the church can claim to have had a civilizing influence on the life of man during these twenty centuries." The method of such critics as Mr. Ponsonby is to separate the activities of churchmen into two kinds: the bad, which are due to their foolish absorption with creeds, and the good which are done in spite of their Faith.

* * *

Catholics and the Bible

There is to be a Catholic Bible Conference at Cambridge in July—so Cardinal Bourne has made known in a pastoral letter of peculiar interest. The letter finishes with an invitation to our "separated brethren to listen to what our Catholic scholars will endeavor to put before them." "Protestants," the cardinal admits, "are still in no small measure devoted to the word of God and have no liking for the growing disrespect and unbelief with which it is being treated, even by those who call themselves ministers of the Christian religion." No one who has followed the recent history of the Roman church will be surprised at this appeal. For some time, French Catholic scholars have done admirable work in biblical study. Cardinal Gasquet, for long one of our people, is a scholar respected and admired everywhere. There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of this new interest. But the strategy of it is at once clear and subtle. The most vehement foes of Rome are at the same time the most uncompromising foes of modern criticism. Mr. Kensit, for example, considers Rome and rationalism two enemies to be fought, and under the head of rationalists he groups all biblical students who do not accept the traditional Protestant view of the Bible. But here is the cardinal "spiking the guns of his enemies" and saying, in effect, to the foes of modern biblical criticism, "See, we are with you on this matter. Why cannot we understand each other on this common ground? Come to Cambridge and hear what we have to say."

* * *

A Quaker Scholar on Human Progress

The Swarthmore Lecture is delivered every spring at the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends. Since the custom was instituted, many thoughtful messages to the times have been given by the chosen lecturers. This year Mr. T. E. Harvey spoke upon "The Long Pilgrimage: Human Progress in the Light of the Christian Hope." Mr. Harvey was for some years a member of parliament, where he won a hearing, often for unpopular views, by his fine spirit and his unquestioned sincerity. At the same time he is a careful student of theology and a writer of distinction. Now as the warden of the Swarthmore settlement, Leeds, he has a task which enables him to bring his gifts to the help of his own society and of the adult schools to which that society has given so much of its love and service. It was therefore fitting that he should be chosen this year to lecture before his own people. Upon the debated question of human progress on which Dean Inge and Professor Bury have written, he spoke with hesitation. If progress means the growth of a man's power over the physical forces of nature, progress was an evident fact; but if progress means a continually better organization of society with less pain and oppression and more human happiness, the lecturer would not venture to answer the question whether or not mankind had made progress. He found himself, however, always brought to the mysterious fact of human personality: "The good man's value to the community is out of all proportion to the numerical ratio of good men to bad." And the more hopeful meaning of human life could be read if it were regarded as a place of pilgrimage for the long wavering line of human souls, without answering the question as to whether the destiny of particular nations or civilization is one of perpetual growth. But for Mr. Harvey this does not mean the duty of world-renunciation. His ideal of the Christian society is not that of a community cut away from the service of the world. "The fellowship of Christian disciples today," he said, "should be to the world what a good monastery was to the church in former ages. It should be in constant relationship with those outside it—not self-contained and living its own life, but ever seeking to share its apprehension of truth, its vision and its love with all whom it can reach." In such words Mr. Harvey speaks for the Society of Friends as it faces the new age. And this vision helps to explain why so many seekers after the life of truth and service are finding their home in that Society.

* * *

A Congregational Church Becomes a Guildhouse

Near to Victoria Station in the west of London is Eccleston Square. There various labor organizations have made a home. In the square, before they came, was a Congregational church, which had done excellent service in other days and till this hour was the scene of thoughtful ministry of the Rev. A. H. Storrow, a scholar and a poet. But this week the church is to come into other hands. After negotiations conducted most cordially by the pastor and his people, and by the guild, the church buildings now become the center of the Fellowship which has been formed by Miss Maude Royden and Dr. Percy Dearmer. Those preachers are both members of the church of England, and for long it was hoped that some buildings would be allotted to them by their own church. That hope proved vain. Now, there is no Congregationalist but will be glad that to his church has fallen the honor of providing room for a great experiment. It is the boast of the Congregational churches that they encourage boldness and initiative, and they will not suffer in the eyes of the church universal through this experiment, though it turns a church into a guild house.

EDWARD SHILLITO.

BOOKS

THE GREAT STEEL STRIKE AND ITS LESSON. By William Z. Foster. Mr. Foster was the executive secretary and real generalissimo of the great steel strike of 1919. This volume from his own pen gives much of the inside history of that great struggle. He writes with a good deal of warmth at times but endeavors to keep the objective temper. His ability is undoubted and his devotion to the cause of labor is beyond question, but like all special advocates he is not without bias. This is illustrated in his assessment of such plans as that of industrial representation outside of union organization, calling them "worthless" and "tyrannical." However, one who would know the story of the steel strike must read this book. He can get nowhere else as vivid pictures of the suppression of free speech and assemblage and of the titanic forces engaged on either side. (Heubsch. 265 pages).

THE AIMS OF LABOR. By Arthur Henderson, M. P. This little book is the finest rescript of the loftiest political pronouncement of a century, viz, that of the British Labor Movement at the time of the great war. It was called at the time an "epoch marking document" on a par with Magna Charta and the Declaration of Independence. To read it is to learn of the finest ideals in politics and industry of our time. (Heubsch. 128 pages).

BROKEN HOMES. By Joanna C. Colcord. This little book is a close first-hand study of the husband who deserts his family and of the family he deserts, together with an account of the social support that should be given the broken home. Just now we are beginning to take legal account of the miscreant who deserts his home and scientific account of the home that is thus broken. Not all wives can be lived with, but all children can be, and society will increasingly visit its wrath upon the parent who refuses to bear the responsibilities of his parenthood. Such studies as this put social case work upon the high level of scientific achievement and of Christian sympathy. (Russell Sage Foundation. 208 pages).

AMERICAN MARRIAGE LAWS. A digest by Fred S. Hall and Elizabeth S. Brooke. This is a very valuable digest of American marriage laws, covering in topical arrangement all the important questions involved. Among them are common law marriages, the license, marriageable age, the solemnization, the record, etc. It behooves social workers and ministers to have some knowledge of these things in face of the appalling divorce rate in this country. (Russell Sage Foundation. 152 pages).

THE SOCIAL MESSAGE OF THE BOOK OF REVELATION. By Raymond Calkins. This very useful little book brings the Book of Revelation down to earth and historical reality. It is needed in these days of millenarianism. The Apocalypse is interpreted as a document written to the persecuted church in Rome with its figures and symbols based upon those in the Apocalyptic portions of the Old Testament, and thus made comprehensible. Jesus increasingly used apocalyptic symbolry as a realization of his tragic end loomed before him, and under it prophesied final triumph of the Kingdom. So the writer of Revelation saw evils that could not then be overthrown finally overcome by the power of God. (Woman's Press. 191 pages).

GUILD SOCIALISM. By G. D. H. Cole. This exposition of the new proposals for a form of economic socialism and functional government was written by Professor Cole especially for American readers. It is a vigorous criticism of state socialism and seeks to find a way to obviate the evils that would seem to be inescapable in it by a form of industrial cooperation and political government that would preserve local autonomy, individual initiative and also put industry upon a par with politics as a democratic system. Industries would become cooperatively owned by labor, management and consumer. Capital would be employed by the actual users instead of labor by the holders of it. The various independent industries would articulate in a purely functional manner through representatives. There would be as many representative bodies in political, social and industrial life as there are large specific interests to be organized. No man would be represented as merely one of a mass in a geographical district, but each big interest would be represented by some one chosen on that basis. The scheme is enticing theory but it exhausts the imagination to comprehend how so complex a scheme of social control could be made to articulate and work smoothly. (Stokes. 202 pages).

DAD'S LETTERS ON A WORLD JOURNEY. By Bert Wilson. These are delightful letters, written by a real Dad who knows just how to say things to his "kiddies." He writes to them more than he writes about things. In other words the things he writes about are incidental to his interests in the beloved children to whom he writes. There is imagination and humor and that touch of the dramatic that charms the child mind. There is enough missionary interest in them to make them more than just good reading. (Powell & White. 257 pages).

A MORE CHRISTIAN INDUSTRIAL ORDER. By Henry Sloane Coffin. The fundamental proposition of this small volume is that if the Christ church believes that Jesus is the disclosure of God and of His will for mankind, then Jesus must offer solution for the industrial problems of our time. Believing this he proceeds to consider the Christian as producer, consumer, owner, investor, employer and employee, with a concluding chapter on Democracy and Faith. The author puts humanity before dollars, but there is no taint of haste or of an impatience that would violate the orderly processes of democracy. (Macmillan. 86 pages).

CORRESPONDENCE

The Misuse of the Bible

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It was the New Testament teaching of the speedy, open, spectacular, physical return of Jesus Christ to earth that started me on the road to the camp of the freethinkers, forty years ago, and there I have remained, daily becoming more settled in belief that the Bible is both misunderstood and misapplied by many good people who regard it as a God-given code of laws and an accurate statement of historic facts for all men in all time. Used in this way the Bible has caused divisions and disturbances among genuinely good people.

While the Bible is a frankly human production and to be studied from the historical viewpoint it still remains a source of rich spiritual values and it is to be desired greatly that men shall be freed from false notions about it so that they may secure its benefits and not be harmed by its archaisms.

Bergholz, O.

F. M. CUMMINGS.

Why College Men Avoid the Ministry

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: "How unfortunate for the church that so few of our young men are planning to enter the Christian ministry!" To those of the older generation guilty of this not infrequent lament it must appear that it is the college which is largely to blame for this lack of interest in religion. From the standpoint of an undergraduate this is not exactly the case. The vast majority of our older colleges and universities were founded upon Christian principles and democratic ideals. During their early history great emphasis was laid upon these principles, while the democratic ideals were more or less taken for granted. With the institution of theological seminaries those men interested in religion were enabled to specialize, so that today a college education is almost a prerequisite to theological study. The fact, therefore, that college instruction is no longer chiefly moral and religious leads many to believe that genuine Christianity is decedent—that the ministry is deteriorating under anti-Christian college influences. On the basis of suspecting that this is not the case, and that in most college students a sincere Christian attitude toward life lies dormant behind a confusion of very human and material consideration, I present a few reasons why the ministry as a profession fails to attract the interest of the average undergraduate.

Certainly the college is not to blame for the new environment which furnishes the first and most obvious reason. We have grown out of a simple into a complex order of society. This age of specialization and high-pressure competition almost forces the ambition for personal aggrandizement to supplant a normal and more wholesome interest in community welfare. With such a transition taking place, the college as an educating institution will be acutely sensitive to these alterations in society. It will reflect them in every sphere of its activity.

In keeping pace with the materialistic trend of events, the college man has found little place for the church in his life. He either passes it by as inconsequential, expressing only a luke-warm interest in matters pertaining to institutional religion, or, if he be of a reflective temperament, he will seriously question the value of the church as an essential factor in the upbuilding of our national life. And from the obvious lack of interest in the ministry as a profession will he not silently conclude the church to be passively inoffensive instead of actively progressive? It is not the college, but society in general which is to blame. So it follows that the place which the minister occupies does not impress him as having the necessary qualifications of a "man-sized job." The college man is not looking for a soft snap. Even though the satisfaction of personal ambition may be his highest motive, he craves an opportunity to do something worth while, something active and virile which will at least insure him a recognized and respectable standing among his fellows. From all indications he thinks he does not find such an opportunity in the ministry.

That there is a measure of truth in this I have tried to show, but in larger part it is due to ignorance. All too few have learned of those intense, human problems which the minister is called upon constantly to face. Too many are hopelessly uninformed regarding that cooperation between pastor and congregation which makes the church an invaluable asset to the moral well being of a community. And even today there are people who insist on asking that pathetically amusing question, "What does a minister do the other six days?" Furthermore, the undergraduate looks askance at the social status of the clergy. He does not wish to appear "different," to fall outside the circle of accepted social standards. It is curious, but none the less true, that many regard as abnormally constituted the individual who entertains prospects of joining the ranks of the clergy. This illusion is chiefly due to a prevalent misconception that the minister must possess special qualifications which elevate him to a moral pedestal above his fellows. Such an attitude induces a sentiment that the minister is necessarily excluded from exhibiting a normal interest in many perfectly justifiable avocations and amusements, and that it is a drab life work which alienates the individual from society.

If I have correctly interpreted the feeling of even a reasonable percentage of undergraduates, it would seem that here lies a challenge to the ministry to render an account of itself to the younger generation. The ministry does not merely want the unusual man, the intellectual genius. Even more it requires sincere, representative men, who are anxious to consecrate their lives to various phases of constructive Christian enterprise. Surely the college should not advocate any particular profession for a man. Neither is it the business of the clergy to induce men to enter a calling which might quite possibly prove a misfit. But some method should be devised whereby the Christian ministry could present to the undergraduate bodies of our various colleges and universities an honest, straightforward, and clear cut statement defining the positive function of the church in modern society, what are its ideals and purposes, and exactly where a minister's influence is exercised to the best advantage. This would not constitute propaganda. It would be a plain statement of facts from sources which the college man would respect and appreciate. I feel sure that many men, just around the corner in deciding upon a life work, would find an irresistible appeal in the manly, self-sacrificing, and intensely human calling of the Christian ministry, could they but learn the truth about it from these who have already found genuine satisfaction in living and preaching the doctrines of Jesus Christ.

DAVID P. HATCH, JR.

Amherst College, class of 1921.

Christians, Good and Bad—But Christians

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The discussion on what constitutes Christianity, now going forward in the columns of The Christian Century, will provoke new interest in making carefully wrought out distinctions if not in discovering a new spirit. Christianity ought to be on the rack all the time that we may not grow dull, flat or formal. Your most recent correspondent has let fall a few statements that seem to me to need recasting. Or possibly they have made room for an interpretation of the sayings of Jesus that is discredited. Permit me to specify. It is Mr. Victor S. Yarros' article and for the most part I go with him and that he may go with me we must agree.

Who may call himself a Christian? I hold that the spirit of Jesus, the general outlook he entertained of the relationship the race holds to God, the work we have in hand for humanity are quite enough for us to have to make us Christian in theory. To complete that theory is most essential and we cannot be wholly satisfied with our Christianity till we make the achievement. But we must allow that one who has these essential Christian characteristics may be Christian though he worships Buddha or worships the God of the Jews alone. Jesus opens the way to this in such sayings as, He that is not against me is for me. Surely Jesus did supercede the teachings of the Old Testament. But he held that he was fulfilling the spirit of the Old Testament when he did so. He came not to destroy but to bring to completion the spirit of the old teaching, to make possible for fullness of life in the old dispensation. Couple this with his parables on growth of the commonwealth of God in human life and we can readily see that there are gradations of Christianity. That it is ever a growing thing. That is its real claim to being an inspirational religion. The ideal is ever before us and when reached, if ever, will be no more entitled to be called Christian than the thing from which it grew. Let us get it clearly that Jesus is the expounder of a developing, expanding, growing relationship between God and His children and between the children themselves. So long as this relation bears the spirit of Jesus and has the goal set that he set as its mark it must be Christian. That means there are babes in Christ, Christians of primary development, of fuller development on up to adulthood in morals. The whole thing is Christian and so far as it obtains among the so called heathen portions of the human family is even Christian. And we should so claim it and make bold to inform these uninformed brethren of their divine heritage. That is the first observation—the second is like unto it.

Why not good Christians then, and bad Christians? Was John Calvin a good or bad Christian when he had Michael Servitus burned for holding about such views as are here set forth? We must convince the world not to lose sight of the ideal to be sure. But to hold out no hope till they have reached the ideal of ever qualifying is to discard once and for all the best incentive we know. In fact we are invited to give up pedagogy and the study of child nature and give up in despair.

That of course is not taken seriously by Brother Yarros or he would not be at Hull House. He does not mean what he seems to say.

I suspect that a type of exegesis that we have long since relegated to forgotten dreams has stolen unawares into the thinking of the writer and has tripped him up. He as much as gives his case away when he has Jesus admit that some few Christians only may be perfect. He is speaking of selling all and following Jesus. He would have us to understand that all that Jesus said to any one is equally applicable to all under all conditions, "if we would be perfect." Only the few may meet the demands—that is very bad exegesis and worse morals. The rich young man needed to get rid of his riches for they stood between him and development. That was why he should make the full surrender. The wealthy man who stood ready to restore fourfold was in the kingdom, or the kingdom was in his house. The parable on stewardship apports praise and blame according to ability to do so, or as they have actually done. And those who have made the same effort in fidelity are equally commendable, regardless of the results. The exegesis is further revealed in the failure to note that Jesus spoke in the highly colored language of oriental imagery. To make a contrast Jesus used such statements as, All manner of sin shall be forgiven. One sin shall not be forgiven. Resist not evil, is such as the one above. Now we know that the one thing Jesus would condemn in a follower would be the failure of the follower to do what ought to be done even when it involved resistance to evil. The same Jesus said, Sell your coat and buy a sword. Let us not make Jesus ridiculous, or crazy, or futile in his teaching. We must understand that Christianity is for the hurly burly of red blooded men. And when any of them go wrong and refuse to listen to sense, those who are right are bound to resist the wrong doing. Evil gets itself followers through ignorance and selfishness.

The Meaning of Service

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

ANYONE who thinks at all in our day about humanity's condition must think about service, its meanings, motives and aims. This book conceives of service as the indispensable expression of discipleship, the practical overflow of the Christian life. A life that rightly conceives of prayer, and that is dominated by faith, must be serviceable, and so there is now the trilogy of Dr. Fosdick's interpretations of Christian character. His other books, "The Meaning of Prayer" and "The Meaning of Faith," have been more widely read than any other books on religion published in many years. These are all intensely suggestive to makers of sermons and addresses.

Price $1.25, plus 6 cents postage.

The Christian Century Press
508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Men do foolish things because they do not know better, or are supremely selfish. Are we to put up with them forever? No, when they get the moral kinks out of their souls they will be glad that they were halted in their mad career. I think we need to be more certain of the conclusion to which our agnostic brother would hold us. The statements he finds in the four gospels need to be supplemented and interpreted as Jesus knew his hearers would treat them. Our cold, hard, scientific western way of saying and understanding a thing was not Jesus' way.

CHAS. E. PETTY.

Binghamton, N. Y.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Saul, the Pharisee*

WE learned last week that Saul studied in the college of Gamaliel and that, like his teacher, he became a Pharisee. Now let us see what a Pharisee was. He was essentially a separatist. "Come out from among them" was his mark. He was a strict Jew whose ideas involved perfect obedience to the law and customs of that people. He was a legalist to the limit. He held to crude notions of immortality; the soul was thought to possess vigor, so that after death the bad were punished under the earth, while the good were returned to life. In some cases this amounted to transmigration of souls. Resurrection was involved in the Messianic hope, for it was thought that when the Deliverer should come he would rule over all the saints in Jerusalem. (The Pharisees were always dead sure that they were the saints and that no one else was—a characteristic that persists to this day!—a little historic sense and a bit of humor would save a modern from this conviction.) The Pharisee differed from the Sadducee in his belief in angels and spirits. In Jesus' day the Sadducees had become a political party, catering unscrupulously to whatever power was dominant; religious ideas were secondary, even skepticism prevailed. On the other hand the Pharisee was religious or he was nothing. He was making a serious attempt to get to heaven by obeying the law. In Christ's day tradition and Rabbinical lore had so cumbered the older codes of Ezra and Moses that obedience was all but hopeless. A cow could not carry a halter on the Sabbath, a fire could not be lighted to cook food, a sheep could not be lifted out of a ditch. All of these absurd legalities induced evasions and clever short-cuts, to the great discredit of the sect. Jesus made the Pharisee face these absurdities in his terrible denunciation of the empty forms and lifeless ceremonies. While not the author of "Kismet," the Pharisee held strongly to what he called "fate." Everything was determined by fate and yet he practically believed in free-will because on his own account he sought to keep the law. The Sadducee made man the architect of his own fortune. The Pharisee endured foreign political dominion merely as a form of chastisement, but he hoped for the day when the Messiah should bring deliverance.

When Jesus came, the Pharisees soon took a position of hostility to him. They did this consistently. Jesus paid little attention to the petty details of legality which obsessed them. He claimed authority to forgive sins, he associated freely with publicans and sinners; he and his disciples cared nothing for the fasts and ceremonial cleansings, even eating with unwashed hands (the pure heart is nothing to a Pharisee, his microscopic mind gets no farther than the nail-file and the brand of soap—both good things but not the most important). Most shocking of all, Jesus did not keep the Sabbath in the orthodox way; he even insisted that the Sabbath had no reason for existence except to serve men. Consistently, right up to the hour of his death on the cross, these legalists opposed our Lord. The day came when Jesus, finding that winning them was impossible, broke forth in his denunciations. He called them hypocrites, whited sepulchres, offspring of snakes, a vile generation, blind guides, think of it—he even said that the harlots and tax-gatherers would get into heaven before these sticklers for the law would.

Saul, the Pharisee, presents a sad picture. He appears as a persecutor, dragging off to prison and death even women Christians, sitting at the feet of Stephen and holding his garments while that saint was being stoned to death. (There is an old Latin saying that if Stephen had not prayed, Paul had not wrought.) Saul was consistent, he was still under the law, but the hour of his illumination was approaching, when he would renounce the devil and all his works and devote himself to the service of the Gentle Master. Would God that such a change might come to all modern Pharisees! Only a vision of the true Christ can bring about such a violent change. But to see Jesus must mean the deliverance from legalism, formalism and separatism.

JOHN R. EWERS.

WHY Your School Should Use the Bethany System of Sunday-school Literature.

1. Because it is more easily handled than any other series in the practical work of the school.

Thus It Helps the Superintendent.

2. Because its Teacher's Manuals contain fully a third more material than the manuals of any other series.

Thus It Helps the Teacher.

3. Because its arrangement for study, its illustration and mechanical attractiveness are unequaled by any other body of Graded literature.

Thus It Helps the Pupil.

4. Because it is Scriptural in teaching.

Thus It Helps the Cause of Bible Study.

5. Because it is used not only by Disciples, but also by Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, etc.

Thus It Helps in Graded Union Work.

6. Because it is free from the sectarian spirit, and is produced by the editorial co-operation of the foremost religious bodies.

Thus It Helps the Cause of Christian Unity.

Let the Bethany System Speak for Itself.

Send for Returnable Samples Today.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
Chicago, Ill.

*Lesson for July 10, "Saul the Pharisee." Scripture, Acts 7:54-8:3; 22:3, 4; 26:4, 5, 9, 10.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Dr. Cortland Myers Resigns

Dr. Cortland Myers of Tremont Temple, Boston, has been pastor of one of the leading Baptist churches of the country. He resigned recently and will spend his summer cooperating in various conferences connected with the Fundamental movement. He is known as one of the outstanding conservative thinkers of his denomination. His church in Boston has three thousand members and an income of $110,000 per year. It supports fifteen home and foreign missionaries besides some native workers.

Dr. de Blois Surveys Religious Conditions in Boston

At the completion of ten years of service in Boston, Dr. Austen K. de Blois, pastor of First Baptist church, becomes the dean of the Baptist ministry of the city. In a sermon that reviews the conditions in Boston during the past ten years he offers some interesting information concerning his kaleidoscopic city. His report is summarized thus: "Every creed and cult is represented here. Unitarianism has gone backward; Congregationalism has made no perceptible advance; Methodists have gained in the suburbs; Episcopalians are stronger; Roman Catholics control the city; Christian Science is losing ground; the various cults are about the same way; the Christian associations are doing a much greater work than ten years ago; the Baptists are not gaining much apart from Tremont Temple."

Big Congregation in Richmond

Congregations that overcrowd the church building continuously are news in the Christian world, for they are not numerous. Dr. Len Broughton is preaching to a Baptist church in Richmond where this is the case. The congregation is preparing to enlarge the auditorium at once to take care of the ever-increasing audiences that are coming to hear the gifted preacher.

Friends Help Repair War Damages in France

The Society of Friends has done a most notable work in France in helping to repair the war damage. One of the most shocking results of war is the lust which leaves behind a crop of illegitimacy. The Friends have taken in over a thousand abandoned children whose parentage is Chinese, African, German, Spanish and American. A permanent foundlings home has been established at Chalons-sur-Marne. This is said to be the first maternity hospital ever to be built in France. The work of the Friends has been so wisely directed and so helpful as to make a warm place in the French heart henceforth for American Protestantism.

Congregational World Movement Gets the Money

The Congregational World Movement reports many churches over the land in which large gifts have been made to the war chest of the Congregationalists. In Illinois are a number of the leading gifts of the whole denomination. One notes the following: La Grange, $19,000; Pilgrim, Oak Park, $18,000; Second, Rockford, $10,000; Winnetka, $11,000; Oak Park, First, $29,000; Evanston, $30,000. Though the Congregationalists were originally a denomination that did not operate outside of New England, they are increasingly looking to the middle west for their resources and their leadership. The coming of the immigrant to the New England cities with his Roman Catholic religion has wrought changes that are very significant for the future activities of the denomination.

Lectureship Established at Northern Baptist Theological Seminary

The Northern Baptist Theological Seminary of Chicago, a conservative institution accepting students of lower than the graduate rank, is making considerable success of gathering together a body of students and of securing endowment. Recently Mrs. Harriet R. Wilkinson of Chicago gave money for the establishment of a permanent lectureship on "The Christian Religion: in Life, in Literature and in Art." Dr. A. H. Strong has been invited to be the first lecturer upon this new foundation. The amount of the endowment is enough to make this one of the significant lectureships of the country.

Buddhists Make Rapid Progress in America

The Buddhist faith is by no means obsolete. Copying the methods of the Christian organizations, it has rapidly modified its program to meet modern needs. There are twenty-two Buddhist temples or meeting places on the Pacific coast and in Fresno, Cal., a temple is being built at an expense of a hundred thousand dollars. In San Francisco there is a Buddhist bishop who rules over the Buddhist group on the Pacific coast and who is supported from Japan. In Los Angeles there are nine Buddhist meeting places, where the followers of Gautama are stronger than in any other American city. Not many Americans take interest

Baptists War Over Big Gift

WHEN the Home Missionary Society of the Baptist denomination accepted a gift of a million and a half with a creed tied to it, it started something. The progressives of the denomination assert that the only creed that can never be revised is the one that is protected by a big endowment. For this reason they are opposed to the acceptance of the big gift. Dr. Shailer Mathews in an article in the Independent of June 11 suggests that it is really opposition to the social gospel which is leading some rich men to create endowments with creedal attachments. The anonymous donor insists that no home missionary shall be appointed on this foundation who does not believe "in the inspiration and supreme authority of the holy scriptures, in the deity of Jesus Christ, his incarnation, his atoning death, his bodily resurrection and his personal physical return; and that Baptist churches, composed of those who have been baptized into fellowship on a confession of faith in Christ as their redeemer and Lord are commissioned to make their chief business the evangelization of the world."

Dr. Shailer Mathews says: "Millions of dollars are being offered to carry on the activities of the religious boards in such a way as to divert the church from any application of the gospel to social affairs. Men are being influenced not to contribute to Christian associations or to support ministries or missionaries or to endow schools or to countenance church action looking to the christianization of industrial affairs. The situation is one that prevents clear-cut issues. Are our mission boards to be under the direction of rich men who are more interested in their own theories of inspiration than in Christ's sermon on the mount? Are our church workers to be subsidized into theological subservience, and made silent as to industrial justice and Christ's gospel?"

Rev. Charles L. White, executive secretary of the Home Mission Board, makes this statement: "The donor does not know what the future may bring forth, and so provides that if at any time it shall be proved that the officers and board of managers of the American Baptist Home Mission Society are not in sympathy with the beliefs stated as above, then and in that event said trust fund shall be transferred to another institution, provided the faculty and trustees of said institution are in sympathy with the beliefs stated. If the faculty and trustees of said institution are not in sympathy with the beliefs stated, then said trust funds shall be transferred to certain other organizations.

"The donor is a business man who looks far ahead in all of his transactions and has learned to anticipate possible contingencies. He is following this same custom in creating a trust, the income of which contemplates widespread missionary work and the providing that if that improbable and unexpected and unbelievable day should ever come, that a denomination calling itself Baptist has so completely discarded evangelical truth that a board of managers appointed by it should not be in sympathy with statements 1, 2 and 3, as above stated, then he believes that it should be proved incompetent, and provides that the trust fund shall be paid in that contingency to others. This provision is both wise and just if it seems important to the donor. The board of managers of the society has accepted this trust, and the transaction has been completed."

in the imported cult but the great motive of its existence is to hold the Japanese to their ancestral faith. It is held by home mission workers that in the Buddhist temples loyalty to the Japanese government is maintained as well as loyalty to religious conviction.

Fundamentalists Work Division on Mission Field

The "Fundamentalists" of America, a group of ultra-conservative religionists with premillennial beliefs, have become well organized in many parts of the world. A group of "Fundamental Preachers" in Chicago meets regularly at the Y. M. C. A. In China a Bible Union has been formed which undertakes to become a kind of ecclesiastical court before which brethren shall be tried for heresy. With a majority of the Chinese missionaries outside the union, the presumption in this procedure is evident to all. In Russia the American Board of Missions finds its missions greatly disturbed over the activities of "Fundamentalist" emissaries. These are trying to reproduce the Pentecostal tongue speaking, and many of them grunt like animals in their efforts to be "spiritual." On account of the illiteracy that abounds in Russia, this primitive thing threatens to make great havoc among the Christian people.

Episcopalian Writer Suggests Prayers with a Punch

President Bernard Iddings Bell, of the Episcopal fellowship, is never dull. He recently proposed a list of "Ten Things to Pray For." Some of these objects of prayer are of sufficient importance that the whole Christian world might be asked to join in the supplications. The list of ten is as follows: "For the increase of bishops, priests and deacons who will answer their mail and attend to the ordinary courtesies of correspondence. For the elimination of questionnaires which are never analyzed or used after they are sent in. For clergymen who will take the trouble to ascertain their facts before they speak evil of their brethren. For church people who do not instinctively feel that all institutions and activities of their own communion are of necessity inferior. That blunt candor may soon supplant our deadening tactfulness in church matters. That parsons may be treated more like human beings and not as combinations of angel and ass. That all persons called to be bishops may be blessed with a strong sense of humor. That religion may continue to become unfashionable. That all parsons take at least a month to think over new political and economic developments before preaching about them. That Episcopalians may some day support one-half as many colleges as the Quakers."

Religious Conditions Improve in Mexico

Under the new administration there is an awakened interest in religion in Mexico. Many obstacles were formerly placed in the way of Catholic work which have been removed under the present administration and as a result some churches that have been closed for years are now reopened. The missionaries report for the Protestant churches the largest attendance in their history.

Minister Asserts Theater Is Holy Place

In Texas it seems to be a bit radical to hold religious services in a theater. At any rate, Rev. Byron Hester, pastor of Electra Disciples church, felt impelled to open his series of theater sermons on Sunday evening with a defence of preaching the gospel wherever the crowd could be found. In tracing the growth in our consciousness of the Divine Presence he said: "God was so little once that he was carried around in a box. They called the box the Ark of the Covenant. God was in that box, or directly over it between the wings of the two little angels, the cherubims. Hezekiah prayed before the Lord, and said, 'O Lord God of Israel, which dwelleth between the cherubims,' and the Psalmist cried, 'Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, thou which dwellest between the cherubims.' Where that box was God was. It was the box in the temple that made the temple holy. Other

Baptist Fundamentalists Adopt a Creed

(By Our Own Correspondent)

SHOOUTING and tumult characterized the vote taken on a new confession of faith by the Baptist Congress on Fundamentals at Des Moines, June 21. Two thousand people sat through the long sessions on a hot summer day with increasing tension and nervousness. The chairman, Dr. J. C. Massee, evidently felt the delicacy of his position. The muscles on his face worked continuously in nervous spasms. Cheers, occasional stamping of the feet, and loud protests of "No" and "Never" were heard in the midst of the deliberations over the new document. By an overwhelming vote the two thousand people present, after a discussion of an hour, adopted the confession of faith. By the time this is in print the creed will have gone forward to the Northern Baptist Convention, which is meeting in Des Moines this week, where it will doubtless arouse even more spirited opposition in an official gathering representing a denomination supposed to be antagonistic to the creed-making business.

One must not conclude that the demonstrations were simply those of a few neurotics, though that type is always to be found in religious conventions, ready to explode at the psychological moment. There is no quarrel so hard to bear as a family quarrel. The reactionaries in the Baptist fold are of various types. Some come from old families which for generations have belonged to this denomination proudly claiming to be older in its historical antecedents than the Lutheran reformation. They are proud of their history, and it grieves them to note any departure from ancient ideas and customs. Some have migrated north from the southern church which is often accused of being engaged in an effort to swallow the Northern Baptist Convention. It seems to many conservatives that the teachers in the theological seminaries who teach such views as are current at Yale, Harvard and Chicago are selling out the Christian faith and substituting a form of philanthropy for religion.

The liberals, too, are not without historical feeling. Roger Williams was driven out of Massachusetts on account of his religious opinions. The liberals hold that they are defending the same sacred cause as that for which Williams endured persecution. Such Baptists believe that they are conserving faith by stating it in harmony with modern views of science, history and sociology. The idea of a creedal yoke is abhorrent to them, for they remember with joy that the Baptists have left behind eight creeds during their history.

The creed that was considered is but recently written. Dr. Massee denies any part in its making. Rumor names Dr. Curtis Lee Laws, editor of the Watchman-Examiner, the one northern Baptist newspaper that refused to be absorbed by the denominational organ, as the author. The document has resemblances to the ancient Philadelphia confession and to the New Hampshire confession, but notably includes the doctrine of the visible return of Christ to this earth. A great proportion of the group of Fundamentalists are also premillenarians. Dr. Laws insists that the document is a confession and not a creed. Most of the speakers called it a creed.

Dr. Goodchild of New York City in favoring it asserted that every man but a fool has a creed by which he lives. He asserted that the new document as adopted is a "credo" and not a "credendum." It could never be enforced by authority. Yet Dr. Massee is on record in a tract recently published as favoring a test for all the theological teachers of the denomination. Dr. Goodchild asserted that whenever in the past the Baptists issued a creed the effect was to demolish other creeds or modify them. It was objected by one Baptist pastor that the creed so defined the church as to disfellowship other Christians who are not Baptists, whereas Baptists practice comity with these Christians on the mission field. It was objected by Dr. Murphy, of East Orange, N. J., that the Baptists should not be looking for a minimum faith, but for a maximum. He also demanded that he be given a part in making the creed, instead of the mere privilege of voting assent to one already made. He referred to an admission made by the chair that if the creed had been mailed to the pastors previous to the meeting it would have resulted in seven thousand amendments. This constituted a fatal objection to its passage, Dr. Murphy said. Dr. Langford of Redlands, Cal., took the position that instead of adopting a creed with which to measure theological professors, the professors should be invited to national convention and compelled to state their faith.

The text of the creed adopted by the "Fundamentalists" is as follows:

(Continued on page 27)

places were not thought to be holy for the box containing God was not there. But we know that God is everywhere and that all places are therefore equally holy. God is too big to be gotten into a box, or as Paul says, the God that made the world is too big to be gotten even in a house made with hands. Where God is is holy ground. Everywhere is holy ground. This theater, your place of business, the churches."

FUNDAMENTALISTS ADOPT CREED

(Continued from previous page)

1. We believe that the Bible is God's word, that it was written by men divinely inspired, and that it has supreme authority in all matters of faith and conduct.

2. We believe in God the Father, perfect in holiness, infinite in wisdom, measureless in power. We rejoice that he concerns himself mercifully in the affairs of men, that he hears and answers prayer, and that he saves from sin and death all who come to him through Jesus Christ.

3. We believe in Jesus Christ, God's only begotten Son, miraculous in his birth, sinless in his life, making atonement for the sins of the world by his death. We believe in his bodily resurrection, his ascension into heaven, his perpetual intercession for his people and his personal visible return to the world according to his promise.

4. We believe in the Holy Spirit who came forth from God to convince the world of sin, of righteousness and of judgment, and to regenerate, sanctify and comfort those who believe in Jesus Christ.

5. We believe that all men by nature and by choice are sinners but that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life"; we believe therefore that those who accept Christ as Savior and Lord will rejoice forever in God's presence and those who refuse to accept Christ as Savior and Lord will be forever separated from God.

6. We believe in the church—a living spiritual body of which Christ is the head and of which all regenerated people are members. We believe that a visible church is a company of believers in Jesus Christ, baptized on a credible confession of faith, and associated for worship, work and fellowship. We believe that to these visible churches were committed, for perpetual observance, the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper, and that God has laid upon these churches the task of persuading a lost world to accept Jesus Christ as Savior, and to enthrone him as the Lord and Master. We believe that all human betterment and social improvement are the inevitable by-products of such a gospel.

7. We believe that every human being has direct relations with God, and is responsible to God alone in all matters of faith; that each church is independent and autonomous and must be free from interference by any ecclesiastical or political authority; that therefore Church and State must be kept separate as having different functions, each fulfilling its duties free from the dictation or patronage of the other.

Fundamentalists Find Heresy in Quaker School

The "Fundamentalists" are operating among the Quakers also. They recently created an uproar about heresy in Earlham college with the result that the Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings appointed a committee to look into the teachings of the college. Their findings are as follows: "Earlham college, as a standard educational institution, cannot

The addresses of the day were of very unequal level. Dr. Massee is a forceful speaker. In his opening presidential address he said: "The second proposal is that we continue the educational policy now in vogue, but adopt a statement of belief to which all Baptist educational institutions shall be required to give annual assent in writing, cutting off from denominational support and sponsorship all schools refusing such fellowship of faith."

Dr. J. R. Sampey, of the Southern Baptist Seminary of Louisville spoke on "Jesus and the Old Testament." The professor's method was to examine all the references Jesus made to Old Testament books and characters and to conclude that since Jesus referred to these, he thereby passed upon their historicity. At a somewhat awkward reference to Jonah the congregation broke into a laugh. This angered the professor, and he called them to order with stern rebuke. "The book that furnishes a symbol of our Lord's resurrection is no joke," he asserted. He got into rather hot water in some of his critical discussions; admitting to the surprise of the orthodox that he did not know whether Moses wrote the account of his own death or not, thus making a gap in the Mosaic authorship. In dealing with prophecy he asserted that Jesus in some cases manufactured his own fulfillments of the Hebrew Scriptures. The professor conceded the presence of a human element in the imprecatory psalms. In this he takes issue with those Fundamentalists who hold to the verbal inspiration of a level Bible. Jesus' criticism of various Old Testament scriptures, particularly the laws on divorce and revenge were quoted as evidences of the human element in the Bible. The professor was not above the use of slang. Discussing Jesus' attitude when questioned by those who considered their property korban, sacred from family obligation, he represented Jesus as saying in modern phrase, "Not on your life."

Rev. Jacob Heinrich, vice president of the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary of Chicago, founded to counteract the work of the University of Chicago, gave a paper on "The Authenticity and Authority of the New Testament." It was evident that the brethren had great confidence in his ability to deliver the speech rightly for two-thirds of them left the hot assembly hall to hunt the ice cream parlors, while the professor labored to prove that in spite of his Germanic accent he held to no German materialism but to the good old-fashioned views of the New Testament.

The meeting grew in heat both physically and mentally. The real fireworks orator came on in the afternoon and be rightly expected to suppress the facts of science, or the theories of science, commonly held by Christian educators. Neither can it reply satisfactorily to the honest questionings of the masses of young men and women who come to the institution for instruction, by saying that the scientific course is not a course in theology and does not have to account for theological interpretation. Both the theology and the science must be taught hailed from Canada. Dr. T. T. Shields is pastor of Jarvis Street Church of Toronto. Tall and angular, with a very marked Roman nose and small eyes, he was a figure to attract attention at once. He claims to have been for a long time a lone voice in the Canadian church, but now the lay people reinforce him in his positions. His topic was "The Cross and the Critics." His logical process was the same as that of Dr. Sampey. Whatever Jesus had referred to in the Old Testament must of necessity have been historical. He was warm in his denunciation of those who, Peter-like, warm themselves by the critics' fire while the Lord is led away to death. In his speech he sneered at those who hide behind the doctrine of Baptist liberty, and his sneer was answered by cheers. "The true Christian delights to be the bond-slave of Jesus Christ." On this idea of bond-slave he rang the changes, asserting that we must bring our minds into subjection to the Lord. Among other things he said, "Some of the moderns have a learned lunacy. A lot of young men want to keep up with the intellectual four hundred. They are not real higher critics, for they have never read the Bible enough to find much fault with it. Can the ship we know as the church survive with this Jonah of modernism on board? Can we lighten the ship or calm the sea by casting our theological wares into the sea? Or must we take the modernist who will not preach the preaching which God bids him, nor let anyone else do it, and heave him overboard?"

Rev. D. F. Rittenhouse read an old sermon on "The Proof of the Resurrection" in which he discussed chiefly the world's need of assurance about immortality. The premillenarian viewpoint was presented at the evening session by Rev. W. B. Hinson of Portland, Ore. Rev. Lee Scarborough, president of Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, of Ft. Worth, Tex., spoke on "The Supreme Passion of the Gospel."

Among the interesting announcements of Dr. Massee was one that he had been in conference with William Jennings Bryan, and that the "great commoner" had assured him that the major passion of his life henceforth would be to set forth the views of the Fundamentalists. This quite agrees with recent reports of Mr. Bryan's addresses. The Conference on Fundamentals regards itself as a permanent organization and will go forward with its work holding another session next year. What success it will have in imposing its views upon the session of the Northern Baptist Convention which immediately follows will be evident in the next few days.

O. F. J.

in agreement, or the teachings are bound to produce doubt and infidelity, and no charm can afford to adhere to interpretations of theological doctrines that are plainly inconsistent with the known facts of science. Real science and real Christianity do not disagree, for God is the author of both of them. Our interpretations of both have to be revised sometimes in the face of the actual experiences of human life."

Presbyterians of Philadelphia Make Gains

Not many cities in the country have so virile a group of churches as are the Presbyterian churches of Philadelphia. These congregations made a very significant gain in membership last year. With a membership of 63,060 they made a growth of 2,150. It is significant that their congregations average in size much above the ordinary city church. The average size of a Philadelphia Presbyterian church is over six hundred members. The Presbyterian denomination in the various large cities tends to be conservative in the multiplication of new churches preferring strong and influential centers to a multitude of weak and struggling missions.

Look for Fifteen Thousand Delegates

The promoters of the sixth World Christian Endeavor convention predict an attendance of fifteen thousand delegates. The convention will be held in New York July 6-11. William Jennings Bryan is listed as one of the speakers. He is a trustee of the society. Among the other prominent speakers on the program one notes the names of Dr. Sherwood Eddy and Dr. A. E. Cory. The morning sessions will be devoted to conferences on the various phases of young people's work, while the afternoon and evening sessions will give opportunity to hear the leading workers of the various co-operating religious denominations. Some time will be taken for recreational features in connection with the convention.

Episcopalians Confer with Others on Pageantry

The Episcopal church has a commission on Pageantry and Drama. This commission has recently called together representatives from similar commissions of other denominations in New York. Among those answering the call were Methodists, Unitarians, the Missionary Education Movement and a number of smaller organizations. A permanent organization was formed by which the people of the various communions might exchange ideas on the promotion of the dramatic activities of the churches. In many city parishes the young are more interested in amateur dramatics than in other kinds of recreational activities.

Summer Outings for Two Thousand Boys and Girls

The Church Extension Board of Chicago and the Christian Industrial League have arranged to give outings in Michigan to two thousand boys and girls this summer. These Presbyterian organizations have secured control of a large place called Camp Gray at Saugatuck, Mich. The camp has 143 acres. It has accommodations for 350 at a time, and there will be a constant stream of visitors during the summer. Fourth Presbyterian church has sold its camp at Lake Geneva, and hereafter will send groups to Camp Gray. The camp is under the management of Rev. George A. Kilby, who is also head of the Christian Industrial League.

Lutheran Denomination Has Large Class of New Ministers

The most conservative of the various Lutheran denominations is that known as the Missouri Synod. The men of this communion have but little fellowship with brother Lutherans, and practically none with other communions. The membership is largely German in nationality. The very intensity of this kind of denomination seems to work out some of the problems that are troubling religious organizations. This year the largest class of new ministers in the history of the denomination was graduated from the seminaries of the denomination located at St. Louis and at Springfield, Ill. One hundred and eight new men have been assigned to charges. The demand of the churches was for 170 men, which shows that even the German Lutherans are still behind the game in the matter of ministerial supply.

Unitarians Claim the Orthodox Steal Their Thunder

Rev. Richard Lloyd Jones told the American Unitarian Association at its meeting in Boston May 24, that the orthodox churches are stealing the Unitarian thunder. He complained that these churches preach Unitarianism vigorously and fill their churches, while the simon-pure article in the nearby Unitarian church attracts only a handful of people. From this point of view, church building is more than a matter of doctrine. It is a matter of attitude. "He is a poor Unitarian church builder who cannot be a Theodore Parker in his time and place. Let us not be contented without a great and glorious future. We may serve the time without yielding to it." One of the interesting moments in the session was the introduction of Prof. Iso Abe of Waseda University, Tokyo, president of the Liberal Christian Association of Japan and manager of the Japanese baseball team that is touring the country. He brought greetings from the Japanese Unitarians. He made a rather gloomy report with regard to Unitarian propaganda in Japan. He said: "Unfortunately there is retrogression in our church. Eighteen years ago the church seated four hundred and was crowded. Today, attendance at Sunday service averages from sixty to one hundred. What is the reason? We Japanese are quite surprised. In the last ten years Christianity has suffered a reaction; in the old time the church was the center of progressive ideas. All who wanted to hear something new came to church. But we Japanese have made progress in business and economics. We have various ways of expressing progressive ideas. The only way for the churches to make progress today in Japan is by social and settlement work. Japanese Unitarians are eager to cooperate with you. We cannot at present get much money in Japan, but some day we will be independent. Until that time comes we must continue to ask your help." The following officers of the American Unitarian Association were elected: President, Samuel A. Eliot, Cambridge, Mass.; vice-presidents: from Northern New England, James A. Tufts, Exeter, N. H.; from Southern New England, William H. Taft, New Haven, Conn.; from the Middle States, Frank H. Hiscock, Syracuse, N. Y.; from the Southern States, George Soule, New Orleans, La.; from the Central West, Arthur E. Morgan, Dayton, Ohio; from the Rocky Mountain States, Charles A. Lory, Fort Collins, Colo.; from the Pacific Coast, William H. Carruth, Palo Alto, Cal.; from the Dominion of Canada, William H. Alexander, Edmonton, Alta; secretary, Louis C. Cornish, Boston, Mass.

NEW YORK Central Christian Church
DR. F. S. IDLEMAN, 142 WEST 81st ST.
C. E. Internat'l. Convention JULY 5-11.

PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

An undenominational training school for
The Ministry Religious Education
Foreign Missions Social Service
Curricula high grade and modern. Graduate degrees. University of California privileges. Opportunities for the study of Oriental peoples. Open to men and women of all Christian denominations. For catalogue address
WILLIAM FREDERIC BADE, Dean,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA

BOSTON UNIVERSITY The School of Religious Education and Social Service

A Professional Training School for Religious Workers.

Located in the Heart of Historic Boston.

School Year Opens Sept. 20, 1921
Send for illustrated catalog.

ARTHUR E. BENNETT,

Executive Secretary

607 Boylston St. Boston 17, Mass.

Beware of Contagious Diseases

THOMAS  COMMUNION SERVICE

INDIVIDUAL

SAVES 1/4 COST OF OTHER SERVICES
Clean and sanitary. Used by over 40,000 churches. Send for catalog and free trial offer.
Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 495 Lima, O.

100 Religious Books

A list prepared by Charles Clayton Morrison, Herbert L. Willett, Joseph Fort Newton, Alva W. Taylor and Thomas Curtis Clark

THE CHURCH AND PREACHING

- Psychology and Preaching. C. S. Gardner. $2.50.
 The Building of the Church. C. E. Jefferson. $1.50.
 The Christian Ministry and Social Problems. Bishop Charles D. Williams. $1.25.
 Can the Church Survive in the Changing Social Order? Albert Parker Fitch. 80 cts.
 A Community Church. H. E. Jackson. $2.00.
 Ambassadors of God. S. Parkes Cadman. $2.50.
 Modern Theology and the Preaching of the Gospel. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
 Wanted: A Congregation. Lloyd C. Douglas. $1.75.
 Six Thousand Country Churches. Gill and Pinchot. $2.00.
 The Little Town. Paul H. Douglass. $2.25.
 The Course of Christian History. McGlothlin. $2.25.

THE BIBLE AND THE LIFE OF JESUS

- Popular Lectures on the Books of the New Testament. A. H. Strong. $1.50.
 The Jesus of History. T. R. Glover. $1.25.
 The Manhood of the Master. Fosdick. $1.15.
 Our Bible. Herbert L. Willett. $1.50.
 That One Face. Richard Roberts. $1.25.
 Archaeology and the Bible. George A. Barton. $3.00.
 Christ in the Poetry of Today. Martha F. Crowe. $2.00.
 Jesus—The Master Teacher. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
 Jesus—Our Standard. H. H. Horne. $2.00.
 New Testament in Modern Speech. Weymouth. $2.00.
 Moffatt's New Testament. $1.50. (Pocket ed., $1.75.)
 Jesus in the Experience of Men. T. R. Glover. $1.90.
 The Proposal of Jesus. John H. Hutton. $2.00.
 Epochs in the Life of Paul. A. T. Robertson. $1.50.
 The Life of Paul. B. W. Robinson. $1.50.

SOCIAL

- Social Principles of Jesus. Walter Rauschenbusch. $1.15.
 The Ethics of Jesus and Social Progress. Gardner. $1.50.
 Christianizing the Social Order. Rauschenbusch. $2.00.
 Christianity and the Social Crisis. Rauschenbusch. $2.25.
 Democratic Christianity. Bishop McConnell. 80c.
 Jesus Christ and the Social Question. F. G. Peabody. $1.75.
 Psychology of Social Reconstruction. G. T. Patrick. $2.00.
 The Great Society. Graham Wallas. $2.25.
 The Social Problem. Charles A. Ellwood. $2.25.
 The Church and Industrial Reconstruction. $2.00.
 Labor and the Common Welfare. Samuel Gompers. $3.00.
 Poverty the Challenge of the Church. Penman. $1.00.
 Religion and Business. R. W. Babson. $1.50.
 Fundamentals of Prosperity. R. W. Babson. $1.00.
 The Sword or the Cross. Kirby Page. $1.20.
 The Science of Power. Benjamin Kidd. $2.50.
 The Gospel for a Working World. Harry F. Ward. $2.00.

MISSIONS

- The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War. $2.00.
 Christianity the Final Religion. S. M. Zwemer. $1.25.
 Modern Religious Movements in India. Farquhar. $2.75.
 The Religions of the World. George A. Barton. $2.00.
 Mary Slessor of Calabar. W. P. Livingstone. $2.00.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

- The Experience of God in Modern Life. Lyman. $1.50.
 What and Where Is God? Richard L. Swain. $1.50.
 Holy Spirit in Thought and Experience. T. Rees. $2.00.
 The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation. Denney. $3.00.
 The Christian Hope. William Adams Brown. $1.75.
 Can We Believe in Immortality? J. H. Snowden. $1.50.
 Immortality and the Future. H. R. Mackintosh. $1.50.
 The Truth About Christian Science. Snowden. $2.50.
 Originality of the Christian Message. Mackintosh. $1.75.
 Basic Ideals in Religion. R. W. Micou. $2.50.
 What Christianity Means to Me. Lyman Abbott. $1.75.
 Outspoken Essays. Dean W. R. Inge. $2.25.
 Public Opinion and Theology. Bishop McConnell. $1.50.
 The Meaning of Baptism. Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.35.
 Living Again. Charles R. Brown. $1.00.
 The New Orthodoxy. Edward Scribner Ames. $1.50.

PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

- The Meaning of Prayer. Fosdick. $1.15.
 The Meaning of Faith. H. E. Fosdick. $1.35.
 The Meaning of Service. H. E. Fosdick. $1.25.
 The Religion of a Layman. Charles R. Brown. $1.25.
 Psychology of the Christian Soul. George Steven. $1.50.
 The Psychology of Religion. J. H. Snowden. $2.00.
 The Religious Consciousness. J. B. Pratt. $2.50.
 Finding the Comrade God. Walter Fiske. $1.15.
 Religion of a Mature Mind. George Albert Coe. $1.75.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

- Training the Devotional Life. L. H. Weigle. 75 cts.
 Talks to Sunday School Teachers. L. H. Weigle. $1.50.
 Social Principles of Education. G. F. Betts. $1.50.
 The School in the Modern Church. H. F. Cope. $1.50.
 How to Teach Religion. G. F. Betts. $1.25.

INSPIRATIONAL BOOKS

- The Daily Altar. Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison. $1.50. (Leather, $2.50.)
 The Eternal Christ. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
 The Ambassador. Joseph Fort Newton. $1.25.
 Things Eternal. John Kelman. $1.75.

THE NEW AGE

- New Mind for the New Age. Henry Churchill King. $1.50.
 A Better World. Tyler Dennett. $1.50.
 The Christian Faith and the New Day. McAfee. 90 cts.
 Church Facing the Future. William Adams Brown. 80c.
 The New Horizon in the Church and State. Faunce. 80c.
 World Facts and America's Responsibility. Patton. $1.25.
 The Gospel and the New World. Robert E. Speer. $2.00.
 Some Aspects of International Christianity. Kelman. $1.00.
 The Democratic Movement in Asia. Tyler Dennett. $1.90.
 Is Christianity Practicable? William Adams Brown. $1.75.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature. Davis. $2.50.
 Everybody's World. Sherwood Eddy. $1.90.
 Princess Salome. Burriss Jenkins. $2.00.
 First. Henry Drummond. 50 cts.
 The Strategy of Life. Arthur Porritt. $1.25.
 Life of Theodore Roosevelt. W. R. Thayer. $1.00.

(Add 10 cents postage for each book)

The Christian Century Press, 508 S. Dearborn St., Chicago

Hundreds of Churches of All Hymns of the

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

Rev. Joseph Fort Newton,

Church of the Divine Paternity, New York

After using the Hymns of the United Church for several months I find it in all ways adequate to the practical needs of the church. No great hymn has been found missing, and many of the newer hymns admirably express the newer emphasis and aspiration of the modern religious mind, especially its insistence upon the social meaning of the gospel. The old and the new blend without break or discord. The book is a noble interpretation of the Gospel in Song, and is itself a tie to bind together a broken church. When we argue we are divided; when we sing we are united.

Rev. H. D. C. MacLachlan,

Seventh Street Christian Church, Richmond, Va.

The hymnal is a gem. I have seen nothing on the same street with it. It contains all the classic hymns and all the worth-while new ones. Its hymns of human service and brotherhood are a genuine contribution to American hymnology. Its arrangement, topical indexing, letterpress and musical notation are beyond praise. The Aids to Worship and Responsive Readings I find very useful.

Rev. L. L. Dunnington,

Congregational Church, West Lebanon, N. H.

We are all agreed that Hymns of the United Church is the finest hymnal published. The choice of material is truly remarkable. You have saved us all the good old hymns of the past, left out the poor stuff and yet included the hymns of the new day on social aspiration, service and brotherhood. The selection and arrangement of the psalms in the Psalter are a particular joy to me

Rev. I. S. Chenoweth,

First Christian Church, Philadelphia, Pa.

I have had considerable experience with hymnals of other communions as well as with those commonly used in our churches, and I would unhesitatingly declare Hymns of the United Church to be the most acceptable for the church which recognizes its obligations to help make a better world. It does not contain a lot of the old, selfish hymns, while it does contain the best hymns inherited from the past and adds those which express the social aspirations of the twentieth century Christian.

F. E. Whitney, Dean

Defiance College, Defiance, O., Dept. of Music.

Hymns of the United Church has been used in our College church services for several months and has been found very satisfactory. The very title of the book is wholesomely suggestive of one of the great ideals of the church universal today, and the sentiment of the hymns selected is such as to find a quick response in the hearts of all Christians. The music is fine and there is a wide choice of hymns for every occasion. The best of the old hymns have been retained, while some splendid new ones have been added. The book is beautifully printed and easy to read, the fact that all the stanzas are placed within the staves being a particularly desirable feature. The workmanship is excellent to the last detail. I congratulate you on having put out a hymn-book so spiritually and musically satisfying and so beautifully constructed.

Rev. W. A. Wagner,

First Congregational Church, Mitchell, S. D.

We are greatly pleased with Hymns of the United Church, which we have been using for one month. Our committee selected this hymnal after careful comparison with other leading books.

Rev. Jewell Howard,

Christian Church, Cameron, Mo.

Hymns of the United Church contains the highest class of hymns I know in one book. The forms for all occasions makes it a great help to the minister in preparing his themes. The responsive Scripture readings are the best selections I have seen. It is high class and will deeply spiritualize any church that will use it. Our people are delighted with it and hope to order another hundred copies soon.

Rev. A. H. Cooke,

Park Ave. Christian Church, Des Moines, Ia.

It is a pleasure for me to say that Hymns of the United Church is the best thing that has come into our church life during the past year. The compilation embraces everything worth while; there is not a single thing in the volume that does not elevate. Both form and content are beautiful. The book helps the minister tremendously in the cultivation of the religion of the spirit; one is made to realize the beauty of holiness most vividly. How cosmopolitan is this hymnal! In singing from it one has already attained the unity of the spirit.

The price of the Hymnal is $1.00 per copy, cloth,

Send for a returnable copy today, and bring the musical

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS

Communions Are Now Using United Church

and HERBERT L. WILLETT, Editors

Rev. Herbert O. Allen,

Congregational Church, Sheldon, Ia.

The mechanical work on this hymnal is perfect. The binding is tasteful and flexible, and the beautiful, clear and open page with all verses printed in the staff is a continual delight. As for the editorial judgment evident in the selection of hymns and tunes, I think you have struck upon a happy medium as no others have done. Advisedly you have included several of the modern composers, and we find the good old hymns and tunes of our fathers, but you have included many of the more popular and worthy of the standard gospel hymns also—hymns that are a delight to “mere man.” In short, you have given us a thoroughly usable book for the whole people. It is possible to select hymns upon all subjects and for all classes and services. The responses also are well selected. Hymns of the United Church comes nearest to the hymnal I have been looking for during the past twenty-five years.

Rev. George H. Brown,

First Christian Church, Troy, N. Y.

We have used your book, Hymns of the United Church, for more than a year now, and I am glad to write that it is growing in favor all the time. It seems to me a perfect hymnal in every particular, and I am sure it will lend dignity to any service. The hymns are very choice, the responsive readings fine—I have never seen better—and the mechanical make-up is all that could be desired.

Rev. W. F. Rothenburger,

First Christian Church, Springfield, Ill.

After one year of constant use of Hymns of the United Church for regular worship and occasions such as are incident to the calendar of a busy church we are glad to say that it is most satisfactory. Its arrangement is most pleasing to the eye and the selection of hymns among the best in the field of hymnology.

Rev. James Watson,

University Cong. Church, Vermilion, S. D.

We are very much pleased with Hymns of the United Church. The book suits our purpose in every way. The feature which led us to decide to purchase these books was the fact that while the quality was as good as any we considered, it had the additional advantage of having the words of the hymn all contained within the score.

Rev. Clifton S. Ehlers,

Calvary Christian Church, Baltimore, Md.

Since installing the Hymns of the United Church in our church there has been a great increase in congregational singing and a deepening of the spirit of worship in consequence. Men who could not in good conscience sing some of the hymns we used in the old book, because of the sentimentality or the theological implications, sing with appreciation the great hymns of the spiritual life. It is an interesting fact that our Sunday-school, after years of use of the characteristic Sunday-school songs, are now singing out of Hymns of the United Church and are using much of the responsive material in the book.

Rev. Robt. S. Sidebotham,

Presbyterian Church, Manistique, Mich.

We selected this hymnal from all available books as the best, and have seen no reason to change our minds. We like it more as we use it more. Music and words together—a large choice of singable hymns—a rare selection of responsive readings—these are some of the things that give it a high place in our thinking. It is as free from denominational bias as any book we know.

Rev. J. E. Wolfe,

First Christian Church, Independence, Mo.

I want to tell you of our great satisfaction with Hymns of the United Church. It is thoroughly gratifying to have such an abundance of hymns that enable a congregation to express in song its deepest hopes, yearnings, aspirations in such days as these. Such a hymnal we find the Hymns of the United Church to be.

Rev. Henry P. Atkins,

Federation Secretary, Cincinnati, O.

The choice of title for this hymnal could not have been more felicitous. These are the hymns of the Kingdom—the hymns of life and service—in which the church has already united. The message of this hymnal is the true message of the pulpit.

Rev. Burris Jenkins,

Linwood Boul. Christian Church Kansas City

Hymns of the United Church, in use for some years at Linwood Boulevard, is highly satisfactory. Indeed, the book is reverent, worshipful, uplifting, inspiring. It fills precisely and fully the needs of our congregation.

in lots of 50 or more. Single copy, cloth, $1.50 standards of your church up to 20th century ideals

508 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

A BOOK TABLE for YOUR CHURCH

Read this testimony from Rev. Wm. L. Stidger, of Detroit, Mich.:

“WE have a book table at St. Mark’s. Every book on that table is worth-while. One of our circles of women has charge of these book tables. There is a table in each lobby. The idea is not to make money but to see that good books are available for all. The women sell the books in exactly that spirit; they feel that they are helping in a real ministry of books when they sell a book to a member of the church. They feel that their work is an extension of the preaching ministry of the church. We do not allow this sacred idea of the ministry of books to degenerate into a money-making scheme, even though it is that to a certain extent. The average person actually does not know how to get a book when he feels the impulse to possess it. He must either write to a publishing house or he must go downtown to a bookstore. And many of the book stores know little about books. The book table in a church makes it easy for folks to buy books, and the alert minister will be willing to take time out of his busy life to see that books are made easy of access to his people. People really want books. They are proud of having a well-chosen library, although few of them know how to select books for such a library. It is not an uncommon thing for the women who run the book table in my church to have a young man or an older man come to them and say, ‘I want every one of the books that Mr. Stidger has preached about. Get me one copy of each.’ The last request of this kind meant an order of twenty-five books. I see to it that several copies of the book on which I am going to preach are on our tables. They are invariably sold following the sermon.”

Dr. F. F. Shannon, successor to Dr. Gunsaulus at Central Church, Chicago, Dr. Lynn Harold Hough and Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones of Detroit, are all exponents of the book table for churches.

Why not have a Book Table in your church? Note list of 100 selected books on page 29 of this issue. Send us, on coupon below, list of from five to ten books which you think your people would be interested in. We will ship books at once, for your Book Table, and you may have from 30 to 60 days to pay for them. Note, however, that you need not confine your selection to this list. We shall be glad to secure for you any books now in print.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn St. CHICAGO, ILL.

BOOK ORDER COUPON

Gentlemen: I wish to start a book account with you. Please send at once the following books, and I will pay for them in 30 or 60 days:

.....
.....
.....
.....
.....
.....	My name
.....	Address

(Give author, if possible; also publisher, if known.)

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY
38
1921: Jan-Jun

DATE	ISSUED TO

